The Last Malfoy

Chapter 1: The Last Malfoy

Under a black sky, through a curtain of errant midsummer rain, they buried Lucius Malfoy in the same family crypt where fourteen generations of his ancestors had been laid before him.

Everyone agreed that his widow comported herself well. She wore a high-collared black gown with gloves and a black umbrella, showing as little skin as an abbess, and when she lifted the veil from her face to give the eulogy, not one tear crossed her pale cheek. A blond eight-year-old stood at her side throughout.

Draco did not speak during the ceremony. He was wet and cold, and his father was dead, and he didn't want to talk to people.

"Such a shame," said one of the mourners, an aged and skeletal dandy clad in a waistcoat of black-and-white checks. He fingered the short white triangle of his beard. "In his prime. And from such a great house…"

As if Brutus Travers wouldn't have burned Malfoy Manor to rubble in exchange for one galleon and a firm handshake.

"Thank you, Travers," said Narcissa. "Your kindness is as boundless as your generosity."

Draco snorted. He had heard his parents speak about Brutus Travers before, and so happened to know this was an insult, but it was still true.

"I only hope it can do some good. Have they found Lestrange?"

Narcissa lowered her head. Travers shook his head, taking her silence as an answer.

“A terrible thing,” he said. “I could not conceive of it. It’s shocking, simply shocking.”

She pursed her lips and looked away across the graveyard. Rows of dead Malfoys rose like a silent battalion from the dark green earth, their white tombs pressing ghostly and pale through the fog.

Draco realized that one day he would lie there, too, in that cold silent earth beside his father, and it frightened him. He squeezed his mother’s hand.

“We are assured that the Aurors are doing everything in their power,” said Narcissa.

“Yes, and what powers they are,” drawled Travers.

“I fail to take your meaning.”

“My meaning? Nothing, nothing at all. Only that, if you forgive my presumption, sometimes I wonder if the Ministry’s politics do not favor… what shall we say? Men of your late husband’s disposition.”

Narcissa said dully, “We trust that the Ministry is doing everything it can. You must excuse us; my son is tired.”

He bowed. “Certainly. But my dear lady, please, if there is anything I can do, any comfort I can provide… Rest assured there is no favor too great, no request too extraordinary, that you can make of me. It would honor me most profoundly to be of any service to the heavenly Narcissa Black.”

She smiled without teeth. “I fear you are many years too late for that, Travers,” she said. “But if the same offer extends to Narcissa Malfoy, she will gratefully accept. Come, Draco.”

They drew away from the mourners. The fog was creeping over the black hills in long, ghostly fingers that reminded him of his father. It crowned the treetops and clustered around the parapets of the Manor, leaving a gilding of droplets on the windows and dripping condensation from the eaves. The cuffs of his trousers were dark and spotted with dew, and he wished that he were old enough to have a wand, so that he could cast a Scouring Charm, or better yet, a Disillusionment Charm, to make them invisible. Years in the future, he would still remember how he had fretted for his trouser-cuffs, even as they laid fresh dirt on his father's coffin ten meters away.

He hadn't really considered the fact that his father was dead. It was too big of a thing to think about. He could not take it all at once, but had to approach it gradually, skittishly, from the sides and in pieces, rushing in and catching little bits of it unawares — like the absence of a place setting to head the table at dinner, or the newfound silence that emanated from his mother's study in the evenings, or the missing shadow over Draco's shoulder while he worked at his Latin. These were the things that Draco understood. He was only eight, and he had never thought about death except in books.

He wished he could ask his father about it. Lucius would have said something arch and dismissive and yet utterly practical to comfort him, like: "Don't be so pedestrian, Draco," or "I do not intend to die; I have no intention of leaving my home vulnerable to that pack of vultures at Inland Revenue and their estate tax." And then Draco would have felt better, and he would have asked his father for a game of chess, which his father might have granted if he felt like it; and they might have spent the evening that way, in a cool but somehow companionable silence, until Dobby came to put him to bed.

"Mother," he said quietly. Narcissa continued to lead them away from the mourners.

"Yes?"

"When Mister Travers—"

"Speak softly, Draco," she said, sotto voce. "Voices carry on the glen."

“Sorry, Mother.” He lowered his voice. “What did Mister Travers mean? About Lestrange?”

Narcissa squeezed his hand tightly. So tightly, in fact, that he balked and grimaced, tugging fruitlessly at her grip.

“Damn him,” she said absentmindedly. Then, turning to Draco: “My darling, do you know where your father is?”

“He’s dead.”

“Yes. He’s dead. And someday you and I shall speak together, as grownups, about why that is; but that day is not today. Can you be patient for me, my sweet one?”

“Yes, Mother.”

“Thank you.” She glanced back at the party, and then knelt, which so shocked Draco that he repressed a gasp: she would get grass stains on her skirts.

“Now, I know I have only just asked you a favor,” she whispered, “but I need one more.”

“Of course, Mother. Anything.”

“Your father is dead now—”

“This has been established.”

“—which means you are the Lord Malfoy. His house is your house; his name is your name. You are his heir. The last Malfoy, do you understand? The last real Malfoy left alive.”

“But you—”

“Are a Malfoy’s wife,” she said. “But not his blood. Do you understand the importance of blood, sweet one? You know that it matters? How much it matters? And why?”

“Yes, Mother.”

“And you know,” she said, drawing him into her arms, “what you have to do now, don’t you?”

He felt her hands close around his shoulders and squeeze tightly. Her voice rasped low in his ear, with a sudden coldness that reminded him of nothing so much as Lucius.

“You must be brave,” hissed Narcissa, her fingers digging bruises into his shoulders. “Because the vultures are coming. They will scrape the flesh from this great house, and they will eat its bones. They will eat you. They will eat you. They will gobble you up and swallow you, if you give them the chance. You must eat them first.”

Draco nodded into her shoulder. He felt tears welling in his eyes and bit them back, sniffing angrily. It wouldn’t do for his first action as the Lord Malfoy to break down blubbering like a thankless child.

“Good. Here.” She took his hand and placed something small in his palm. He lifted it to the light: it was polished stone ring, inset with a black garnet, upon which was etched a double-headed snake, joined at the middle, entwined with an elaborate letter ‘M.’

“This is Father’s.”

She pressed his fingers closed around it. “It is Lord Malfoy’s,” she said, her voice suddenly clear and strong. “It was your father’s.” In a lower voice, she said, “Draco, they are watching.”

He looked across the lawn and noticed that the mourners had begun to drift away from the crypt, and were gliding slowly toward the Manor, their dark robes rustling over dew-silvered grass like tongues of smoke. He felt, rather than saw, that his mother was right, and their eyes grew hot on the back of his neck.

He looked at his mother, nodded silently, and put the ring in his pocket.

“Good boy,” she said, and if her voice trembled, then the tremor was gone by the time she spoke again. She said, “Shall we go on, my darling?”

Draco understood from her tone that there was no alternative.

His father was dead. He was the last Malfoy alive. And he would be brave.

Wordlessly, he turned away from his mother’s outstretched hand, and led the crowd of mourners out of the graveyard.

Chapter 2: September, 1991

It's a nice day to start again.

—Billy Idol, “White Wedding”

Draco waited dolefully for Narcissa to stop fussing with his collar. The humiliation of the ordeal was somewhat made up for by the fact that across the platform, countless eleven-year-olds suffered the same fate with equally dour expressions. Over by the luggage carts, Goyle’s mother was festooning his cheeks with kisses, and the idea of Narcissa doing this to him in public turned his stomach so violently that he felt a rush of appreciation for his mother, who was after all a woman of great dignity and poise, and knew better than to disgrace them both with such fretting.

It was September first. He was eleven years old. He carried a trunk of dragonhide leather with silver finishing, and a cage for Ulysses, which he had covered with his cloak, both to quiet the owl and let him sleep on the train. He wore his robes and dress trousers, his uniform pressed, unwrinkled, and perfect. In his pocket was his wand: ten inches, hawthorn wood and unicorn hair, as-yet unused.

The scarlet steam engine howled and belched smoke, which gave him an excuse to extract himself.

“Mother, please. I don’t want to miss the train.”

“You won’t miss it, my love. They’ll hardly leave with all these people still on the platform.”

“That’s the second bell, and the engine’s making all that steam, I really don’t want to take chances—”

She laughed and wiped a (wholly imaginary! He had checked the mirror, thrice) smudge from his cheek. She stage-whispered, “Alas, I think you’re right. Look! It’s starting to move! Hurry!”

He spun around, even though some part of him knew he was being made fun of, because — well, one didn’t like to take chances. His reflection in the shining and motionless side of the traincar stared back at him: irritated and embarrassed.

Narcissa’s laugh sounded behind him like a passel of silver bells. She reached out to fidget with his robes again, and he stepped out of her reach.

“Unsporting of me,” she admitted. “But you really needn’t worry. If you do miss it, we can always Floo you in through Snape’s office.”

“But I don’t want to go in through Snape’s office. I want to go in on the boats like everyone else.”

“Then you shall have your boats, darling.”

“And I don’t want to be late.”

“Very wise of you. A prudent wizard is punctual.” She bent and kissed the air above his right cheek, and then presented her cheek for the same honor, which he obediently gave. With a short sharp breath, she straightened. “All right. I won’t make you stand here squirming any longer.”

Overwhelmed by a sudden wave of affection, commingled with fear, Draco seized her hand. She wrapped it in both of her own, lifted it to her mouth, and kissed each of his knuckles, including the one where the signet ring sat, though it was far too large for his small finger. Then she dropped it and said, in a voice full of iron and dignity, “Goodbye, Draco,” which was his way of knowing that he was dismissed; other people had heard her.

He hauled his trunk down the narrow alley between compartments, ignoring the bustle and clamor around him. He passed a round-faced boy who was moaning about his toad, and a glance at the recipient of this moaning clocked her as Augusta Longbottom. He nodded to her and kept moving, hoping that she wouldn’t recognize him. The Longbottoms were good stock, but word had it the boy was a squib. The pureblood community had been broadly surprised to hear he’d received a Hogwarts letter at all, but rumor had it Augusta bullied his way in with a strongly worded letter to Albus Dumbledore.

A pair of boys with bright red hair were languishing by the doorway to another compartment, helping first years with their luggage. “Come on up! One at a time! There you go, mate, hop on. I’ve got it, leggo. All right. That’ll be twelve galleons. What, you’ve never heard of tips? Stingy, aren’t we? Oh, never mind, I’m only joking. You’re fine. Welcome to Hogwarts, I’m Fred.”

As Draco approached, the other boy stepped into his way. “Hullo, Ickle Firstie,” he chirped. “Help you with your trunk?”

“No, thank you.”

“You sure? You’re none too big, my friend, and that trolley’s heavier than you are.” The redhead paused and gave him a studious look. “Oi. Do I know you from somewhere?”

“I don’t think so.”

“You sure? You never been in the papers or nothing? I swear I’ve seen that face before.” The boy squinted at him, and his expression cleared. “Oh! I know you! Fred, c’mere, look! It’s the Malfoy brat.”

“No way,” said Fred, craning his neck. The twins leaned against the wall with identical and somewhat uncanny poses. “Looks just like his Dad, dun’ee?”

“I thought so. Got a face I’d seen in the papers.”

“Didn’t realize he was in Ron’s year.”

“Small for his age, now you mention it.”

“Don’t his house elves feed him enough?”

“Seems not.”

“Don’t say much, does he?”

“No. Strong and silent type.”

“Knowing his father, maybe that’s for the best.”

Draco cleared his throat. “Excuse me,” he said, as calmly as he could. “If you don’t mind, I’d like to sit down.”

He half expected them to refuse, but to his relief, they let him pass. “Hey,” called Fred, sounding almost apologetic. “Do you want help with that trunk? Seriously, it’s no charge.”

“No, thank you.”

“I’m Fred,” he called. “That’s George. If you need anything, you can holler for us — or our brother, Percy. He’s the Gryffindor prefect, can’t miss him, just look for the big freckly git with a ‘P’ on his chest.”

“I said no thank you, Weasley, is there something wrong with your ears?” he snapped. Fred and George exchanged a balking glance.

After a moment, hearing his mother’s voice nagging in his ear, he swallowed and said coldly, “Please accept my apologies.”

Then he hauled his trunk past them and — finally landing upon an empty compartment — he wrestled his trunk inside, slammed the door, and shut the blinds.

The train gave a great bellow and began to move. Draco sat by the window and watched the houses flash past, first at a crawl, then at a sprint, and finally flying so quickly that they bled together and turned into a ruddy smear of brick and stone and fog, the colors of London in its brute industrial glory.

Watching the landscape fly away, a cold wave of loneliness crested over his head. The panic and paranoia of one's first solitary venture away from home seized him, as it always does, at the very moment it becomes impossible to turn back, and it occurred to Draco that for the first time in his life, he was going to a place where not one person loved him, because he was leaving behind the only person in the world who already did.

A tap came on the door of the compartment. He ignored it. He wasn't in the mood to be disturbed.

The tap came again. Then, to his alarm, the door slid open, revealing a girl with crooked teeth and absolutely astonishing amounts of hair.

"Hello," she said breathlessly. "I'm Hermione Granger. Is anyone sitting here?"

He stared. He didn't know her, which meant she wasn't from Society. She wore her Hogwarts robes, sans tie, which meant she was a First Year, like him. The name Granger was British, though it could've been French, which didn't rule out any of the noble bloodlines. Frankly, she could have been anybody, except that she had the tone of someone very much used to getting her own way, either by hook or ingenious crook. Draco knew this tone well, because it also happened to be his.

She waited for him to speak, and when he didn't, she bit her lip. "I'm sorry to bother," she said, "but it's packed full everywhere else and I've been walking around for ages and I don't want to sit in a car full of strangers. I thought this was empty when I found it. If you'd rather not be disturbed that's fine, I don't even hardly want to talk, I just want somewhere to sit and read my book."

She held up a worn and threadbare copy of Hogwarts: A History. It was so beat-up that Draco could barely read the title, and something appeared to have taken a bite out of the spine.

Unable to think of a reason to refuse her, he shrugged. “Fine.” He waved rudely at the seat across from him and turned back to the window.

“Thank you,” she said fervently, and hopped onto the seat. He heard her rustling around, arranging herself, and then the rustling of pages.

She cleared her throat a little, and gave an actual happy sigh of contentment, like the mere act of opening a book gave her so much joy she couldn’t contain herself.

He snuck a glance at her and found her already engrossed in the volume. She was cross-legged, with the book splayed open in her lap, and with one finger she scanned each line, her eyes flying across the pages with remarkable speed. A strand of hair drifted into her face (with that much hair, it was surely impossible for some of it not to end up there) and absentmindedly, she ran it between her lips. Draco found this gross, ill-bred, and excellent evidence as to why he should refrain from the charitable impulse to share his compartment in the future.

Still, she was already here, so it wasn’t like he could very well remove her. He leaned his head against the window and closed his eyes, hoping that he could escape the girl’s various irritations with a nap.

This was not to be, however. Not two minutes had passed before the girl lifted her head and said, “Excuse me?”

He breathed deeply, pretending to be asleep.

“Excuse me?” She could not (or chose not to) take the hint. “Sorry. Um… you, there?”

Without opening his eyes, he muttered: “Yes?”

“Are you… I mean, not are you, but does your family…” She tapped her finger on her mouth, frowning. “Are your parents wizards?”

He lifted his head and stared at her.

“Sorry if that’s a rude question,” she said hastily. “I don’t know. I’m sort of new to all this. I just —”

“Yes,” he said slowly, wondering if she had been raised these eleven years under the surface of an actual rock, or was perhaps merely deranged. “I come from a… large… wizarding family.”

“Oh, good!” She beamed. “Then can I ask you a question?”

“You haven’t seemed to need my permission so far.”

“Could you tell me what this word means?” She flipped the book around and held it out to him, pointing to a line on the browned and moth-eaten page. “I have a copy of Metaxia’s Marvelous Magical Dictionary in my luggage, but it’s buried under my robes. It’s funny, reading this is sort of like reading Latin. I need a lexicon to work through it.”

“Most of it is Latin,” he said, and without meaning to, he glanced down at the word her finger indicated. “You might as well get a lexicon, it’ll help. Move your finger, I can’t read the word.”

“Oh, sorry.” She shifted her grip, revealing that she had indicated the word ‘quidditch.’

“Quidditch?” he repeated. “You don’t know what quidditch is?”

She bristled. “There’s no need to take that tone,” she said. “I’ve never been to Hogwarts before, and the book doesn’t explain what it is.”

“I’ve never been there either, but — you’ve never heard of quidditch? Really? The biggest sport in the world?” At her uncomprehending gaze, he continued, “It’s on brooms? With balls? And hoops? Honestly, didn’t your parents ever take you to a game?”

“I doubt I’d have liked it if they did,” she said haughtily. “I hate sports.”

He ignored this toothless riposte for the diversion it was. “So does my mum. But she knows what quidditch is.”

“And now I do, too.” She cleared her throat to disguise her obvious embarrassment. “Thank you. I appreciate your enlightening me, Mister…” She trailed off meaningfully.

“Malfoy,” he sighed. “Draco Malfoy.”

“Thank you, Draco,” she said, in a tone so full of superiority and cool, inscrutable primness that it would have had Narcissa clapping in approval.

He rolled his eyes and turned back to the window. She gave a short huff and returned to her book.

Five minutes later, she cleared her throat again. He suppressed a sigh.

“Yes?”

She was pointing at another word, now, although he noticed she’d moved through a remarkable number of pages in the time since their last exchange. “I really am sorry to bother,” she said, though she sounded less sorry than she’d been the first time. “But do you know what a ‘remem-brall’ is? I’ve looked in the appendix, and it doesn’t explain anything.”

At least that one made sense. A remembrall was relatively advanced magic, and Draco wouldn’t have known what it was, either, if his grandmother hadn’t used to wear one in a pouch around her neck. “It’s a magical item,” he explained. “It’s this little glass ball full of fog. You rub it, and it turns red when you’ve forgotten something.”

Her brow furrowed. “Oh,” she said. “But that’s not very useful, is it?”

“What do you mean?”

“I mean, does it tell you what you’ve forgotten?”

“I — well — no,” he said, slightly aggrieved. “I imagine once you know you’ve forgotten, you’re more likely to remember.”

“Yes, but, if the rembrall—”

“Remembrall.”

“—if the rememberall—”

“Remembrall.”

“If the object,” the girl said forcefully, “can already tell that you’ve forgotten something, then presumably it knows what thing you’ve forgotten, right? So why can’t it just show you a picture of the thing you’ve forgot?”

He rubbed his chin, puzzling.

“I don’t know,” he said. “I haven’t read much about them.”

“Oh. I see. Well, thanks, anyway.”

This time he did not bother to try for sleep. He put his head against the window and waited, brooding, as he felt (rather than saw) her curiosity mount. It manifested in physical signs: her knee bounced. Her fingers fidgeted with the corner of the page. She gave long sighs that were probably meant to make him ask what she wanted.

But Draco had trained in passive aggression at the feet of Narcissa Malfoy, and he would not be outdone by anyone less than that master herself.

“Okay, one more question and that’s all I promise—”

“Granger.”

“I promise! I’m very sorry to bother you, but honestly I’ve already read the book twice through and I’ve been wondering about these things for ages only there’s been nobody to ask—”

“And you happen to be on a train to the best wizarding school in the world, so why don’t you, I don’t know, ask a teacher?”

“You’re very sour about this for someone who wasn’t even doing anything. I mean it’d be one thing if you were reading or talking to friends or what-have-you,” she said matter-of-factly, “but you’re just sitting here alone.”

“I was trying to sleep,” muttered Draco.

She sniffed and withdrew further into her corner of the compartment, cradling the book like an injured pet. “You sleep with your eyes open?” she muttered. “That’s remarkable. Wish I could do that, then I could read and sleep at the same time.”

Draco folded his arms and crossed his legs, feigning indifference, though his irritation was mounting and it was taking an increasing amount of effort not to snap at her. His mother had told him to be polite to everybody, but it seemed to him that Narcissa failed to take into account just how annoying ‘everybody’ could be.

From Granger’s side of the compartment there came a small, short sigh. It sounded slightly hurt.

He pinched the bridge of his nose and massaged it with deep, swift strokes. “Listen,” he said. “You’re obviously not from around here—”

“I’m from Hampstead Garden.”

“Yes, the middle of nowhere, like I said. Anyway, even though your parents decided not to raise you in Society, for whatever idiotic reason, you’re obviously trying to make up for it, and I respect that you’re trying. Annoying as it is. It’s not very easy, cutting your way in from the outside.” He regretted this as soon as he said it. He regretted it not least because she swelled up with pride and pleasure and all sorts of horrible saccharine emotions that probably made her think she should keep talking to him.

“Thank you, Draco,” she said. Then, possibly as a reward for having paid her a compliment, she fell quiet and returned to her book.

While they had been talking, the train had carried them out of London. Now they were speeding past full-bodied swells of grass and sheep, split here and there by low stone walls and dilapidated fences. Silence reigned for a while, Granger engrossed in Bagshot’s magnum opus and Draco in the landscape outside. Aside from the occasional flutter of a turning page, she kept her promise of being unobtrusive, and after a while he ceased to find it bothersome. In fact (though he would rather snog a grindylow than admit it), it was somewhat nice to have another presence in the compartment, another set of breaths, the occasional movement to remind him that he was not the only First Year on the train.

At half past twelve, there was a clattering in the corridor, and a plump, matronly woman slid back their door. “Anything off the cart, dears?” she inquired.

Draco, who had a packed lunch from Dobby in his satchel, shook his head. But Granger’s head snapped up, and with childish delight, she said, “Do you have any chocolates?”

“Plenty, love,” said the trolley woman cheerfully. “What’ll you have? Chocolate Frogs? Cauldron Cakes? Fudge Flies?”

“Oh, er… do you have Cadbury?”

Draco frowned. He wondered if that was one of those foreign sweets that his mother imported. It would explain a lot if the girl grew up abroad. There was a junior boarding school in Switzerland, as he recalled, with a good reputation; the Greengrasses sent their girls there.

The trolley woman shook her head. “Don’t think so, m’afraid.”

“That’s all right. I’ll try the, er… chocolate frogs, then.”

“Good choice, m’love, those are a crowd-pleaser. You might try some Cauldron Cakes, too, if you’re new to them. Bit easier to get down.” She winked.

“I’ll take two.” Granger pulled out a beaded coinpurse and poked around for change. “Do you want anything?” she asked Draco.

His lip curled. “I’m perfectly capable of buying my own candy.”

“I didn’t say you weren’t,” she exclaimed. “I just thought I’d offer. My mum always told me to share my candy with my friends.”

He suddenly felt silly for snapping. Sulking, he folded his arms and leaned further into the window. “I have my own lunch, thank you.”

“Suit yourself,” she said, after a moment, and turned back to the trolley. “That’ll be all, then.”

“Very good, dearie. Four sickles and seven knuts.”

There was a long pause.

“Sickles?”

“Yes, four sickles, seven knuts, please and thank you.”

There was a jingle of coins. Granger said doubtfully, “And — and how many quid is that, exactly?”

“Quid, dearie?”

“Quid? As in, pounds sterling?” A beat passed. “The national currency of Britain?”

Incapable of bearing any more excruciation, Draco stood up. “Good Lord,” he snapped. “Here.” Shouldering Granger out of the way, he dug into his pocket and pulled out a handful of sickles, which he emptied into the trolley woman’s waiting palm without counting them. “Take it and leave us alone,” he said.

“Heavens,” said the trolley woman mildly. “Have it your way. Meant no offense.” She trundled off, mumbling something about uppity children under her breath.

Granger said, “Draco—”

He rounded on her. “Are you really that much of a twit, or have you never heard of money before?”

The guilt and gratitude melted out of her eyes with remarkable speed. “I know what money is, thank you,” she snapped. “My parents gave me five pounds to get lunch on the train, and I was trying to pay her.”

“Pounds of what?”

“‘Pounds of what’? Are you having me on?”

“I was going to ask you the same question.”

She thrust out her coinpurse, her hand trembling slightly in indignation. “Look,” she said hotly. “I know that I’m not very good at all this yet, and I have a lot to learn, and that you just did something nice for me even though I’ve been in here bothering and pestering you all afternoon and you probably wish I’d sat somewhere else. But I do want to learn and I do want to pay you back and I don’t want you to have to pay just because I didn’t know something and happened to sit with you, that's not fair and that's not right. So why don't you just take however many pence the candy cost out of my purse, and we'll call it even."

Draco wrinkled his nose at the proffered purse. "It was four sickles," he said, in the same way he might have said, It was four pieces of lint. "You don't have to pay that back."

"I don't care how much it was. Just take it." She shook the bag and added, "Please."

He sighed, and in the hopes that it would get her to drop the subject, he reached into the coinpurse. What he withdrew were coins like none he'd ever seen before in his life: silver and heptagonal, engraved with the profile of some random old bint in a crown. The lettering on top read 'ELIZABETH II / D.G. REG F.D. / 1987,' which might as well have been Ancient Runes for all the good it did him.

"Who's Elizabeth the Second?" he asked.

Her jaw dropped.

"Elizabeth Windsor?" she said, in the same way he'd said 'quidditch.' "Queen Elizabeth?"

He paused. "Right, the muggle queen," he said slowly. "But I'm assuming this is someone different."

"Why would it be? It's muggle money."

He almost dropped the coinpurse, fingering it as if it burned him. "Why are you carrying muggle money?" he spat, shoving it back at her.

"I didn't think it'd be a problem! The shops in Diagon Alley all took it!"

"That's because they can trade it in at Gringotts," he said, "and because Diagon Alley's gone to the dogs, the only classy shops left are up Knockturn Alley. Where'd you even get muggle money?"

“I told you, my parents gave it to me.”

He narrowed his eyes. “Your parents.”

“Yes.”

“Who are… wizards.”

“No, normal people,” she said automatically.

“You’re a mudblood!” His voice cracked in dismay.

She cocked her head to one side, utterly untouched by the insult. Of course she wouldn’t be, she didn’t know what it meant. And he shouldn’t have been so loud. His mother would have been upset with him. Not in public, she would have scolded. Give them no reason to suspect you. Be polite; feign whatever creeds you must in order to access to the storerooms of power.

“What’s that?” asked Granger.

He chose each word as if he might someday have to repeat it on record. “It means your parents are muggles,” he said. “That’s what some people call it.”

“Oh. Yes. Then I’m a mudblood.”

He winced. “No, n–not exactly.”

“What do you mean? It’s like you said. A mudblood is a person whose parents are muggles, and my parents are muggles. Therefore —”

“Yes, but that’s not the word for it.”

“Why?” Her head tipped even further to one side, like an inquisitive bird. Her tongue probed the inside of her cheek, and suddenly, understanding ignited behind her eyes. “Is it a mean word for it?”

“Yes.”

“But you used it on me.”

“Yes. It slipped out. I’m sorry.”

“Why? Is it a word you use often?”

“I try not to.”

“Because it’s mean?”

“Yes, because it’s mean,” he lied.

“Oh. Well, if you’re trying,” she said, matter-of-factly, “then I’m not going to be angry at you for slipping up. And you did buy me candy, so.” She mulled over this balancing of the moral scale, and judged it in his favor. “I won’t yell at you for it, I suppose. But mind, if you do it again, I will yell at you. And Mum says I’m quite terrible when I yell.”

“Noted.”

She looked down at the coinpurse in his hand. “I don’t suppose you have any use for the money, then,” she said.

“No, not really.”

“That’s a shame. I did want to pay you back. Maybe you could have some candy? That way I wouldn’t feel like you weren’t getting anything out of it.”

He returned her coinpurse, pinched distastefully between two fingers. “I don’t really care. It’s four sickles. You’ve hardly bankrupted me.”

“But it matters to me,” she said, and to his surprise, she sounded like she meant it. “Fair is fair.”

It occurred to him that he and this girl did not understand each other on any number of levels, one of them financial, most of them moral, and at least three of them spiritual.

“All right. How’s this? You give me one of those Cauldron Cakes, and keep the other two, as compensatory damages for emotional injury.”

“You mean, for calling me a mudblood.”

“Yes. That. So we’ll be square. And —” He hesitated. “And you’ll promise not to tell any teachers about it.”

She considered this and deemed it acceptable. “Very well,” she said crisply, and handed over her side of the settlement. “Deal.”

He set the Cauldron Cake on the seat next to him and, deciding that he should eat something substantive before his sweets, dug out his lunch.

Dobby had outdone himself: in one compartment of the lunch tin sat a gridded diamond of sandwiches, with layers of grilled ham, gouda, arugula, and caramelized onions stacked between generous slices of country bread. Beside that another compartment was filled with potato wedges, baked to crisp golden brown and encrusted with salt, and roasted carrots glazed with a balsamic vinaigrette, and for dessert, a bowl of fresh blackberries, crowned with a single dollop of thick whipped cream.

In the center of the box there was a card. It read: wishng master Draco a very gud first day and hopping the ellvs at hogwarts well be feeding him rightly. but not too rightly so he remembers to com home once in every whiles. love dobby.

There was a hotness behind his eyes. He blinked furiously and tried not to think of home, or the warm brassy kitchens of Malfoy Manor, or the single place setting Dobby would be laying out tonight for his mother’s supper.

Granger snapped him out of his moping with a mighty yelp. She had ripped open the Chocolate Frog, and the creature — an unusually spry member of its species, to her misfortune — had made a desperate bid for its freedom, landing in her hair.

Draco let out a wheezing guffaw before he could stop himself. “Merlin,” he said, “it’s a Chocolate Frog, what did you expect?”

“Nothing, obviously! I come from the muggle world! Our chocolate isn’t alive! It doesn’t move! Most things we eat aren’t still moving when we eat them! Oh, oh, oh, it’s in my hair —”

“Calm down, would you, it’s just a bit of chocolate.”

“I can feel it wriggling around!” She swatted frantically at her hair, trying to claw it out. The frog, tiring of the volatile environment around it, made a leap for the window. Draco moved quickly and caught it. Once in his grip, it froze and became inert, as they all did.

“That was horrible,” she whined. He offered it back to her, and she shook her head vehemently. “No. I’m never touching one of those again. That’s a foul trick to play on somebody who just wanted some chocolate.”

“I can’t stand creepy-crawlies,” she said passionately. “Bugs and rats and newts and toads. I don’t like them.”

It occurred to him that she was going to loathe Care of Magical Creatures. Then again, she wasn’t alone in that. Draco had never cared for animal handling. If he ever found himself in a situation where his life depended on being liked by a beast, he had already made too many mistakes to be worth saving.

Granger had discovered the Chocolate Frog card. She held it away from her face, as if suspicious that it might try to jump her, too. “Oh, I recognize these. They’re like the cards you can get for baseball players. Let’s see who I’ve got. ‘Bartemius Crouch’? Well, gosh. He’s not a very friendly-looking fellow.”

Draco swallowed hard around a bit of sandwich, and it settled unpleasantly in his stomach.

He felt vaguely sick. He nodded.

“Draco?” She looked up. “I said, do you think he’s—”

“I heard you. He is.”

“Really? Because I’ve read a lot of books about the Wizarding War and Harry Potter and everything, and he didn’t come up once.”

“He wouldn’t,” he said. He pushed aside his lunch tin, appetite gone. “His career collapsed after a scandal. Or so I’ve heard.”

“Oh, wow. They don’t mention that at all here. Which I guess they wouldn’t. It’s a trading card, not a tabloid. Oh, but there’s a note here, at the bottom. ‘Coming in slightly below Alastor ‘Mad-Eye’ Moody’ — do all wizards have such funny names? I used to think ‘Hermione’ was bad, honestly — ‘Bartemius Crouch holds the second-place record for largest number of Death Eaters killed in or out of wartime.’ Hm. I’m not sure that’s the sort of appetizing information you ought to put on a trading card.”

“Even so. Death Eaters were horrible murderous people and I suppose I’m very glad that once upon a time this man was out there killing them like mad, but that doesn’t exactly make him the kind of man I’d like to have dinner with.”

Draco shrugged. He wished Granger would drop the subject.

She flipped the card over. “He’s gone!”

“Of course he is. He’s hardly going to sit there all day.”

“Your pictures move?”

“Don’t yours?”

“No. Well, except for movies. But those aren’t really pictures, they’re special moving pictures. That’s we we call them movies. Because—”

“I get the idea.”

She flipped the card over once or twice more, experimentally, to see if Crouch returned. Then she stuck it between the pages of Hogwarts: A History, to use as a bookmark.

The countryside beyond the windowpane contorted and darkened, as did the sky, for late afternoon had come and gone, leaving behind it a dusky and overcast evening. The sheep-studded hills had given way to coarse thickets and emerald fens, rivers that snaked back and forth along ravines, where the train thundered across great bridges made of mossy stone.

Granger (who did better with her Cauldron Cake than she did with the Chocolate Frog) scooted to sit across from Draco so she could see out the window. “It’s beautiful,” she said. “I suppose you’re used to it, though.”

He ignored her.

Having failed to bait him, she tried a more direct approach. “Did your parents go to Hogwarts?”

“Yes. All British wizards do.”

“So you know all about it, then.”

He shrugged.

“What houses were they in? Your parents.”

“Slytherin,” he said flatly.

Her eyes widened. “Oh,” she said.

He hated how her voice changed. As if she knew anything about it. As if a mudblood could possibly understand.

She said, “That’s the house…” But she did not finish.

“The house that what?” he said coldly, enjoying how she flinched. “What did you read about it? Did it come up in your little books?”

“It said that most Death Eaters came from Slytherin,” she said quietly.

“That’s true.”

“And Voldemort,” she said.

“Oh, yes. And Grindelwald, don’t forget him.”

“Right,” she said, trailing off. Then: “I expect you want to end up there, because of your parents, then.”

He shrugged.

“I mean, I would. If my parents went to Hogwarts, I’d want to go where they did. And I’m sure not all Slytherins are bad. You hear about the bad ones because they do bad things, and people like to write about bad things. But I think most Slytherins are probably quite normal, wouldn’t you agree? I mean you were raised by Slytherins, and you don’t seem like,” she swallowed, “an evil human being.”

“Cheers.”

She sniffed. “All the same, I don’t think I’d want to be in Slytherin. I hope I’m in Gryffindor, it sounds by far the best; I hear Dumbledore himself was in it. But I suppose Ravenclaw wouldn’t be too bad.”

“You’ll be in Ravenclaw,” he said, without even having to think about it.

“Really? You think so? I thought so too, but then I worried because it sounded like a lot of bookish folk, which would be ever so much fun but it seems like it churns out a lot of scholars and teachers, thinkers instead of doers. I intend to be a thinker and a doer, you know. I’d like to make some positive change in the world.”

“That’s beautiful. They’ll put that on your trading card.”

“Are you being sarcastic? You are.”

“What tipped you off?”

“Well, your mouth was moving, for one,” she said primly, and he gave a short chirp of laughter which he concealed by turning into a cough.

The compartment door slid open, and two thickset boys shouldered inside. The taller had a buzzcut and a rather furry-looking mole perched on the point of his chin, while the shorter was wider by far and had a stain of something yellow on his robes. Both had the habitual scowl of the bad-tempered, but Draco happened to know they were simply in a state of perpetual indigestion.

“There you are, Malfoy,” said Goyle. “Been looking for you all day. Why ain’t you sitting with us?”

“Aren’t,” said Draco.

“I knows you aren’t, that’s what I’m askin’.”

Granger giggled. This brought her to the attention of the boys, who appeared not to have realized she existed. Draco frankly did not think they were capable of sustaining attention to more than one proper noun at a time.

“Who’re you?” Crabbe said rudely.

She stood up, smiled bracingly, and stuck out her hand. “I’m Hermione Granger. Nice to meet you.”

“Vince Crabbe.” He enveloped her tiny fingers in his fist and pumped it. Draco briefly worried that he might tear her arm off.

“Greg Goyle,” said Goyle, doing the same.

“Pleasure. Are you friends of Draco’s?”

“Yeah, could say so,” said Goyle, eyeing Draco furtively, as if to say: Do we like this one? “Our dads worked together.”

“Part of the same social movement,” said Crabbe, and snickered. Granger frowned, not understanding.

“I’m sorry, I don’t understand. Your families know each other?”

“A long time ago,” Draco said curtly.

“Long,” said Goyle, offended. “It was four years ago, mate. You came over for New Years’ when we was seven.”

“Were.”

Goyle ignored him. “I dunno what happened. We was friends. Then your mum up and vanishes off the face of the earth—”

“Oi, lay off him,” Crabbe grunted. “Ain’t his fault his mum went nutters when his dad died.”

Granger gave a sharp inhale.

Draco stood up and slipped his right hand into his pocket. “Say that again,” he said. He felt very cold. He knew, in some part of his mind, that this was a bad idea, and that he should politely disengage without offending them. He also knew with every part of his mind that he did not give a single solitary damn.

“Hey, now,” Goyle said. “He don’t mean it in the rude way, Malfoy. He only means that it ain’t your fault your mum wasn’t right in the head — I mean everyone says so, even the Ministry—”

“Why, don’t be rude,” Granger exclaimed.

Crabbe and Goyle both goggled at her. “What?”

“I said, don’t be rude.” She stood up, which put her shoulder-to-shoulder with Draco, as they were about the same height. “That’s a terrible thing to say about someone’s mother, even if you do think it’s true, and you should speak more sensitively when someone’s had a death in the family.”

“Hark at her, telling me what to do,” Crabbe leered. “Little snaggle-toothed brat, aren’t you? I bet we could toss you out that window.”

Goyle said, “Might do, too, if it wasn’t wrong to hit a girl.”

“Weren’t,” said Granger, remarkably unintimidated by this very credible threat of physical violence. “And don’t make me laugh. I know types like you. You’re all bark and no bite. You’ll bluster and cuss and spit at people, but really I expect you’ve never had a real fight in his life.”

Draco could have corrected her — Crabbe in particular had been expelled from three preparatory schools for violence against a fellow student — but he was too busy trying to remember what it felt like to see colors other than red.

“Bet on it, wouldja?” sneered Crabbe.

“I could. I’m not afraid of you.”

“Crabbe,” Draco said tightly. “Goyle. You should leave.”

“We don’t feel like leaving, maybe,” said Crabbe, flicking the lock on the door behind him. “Maybe we want to catch up with our friend. Maybe we’ve been missing you, Malfoy.”

Goyle rolled back his sleeve. Crabbe moved forward, forcing Draco to step back, and his shoulders collided with the window. He felt the rattling side of the carriage under his back.

“Maybe you’re the one who wants to leave,” Crabbe said, and he reached forward for the hem of Draco’s robe.

And in a blink, he found himself staggering back, as the point of Draco’s wand drove into the soft flesh of his neck. Goyle leapt back with a cry, and Granger, who had been watching in mixed horror and confusion, cried out: “No, Draco, don’t, you’ll get in trouble!”

“Sod off, Granger, this doesn’t concern you.”

“You will! You’re not supposed to do magic off school grounds, and it’s not safe—”

“You’re bluffing,” blurted Goyle, though he had retreated back to the compartment door. “You don’t know any spells. We ain’t even been to school yet. You don’t know how to use that thing.”

Draco jabbed the point of his wand even further into Crabbe’s neck, and felt a surge of satisfaction in how Crabbe whimpered. “Don’t I? Say another word about my mother, you’ll find out.”

“Don’t you dare! I’ll tell!” shrilled Granger. “I’ll get a prefect! I’ll go find Percy Weasley, and he'll sort all three of you out.”

The invocation of a prefect had a chilling effect on tensions in the compartment. Draco’s grip on his wand slackened slightly, and it gave Crabbe enough leeway to wriggle out from it. Goyle followed him, and though they were fleeing, they stood in the hallway for a moment, as if waiting for Draco to make the last move.

He flicked his wand between them. “Keep my mother’s name out of your mouths,” he said coldly. “Or next time, I’ll let Granger and Weasley deal with what’s left of you.”

The boys fled, and the compartment door slid closed with a final snap.

Granger gave a long exhale, smoothing down her hair. “That was very dramatic,” she said finally. “They’re certainly a pair of unpleasant characters. Was that serious, by the way? Do you actually know how to use any spells?”

He snorted, slipping his wand back into his pocket. “No. Of course not.”

“You were bluffing?”

“Obviously. You?”

“Me? Bluffing about what?”

“Telling the prefect.”

She paused to think about it. “No,” she said. “I would have gone to get Percy, if there was a fight.”

“Tattle-tale, are you?”

“If there’s trouble, of course. But I mightn’t have — told him all the facts.”

He raised his eyebrows. “You’d have lied to him?”

“I wouldn’t have lied. I’d say something like, ‘Come at once, these two big bullies are scrapping with Draco.’ Which would be true.”

“Even if I started it.”

“You didn’t start it,” she said, lifting her nose disdainfully. “They came into our compartment and tried to make a commotion. And they said very rude things about your mother and father, and they weren’t too nice to me, either. So I wouldn’t go out of my way to get you in trouble for it, no.” She paused. “I can’t stand bullies.”

He said, “So it seems.”

A tinny voice echoed through the train. “We will be reaching Hogwarts in five minutes’ time. Please leave your luggage on the train, it will be taken to the school separately.”

Draco took a steadying breath. He glanced out the window and saw that it was nearly night, and the woods flashing past the carriage were shrouded in darkness. He straightened his robes and followed Granger into the crowd thronging the corridor.

The train slowed to a halt. On the platform, Draco found himself sandwiched next to Granger, a position which left much to be desired, since it meant he was frequently swatted by a cloud of bushy hair. Granger did not seem to notice, and kept standing up on her tiptoes to try and see over the crowd. “What’s up front?” she demanded anxiously. “Where are we going? What’s happening? Draco, can you see?”

“I can’t see anything through your dreadful hair.”

“Rude! Oh, where’s a prefect when you need one? They could tell us what to do.”

“In the wizarding world,” she said decisively, “everything should come with an instruction manual.”

A lamp bobbed over the heads of the students, dangling from a dizzying height, and a deep voice boomed above the din. “Firs’ years! Firs’ years over here!”

“Who’s that?” said Granger, yanking on Draco’s sleeve. He wrenched it free of her.

“I don’t know! I can’t see him, either! Why are you asking me?”

“He’s a giant! I mean, have you ever seen a man that tall in your life!”

“I can’t see anything now,” he said irritably. “Refer to, again, the hair.”

She ignored this, and whirled on him, eyes glowing like little brown lanterns. “Isn’t this exciting?” she whispered. “We’re going to magic school!”

He rolled his eyes. Undeterred by his lack of enthusiasm, she hurried after Hagrid, practically skipping with every step.

The First Years trickled down a steep, narrow path between walls of trees. The crowd thinned into a line, since the pathway only permitted two or three at a time to descend safely, without falling off the trail. Passing around the bend, they came upon a wide lake, and perched atop a mountain across the other side was the castle, its windows blazing gold against the night, its spires breaching the clouds. It dwarfed the mountain beneath it, with so many turrets and towers that it ought to have defied the laws of physical space.

A fleet of boats waited on the beaches. Draco lost track of Granger in the hubbub as students scrambled into the dinghies, which, Draco was dismayed to learn, were cramped, wet, and carried a thin layer of lakewater at the bottom. The scummy water splashed on his shoes and lapped at his cuffs as he clambered into the first available boat and sat, hunched and miserable, as far away from the other occupants as was possible.

Across the beach, he caught sight of Granger again — it was easy to pick out the mop of hair — and saw that she had found her way into a boat. She was sitting next to a scrawny boy with black hair and a tall redhead whose gangly limbs and freckles marked his allegiance to the same clan as the Gryffindor prefect. When she caught his eye, she smiled and waved. He nodded back at her reluctantly.

The fleet of boats moved off all at once from shore, gliding across the lake in a motion as smooth and seamless as flying. The other children in Draco's boat starting whispering at once, clutching each other and pointing at the castle as it loomed before them.

"...oldest manmade structure in the Wizarding World, older than Durmstrang, twice as old as Ilvermorny…"

"...made as a fortress, people say it's impregnable, it's never been taken, not once… More secure than Gringotts…"

"... hear about Gringotts? It's been all over the Daily Prophet, someone tried to rob a high security vault."

Draco turned his head. "What did you say?"

The student who'd spoken, a mousy-haired boy with a square face and a brogue you couldn't cut with a cleaver, grinned with satisfaction at the curiosity in Draco's voice. "Someone broke into Gringotts," he said. "My dad got a call because of the security breach. They still don't know who it was."

"And what did they take?" said Draco. He was alarmed on his own behalf, since the Malfoys had several vaults of considerable value, but he would have known already if anything of theirs had been taken.

"Nothing. That's the plot twist. The goblins did a full inventory, and I mean a full, put-it-in-lockdown, nobody-leaves-for-a-fortnight kind of inventory, but nothing was taken. People say it must have been a powerful Dark wizard, but my dad says that's fearmongering nonsense."

"And why's that?" drawled Draco.

"He says there hasn't been a Dark wizard strong enough to crack Gringotts in ten years."

"Ten?"

The boy smirked. "Eleven, to be precise," he said. Then, ostensibly at random, he said, "Did you know Harry Potter's in our year? Wish I could get a look at him. They say he's still got the scar. Love to ask him what he's been doing all these years. My dad says he's been hiding out with Dumbledore, getting private lessons in magic."

"Your dad seems to know an awful lot about all this."

The boy shrugged. "He likes to talk, my dad does. 'Specially when he gets some drinks in him."

"Most do, I suppose."

The boy stuck out his hand. "Name's Theodore," he said.

Draco glanced at it, and resigned himself to what was about to happen.

“Draco Malfoy.”

Recognition flashed across the boy’s face — but nothing more; there was no instinctive sneer, no apprehension, no leer of knowing or disdain. It was simply recognition; that was all. “Ah,” he said. “Yeah. My dad mentioned your dad once or twice.”

Draco set his jaw. “Did he,” he said. “Anything of note?”

“Yeah,” said Theodore. “Said he was filthy brilliant at Transfiguration and couldn’t dance for shite. And it shocked everybody when he pulled your mum.”

The corner of Draco’s mouth tugged up. He flattened it sternly.

“And that he was sorry to hear he’d died,” added Theodore belatedly, in a more somber tone.

Draco dipped his head in acknowledgement. The silence in the boat stretched on for a while as they drifted into a small cove beneath the cliff face, and the moonlight retreated, leaving them only the small lantern in the front of the boat to see by.

“You’re Theodore Nott, aren’t you?” he said. His voice echoed against wet rock.

“Aye.”

“I thought so. Your mother…”

Theodore gave a jagged little smile. “Yes,” he said.

“My sympathies,” said Draco. Theodore’s expression turned brittle and sour and painstakingly polite in a way that Draco recognized perfectly.

“Let’s make a deal, you and I, Malfoy, seeing as we’re trapped in this wretched boat together,” said Theodore. “I won’t say anything about your terribly tragic super-young dead daddy, and you won’t say anything about my terribly tragic super-young murdered mummy. And that way, you and I will turn out to be thick as thieves."

Draco stuck out his hand. Theodore shook it.

They sailed the rest of the way in complete, but not uncomfortable, silence.

The boats dredged up on a pebble beach, and the First Years clambered up a passageway of smooth, wet rock, guided by the bobbing flare of the giant's lamp. Draco and Theodore ended up towards the back of the line, since they refused to partake in the full-body crush of overeager Firsties who salivated at the chance to get a glimpse of the castle. At the end of the passageway, they emerged onto a grassy lawn, and passed through a pair of vast oaken doors into the Great Hall.

He had seen it described before in books — Granger was not, in fact, the only First Year to have read Hogwarts: A History — but nevertheless, it knocked some of the breath from Draco's lungs to see the glistening folds of stars and moon-dusted clouds rising over the four long tables. A chorus of gasps erupted from the other first years, and he found himself falling begrudgingly victim to a sense of wonderment.

The faculty sat at the high table, and Draco scanned this to see if there were any surprises. Since his mother had given away his father's Board seat, they didn't get news about faculty appointments any more, and so it was somewhat intriguing to see the reedy man in a purple turban perched in the D.A.D.A professor's seat. Next to him sat Snape, sneering regally at the babbling crowds. As his eyes swept over the flock, they landed on Draco.

His expression softened slightly, and he inclined his head a fraction of an inch.

Draco ignored the speeches and songs. They were useless and insipid, respectively, and he was far too busy trying to master his stomach, which had discovered a newfound passion for backflips. Before he had time to register that the song was over, however, he was being herded into a line near the center dais, and steely-haired, green-robed McGonagall was brandishing the ratty old hat in the air.

“Abbott, Hannah!”

“Alphabetically, figures,” muttered Theodore. “And they don’t let us sit down, I suppose. My feet are killing me already.”

Draco ignored him and tried to focus on pinning each face to the name McGonagall read out. It was important to start building an idea of who was who in their year. His family had been withdrawn from Society too long for him to know these names instinctively, as he otherwise might have, and he didn’t want to miss the chance to collect intelligence.

“HUFFLEPUFF!”

“Shocker,” said Theodore.

“Bones, Susan!”

The aforementioned Ms. Bones tried to smooth her hair and almost swept the hat off her head. Some people gave a titter.

“HUFFLEPUFF!” cried the disgruntled hat, once it had been righted.

“Double shocker,” said Theodore.

Thereafter, in quick succession, Terry Boot went to Ravenclaw (“Nerd,” said Theodore) Mandy Brocklehurst to Ravenclaw (“Shame, she’s quite pretty”) and Lavender Brown to Gryffindor, which was, predictably, greeted by obnoxious cheering from the left-most table (Draco and Theodore exchanged a look). Millicent Bulstrode became the first Slytherin (“There we go, about time”), the unfortunately surnamed Justin Finch-Fletchley joined Hufflepuff, and Seamus Finnigan (“You think his folks considered calling him ‘Irish McIrish’?”) gave Gryffindor its second full-throated roar of the night.

Then McGonagall, consulting her scroll, barked: “Granger, Hermione!”

Draco stood up straight and watched the girl skip, so hastily she tripped over her feet, to the stool. She sat with her ankles crossed and her hands clutched in her lap, beaming, while McGonagall lowered the hat onto her head.

He found himself thinking: Ravenclaw. Come on, you stupid old hat, give her Ravenclaw. You know she’d love it. Let her live happily ever after with all her little boffin pals.

“GRYFFINDOR!”

He exhaled through his nose. Granger whipped the hat off her head, her beam becoming impossibly wider, and she dashed down the stairs. The red-clad mob of brawny goons howled and hooted and beat thunderously on the table to welcome her. As well they should, Draco thought spitefully. She’d probably raised the house’s average I.Q. by twenty points. Nevertheless, he did feel sorry for her. She deserved a house that would have made better use of her talents — even when her chief talent, apparently, consisted in an utter inability to know when to leave well enough alone.

More names came and went. Conscious that they were getting closer to his own, Draco stopped paying attention to the comments Theodore made under his breath. Goyle joined Crabbe at the Slytherin table, which compensated in enthusiasm for the lack of support from the others.

“Malfoy, Draco!”

He startled. Theodore slapped him on the back. “See you at dinner,” he whispered, and gave him a helpful shove out of the crowd. Draco hadn’t even noticed the last of the L’s trickling by, and now he found himself tottering forth on numb legs, conscious of the curious stares from every table, the susurrus of whispers that erupted at the sound of his name. He kept his expression neutral. As he passed Professor McGonagall, he risked a glance at her, and found her expression devoid of either pity or warmth. She regarded him with the dispassionate curiosity of a scholar encountering a new and colorful kind of beetle.

He lowered himself slowly onto the stool, trying to prolong the time it took for the hat to descend.

Something soft and dense landed on his head. In an effort to remain calm, he closed his eyes and thought of his mother. He thought of her arranging flowers in the sitting-room and playing harp in the drawing room. He thought of her holding his head in his lap and reading to him while the rain came down like arrows on the glen.

Draco opened his mouth and then snapped it closed. He’d forgotten that no one else could hear.

“Of course, she hardly needed to beg. They could have sorted that witch with a deerstalker, she would’ve ended up in the right place. Anyone could see it, same as your father. But you… what to do with you, Draco Malfoy?”

He swallowed and tried to make his mind blank.

“Now, you’ve got your father’s wit, which is and was a dangerous weapon… you’d excel in Ravenclaw, oh, yes. But what use is there in a scholar’s house for one so desperate to climb? No, you have Slytherin dreams, Slytherin longings… you want to carve your name in history. Am I wrong?”

Slytherin. Give me Slytherin, you shabby sack of felt.

“And you get your arrogance from Lucius,” said the hat, sounding delighted. “Such drama. Such righteousness. Almost not Slytherin at all.”

Draco opened his eyes. A sea of curious faces stared back at him.

Whatever you think, he thought tightly, think faster. I’m getting funny looks.

“Hubris, thy name is Malfoy. I will not be rushed. I could put you where you wanted, yes, but should I? Some would say I have cursed your family for generations by giving them altogether too much of their own way.”

There are worse things than tradition.

“There are also better things. Tell me this, Draco Malfoy, and I will send you to your dinner: of what, in your heart of hearts, do you dream?”

Draco swallowed hard. I want power, he thought. Money. Influence. I want people to obey me.

“Pah. Dull! Is that it?”

No, I want — I want people to like me — I want acclaim, respect—

“Respect? Love? Is that what you want?”

Yes — no — I want to be like my father — strong like he was, smart like he was—

“That’s it? The sum of your dreams? To live forever in the minds of men as Draco, son of Lucius?”

No — better — I want to be better than my father was, smarter, stronger, more powerful—

“Good. And why?”

I don’t — I don’t know, I just — I want it. I want it because I want it. There’s no other reason.

The hat was silent, emanating disapproval. Draco opened his eyes. Almost by accident, he caught sight of Granger at the Gryffindor table, staring at him with a hopeful expression. She gave a reassuring smile and some kind of hand gesture that involved making a fist with her thumb pointing at the ceiling. He didn’t know what it meant.

Glory, he thought. I want glory. I want to be the greatest Malfoy that ever was.

In his mind, the hat said, “Interesting.”

Then it roared: “GRYFFINDOR!”

Gryffindor

Chapter 3: Gryffindor

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

Draco's heart skipped. It stuttered. It almost stopped altogether, and he would have preferred if it stayed that way, because when it started again, the world he returned to was far from pleasant.

The hall was perfectly silent. Neither the Gryffindors nor the Slytherins made a sound. Even Professor McGonagall's mouth parted, and she did not attempt to remove the hat from his head.

His breaths came quickly. His chest heaved. He thought about running. He might be able to make it to Snape's office, and Floo home from there, and he could — he could — he didn't know what he'd do—

A single clap broke open the silence, like shattering the ice on the surface of the lake. It came from behind him.

Professor Snape slowly drew his hands apart and clapped again, lazily, as if he were so bored by the proceedings that he couldn't muster the enthusiasm to applaud properly. He glanced at Draco, lifted his eyebrows, and sent a meaningful glance at the Gryffindor table.

Draco understood the message being communicated. It was neither sympathetic nor cruel, disappointed nor approving. It said, If you want them to stop staring, take off the damn hat.

It was just the sort of practical Slytherin wisdom that he badly needed, and he felt a pang of affection for his godfather so strong that it overwhelmed him. Draco made a mental note to send Snape a box of ridiculously expensive cigars, if he didn't end up flinging himself from Gryffindor Tower that night.

He rose, removed the hat himself, and with all possible dignity, he handed it to Professor McGonagall. Then, twitching back his robes and slipping his hands in his pockets, he swaggered casually and deliberately over to the Gryffindor side of the room. His footsteps echoed loudly on the stone floor. The eyes of hundreds remained glued to his back.

He didn't sweat. He didn't flinch. He thought, Go ahead and watch me, you feckless nobodies. Just go ahead and look your fill. You'll be staring for the next seven years, might as well start now.

When he was about halfway from the podium to the table, Fred Weasley — shaking himself out of a dazed and slack-jawed stupor — stood up and let out a wolfish howl. He started clapping. George joined him instantly. A cheerful-looking boy with dreadlocks came after them, and in a belated explosion of glee, Gryffindor issued a bold, if somewhat confused, explosion of cheers for its newest member.

Percy Weasley stood up and waved him over, bulldozing a few Fourth Years out of the way to clear a seat. "Good show, Malfoy," he said incredulously. "Good show — wouldn't have expected it of you — but well done, well done, well done—"

Draco grunted and sat down.

"Yes, welcome, welcome, welcome, that's all I can say! Percy Weasley, I don't know if we've met, I think you ran into my brothers earlier. Fred and George? They're twins, it's hard to miss. And of course, you might know my brother Bill, he's a cursebreaker at Gringotts, he's done some work with your family before…"

Wordlessly, Draco turned his back to Percy. He hadn't a moment's peace before Granger came bounding over and squeezed her way in beside him, wedging herself into a gap less than half her size and forcing him to shimmy over to avoid bearing the brunt of her weight on his lap.

“Congratulations!” she cried, eyes shining. “I had no idea — I never thought — but this is fantastic! We’ll have all our classes together!”

Draco let out a groan that was mostly lost under the cheering. He wondered if he slammed his head very hard into the table whether he mightn’t wake up in an empty compartment on the Hogwarts Express, or better yet, in his bed back home.

There weren’t many people left now. Theodore Nott strutted forward when his name was called, and the hat had barely touched his head when it howled, “SLYTHERIN!” He trotted down to the Slytherin table, carrying the full weight of Draco’s envy with him.

“Paisley,” “Patil,” and “Patil” came and went (“Splitting up twins, that’s rare,” mused Percy), then “Perks,” and finally: “Potter, Harry!”

It was the only Sorting so far that matched Draco’s in terms of whisper volume. A small, shaggy-haired boy with a dark, slender face climbed the stairs to the podium, his robes trailing behind him. He was quite skinny. His limbs were short and birdlike, and there were hollows under his cheeks where puppy fat ought to have been. Across his forehead ran a series of pale raised lines, almost like lace or netting, which Draco realized in a nauseating jolt were actually one huge scar.

“They oughtn’t all be whispering like this,” hissed Granger, also whispering. “It’s nerve-wracking enough without everyone gossiping.”

Potter received the hat with a trepidatious expression, clinging tightly to the edge of the stool. It sat on his head for almost as long as it had been on Draco’s before belting, “GRYFFINDOR!”

Predictably, the house went wild. Draco was knocked about by a sea of flailing elbows and caught a stray wallop to the back of his head. Granger, for her part, stood up and gave a hearty cheer — though not any louder, he noted with satisfaction, than she’d cheered for him. Potter disappeared into the cheering crowd down the table, followed by another Weasley (Draco wondered wildly how many of them there could possibly be) and after a few more names, the Sorting was over.

The food appeared, and it looked delicious, but Draco had lost his appetite. He halfheartedly piled a few slices of roast beef on his plate and pushed them around until the feast wrapped up. Every time he closed his eyes, he could see his father's face, drawn with shock and disappointment. It was enough to turn his stomach.

At the High Table, McGonagall and Snape were leaning their heads together and talking about something. Draco tried to catch Snape's eye, but he couldn't. He did manage to catch the eye of Theodore Nott, whom he glimpsed across the hallway at the Slytherin table. The boy cocked his head and somewhat bemusedly raised his cup. Draco dropped his gaze to his plate.

After the meal, Percy Weasley led the first years out of the Great Hall. While they waited for everyone to congregate, Weasley seized the chance to launch into a historical lecture: "And that's a portrait of Wilhelmina Swallow, Headmistress of Hogwarts in 1296, pioneer of the Disillusionment Charm… and that's the Great Bell, it rings on the hour-mark and for meals… bequeathed to Hogwarts as a gift from Beauxbatons, to celebrate the allied British and French victory in 1919…"

True to form, Granger greeted every dull detail of this tour with coos of interest and awe. This was sweet at first, but quickly became annoying, and Draco wished she would go stand by someone else.

As they were milling around in the Great Hall, waiting for the last few first years to trickle out, Draco heard someone call his name. Crabbe and Goyle came slinking out of the shadows near the passageway that led to the dungeons.

Draco — after casting a quick glance at Weasley, to make sure he wouldn't notice — ducked into the corridor with them.

“What do you want?”

“Oi,” said Crabbe. “You haven’t been very nice to us, you know, Malfoy.”

“Yeah,” added Goyle. “We feel like we deserve a proper apology. For what happened on the train.”

“An apology?”

“Right. An apology. Especially since you’re not even a proper Slytherin, now, you’re a numpty Gryffindor.”

Draco drew himself upright, which put him about eye level with Goyle’s sternum and Crabbe’s chin. “I’m not apologizing to either of you,” he said evenly. “And I’m not a Gryffindor.”

Crabbe giggled stupidly. “Hat says you were, though.”

“Well, the hat was wrong. I’m going to go talk to McGonagall tomorrow, and if she doesn’t help me, I’m talking to the Headmaster. But I’m not staying in this wretched house, you can believe that.”

“No, really,” Goyle said, grinning. “Wait until my dad hears about this! I’ll hear him laughing all the way from me house. And my mum was always on about how smart the Malfoys were, too. But you ended up in the dumb house, an’ we’re in the smart one, so there.”

“That’s Ravenclaw, you idiot.”

“Naw. Ravenclaw’s just for the skinny drips what can’t do nuffin but read books. We’ve got the real smarts, Slytherins.”

“Certainly seems like it,” Draco muttered.

Goyle seized a handful of his collar and shoved him against the wall. Draco’s head smacked on the marble, and he let out a yelp of pain.

“What was that?” Goyle said lowly, leering. His sour breath washed over Draco’s face. “Did you wanna say somefin’ about our house?”

“Let me go, you turd, there are people watching.”

“Make me.”

This was a wild bluff, and one that failed to touch sides. Crabbe and Goyle both snickered at the empty threat. Crabbe, sensing the ripe opportunity for violence, threw a punch into his gut, and Draco groaned, doubling over.

“You ain’t nobody’s boss, Malfoy,” sneered Crabbe. “We ain’t got to listen to you. Your family ain’t nuffin anymore, not nuffin at all. We was going to be nice and all because we felt bad about your daddy, but you’re a git, and some proper purebloods ought to teach you how a Slytherin minds his manners.”

“Yeah,” said Goyle. “And figure this, Malfoy: we ain’t even need our wands to do it. Guess that makes us stronger than you.” He hefted his meaty fist and leered.

Draco grit his teeth and braced himself for pain. Not the face, he thought. He didn’t want evidence for others that he was a target.

“Oi!”

A new voice rang out from the mouth of the corridor. It stalled Goyle’s hand long enough for Draco to wriggle himself free of his grip.

Two boys, one dark-haired and one redhead, came striding out of the Great Hall. The latter was tall, freckly, and wore robes several sizes too small for him, showing off much of his ankles and wrists. The other was small and birdlike, and had so much hair he and Granger ought to start a club. He had piercing green eyes that occasionally hid behind his fringe, and without being told, Draco knew his name.

“You two leave him alone,” said Harry Potter.

“Yeah, sod off,” barked his ginger companion. “I’d say pick on someone your own size, but I dunno where you’d even find a troll around here.”

Crabbe and Goyle let out grunts of irritation, but they did amble away from Draco, giving him a bit of space to breathe.

“Aw, look, Greg,” Crabbe said. “Three widdle Gwyffindors, sticking together.”

Potter planted himself in front of Crabbe. The size difference between them was comical. Draco almost laughed, feeling vaguely hysterical.

“Have you got a problem?” Potter said.

“Yeah, what’s got up your trousers?” the redhead demanded. “Get lost on your way to the dungeons? Doesn’t surprise me, you look like you need a map of your own bathroom.”

Goyle sneered at Malfoy. “We’ll come find you sometime,” he promised darkly. “When your pals aren’t around to watch your back.”

“I hope you do,” said Draco coldly. “Find out what happens.”

Crabbe and Goyle retreated down the corridor, flashing sour stares over their shoulders. Draco watched them go until they rounded the corner, fighting the itch to grab his wand and go after them.

“Blimey,” said the redhead, scratching his neck. “Those two sure aren’t missing meals, are they?”

“Nah,” said Potter. “Like to see them go ten rounds with my cousin. Hey, are you all right?”

Draco straightened his robe where Goyle had twisted it askew with a sharp tug, and glanced at them. “I suppose you expect me to thank you,” he said.

The dark-haired boy blinked at him. “Only if you feel like it,” he said. “Didn’t have much choice, really. Everyone’s waiting for you to go upstairs, and Hermione said she’d seen you wander off this way, so we thought we might as well check.” He stuck out his hand. “Harry Potter. Nice to meet you.”

Draco glanced at the pale waiting face of his outstretched palm. Reluctantly, he clasped it. Harry Potter shook his hand.

The ginger said, “Looked like you took a knock on the head, there, mate. You need the infirmary?”

“No. I’ll be fine.”

“Bang on. I’m Ron, by the way. Ron Weasley. And you are?”

He suppressed a sigh. Rescued by a Weasley: would indignities never cease? “Draco Malfoy.”

Weasley sniggered.

“Oh, think my name’s funny, do you?”

“Yeah, a bit, to be honest,” he said. “My mum said that the old pureblood families had batty names, but I never met one before.”

Draco rounded on him. “Did she? Mine told me that every Weasley has a dozen brats and names them all after muggles.”

“Oi!”

Potter stepped forward. “Hey. Lay off him, he was only joking.”

“Yeah? I’m sure he’s told you all about my family. I don’t suppose you know anything about wizarding families, but in case you were wondering, mine and Weasley’s here are about as far apart as you can get.”

“Oh, really?” snapped Weasley.

Potter folded his arms. “I think I can tell for myself which families are worth what,” he said coolly.

“Right. Well, good luck. I’d offer my help, but obviously you’ve already made up your mind.” Draco added spitefully, “I suppose when the whole Wizarding World’s in love with you, you can afford to run around with riffraff.”

“I don’t know what your problem is, but you ought to be careful what you say about Ron,” Potter said angrily.

“I’ll say what I please. I don’t owe you anything.”

“No, but you might try some manners, seeing as we just stopped your nose from being caved in,” Weasley said indignantly.

“Potter! Weasley!”

Weasley (Prefect Weasley, the fussy one; it dawned on Draco with disgust that if he was going to live in Gryffindor Tower, he would need to learn to tell them apart) appeared in the mouth of the corridor, his face pink with exertion. “Malfoy! There you are! We’ve been looking for you!”

They herded back into the Great Hall while the prefects did a final headcount. Draco traded a cold stare with Potter and Rude Weasley as they disappeared into the crowd. He glimpsed the Slytherin first years being led off down a flight of stairs into the dungeons, and wondered longingly where they were going. The Slytherin commons couldn’t be underground, could it? That seemed unfair.

Perhaps more unfair, however, were the number of sodding stairs that Gryffindors were apparently expected to climb. The first three flights Draco weathered without complaint, but by the sixth or seventh, his legs had turned to jelly, and it was downright pathetic how Weasley kept trying to rally them with exhortations of “There you go, one more now!” or “Almost there! Worth it, I promise you!”

Granger, who was flushed ruddy pink and well out of breath, mumbled: “You’d think they’d consider putting in an lift.”

“Gryffindors,” muttered Draco disdainfully. “Probably never thought of it.”

“You’re a Gryffindor.”

“Under protest.”

A bundle of walking sticks was floating in midair ahead of them, and as Percy took a step toward them they started throwing themselves at him. “Peeves,” Percy whispered to the First Years. “A poltergeist.”

“What’s a poltergeist?” said one round-faced boy fearfully.

Granger twisted around. “It’s a mischievous magical spirit,” she announced loudly, ignoring the fact that they were several steps above the boy who’d spoken and that the question had not been addressed to her. “It’s bound to a particular location, and the longer it dwells there, the harder it is to banish. The Hogwarts poltergeist is named Peeves. I read about it in—”

Draco mouthed along when she said it: Hogwarts, a History.

“Oh, no,” fretted the round-faced boy. “Is it scary?”

“Not if you’re older than five,” muttered Draco. “So for you, maybe.”

But he must have said this too loudly, for Peeves contorted in midair, folded his legs into a pretzel, and zoomed headfirst toward Draco.

Draco forced himself to hold still as Peeves made a swooping pass over his head, ruffling his hair.

“My toad!” shouted the round-faced boy. “Where’s my toad? I’ve dropped him!”

“See, that’s why I didn’t get a toad,” said Granger matter-of-factly. “It just seems impractical. You’d have to worry about people stepping on it all the time.”

“An owl’s more useful anyway,” said Draco absently.

“Yes, that’s what I thought. But I couldn’t convince my parents to let me get one. I told them and told them, Mum, Dad, it’s normal, it’s how wizards send letters and things, everybody has one, but they said if I couldn’t take care of a gerbil there was no way they were buying me a bird of prey.”

He looked at her out of the corner of his eye. “What happened to your gerbil?”

“Nothing!” she said shrilly, and he made a mental note never to loan her his owl.

At the stratospheric top of the staircase hung a portrait of a rubenesque lady in a pink silk dress. “Caput Draconis,” said Percy, and the portrait swung forward to reveal a round hole in the wall. They climbed through, and found themselves in a round, stone room, paneled with tapestries and dark wood bookshelves, covered in a patchwork quilt of dark red rugs and crammed full of old soft-looking leather armchairs. Half-melted candles and abandoned teacups sat here and there amongst stacks of parchment, ghostly white busts of strangers’ heads (famous Gryffindors, Draco presumed), oil portraits, red wool jumpers, fluffy throw pillows, and shaggy wool blankets draped thickly over the back of each chair. Near one end of the common room, a giant fireplace roared behind a wrought-iron grate, and covered the room in its golden light.

At the top of a spiral staircase, a series of doors lead off to little suites, and behind the furthest door stood five empty four-poster beds, each hung with thick red curtains and gold tassels.

His last hopes that there had been a mistake were dashed when he saw his trunk and owl had been brought up and laid at the foot of one bed.

Potter and Weasley were already unpacking. They ignored him, which was fine by Draco, and in fact preferable. The round-faced boy with the toad was rifling through his own trunk, tossing books and pairs of underwear left and right.

“I can’t find him! My gran will kill me! I promised her I could take care of him...”

“...not a surprise, but still nice,” one of the other boys was saying. “Six generations, all Gryffindors. Me mum’ll be pleased…”

“...s’pose I can borrow some pajamas? I buried mine and can’t be arsed to unpack—”

“Got you, mate, catch—”

Draco ducked as a clutch of soft red fabric went sailing across the room.

“Thanks!”

“Don’t mention it.”

“...called ‘ceedees,’ they are, me dad showed ’em to me. You pop ’em in the player an’ it spins ’em real fast, an’ somehow that makes music. Muggles came up with it. Bloody brilliant if you ask me.”

“Sod off. And you’re telling me there’s no magic involved at all…?”

“Get off, Scabbers! He’s chewing my sheets.”

“...called a ‘deejay,’ an’ he plays ceedees for a living.”

“Muggles can make money doing that? Playing other people’s music? You’re joking!”

“Hey, you.”

“Am not. An’ here’s something else. You ever heard of a band called ‘R.E.M.’?”

“You there,” someone said loudly. “Pale bloke. Here.”

Draco realized he was being spoken to. An unfamiliar prefect held out a bundle of something red and gold.

“What’s that?” he said, though a pit in his stomach told him he knew.

“Your house ties,” said the boy. “Last part of the uniform. They’re mandatory for classes, school events, and any meetings with professors that take place on school grounds.”

When Draco did not take them, the prefect set them on his bedside table. “Failure to comply with dress code will lose you house points. If you need help tying them, you can ask me or Percy.”

He stared at the prefect like he’d grown a second head.

“What?”

“I know how to tie them,” he said indignantly.

The prefect shrugged. “No need to sound uppity about it. There’s lots of first years who can’t.”

This, perhaps more than any other facet of Gryffindor culture, was appalling. Any self-respecting pureblood who could not, at the age of eleven, tie his own full Windsor, would have been deemed unacceptable for introduction to polite society. He doubted very much that any Slytherin prefects needed to make such offers of help.

In the privacy of his bed, with the hangings drawn, Draco changed into his pajamas and crawled beneath the covers. He could hear the various murmurs and stirs of the dormitory as the other boys went about their nightly routines. Remembering belatedly that Dobby wasn't there to do it, and muttering a curse, he crawled out of bed again and fed Ulysses, sprinkling a few food pellets through the bars of his cage. Ulysses snapped them up and hooted at him balefully, obviously resenting his entrapment. Draco felt a great deal of sympathy.

He swaddled himself in the covers and indulged in some good old-fashioned wallowing. As if everything else weren't enough, Weasley had started snoring, great honking snores that seemed to rattle the bedposts, and rain had started coming down on the windows outside. Draco tried to think of Malfoy Manor, its wide silent rooms, and his soft goosefeather mattress with a hot bedpan at the foot. But this was in the way of a mistake, because thinking of home only reminded him of his mother, and the letter he would have to write, explaining himself. Dear Mother. The quest to restore the family name is going splendidly. I have started by humiliating the family and shaming us forever by breaking a centuries-old tradition…

He was interrupted in his moping by one of Weasley's ear-shattering snores. It was a reflection on his sorry state that he actually felt grateful toward Weasley in that moment, if only for distracting him from his misery.

At some point he must have fallen asleep, because he found himself in a long, dark hallway surrounded by green doors. He was walking toward the big door at the end of the hallway, but the faster he walked, the further away the door drew, so that with each step the distance became farther and farther, until he was sprinting after a door no larger than a speck of green on the horizon. Panic gripped him, and he knew at once, with the certainty that only exists in dreams, that if he didn't reach the door, something horrible would happen to him. Somewhere, someone was laughing, a raspy woman's laugh that grated in his ears.

Someone shouted, and Draco shot up in bed, sweating.

He snatched back the hangings and found himself staring at Harry Potter, who was sitting bolt upright in his own bed, wide-eyed and trembling, obviously just surfaced from a nightmare. Sweat had slicked his mop of hair down to his head.

The two boys regarded each other. A clock on the wall said it was nearly three in the morning. The other boys were all fast asleep.

Slowly, Draco lifted a finger to his lips.

Potter nodded.

They both drew back the respective hangings of their beds, and they went back to sleep.

Life began its strange, militant lockstep onwards. As Granger intimated, first years took their classes together as a house, which meant there was no escaping the brigoon of boisterous, noisome tweens that were Draco's housemates. Luckily, the number of students in their year required most professors to teach double-blocks. They shared Transfiguration, History of Magic, and Herbology with the Hufflepuffs, Charms and Astronomy with the Ravenclaws, and Defense Against the Dark Arts with one or the other twice a week. Potions they took with the Slytherins, under the blissfully competent instruction of Severus Snape, whose lessons were such a relief from the puerile hand-holding of Flitwick and Sprout that Draco went to McGonagall at the end of the first week to ask if he could take Potions II instead of Herbology.

"Mr. Malfoy," she said, "although I'm sure Professor Snape will be flattered to hear of your passion for the subject, you must be aware that we do not allow first years to transfer out of any core class."

"Yes, I read the handbook. But if I got a special permission slip from Professor Snape—?"

“He assuredly would not give it, and in the hypothetical event that he did, I as your head of house would have to approve your study list,” said McGonagall severely, looking down at him over her spectacles. They were ensconced in her office, a warm, sunny room off the Transfiguration classroom, full of old books with metal-studded spines, and plush leather furniture. She said, “May I ask if you have something against Herbology?”

He scowled. “Sprout never makes us do anything. She spent half the first lesson talking about the proper way to wear gloves.”

“You don’t consider your own safety a valuable educational priority?”

“I don’t see why we’re being made to muck around in the dirt for a letter-grade.”

McGonagall steepled her fingers on her desk. “Herbology is admittedly not my specialty, but it has always been my understanding that dirt is where the plants tend to be.”

Draco threw up his hands. “It’s not dignified,” he said passionately. “We get out all filthy and sweaty after an hour in that sweltering greenhouse, hauling around henbane planters, and then it’s straight into Charms, so there’s no time to bathe or change our clothes, and I’ve had dirt under my fingernails for about a week, and she has us carrying these giant watering cans that she could just as easily levitate if she wanted to—”

“You think it’s beneath you,” said McGonagall calmly.

“It is beneath me. It’s beneath any pur— any wizard.”

The elderly witch arched her eyebrow, but said nothing. Nevertheless, he knew he’d lost her. She rose and waved her wand, and the door to her office swung open. “Your request to transfer is denied,” she said. “If you do well on your end-of-term exams, you may submit yourself to be considered for advanced placement in Second Year. Until then, I suggest you find some way to cope with dirt under your fingernails; I am personally partial to a good Scouring Charm."

Thereafter, Potions remained the sole point of light in his schedule. Defense Against the Dark Arts was passably interesting, though Quirrell had no great surfeit of teaching talent, and after a few days of Transfiguration he began to harbor a begrudging respect for McGonagall, who gave no quarter and suffered no fools. He excelled in Charms, though he complained to anyone that would listen that the work was mind-blisteringly easy. History of Magic bored him to tears, and he couldn't even complain to Granger about it, because the daft witch spent the whole class in rapt attention, hanging on Binns' every word.

"They don't teach it the right way," he told her later.

She dropped the book she was reading and frowned at him. Her hair was ineffectually roped back into a ponytail and there was a smudge of jam on her chin. "What do you mean?"

He thumbed his jaw meaningfully, and she pinked and grabbed a napkin. "They don't start at the beginning," he complained. "They have us reading Bagshot's A History of Magic, which starts in the Golden Age of Athens, with Atlantis as the first Wizarding community, but it's established archeological consensus that magic existed in the Mediterranean prior to the Bronze Age Collapse."

"Well, you have to start somewhere."

"Yes, but it's wrong."

"It's not wrong, it's just incomplete," she pointed out. "And I expect we'll go back and study the more complicated historical questions when we're older. After all, they have to catch up all of us muggle-borns who've never learned any magical history before."

"Then they ought to put you lot in a different class," Draco said irritably.

She set down her fork. “You don’t mean that,” she said, stung.

“It’d be for your benefit, if anything. It’s not fair for them to grade us on the same curve when you’re coming in already at a disadvantage.”

“I don’t mind it,” she said, after a pause. “I’d like to be graded the same way as everyone else. I don’t want anyone to make special exceptions for me because I’m a muggle-born.”

They already have, Draco thought nastily. That’s why you’re here.

But he merely shrugged, and said, “Albus Dumbledore agrees with you.”

He and Granger were developing something of a rivalry. She was, predictably, a ruthlessly hard worker, much more so than he, but he had an instinctive edge to even the score. Granger, after all, had rarely seen anybody do the spells they were learning. He instinctively mimicked parts of wand-posture and hand movement that the professors didn’t think to explain, and which Granger had to figure out for herself. To her credit, she didn’t let this deter her. Whenever he got something before she did, the witch would descend on him like an inquisitorial squad unto herself, demanding to know how he did it and what technique he used and what she wasn’t doing right.

(He thought about refusing to help her; it would probably boost his class rank. But one day, after he fell asleep in History of Magic, Granger elbowed him awake with a hiss of: “Wake up, or you’ll miss the chance to turn in the homework!”, thereby sparing him from a zero on the assignment, and after that, he felt it would be unsporting to begrudge her the precious few hints she asked for).

She had him by a nose in Transfiguration and D.A.D.A., while he led by a hairsbreadth in History and Charms, and neither of them cared much for Herbology.

In Potions, however, it wasn't even close. Snape rarely even came over to check on his table anymore, so rare was it for Draco to require instruction. His homework was so frequently used as a model for the class that he might as well have been credited in the curriculum. Once, he put up his hand to ask a question about the chemical properties of boomslang venom, and it turned into a twenty-minute conversation between himself and Snape on the various uses of snakeskin in potioneering. It was the most interesting conversation Draco had with anyone since entering the castle. Of course, he'd always known his godfather was talented, but not until now did he realize that Snape was a proper genius, and it made his status as pet-prodigy into a source of personal pride.

This made him beloved by nobody. In fact there were few things, aside from dropping his pants and shooting a Dark Mark over the Astronomy Tower, which could have generated more animus from his peers. The result was acute inflammation of the ego combined with chronic hatred of the self, a combination whose symptoms included confusion, misery, and a lack of friends to whom he could complain about it.

It also helped that Snape utterly disdained Harry Potter, and did not labor to conceal that fact. The dungeon became the one place that Draco could hide from the school's obnoxious fawning over Saint Potter and his trashy friends.

"I don't get what you have against them," Granger sighed at dinner, flouncing down so forcefully it lost him a spoonful of tomato soup. It was not an excellent tomato soup, so he was not cross with her. True to Dobby's wish, none of the cooking at Hogwarts rivaled anything from home. "They're not my best friends either, but they haven't done anything wrong. Harry tries to be nice to everybody."

"Oh, please."

"He does!"

“Of course he does. He struts around this school like butter wouldn’t melt in his mouth.” Draco became aggressive in his treatment of the soup, which failed to achieve anything: the soup, being soup, was unintimidated. “And the professors let him. They coo and fawn and try to get him to like them, it’s obvious. I think Flitwick would let him teach the class, if he asked.”

“But that’s not his fault,” Granger objected, ladling herself a bowl.

“And he doesn’t try.”

That clouded over her open, earnest features. “Well,” she said, “no, maybe, not exactly, he doesn’t.”

“Not at all. Don’t get me started on Weasley. And they cost you house points like you wouldn’t believe. Example!” He indicated his own (perfectly knotted) Gryffindor tie. “Weasley’s inability to master the intricate theorems of the full Windsor has cost Gryffindor fifteen points in the last week.”

“Us,” she chided, in a tone that was positively McGonagallesque.

“What?”

“You said ‘cost you house points,’” she said. And because he had nothing to say to that but indiscriminate grumbling, he buried himself in mediocre soup.

Draco did not consider himself a Gryffindor.

He did not attend house events. He did not linger in the common room after classes. He came and went directly from his bedroom in the morning and evening, and spent any free hours roaming the castle. He did not like the Gryffindor ghost, a pompous knight with a cervical problem. He did not like the house colors, which clashed with his complexion. He did not like the one hundred and twenty-four stairs that laid between his bed and his breakfast. He did not like that whenever he passed a group of Slytherins, they could be relied upon to break into a chorus of hissing. He did not like that unless Granger decided to inflict her presence upon him, he would sit alone at meals, in classes, and anywhere he chose to sit in between. He liked least of all the fact that his mother still had yet to write back to him, three weeks into the term.

On September 23rd, in addition to his daily edition of the Daily Prophet, Draco received a large package in the post, wrapped in dark green paper and tied in silver string. It was far larger than anything anyone else had received, and he ignored several jealous stares as he picked it up, left the table, and marched into the nearest empty classroom.

Inside lay a careful matrix of smaller boxes, all fit together, individually wrapped, and carefully insulated with tissue paper. He pried them out one by one and shredded the wrapping paper greedily. There was a box of assorted chocolate caramel truffles, dusted in sea salt and a snowy crown of powdered sugar, which had been his favorites since he was four. There was a small bottle of cognac (this was crammed underneath a large wad of tissue paper, as if the person packing the box had attempted to hide it) and a travel-size bottle of his mother's perfume. A spherical package the size of his fist turned out to be a pack of gardenia-scented bath salts, and the last was a tall green candle with golden marbling, which the label promised would smell like "wherever the witch or wizard who lights it considers home."

At the very bottom of the box lay a note, folded into quarters. He unfolded it.

wishng mester Draco al the best and hopping he is having a good tim at skool. we is missing him gretly but we no he is becomng a very gret wizard and are proud of him but still we are wishng always he is coming home soon. love dobby

And it was still not this — not this stroke of unsolicited kindness, not this cruel reminder of a distant home, not this devastating blow to any red-blooded wizard's stiff upper lip — which undid him. No, the thing that broke Draco was the realization that, beneath his gratitude, his affection for Dobby, and beneath even his animal pleasure at receiving presents, there was a pit of disappointment as wide as the Atlantic opening at the bottom of his stomach: for he had hoped until the very last word that the note would bear his mother's name.

It was for this reason that he spoke little in Potions that afternoon, despite knowing the answer to every question, and despite Snape offering him several opportunities (summarily refusing to call on Gryffindors who already had their hands raised). He fiddled with his quill and remained silent, forcing Snape to call on Granger not once, not twice, but thrice, each time finding less and less to criticize in her answer. After class, as everyone shuffled around collecting their books, Snape swooped over to his table and loomed over him while he packed his bag.

"A word, Mr. Malfoy," he said.

"Yes, sir."

This was not unusual. He often hung back after Potions. What was unusual was that Snape, instead of striking up a conversation about lacewing flies, escorted him into his office and shut the door behind him.

"Is this about my class schedule, sir?"

"Sit," said Snape, pointing to the chair.

Draco sat. "Because I spoke to Professor McGonagall about it, and she told me I couldn't take Potions II as a first year. But I thought, if you spoke to her, then maybe—"

"You cannot."

"Oh," he said, deflated.

Snape swept over to his desk and “I was disappointed by your performance today in Potions. You were ill-tempered and uncooperative, and you did not conduct yourself in accordance with your considerable talents. It will not happen again.”

“I’m sorry, sir.” This was the second blow in a day against his bruised pride. It was a special misery to disappoint the one teacher whose opinion he actually cared about.

“I understand you are unhappy with your house.” Snape settled behind his desk, his robes billowing like vast bat wings.

Draco fidgeted in his seat and gave no answer.

“You would have preferred to be in Slytherin.”

“Of course I would have,” he said bitterly. “That’s where everyone respectable is.”

“You do not consider Professor McGonagall respectable.”

He rolled his eyes. “Except Professor McGonagall.”

“You do not consider Albus Dumbledore respectable.”

“I’ve never met him personally. I couldn’t say.”

“Whom do you consider respectable?”

This was an example of what a Slytherin might call ‘free lunch.’

“Well, you, sir,” Draco said immediately. “Obviously.”

Snape did not appear moved by the flattery. “Indeed.”

“And… and my father. He was a respectable man.”

“Indeed so. Dead, also.”

Draco flinched. “Yes, sir,” he said tightly. “As I have been made aware, my father is, in fact, dead.”

“There is no need for that tone of voice. I am merely reminding you of the salient facts.” Snape opened a drawer in his desk and rummaged in it. “It is my understanding that you have not heard from your mother yet this term.”

“Who told you that?”

“Irrelevant. That is my understanding. Is it incorrect?”

Sulkily, Draco muttered, “No, it’s not.”

“Speak up, I can’t hear remarks addressed to the floor.”

“No, it’s not incorrect.”

“Good. And you have not been in contact with anyone else by post?”

Draco frowned. “No, I haven’t.”

“You have not sent any letters from the Hogwarts owlery, nor received any?”

“No. I mean yes. I sent one the first night, to my mother. I told her… well, I told her.”

“And after that?”

“No. I don’t get letters. I get the Prophet in the morning. That’s all.” Draco wracked his brain. “And a package from home, earlier today, I suppose. Trinkets, candy, things like that. But not correspondence.”

“Good.” Snape withdrew a letter from his desk and shut the drawer. He held it out to Draco. “This is from your mother. It is for you.”

Draco gaped at him for a moment. Then he lunged forward and snatched it. Snape sprawled back in his chair and watched, expressionless, as Draco tore open the wax seal and ripped open the envelope, shaking out a single sheaf of creamy paper covered with elegant black script.

Dear Draco,

Hello, my sweet one. I was very sorry to get your letter; sorry not because I am ashamed but sorry because you sounded so dreadfully unhappy. Please know that I could not be disappointed in you if I tried and though I am dismayed, I admit, at this rupture in a grand and admirable family tradition, I cannot be cross at you for a failure of the Sorting Hat to do its job. We will write to Dumbledore and see if you can be reassigned somewhere more suited to your talents and heritage. In the meantime, hold fast, and be strong, my darling. I know that it is hard to be in a strange place but I believe that you above all others have the power to bear it. You are the son of a man whose great virtue was the ability to bear anything for his family and I know this power lies with you also.

Please forgive me for not writing sooner. It was difficult to get ahold of Severus, for he is busy and does not often have time to come visit. For reasons which he will hopefully explain, it was not possible to contact you by owl, and so I apologize for any distress I have caused you by waiting. Know that it was not my intention and that I have been suffering far more than you these long weeks, for anyone can agree that it is far worse for a mother not to hear word of her son than a son not to hear word of his mother. I remember when I went to Hogwarts it was a source of private joy that my mother knew so little about my life.

As to my health and happiness, do not worry. I am occupied with the maintenance of the estate and the accounts, and of course, the gardens. I have been thinking of putting in a new species of flower to replace the jasmines — what do you think of yellow roses? I know it may be an overreaction to suggest such a dramatic change, but with my son gone, I am prone to restlessness.

Remember what that greatest of all magicians, Homer, once wrote: Be strong, saith my heart; I am a soldier, I have seen worse sights than this.

And remember also what that silliest of all witches, your mother, once told you: I love you more than sunlight and moonlight and wine and music, all the pleasures of the world put together.

All my heart,

Mummy

Draco read it twice, and then a third time, for good measure. When he was finished, he folded it and slid it into the breast pocket of his robes, where it pressed against his heart. He murmured, “Thank you, Uncle Severus.”

“Inside the walls of this castle,” said Snape, “you will refer to me as ‘sir,’ or ‘professor.’ And you are welcome.”

The Potion Master’s face was veined and sallow, lined with wrinkles that foretold premature age, and a furred brow cast a long shadow over eyes of shineless black. They were unreadable, even to Draco, who had known them for the better part of his life.

“Sir,” he said, “permission to speak freely. As family.”

“Granted.”

“Why is my mother using you as a go-between?”

“Safety,” he answered. “I do not know what your mother wrote to you, but whatever she wrote, I imagine she would prefer that it remained between you and herself. She solicited my help in ensuring that fact.”

“Ensuring… are you saying someone’s spying on my mother?” A hot tongue of anger licked up his throat. “Who would dare—”

“I did not say that,” said Snape tonelessly.

“But then what do you mean?”

“Precisely what I said. I did not say,” drawled Snape, examining his fingernails, “that someone was spying on your mother.”

He looked at Draco.

It took a moment for the implication to sink in.

“On me?”

“You will refrain from raising your voice in this office.”

“But who would want to spy on me?” Draco demanded. “I’ve not done anything to anybody! I’m innocent! I’ve never even had a detention! I’m ELEVEN!”

“Don’t make me repeat myself, Draco, I detest tedium.”

Draco gripped the armrests of his chair for strength and grounding. “But,” he struggled, “but, but. But.”

“You sound like a parrot. If you have nothing intelligent nor novel to say, say nothing.”

This stung. Nevertheless, out of respect for his godfather, he swallowed his words and his pride. After a moment, he managed, “I don’t understand. Who’s spying on me?”

“That’s better,” said Snape, in a somewhat softer tone. “It’s an apt question. Consider, then, another question: who would benefit from knowing the substance of private conversations between you, Draco Malfoy, and your mother?”

It was hard to imagine anyone wanting to know much about Draco's life, considering how wretched it was. He took a flying guess. "Dumbledore?"

"Dumbledore has more sophisticated ways of acquiring information about you. You live under his roof. Think harder."

"...The actuaries?"

"No. You're thinking simplistically."

This rankled. He furrowed his brow and stared out the window, deep in thought.

"If one were to think in terms of means," Snape suggested, "who, of anybody, possesses both the motive and capability to conduct surveillance of owl post?"

"...The Ministry?"

"Better. It is usually best practice to deal in specifics."

"The Department of Magical Law Enforcement," he said, leaning forward. "They keep tabs on former Death Eaters, don't they? Even exonerated ones? I know they had the Trace on you for years—"

"Careful," said Snape, and his voice was as dark and cold as the bottom of the lake. Draco paled and fell silent, quelled by the glimmer of anger in his godfather's eyes.

The silence turned brittle, cracked, and passed them by. "My past," murmured Snape, with a touch of regret, "does not concern us today."

"Yes, sir."

"I have summoned you here, and ferried your mother's correspondence, and offered you what guidance I can, out of respect and gratitude for the generosity your mother has shown me over the years. I have done this, also, in fulfillment of the obligations I undertook freely to owe you as my godson. I will continue to assist her, as I am able, in your stewardship and defense. But all her efforts and mine will be wasted if you do not exercise judgment in when to hold your tongue."

Draco nodded so hard his neck hurt. "Yes, sir."

"Do you understand the significance of what you've learned here?"

"Yes, sir." In truth, he didn't. Supposedly the Ministry was watching his owls, but how and why they were doing that he didn't have a clue. Perhaps they were monitoring his mother, but he couldn't think what their suspicions would be; Narcissa hadn't been a Death Eater. She'd had a stake in the fight, and she certainly didn't get in her husband's way, but she'd never touched the mask.

Anyway, what did the Ministry even suspect her of? Voldemort had been dead for eleven years. The Death Eaters were all dead, imprisoned, or living under heavy supervision, like Snape.

Like his father would have been, if he had lived.

Shortly before he died, Lucius had testified before the Wizengamot. Under the baleful sneer of Bartemius Crouch, he had dutifully offered up a complete registry of names: every man, woman, and creature he had ever glimpsed under the mask, every contact he ever made, every safehouse and bunker they ever used in the war. He gave a complete dossier of Voldemort's arsenal, including what magical artifacts he had seen used and where he had gone to recruit the magical creatures who fought alongside him in the war. He spoke for six hours. (Narcissa, years later, had told Draco all this.) When he was done, Crouch signed his name and dropped the Ministry stamp on a government pardon, and sent him on his way with the Trace hanging from his neck.

Within a year, Lucius was dead.

“That is all I have to say,” Snape said abruptly. He stood, loosing a tidal ripple of black cloth. “If you wish to send your mother a reply, you may enclose it with your next homework submission for my class. I will see that it is delivered to her, although I make no promises as to expediency; I am not your owl.”

“No, sir. Thank you, sir.” Hearing his dismissal, Draco scrambled up and hurried to the door.

As he was leaving, Snape called his name.

“Oh, and Draco?”

“Yes, sir?”

“Your housemate, Neville Longbottom, is abysmal at Potions,” said Snape carelessly. He leaned back in his chair, flicked his wand at the quill on his desk, and it began to scrawl busily over what Draco suspected were student papers. “A hippogriff holds more talent for brewing in one feather than he holds in his body entire. I have no desire to reward poor performance with special treatment, but if he continues in this manner he will hurt himself, and most probably others.”

Draco, who thought this was both amusing and true, agreed.

“You will help him.”

This was far less amusing. He stared at Snape in horror.

“Sir,” he began desperately. “He’s a lost cause. I can’t… I won’t…”

“You can, and you will. A student of your skill should not find it difficult to instruct Longbottom on the fundamentals of potion-making, and in so doing, you will find an outlet for your time and energy beyond badgering Professor McGonagall to let you drop a class — who, incidentally, is convinced that it was my nefarious doing to put the idea of dropping Herbology into your head, when even the most execrable potioneer alive could tell you how absolutely essential herbological knowledge is to all that we do.”

This was not to be borne. Draco wondered, with all possible lucidity, whether Snape didn’t actually want him dead. If he did, putting him in a room near Longbottom and a cauldron for any amount of time was a sure way to achieve it. “Yes, sir,” he managed. “Absolutely. I understand. But really, I mean, Longbottom —”

“An hour every week, I think,” said Snape silkily, and if Draco didn’t know better, he’d say a trace of mirth gleamed in his godfather’s coal-black gaze. “That should do, to start. We’ll see how Longbottom is progressing after that. Dismissed.”

I write full "seasons" (a.k.a. one academic year) of this fic at a time, and then release the chapters on a schedule, so there will be regular updates so long as a particular "season" is in progress.

Halloween

Chapter 4: Halloween

On Halloween morning, the castle awoke to the scent of baking pumpkin and cinnamon, sweet apples and brown sugar. A cascade of red leaves descended past the window panes, carried on the back of a fine silver fog, and the first blades of frost appeared on the grass. In Gryffindor Tower, the fireplaces kept the dorms toasty and warm, despite the cool weather outside, and in the night the house-elves had come to decorate the dorms with paper garlands of bats and jack-o-lanterns. When he drifted awake, there was a split second where Draco felt so content that he actually forgot where he was, and he burrowed into his pillows, relishing the toasty, sweet confines of his bed, unimpeded by the cruel bite of reality.

Naturally, reality would not suffer this kind of arrogance for long. He heard, rather than saw, someone peel back the hangings of his four-poster, and light flooded his eyes.

He gave a disgruntled honk and rolled over, tugging his pillow over his head.

“Er, Malfoy?”

He held still and said nothing, feigning sleep.

“Malfoy?” Someone gingerly prodded at his arm. “Malfoy, are you awake?”

“No,” he said into the bedspread.

“Oh, good,” chirped the voice, which he now recognized. “I’m sorry to wake you. I didn’t know whether, um, you had forgotten? What you said? About helping me with my Potions homework? Before Charms?”

Draco gave another long, plaintive honk, and sealed the pillow tighter over his head. If he suffocated, he reflected, he couldn’t be liable for whatever Longbottom did.

This cheered him up enough to open his eyes. Unfortunately, this meant he got an eyeful of Neville Longbottom, snaggle-toothed, round-faced, and freckled like a painter’s smock, already dressed for school and carrying both of their satchels.

“I’ll meet you in the common room?” Longbottom said hopefully.

In response he received only a muffled groan.

It was his own fault for scheduling their lesson in the morning. He’d originally proposed it for Thursday evening, but he’d forgotten it was Halloween, and so there’d be a feast in the Great Hall, followed by parties in each of the dorms. Not that Draco expected to be invited to any festivities, but he didn’t want to be trapped in a room with Longbottom while everybody else ate candy and danced to music. Even if he wouldn’t have been there anyway, there was something particularly dispiriting about the idea.

The Charms classroom was bitterly cold in the mornings, as Flitwick hadn’t been in to light the grate yet. Draco set up the cauldron, lit the burner with a muttered spell that Snape had taught him, and set the water boiling, just to give Longbottom the best possible starting odds. He really did hope that he would succeed, if only because it would let him off the hook as a tutor.

Longbottom sat.

Draco thunked his copy of Magical Drafts and Potions (79th Edition) on the desk. “We’re doing a Cure for Boils. Should be a motivating exercise, since it’ll come in handy for you.”

The boy flushed and rolled back his sleeves. With shaking hands, he began to grind his snake fangs. He was doing it wrong, Draco observed — employing short, choppy strokes of the pestle like he was churning butter, instead of grinding them properly on the side of the bowl — but he held his tongue, since he wanted to see how far Longbottom could go without an outright error.

The answer was, apparently, seventy-four seconds. “Stop,” he snapped, seizing Longbottom’s wrist. The boy froze, his fistful of crushed snake fang suspended over the bubbling cauldron. “What are you doing wrong?”

Longbottom flinched. “I’m… doing something wrong?”

“I suppose that answers one question. I’ll start simpler, so you can understand: what are you doing?”

“I’m adding my snake fangs to the cauldron, like it says in the book.”

“And what were you going to do after that?”

He read doubtfully from the book. “Stir,” he said.

“Yes, I meant after that. The next step.”

“Finely slice my Pungeous Onions,” he read, “and place them in the mixture.”

“And the fifth step?”

“Add a sprinkle of powdered ginger…”

“Do you have powdered ginger?”

Longbottom looked around, as if the powdered ginger might be lurking under his armpit.

“No. You don’t. You have ginger root, which you’ll need to grind in order to get powder. But you can’t grind it at Step Five, because you’re supposed to be stirring vigorously from steps four through six.”

“Of course I’m right. Read the recipe all the way through before you start brewing,” said Draco curtly, extinguishing the burner. “It’s thirty seconds of up-front work that’ll save your skin. And prep your ingredients in advance. Even if it’s only measuring.”

“That makes sense,” said Longbottom brightly. “Gee, thank you, Malfoy. I really appreciate—”

“There’s no need for us to talk unless I’ve asked you a question. Start over, try the potion again.”

It took the better part of an hour for the pair of them, working jointly, to wrestle together a passable interpretation of a Cure for Boils. Draco had to stop Longbottom from melting his cauldron not once but twice, usually by shouting at him, and though his intervention had saved the other boy a lot of pain, Longbottom still had the nerve to act like a girl about it.

“D-d-d-don’t yell at me,” he moaned. “I’m d-d-d-doing my b-b-best—”

“I didn’t yell,” said Draco tartly. “I told you not to add porcupine quills while it’s over heat, you daft baby. And you should be grateful, because if I hadn’t, we’d both be on our way to the Hospital Wing.”

“But you d-d-d-didn’t need to sh-sh-sh-shout…”

“Merlin, are you weeping?”

Longbottom scrubbed at his cheeks, sniffling.

Draco curled his lip. “Well, don’t get any tears in the potion, salt water ruins a brew.”

By the time they had bottled and stoppered the homework assignment, other Gryffindors were trickling into the Charms classroom, and the Great Bell was tolling nine. Draco was hot and damp from working over a cauldron all morning, and peevish, because he hadn’t gotten any breakfast. Dealing with the other boy had burnt out the lion’s share of his patience, which was far from plentiful to begin with, and he stomped over to his desk in the early stages of a stormy mood.

Today in Charms they were making objects fly, an announcement which brightened him somewhat. This was a tremendously useful spell, and it marked a departure from weeks of shooting colored sparks out of their wands. They were put in pairs to practice, and to Draco’s relief, he got Granger. It wasn’t so much that it was pleasant to work with Granger as it was that everyone else would have been intolerable: Potter and Weasley would annoy him, Seamus Finnigan would blow something up, and if he got Longbottom, he would end up leaping out the window.

True to form, most Gryffindors found the swish-and-flick motion bafflingly difficult to comprehend. Weasley seemed to think that volume of incantation corresponded to strength of spell, and kept bellowing “WINGARD-EUM LEVIO-SA!” while windmilling his arms.

“He’s saying it wrong,” Granger sighed, and though she might have said it more quietly — Weasley shot a nasty look over his shoulder, he’d definitely heard — Draco didn’t disagree.

“Wrong emphasis,” he remarked, catching his own feather on its descent.

“And movement. It’s Wing-gar-dium Levi-OH-sa, not—”

“Levio SOIR.” It was a somewhat unsporting imitation of a West Country accent, but he could see her repressing a smile.

“Well, quite.”

“You do it, then, if you’re so clever,” snarled Weasley.

Draco smirked and sat back, gesturing to her in invitation.

Granger did not disappoint. She twitched up the sleeves of her gown, flicked her wand, and said, “Wingardium Leviosa.” The feather climbed neatly into the air, guided by the tip of her wand, and hovered at a respectable height of four feet.

Flitwick burst into applause. “Miss Granger!” he squeaked. “Miss Granger, very well done! And Mister Malfoy, is that your feather? Very good, very good! Ten points to Gryffindor!”

By the end of class, no one but Draco and Granger had managed to get their feathers over a foot in the air. As they were pushing their way into the corridor, they ended up stuck behind Weasley and Potter, who had barely gotten theirs off the desk. This was a source of comfort to Draco. The natural expectation of most teachers seemed to be that Potter would excel in everything, and watching them slowly become disabused of that notion had been among the few pleasures of his time in Gryffindor House.

Granger, to nobody’s surprise, was yapping his ear off. “I wish I could hang back and ask him about the theory,” she enthused. “It’s so interesting. I’d like to know how it’s different from other charms of movement. Is it the level force applied? Or is it where the energy is coming from? My dad says there are these things called Newton’s Laws…”

“What, like Scamander?”

Potter and Weasley were talking about something. A tall Hufflepuff knocked into Granger, and she bumped into Draco, who shrugged her off and set her upright with an irritated sound. They were practically on top of Potter and Weasley, now.

Granger stiffened.

Potter had the decency to look uncomfortable about this. “I dunno,” he said. “She tries—”

“What, you’re dying to be friends with her, are you?” said Weasley.

“No, but—”

Now Granger was blinking very quickly. “Excuse me,” she mumbled, and shoved past Weasley and Potter. Draco watched, surprised, as she elbowed Weasley on her way through and ran out of the corridor, her shoulders shaking.

Weasley and Potter turned around, wearing guilty expressions. Draco glowered at them.

“I think she heard you,” said Potter, and he had the decency to be ashamed. Weasley couldn’t even muster that much.

“So? She must’ve noticed she’s got no friends.”

Which might have been true, insofar as Draco didn’t really consider himself Granger’s friend — if anything, he was her class partner, which in his mind was a strictly strategic alignment, borne of mutual refusal to tolerate incompetence — but even so, no one besides himself should be permitted to make such remarks about her. It was demeaning to both of them. His father wouldn’t have tolerated an insult to one of his associates, no matter how he felt about them personally.

He called, “Embarrassed, Weasley?”

“Go away, Malfoy.”

He shouldered between them, knocking Weasley to the side. “Bet you wish you had her brains,” he said. “Then maybe your mummy would pay attention to you.”

This was a shot in the dark — large family, youngest son, it didn’t take a genius — but it landed square and true. Weasley started at him, held back only by Potter’s outflung arm. “Shut up!”

“Yeah? Oh, you felt that, didn’t you? At least Granger’s parents are proud of her. I doubt your mum even noticed when she gave birth to you.”

“That’s enough, Malfoy,” Potter said quietly.

Draco smiled nastily. “As for you, Potter,” he said, “you may have the others fooled, but not me. You’re a middling wizard who’s only here because of a freak accident eleven years ago. You’re hardly any better than a muggle-born.”

“Yeah?” said Potter calmly. He stepped into Draco’s face. “Something wrong with muggle-borns?”

He shrugged. “You don’t have me fooled,” he repeated. Then he shoved past Weasley and hurried into the crowd before either of them could hit back.

Granger didn’t turn up for the next class and wasn’t seen all afternoon. This was at first a pleasant reprieve and then a less pleasant one. Draco enjoyed, on one hand, the newfound peace with which he could take his lessons, and the absence of botheration in the hallways between classes. He did not lament the loss of always being the second hand in the air. But he discovered that this silence, once enjoyed, continued well after one stopped enjoying it. No one besides Granger talked to Draco. She was the only Gryffindor immune to his stony looks and sullish, unsociable demeanor. (That, or she simply didn’t notice, which was highly possible: Hermione Granger had the people skills of a sea sponge.)

At the feast, his morale reached an all-time low. The hall was magnificently decorated: thousands of conjured bats swarmed the walls, spiderwebs the size of parachutes swabbed the windows, and hovering jack-o-lanterns cast flickering shadows on the tables below. It smelled of pumpkin and squash and roasted hazelnuts, and down the center of each house table, trays of candy and colorfully frosted cakes rose in pyramids taller than Draco's head. Some of the students were wearing mummer's costumes. Several of the students at the Slytherin table in particular were wearing cow skull masks in observance of Samhain, and Draco wondered if there would be a bonfire later that night for the purebloods. He had gone to one of his cousin's Samhain bonfires when he was very young, four or five maybe, and he remembered it indistinctly as a blur of bright lights, woodsmoke, and enough candy to give Dobby a heart attack.

Granger didn't turn up for supper, either. Draco sat by himself, picking at a bit of baked potato, while all around him Gryffindor house roared with laughter and camaraderie. By and by he got to feeling so sorry for himself that he became irritated at her. Surely she'd known that if she didn't come, it would force him to sit alone. Surely she knew it would embarrass him. Didn't she care for his feelings? Wasn't he important to her at all?

Parvati Patil, a dark-haired girl with a knack for Transfiguration, asked him to pass the potatoes. She resumed talking to her friend, Lavender Brown, at once. "First-floor bathroom," she murmured. "Yes, I know, poor thing. She's been crying for hours… I asked if she'd like me to bring her some food, but she said she wanted to be left alone."

"Oh, well. You tried," said Brown, yawning.

"I felt so bad. She keeps to herself, but I never thought she was lonely…"

"She's just stuck-up. You can tell she thinks she's too good for us — Ron only said what we were all thinking…"

The suggestion that Weasley had been elected the vox populi of this wretched assembly, however frivolous, was the last straw. Draco made a snap decision.

“Hey. You two. Are you talking about Granger?”

The two girls broke off, stunned that he was talking to them. Credit to her, Patil nodded.

“First floor bathroom, you said?” He stood up, slinging his bag over his shoulder.

“Ye-es,” said Patil uncertainly, watching him clamber out of the table. “But you might… I’m only warning you, she said she doesn’t want to be disturbed.”

“Bully for her. I don’t care.” He grabbed a pear and a chicken salad sandwich from the table, bundled them in a napkin, and shoved them into his bag. As an afterthought, he snapped: “And Weasley didn’t say what we were all thinking, Brown, but thank you for that particularly revealing remark.” He turned on his heel and marched out of the hallway.

There was no one around the girls’ bathroom when he arrived, which was convenient, because he had no desire to be seen skulking around it. He rapped on the door. “Granger,” he barked. “It’s Malfoy. Come out of there.”

There was no answer. “I know you’re in there,” he added. “Patil told me. This is ridiculous. It’s far too much whinging for one day, and it’s undignified.”

Still, no answer. He banged on the door. “Answer me, Granger. Or I’m coming in. I don’t care if it’s the girls’.”

When this, too, received nothing, he rolled his eyes and kicked open the door.

The bathroom was empty, or at least seemed so upon first glance. A faint sniffling came from one of the stalls, echoing on the tile. When he poked open the door, he found Granger hunched over on the toilet seat, her arms around her knees. Upon seeing him, she knuckled her eyes dry and took a sharp breath.

“What are you doing here?” she demanded. “This is the girls’ loo.”

He folded his arms. “So you’ve been sulking in here all day, have you.”

“You’re one to talk about sulking.”

“I don’t know what you mean by that, and I’m going to ignore it. Granger, get up. Weasley can’t have hurt you that badly.”

She shrank into herself.

“Oh, come on.”

“You didn’t have to come,” she said in a small voice. “You can go back to the Feast. I’ll be fine. I’d like to be alone for a while, that’s all.”

“The Feast is dull,” he said. “Our house is all gossips and idiots. I’d rather be bored by you than by a hundred Gryffindors.”

Her face peeked through a gap in her arms. “What?”

“You heard me. Don’t fish.”

“You don’t think I’m a horrid know-it-all?”

“You’re absolutely a horrid know-it-all. What’s more, you’re stuffy, stuck-up, holier-than-thou, moralistic, and you think you’re better than everyone else.”

Her lower lip trembled. “Go away!” she cried. “You don’t have to tell me like I don’t know! I know I’m awful and nobody likes me, I know I haven’t got any friends—”

“I didn’t say that. Calm down.” He leaned against the stall. “Why do you care if nobody likes you? There’s nothing wrong with being stuffy and stuck-up and holier-than-thou, I should know. And the moralizing is annoying, but at least you’re not a hypocrite about it. I’d be far more embarrassed by the fact that you’ve spent this much time crying over Rolf Weasley.”

“His name’s Ronald,” she sniffled, though she wasn’t crying anymore.

“I’m not going to remember that.”

He gave her the bundle of food from the feast. “There. It’s chicken salad. I chose the nastiest sandwich I could find to punish you for not coming to dinner.”

She took it, tentatively, and then crammed it in her mouth with the haste of someone who hadn’t eaten since breakfast. “Thank you,” she mumbled, chewing.

His tsked and kicked her lightly in the shin. “Chew and then swallow, Granger, were you raised in a barn? Oh, right. Muggles. Don’t answer that.”

“You really are a prejudiced person,” she said reflectively, finishing the sandwich and starting on the pear. He found himself more at peace now that she’d stopped crying, and his morale was a great improvement on the state of things at the feast. “At first I thought it was ironic, but no. You really do think muggles are worth less than wizards, don’t you?”

“Oh, please.”

“You do!”

“Because they are.”

“You’re wrong. They’re people, like you and me.”

“But — oh, that’s ridiculous,” he said crossly. “They can’t do magic! What kind of person can’t do magic?”

“There’s nothing about magic that makes you a person,” she said matter-of-factly. “My parents can’t do magic. But they’re still people.”

“The less you mention your parents, the better we’re going to get along.”

“But they’re my parents,” she pointed out, and he hated how reasonable she sounded. “I’m not going to pretend they don’t exist just because you have a problem with them. Listen to you, you don’t even have a reason to dislike them. Have you ever met a muggle in your life?”

“Of course I haven’t. Don’t be absurd.”

“You’ve never been to the supermarket? Or a park? You’ve never gone out in London, just to see what it’s like?” She blinked. “Gosh, you are sheltered.”

“The word you’re looking for is ‘cultured,’” he said loftily. “And of course I’m not going to trounce around muggle London, getting mud and muggle all over my clothes. I’m a pureblood.”

“I don’t like the way you say that word,” she said suddenly, staring at him. “It feels unclean.”

“We don’t have to talk about this.”

“Very mature.”

The door swung open. Draco, realizing belatedly that he was still inside the girls’ bathroom, spent a wild half-second casting around for a way to exit, and spent far too long considering the toilet.

A lumbering footstep shuddered the walls. Something made a deafening growl, like an avalanche of stone.

Draco and Granger stared at each other, wide-eyed. Then they moved as one: Granger scrambled to her feet, and Draco slammed the stall door shut, snapping in the lock. He braced his weight against it and drew his wand, though he realized with a terrible jolt that he didn't know any helpful spells. He might as well pitch his wand at the creature, for all the good it'd do.

The shuffling footfalls of giant legs sent tiles clattering across the floor. The stall shook. There was an explosion of ceramic and metal, and water burst from the remains of what was surely a mangled sink. Granger gave a high whimper, and he clapped his hand over her mouth.

A shadow loomed over the stall. A foul scent washed over them, so thick and putrid that Draco fought the urge to vomit.

He looked up.

It was a horrible sight. Twelve feet tall, its skin was a dull, granite gray, its great lumpy body like a boulder with its small bald head perched on top like a coconut. It had short legs thick as tree trunks with flat, horny feet. It was holding a huge wooden club, which dragged along the floor because its arms were so long.

Draco's insides turned to ice. Granger threw herself behind him, which he might have been irritated about if he weren't busy trying to remember which bits of the brain controlled motor function in the legs.

It ripped the door off the stall and tossed it at the window. Glass shattered. The floor was littered with shards of ceramic and broken pipe.

"Draco, do something!"

If he had use of his throat, he might have shouted, Do what! You do something, you're the real Gryffindor!

What came out of his throat, however, was a much less dignified noise. He could not believe that he, Draco Malfoy, was going to die in a girls' bathroom with Hermione Granger.

"Hermione!"

Like the world's least inspiring pair of guardian angels, Potter and Weasley came skidding into the bathroom, armed with nothing but their wits and wands — which was to say, nothing. Draco could have laughed.

The boys took in the scene at a glance. Weasley, without so much as pausing to think, snatched a broken tap and threw it as hard as he could against the wall. It cracked loudly against the plaster, freezing the troll in its tracks. Draco noted (deliriously, it must have been) that with an arm like that, Weasley would make a half-decent Chaser.

The troll swung around and noticed the two newcomers, blinking stupidly. It hefted its club and lumbered forward, leaving Draco and Granger clustered in the warped remains of the stalls.

Weasley wasn't finished. While Potter cast around frantically for something to throw, Weasley picked up a metal pipe, hefted it, and with a warlike yell, he hurled it directly at the troll. It soared across the room and smacked the troll on the shoulder. In terms of damage this did not much, but the troll heard the sound and shifted directions, converging on the ginger. "Want some more, pea-brain?" roared Weasley, grabbing another tap from the rubble. "That's right! Over here, you bloody big git!"

There, in the shattered wreckage of the girls' bathroom, Draco had an epiphany. He found himself, to his anguish, suddenly capable of seeing the virtue in Ron Weasley: that either from bravery, stupidity, or sheer force of will (or perhaps a tremendous combination of all three) Weasley simply did not freeze in the face of danger. He could stare down twelve feet of ugly and still think three steps ahead.

Potter, perhaps thinking the same thing, got ahold of himself and darted forward. He grabbed Draco and Granger each by the arm and hauled with all his might, dragging them toward the exit. “Come on!” he yelled. “Both of you! Run!”

But Draco’s legs were still jellied with fear. On the way to the door he tripped over loose tiles, and Potter’s grip wasn’t strong enough to keep him upright. He went down on his knees, kneecaps smacking against hard floor. Granger skidded to a halt, yanking Potter back in the doing, and shrieked “Draco!”

She hurried back for him. Potter groaned and followed her. Grabbing one of Draco’s arms apiece, they wrenched him upright.

Meanwhile, Weasley was giving a performance to rival the great Spanish matadors. He scattered shrapnel against the walls and the mirrors, distracting the troll with sounds from different locations, having identified — cleverly, Draco thought — that the troll had stronger hearing than it did eyesight. He scampered this way and that around its legs, forcing it to turn around in the confined space, giving it little room to wind up or swing with its club. When Draco fell, the noise made the troll spin around, and its club took out a row of sinks. Weasley threw himself to the side to avoid getting hit by shrapnel, but this put him in a corner, and when the troll swung around again, he was trapped.

“Come on,” Draco urged, herding Granger and Potter toward the door. “We’ve got an opening, it’s distracted! Let’s go!”

Granger gasped, “But Ron—”

“Yes, we’ll get a teacher and come back for him, let’s hurry!”

“We’re not leaving him,” snapped Potter, and he dropped Draco’s arm. Spinning around, he took out his wand — looked at it — probably came to the same realization about spells that Draco did earlier — and tossed it aside. Then, with a yell, he took a running jump and vaulted onto the troll's back.

"Oh my God," cried Draco hysterically.

"Harry!" screamed Granger.

Draco couldn't believe he was going to watch Harry Potter die. To his surprise, he felt rather melancholy about it. Of course, he hadn't liked the boy, but there was something vaguely depressing about someone surviving the Killing Curse from Lord Voldemort only to get knocked off by a mountain troll.

Oh, well.

He dove for the doorway. He made it about one step before he was hauled back by the scruff of his robes.

"We have to help them!" Granger shouted, wrenching him to heel. "Do something! Throw something! Cast a spell!"

He shook his head, despairing. The poor witch, he thought. The panic had driven her mad.

The troll roared, twisting and flailing its club. Potter was beating the troll's head ineffectually with his fists, while Weasley shouted and scrabbled his legs on the tile, trying to drive himself further into the corner. The Boy Who Lived was clinging on for dear life, and any second, the troll was going to rip him off or catch him with the club. He had perhaps ten seconds before his luck ran out.

Granger drew her wand. "W-w-wingardium," she said, but her voice was thin, and her grip was weak. "W-ingardium l-l-l—"

He suddenly saw what she was trying to do. The club made a wide arc and shattered one of the ceiling lights, raining glass and filament on them. He ducked, shielding himself with his arms, and she did the same. The troll gave a mighty shake, and Potter's legs were thrown free — they wheeled in the air while the troll spun, kicking — but then he found his grip again. The club swung low and almost decapitated Weasley. Granger shrieked.

"Oh, for Merlin's sake," moaned Draco.

He ripped out his wand, aimed it at the beast, and executed the same gesture his mother had used to hang Christmas garlands for eleven years: "Wingardium Leviosa!"

The club flew suddenly out of the troll's hand, rose high, high up into the air, turned slowly over — and dropped, with a sickening crack, onto its owner's head. The troll swayed on the spot and then fell flat on its face, with a thud that made the whole room tremble.

Potter staggered to his feet. He wiped his nose with his sleeve and sniffed, shaking himself off. He looked for all the world like he'd just come back from a hard Quidditch match.

Weasley shoved himself upright, staring at what they had done. He looked at Draco, and it was he who spoke first. "All right then, Malfoy," he said, and his voice was remarkably steady. "Good aim, mate."

Granger let out a shaking breath. "Is it dead?"

Potter stooped over the head, getting far closer than Draco would have liked, and shook his head. "Knocked out," he said. He glanced around, patting his pockets. "Any of you see where my wand went?"

Wordlessly, Granger bent and retrieved it from the rubble.

"Thanks."

"You're welcome," she said, so quiet it was almost soundless.

"You, too, Malfoy," Potter added, and he patted Draco on the shoulder. "Good thinking, with that spell."

Draco, whose jaw was still locked shut from fear and adrenaline, gave him a small, jerking nod.

Footsteps clattered from the hall, and the door burst open. (Granger jumped.) Professor McGonagall swept in, closely followed by Snape — walking with a slight limp, it appeared — with Quirrell bringing up the rear. Quirrell took one look at the troll, let out a faint whimper, and sat quickly down on a toilet, clutching his heart. When Snape saw Draco, he did a double-take.

Professor McGonagall swept over them, white-lipped. “Explain yourselves,” she said, in tones colder than a Scottish Yuletide.

Potter brushed a bit of rubble from his robes, suddenly shy.

Weasley looked behind him at the troll, then at McGonagall, like: You’re joking, right?

“It appears one can always trust Mr. Potter to locate himself at the center of attention,” Snape purred. “Nevertheless, if you cannot explain yourself, we will have no choice but to punish—”

“They came to find me,” blurted Granger. “I was here, in the bathroom, during the feast. I didn’t hear the alarm. So they came to get me. Harry, and Ron, and—” She glanced at him, and hesitated. “Draco.”

The fact that this was a lie was not lost on any of the first years, least of all Draco, who exchanged an eyebrow-raise with Potter.

“All three of them?” asked Snape, his expression neutral. His eyes flit between Potter and Draco. “Together?”

Granger swallowed. Then she nodded. “I owe them my life,” she said. “Harry and Ron distracted it. Ron threw rocks, and Harry jumped on its back. And Draco cast a spell that knocked it out.”

“Makes it sound more impressive than what we did,” muttered Weasley, and Potter stepped on his foot.

“You should have found a teacher! What you did was exceedingly stupid and profoundly irresponsible!”

“Respectfully, professor,” said Potter, “we didn’t exactly know that the troll was going to be in here.”

“Yeah,” chimed in Weasley. “We were just trying to get Hermione and go. Honestly, I could’ve lived a long, happy life without ever seeing a mountain troll.”

McGonagall did not find this amusing, but the combined weight of their excuses appeared to move her. “Five points from Gryffindor,” she said. “Each.”

“Each?” cried Weasley.

For Draco, too, this seemed an injustice. He exclaimed, “Professor, excuse me, but how many First Years could take on a mountain troll?”

Weasley pointed at him. “He’s right!” he said, as if he couldn’t believe it.

“And — excuse me, professor, really, but — it’s not Granger’s fault she was in the bathroom, and we didn’t know the troll would be here, and we would’ve gone to get a professor, but we assumed they were all busy, mostly because of the aforementioned troll.”

Weasley was nodding vigorously. “Yeah,” he said. “Yeah. Yeah.”

“And really, professor, when you think about it—”

“Harry and Ron were tremendously brave,” Granger piped up.

Draco suffered this slight out of common cause with her. “Right, and nobody got hurt, which is remarkable, since Potter got all the way up on its back—”

“Except for the troll, which is rather a good thing, if you think about it —”

“At the very least we oughtn’t lose points for doing a bit of pest control.”

“And Draco was ever so clever with the spell, you’d never know that we only learned it this morning!”

“Well, but it was really Granger’s idea—”

“Enough,” cut in Professor McGonagall, but her eyes were soft.

Snape was staring at Draco and Granger, his lips parted, a very strange expression on his face.

“Five points from Gryffindor each, for Mr. Potter, Mr. Weasley, and Mr. Malfoy, given your failure to follow instructions and return to the common room,” said McGonagall. “And five points apiece for all four of you, for an admirable performance in the face of danger… does that seem fair to you, Severus?”

Snape closed his mouth and nodded.

“Very good. You may go.”

They hurried out of the chamber and didn’t speak at all until they had climbed two floors up. It was a relief to be away from the smell of the troll, quite apart from anything else.

“We should have gotten more than five points each,” Weasley grumbled.“A mountain troll! I’ll be washing that smell off for weeks. For five measly points!” He elbowed Granger. “You all right, then? Not still shaken up?”

She nodded. “It didn’t hurt me.”

“Not what I meant,” said Weasley, glancing at Draco. Draco arched an eyebrow and said nothing.

“Oh,” she said. “That.”

“Yeah. I don’t suppose… well. Let’s say us saving you makes it even?”

“She wouldn’t have been in there if it weren’t for you,” Draco said, offended.

Weasley grimaced guiltily. “Yeah,” he said, “s’pose you’re right, aren’t you. But still, I mean, it was pretty dangerous—”

“Yeah, so maybe you should feel worse about it,” Draco retorted.

“No, Draco, it’s all right.” Granger tucked her hair behind her ears. “I am grateful to you, Ron. And Harry. We can… I mean, you did save my life, and it’s not like it’s your fault the troll found us. And anyway I wasn’t very nice this morning, I suppose,” she said, though this last part was hard for her, and she tossed it out somewhat haughtily.

But it was good enough for Weasley, who shook her hand. “Bang on,” he said approvingly. “Square, yeah?”

She smiled. “Square.”

Then, to Draco’s shock, Weasley reached past her and stuck the same hand out to Draco. “You,” he said, “are an ungrateful git. You know that.”

“Do tell.” Draco eyed Weasley’s palm as if it contained a foul-smelling species of algae.

“But you did help. Might’ve saved my skin or something, I dunno. So.” He waggled his fingers. “Clean slate. I’m Ron Weasley. You are?”

Draco massaged his nose. He wondered what his mother would say if she could see him now. Shaking hands with a Weasley. The gut rebelled.

Granger tugged at his sleeve, obviously desirous that they should make up.

“Draco Malfoy,” he muttered, and without looking, he limply shook Weasley’s hand.

“Cool name,” said Weasley evenly, without a trace of mockery. “My gran says she knows your mum. You don’t know a Cedrella, by chance?”

He blinked. “Not Cedrella Black?”

“Yeah, yeah. That’s my Granny Weasley. And your mum’s Narcissa Black, yeah? So we’re like fourth cousins, twice removed, or something.”

“Oh, joy,” he said dully. “Hail and well met, coz.”

Weasley grinned. “Yeah. Think they disowned her for marrying my granddad. She was engaged to her cousin, ended up jilting him. It all seemed a bit pervy to me, but then, Weasleys don’t really go in for that sort of thing.”

Draco leered at him. “Never say never, cousin.”

To his surprise, Ron laughed.

They came to the portrait of the Pink Lady. “Pig snout,” said Potter.

The common room was packed and noisy. Everyone was eating leftovers from the feast, and floating platters of candy orbited the crowd like celestial bodies. “Ah, we’ve missed the best of it,” said Weasley, in devastated tones. “There’ll be only scraps left.”

“You had three helpings,” marveled Potter.

“I know, I’m starving.”

“Sweets!” exclaimed Granger. “I didn’t know there would be candy. I wonder if they have Cauldron Cakes. Draco, can you see if they have Cauldron Cakes?”

“Yeah, they’ve got Cauldron Cakes,” Weasley assured her, craning his long neck over the masses. “And Chocolate Frogs, and Bertie Bott’s. Want me to nab some?”

“Yes, please. And some sandwiches, if you don’t mind; I’ve barely eaten.”

“Sure. Harry, flag down some potatoes, would you? Draco, what do you want?”

Draco, who’d been preparing to slink off to the dorms, stopped. “What do you mean?”

“We’re getting plates, mate, do you want anything?” Weasley looked him up and down. “Are you leaving? They’ve got food here.”

“I know,” he said, somewhat stiffly. “I ate earlier.”

“You don’t want to stay for the party?” He nodded to Seamus Finnigan, who was setting up a ceedee player while Dean Thomas flipped through his collection.

“I’m not exactly —”

“Look!” Granger jumped on her tiptoes, clinging to Potter’s shoulders for balance. Potter was laughing and holding her steady. “They’ve got Turkish Delights! Real ones, muggle ones! I haven’t had one of those in ages! Harry, did you ever read…”

Draco looked back at Weasley. He shook his head.

Weasley shrugged. “Suit yourself,” he said. “Have a good one.”

“Thanks,” said Draco coolly, and with a last glance, he retreated up the stairs.

The Quidditch Pitch

Chapter 5: The Quidditch Pitch

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

Draco had no intention of developing an acquaintance with Harry Potter or Ron Weasley. Unfortunately, they had other ideas.

Starting the day after Halloween, the pair of them started to act very strangely around Draco. They said hello to him in the mornings, and bid him goodnight while they dressed for bed. If there was an empty seat at Draco's side, one of them might occupy it, and they would colonize any table where he elected to sit by himself. Once, they had even picked up their plates and moved down the Gryffindor table so as to disrupt his solitude with their noisy chewing and insipid chatter. This had been bad enough from Granger, but with all three of them triangulating, Draco scarcely had a moment to himself.

Granted, he could conceive of worse things. One morning, he forgot his satchel in the Transfiguration classroom, and he'd hardly had time to groan and spin on his heel before Saint Potter came strolling up the corridor with two satchels slung over his back.

"Forgot something, Malfoy?" he called smugly.

Or once, when he'd cut himself slicing foxglove in Potions: Draco hissed and dropped his knife, catching Weasley's attention. "Ooh, ouch," said Weasley mildly. "You know what to do with that, yeah?"

"No," Draco snapped, cradling his finger to his chest. At home, minor scrapes and bruises were healed by Dobby, or if it was more serious, his mother.

"You got to tie it up. Pressure makes the bleeding stop. Bill taught me. Here," and he drew the grayest, rattiest old handkerchief Draco had ever seen from his pocket. He shook it aggressively at Draco. “Well, wrap it, don’t just sit there.”

And after class, he had seen Draco to the hospital wing, even though he’d complained all the while that the visit was unnecessary and Draco was being a baby.

Granger found this behavior far less mystifying than Draco. “They’re trying to be friendly,” she said, with a lightness in her tone that implied she was laughing at him. “You’re so sour that you can’t tell when people are trying to be nice.”

“I don’t need their charity.”

“It’s not charity, it’s friendship. People doing things for each other. You might try doing something nice for one of them, sometime, you know.”

He bristled. “I don’t owe them anything. I didn’t ask them to be nice to me.”

“All right, then, don’t,” she said. “But I don’t think that you’re being fair to them. Harry and Ron are good people, and they grow on you when you get to know them.”

He hauled open the door of the library and held it for her. “Like a species of fungus,” he deadpanned, and followed her inside.

Midterm exams finished. Results were posted outside the classrooms, papering an ivory swathe down the doorframe, a Doric declaration of academic achievement. Marks generally ran in order of highest to lowest, although the kinder professors went alphabetically. Flitwick, for instance, refused to give a grade lower than 50%, and offered a ten-point jump for any student who came in to review their mistakes after the fact. Snape not only sorted by score, but divided the list into categories of ‘Acceptable,’ ‘Needs Improvement,’ and ‘Unsatisfactory.’ Draco led the pack of ‘Acceptables,’ with a midterm score of 102%, a perfect O. He’d found an error in one of the questions and corrected it, presuming it was a trick question. Granger trailed him with a score of 101%, since she'd been the only other student to find the error, but her correction had less detail than his.

Neville Longbottom had burrowed to the bottom of the 'Unsatisfactory' group. This was disappointing to him and Draco both, since he had been laboring weekly over Longbottom's cauldron. It did not matter. Longbottom was immune to instruction, incentive, and punishment. He had singed off his own eyebrows twice in a week and proved prolific in the art of turning cauldrons to molten slop. Draco had started wearing fireproof gloves to their lessons.

"I don't understand it," he spat, pacing the floor.

Snape sat behind his desk, grading papers. He allowed Draco to vent his frustrations in his office on the understanding that he was under no obligation to listen to them.

"He's like an automaton. I explain something, he says he understands, and then he doesn't do it. I ask him, again, if he understands it, and he says yes. And then he doesn't. Do. It. I tell him, Longbottom, if you don't do this, I'm going to club you upside the head with this ladle, do you understand, and he says yes, I understand, and then he doesn't do it."

"Welcome to teaching," Snape said flatly. He circled something and struck it out.

"It's maddening! And now he's got me worried about his midterm marks, like I don't have enough to concern myself with."

He had received another letter from his mother. She had been beside herself at the story of the mountain troll, which he may or may not have edited to emphasize his role in the battle, and he had to write a long letter convincing her not to withdraw him from Hogwarts and bring him home. Dobby had made a mugwump roast for Samhain, which Draco had been aggrieved to miss, and she was thinking about turning one part of the East Wing into a music hall. And, she added, she was going to start taking visitors at the house again — for the first time in ten years.

Draco threw himself into a chair. “Don’t know why he’s not in Hufflepuff, anyway,” he said grumpily. “He’s got all the spine of a cuttlefish. ‘O-o-o-oh, I’m s-s-s-sorry, M-M-M-M-Malfoy!’ He’s less of a Gryffindor than I am.”

Snape said, “The hat does not necessarily Sort one where they would be happiest.”

“You’re telling me. Sir.”

The office fell quiet save for the scratch of Snape’s quill. The sound of water moving through old pipes groaned overhead. Somewhere, water was dripping onto stone, and the candlelight flickered eerily over various jars full of green embalming fluid, illuminating the shadowy objects that floated within.

Draco eyed Snape’s knee. Peering out from beneath the shield of his cloak, he caught a glimpse of red-spotted white gauze.

“Is your leg all right, professor?”

Snape moved his leg out of sight, hiding it beneath his cloak. “Perfectly.”

He frowned. He didn’t see any reason that Snape should lie to him, unless the answer was particularly embarrassing. He persisted, “Has Madam Pomfrey taken care of it? Or do you have your own supply of dittany?”

“Your concern is touching, but I do not require it.”

Draco slouched in his chair. Tapping his feet, he cast another bored look around the room. “I heard the Slytherin commons are in the dungeons," he said. "I wouldn't know, I've never been. Is that because your classroom's down here, or is that a coincidence? The Potions Master can't always be Head of Slytherin."

"Draco."

"Yes, professor."

Snape dropped his quill in the inkwell with a brisk movement. "Tell me what you think of Harry Potter."

Since the question came out of nowhere, Draco had to take a moment to think. "Normal," he decided, after a moment. "Quiet. Bit stubborn. Could do to keep his nose out of other people's business. Granger likes him, but with her there's really no accounting for taste."

"Do you find him arrogant?"

Draco frowned. "Not really," he admitted.

"Self-serving? Spoiled? Cruel?"

"Possible, unlikely, and no."

"Do you like him?"

"Merlin, no," Draco retorted. "He's a shabby piece of half-blood riffraff in need of a haircut."

This answer had a curious effect on his professor. Snape put his knuckle to his mouth and gazed into the middle distance, lost in thought.

"Er… professor?"

"You are dismissed," he said suddenly.

Draco stumbled to his feet. "Did I say something wrong, sir?"

“Dismissed,” repeated Snape, with a curious intensity in his voice, and when he looked at Draco, his gaze passed cleanly through him, as if he didn’t see him at all. Then, without another word, he stalked out the door, leaving Draco alone in the dungeon.

The first Quidditch match happened on a bright, cold morning, under a sun-washed blue sky and over a field still iced thickly with frost. Draco intended to spend the day reading, but Lee Jordan, the resident bastion of house spirit, conducted a raid of the boys’ dormitory and bullied everyone down to the pitch to support the team. Draco made a symbolic protest of refusing to wear the Gryffindor scarf — which he regretted instantly once the highland wind raked across his neck. The stands had filled up, the speakers boomed with music, and the banners flickered bright and blinding in the winter sun. When the Gryffindor team soared out on their brooms, the Gryffindor stands shuddered with the weight of stamping feet. Draco, who had arrived late and squeezed in with Granger in the nosebleeds, clutched his seat and fought a wave of nausea. Nevertheless, the house spirit was so thick you could practically smell it. It was admittedly invigorating.

Which made the game itself all the more disappointing. Slytherin walloped Gryffindor by seventy points in a war of attrition between captains Wood and Flint, punctuated by Terrence Higgs neatly pocketing the Snitch at the two-hour mark. Draco, who had come determined not to get involved in the game whatsoever, nevertheless found himself standing up and shouting whenever one of the chasers fumbled, which happened embarrassingly often. He jeered at Flint when he fouled Katie Bell, not because he had any particular affection for Bell, but because it was a clumsy and obvious technical that the referee really ought to have pulled him for; and though he would deny it, when Flint caught a bludger to the face, Draco elbowed Potter — dispassionately and courteously, of course — in excitement.

Granger, who remained engrossed in their Transfiguration textbook throughout the match, only looked up at the ending klaxon.

“Oh,” she said, sounding not-quite-disappointed. “Is it over? Did we win?”

Draco sighed. “No, Granger. Generally, the team that’s booing and sighing at the end isn’t the team that won.”

On the way back from the match, Weasley shared in Draco’s disgust.

“I mean, Wood’s a decent captain,” Weasley said tragically, in the same way one might have said, ‘Oedipus was a decent king.’ “But he hasn’t got the chasers. It’s not his fault. Flint’s got Pucey and Smithers, and what does Wood have? Except for Angelina he’s got no muscle...”

Draco sniffed. “It’s the seeker’s fault. If Bronson caught the snitch when Gryffindor was ahead in the third quarter, that would’ve been the game. And don’t tell me the snitch doesn’t come out that early, because every quafflehead worth his salt knows that’s a myth, and I’d remind you that Krum caught the snitch in the second quarter in last year’s friendly with Romania.”

“No, mate, and I hear you, I do, but it’s the chasers, it’s all in the chasers, they’re the meat and potatoes of the game…”

“Nonsense. What would you know about it? Your team’s the Cannons.”

Potter was quiet for much of the walk back to the dorm, trailing behind them with Granger. As they were filing back into the Great Hall, Draco noticed him hanging back to stare wistfully at the quidditch pitch.

“Oy, Potter,” he called. “Are you coming in? It’s cold.”

“Go ahead without me,” he replied.

“Did you forget something?”

Potter shook his head. He put his hands in his pockets and sighed. He gazed at the checkered towers of the pitch like a sailor on the dock watching a ship set sail.

Draco followed his gaze. “You ever play, Potter?” he said, hopping down from the stoop. The door swung shut behind him.

“I was raised by muggles,” he said. “Never rode a broom before this year.”

“You liked it, though.”

He shrugged. “Thought it was pretty good, yeah.”

“Pretty good,” repeated Draco. He glanced at the pitch. “You know, you’re not grossly terrible at it. Flying.”

“Yeah? Thanks, mate.”

“That’s not praise, it’s factual,” he said in clipped tones. “Hooch loved you. Think she was filing adoption papers at the end of the lesson.”

“I don’t know about that. She was being nice.”

“False modesty flatters no one.” A gust of wind raked across their faces, and he wished once again for a scarf. “It’s a shame first years can’t try out.”

“I couldn’t anyway,” said Potter, finally turning towards the castle. “I don’t have a broom.”

Draco, whose father had owned a fourteen-piece antique broomstick collection, found this nearly inhumane. “How do your muggles get around, then?” he asked. “Floo?”

“They drive.” At Draco’s uncomprehending look, he continued: “They’ve got these things called cars? They’re boxes made of metal, with rubber wheels underneath them, and when you get inside and press some levers it moves around…"

"Like a rolling jail cell?"

"Sort of. If you want to go somewhere far away, you can get in this big metal box called an airplane, and it'll go up in the air and fly you where you want to go."

Draco balked in horror.

"And you've been on one of them, these 'airplangs'?"

"Oh, not me," he said. "Uncle Vernon once flew to Berlin for a business trip, and they took Dudley to Disney World when he was five… I didn't go, though. They hired a sitter and told me to re-grout all the showers before they came back."

'Grouting' sounded so obscene that Draco feared asking what it was. He could no better express his sympathy than with a disgusted, vehement: "Muggles."

"S'not because they're muggles, it's because they don't like me," Potter said peaceably. "That's all right. I'm not very easy to live with."

Having lived with Potter for almost two months, Draco knew this to be a lie. None of the other Gryffindor boys were so freakishly neat, so careful to keep their things on their own side of the room. None besides Potter bothered to make his bed in the morning, not when the house elves would do it anyway once they left. It was honestly annoying: it made the rest of them look lazy by comparison.

"I think it's criminal to let muggles do that to a wizard," Draco said coldly, believing every word more than he had before. "And I'm not saying this out of any great love for you, Potter, but they should have been carrying you around on a litter and kissing your feet, and thanking you for the privilege."

“I don’t think that’s true,” Potter said uncomfortably.

“Well, I do. And you shouldn’t have had to wait until you were eleven to ride a broomstick, that’s just depressing.” He lifted his nose. “ I went flying for the first time when I was six.”

Potter wrinkled his nose at him. “You did not, Malfoy.”

“I did, thank you!” He paused and admitted, “My father took me.”

“Oh,” said Potter, a touch wistful. “That must have been nice.”

“So he’s not around, then.” Potter’s voice held neither sympathy nor condescension, and for that, Draco was pathetically grateful.

“No. He’s dead.”

“I’m sorry.”

Draco bristled and was about to snap at him when Potter said, “My dad’s dead, too. When I was a baby.” He chewed on his cheek, reflective, while the wind tangled his dark hair. “Wish he could’ve taken me flying.”

There was really nothing to say to this.

“Rough.”

“Yeah,” agreed Potter. “Dinner?”

“Sure.”

But Draco found himself returning to the conversation again and again over the course of the evening, his mind curving back towards it like a planet orbiting a star. The sound of Potter saying Wish he could’ve taken me flying ran on a loop in the back of his head. At first, it irritated him. It made it seem like Draco was lucky to have his father die later in life. Was that what Potter had implied? That Draco should pity him, because he had it worse?

But that just didn’t sound like Potter. It wasn’t in his nature to be spiteful or jealous, merely oblivious, and blind to his own insinuations. That wasn’t his fault, either. He wasn’t used to his words being taken seriously. It sounded like the muggles who raised him barely paid attention to him.

This last thought stuck in his head like a grain of sand, irritating him. It struck him as dangerously, almost violently, irresponsible that Potter hadn’t been told about magic sooner in his life. For a muggle-born like Granger, it was one thing: her parents weren’t to know, and couldn’t be blamed for not knowing. But there were wizards in Potter’s family before him, and his muggles would have known about them. So why hadn’t he been taught? Why hadn’t anyone told him? Why let the poor daft fool stagger into a world he knew nothing about, equipped with nothing but an underdeveloped sense of self-interest?

He stewed until it was late enough that the other boys trickled back into the dorm and started getting ready for bed. As he lay on his four-poster and tried to sleep, he heard Potter’s footsteps — you could tell because after dark, Potter always tiptoed, careful not to wake anybody, while everyone else stomped in — followed by a rustle of hangings and the opening of a dresser. When the drawer creaked, Potter stopped, and eased it out slowly, painstaking in his effort not to make any noise.

It was wretched, when you thought about it. Draco had no idea what Disney World was and would rather summer in hell than find out, but it was still boorish beyond belief not to invite the whole family, at least if two-thirds or more of the relatives would be in attendance. A pureblood would never make such a mistake. His Great Uncle Orion had once sent Grandfather a Howler for failing to invite him to a tea party, on the grounds that because four of seven living Blacks would be in attendance, it was technically a family reunion.

Draco sighed, knowing then what he had to do.

Potter yelped when the hangings of his bed were ripped back. He hauled up the sheets to cover his (clothed) chest.

“Shoes and cloak, Potter,” Draco snapped. “It’s going to be cold.”

“...Where?”

“Where I’ll dump your body if you don’t get up and get moving , do you think I’ve got all night?”

One thing you could never say of the Boy Who Lived, he reflected, as said Boy hopped around in the darkness on one foot, searching for his other sock: call him stupid, call him reckless, call him green as the fresh-cut grass, but you couldn’t say he wasn’t game.

They crept down the stairs and through the portrait-hole. The corridors of Hogwarts were different at night, somehow bigger and longer, and far darker, as the lanterns that lit them in the evenings all extinguished once curfew passed. Moonlight streamed through the clerestory windows and lay in long milk-white bars on the wood, dappling the marble columns of the Great Hall. The castle sighed and groaned, resettling in its firmaments.

Draco crept along the side of the hallway, checking each corner before he turned it. He didn't dare light his wand for fear of making themselves more visible to Filch.

Potter followed, mimicking his actions. "Oy, Malfoy," he whispered. "Where are we going?"

"Keep your voice down! Out of the castle."

"Why?"

"Because I'm demented, apparently. Come along, quickly."

They darted down the Great Staircase, at which point Draco broke into a sprint for the front door. There was nothing else for it: anyone in the Great Hall could be seen from overhead and all directions by anyone who happened to be on the staircases above, and the only thing for it, if you weren't invisible, was to dash and pray. Potter raced after him, making surprisingly good time for his shorter legs, and they hauled open the doors together.

Outside, the lawns shone under a full coat of frost. Silvery clouds gathered like skeins of wool around the full and luminous moon, pockmarked here and there by stars. The lake had turned white and still as a marble plate, and somewhere in the dark quill-feathers of the trees, a nightingale was singing. It was cold, cold enough to turn the hairs on one's neck upright and to pebble the flesh of one's arms, but the wind had gone away, and now the night was still and dark and cool as a shard of black ice, silent save for the susurrus of the trees and the lonely strain of birdsong.

Draco and Potter crossed the lawns, their cloaks dragging over the brittle grass. The quidditch pitch swelled out of the night sky like a beast with eight heads, dark and eerily silent.

"The pitch?" Potter perked up. "Is that where we're going?"

“No, we’re taking a moonlight stroll by the lake. Mind your cloak! You almost tripped me.”

The gates were closed and sealed by a padlock the size of Draco’s head. Potter gave them an experimental rattle. “Rats,” he said. “Locked.”

“Well spotted. Any other observations for the gallery?” Draco hunted through his pockets for his wand.

Potter squinted up at the fence, evaluating. “Bet we could climb it,” he said, after a moment. “S’ not that hard. I’ve watched Dudley and his mates do it a hundred times. You could use that bar there as a foothold, and pull yourself over the top. Hop down, no problem.”

“Yes, Potter,” drawled Draco. “‘Hop down’ a ten-foot fence. Brilliant idea. When I reflect on my life, I often find I’ve dedicated insufficient time to my passion for rappelling…”

There was a rattle of chains, and he looked up sharply. Potter had attached himself to the ironwork and was scrambling, lizard-like, up the bars of the gate.

“Potter! Are you mad?”

The gate rattled and shook, but held fast. He quickly reached the top and swung his leg over the bars, careful not to bruise the Potter Family Heirlooms on the points of the fence. Then he slithered down the other side and dropped neatly to the ground.

“All right,” he said, ruddy with exertion. “Now you.”

Draco, stone-faced, lifted his wand and tapped it on the padlock. “Alohamora. ”

The padlock clicked, and he made a show of prodding the gate open with a single finger. It swung wide. He walked through.

“That’s useful,” Potter said appreciatively. “Did Flitwick teach us that?”

He didn’t mention that it was several chapters ahead of where Flitwick had them. He’d been bored, and the library had been closed.

They hopped a turnstile and climbed the stairs down to the locker rooms. Potter started for the Gryffindor dugout, but Draco stopped him.

“No. Slytherin.”

“Why?”

“Because they have better brooms.”

The Slytherin locker rooms were dark as pitch. Draco whispered “Lumos,” and the beam from his wand illuminated a set of gleaming brass lockers, wood benches, and green-and-silver hangings on the walls. He marched past the row of lockers, scanning the names: Higgs… Pucey… Fletchley… Flint…

That’d do it. Flint was a Twenty-Eight name, and Adrian’s mother had been the sole heiress to the fortune. Draco tapped the combination dial and muttered another “ Alohamora.”

“This is so cool,” said Potter, spinning around. “This is where they hang out before the match, yeah? And practices?”

Draco ignored him. He took down Adrian’s broom — a Comet Two Eighty, not bad — and a pair of dragon-hide flying gloves. They were going to be several sizes too big for either of them, but that couldn’t be helped. “Catch,” he said, tossing the gloves at Potter. With barely a glance at what was being thrown, Potter plucked them out of the air. “Put those on.”

For himself, he found and emptied the locker marked Bole . He'd noticed one of the beaters riding a particularly nice Cleansweep Seven, and he'd never tried a Cleansweep before.

"We're not stealing these, are we?" Potter said doubtfully.

"Of course not. Team equipment will be loaded with Tracing Charms."

"Won't they notice if we take them out of the pitch?"

Draco snapped the hem of his glove, rolled his fingers into a fist, and called the broomstick into his hand. It smacked his palm with a satisfying thwack.

"That's why we're not leaving the pitch," he said, and he strode past Potter onto the field.

The moonlight blazed almost bright as day. Draco mounted his Cleansweep and kicked off, swiveling a little while he got his bearings. The balance was different from his broomstick at home, more sensitive, but he soon hit his stride, and looped a lazy circle around the pitch for a warmup. When he came around the last turn, Potter had joined him in the air, and was hovering in the center of the field.

Draco leaned forward and increased pressure on his front-hand by a fraction. The Cleansweep bucked and dove, dipping its nose precipitously before he righted himself and steered it into an incline, white-knuckling the front-hand grip. He could feel the power humming under the wood, anxious to be let free.

"All right there, Potter?" he barked.

Potter turned his head. He was positively electrified with glee.

"This is magic!" he shouted.

"Of course it is! Not going to catch a muggle doing this, are you?"

He banked and cut a J-curve through the air, accelerating into a breakneck incline, and leveled off once he'd reached Potter's height. They hovered next to each other, the breeze ruffling their hair. Seen from above, they might have resembled the twin eyes of a yin-yang symbol, one white, one black.

Potter shuffled a little, reseating himself on the broom. "It's sort of — alive," he breathed, stroking the handle. "It's like I can feel what it wants to do."

"That's because you're sitting on a good broom. Comets are notoriously finicky, they take a strong hand, but if you don't mind being an active rider, you can get a lot of performance out of them. Cleansweeps, like this one for instance, they're more sensitive. Faster, each to each, than Comets, but harder to control, and the speed is useless if you don't know how to use it. Now, the model that everyone's excited about, the one that's supposed to thread the perennial needle of handling and speed, that's the upcoming Nimbus —"

He stopped: Potter was smiling.

"What?"

"Nothing. You just sound like Hermione," he said.

"I resent that!"

"Why? She's brilliant," he said simply. "Smartest person I've ever met. I wish I could sound like Hermione about something."

Of course, it was true. Nevertheless, he suspected he was being subtly called a boffin. The mischievous glint in Potter's eyes did nothing to disabuse him of this idea.

Potter started a slow helix upward. "Any idea how fast these things can go?" he asked.

“Sure. I could tell you.” Draco shrugged. “Or we could find out.”

This was the right thing to say. Potter’s face lit up with an animal grin. “First one to five laps?”

“Five sickles on it.”

“Why not ten?”

“Ooh. Wouldn’t be too rich for your blood, Potter?”

“Doesn’t matter, since it’s your money I’m taking.”

“Hark at him! Second time in the air, and he thinks he’s Krum.”

“Hardly takes a Krum to beat you,” Potter said, grinning.

“Funny. Do you want to fly, or do you want to talk? I know you’re better at one than the other.”

Potter extended his hand. “Shake on it, then. Five laps, ten sickles. We’ll both start from the goal-hoops.”

“You do that,” said Draco, and took off like a shot.

As the wind ripped through his hair, he could hear Potter hollering behind him: “ Oi! Not fair!”

Like taking candy from a house-elf, he thought, suppressing a grin.

He dropped down on his belly and the Cleansweep soar. The world became a blur.

The distance to the stands vanished so quickly that he misjudged the time it would take to turn, and he had to haul the broom into a hairpin to avoid collision. It banked and swerved at the twitch of his hand. The wind roared in his ears. His pulse pounded in his chest, strong and deep as a timpani drum. Every motion of his hand corresponded with a movement of his body in three-dimensional space, turning the race into a complex game of acrobatics, athletics, and aerodynamics, all conducted at breakneck speed.

This was flying: not the low-hovering circles that Hooch had them crawling through in classes, but flying that thrilled, flying that soared, that dared gravity to look up and realize how it was being spited.

He crossed the field again, knit a tidy loop around the goalposts, and raced back the way he'd come. It occurred to him that he didn't know where Potter was, and he checked over his shoulder, momentarily concerned that the boy had toppled off his broom.

A shadow soared over him. Potter's Comet dropped in from above and leveled in the airspace just before Draco's nose, forcing him to bank or else crash into him. The Cleansweep swerved and shuddered at the sudden jerk, and Draco veered off his line, nearly tumbling into the stands.

"Potter!" he roared. "That's cheating!"

Potter laughed, loud and free and slightly crazed, and accelerated again. "Fair play, Malfoy."

Well, that was not to be borne. He would not take a lesson in cunning from a Gryffindor.

Draco hauled the Cleansweep back in line and raced after him.

They sliced a pair of close turns around the goal hoops and cut twin lines across the field. Potter was, he had to admit, indecently good. Though he'd never learned the theory, he appeared to simply understand the physicality of flying, how to move and where and how far in advance. As they went into a turn, he naturally countersteered against the pull of momentum by tipping his shoulders against the direction of the broom, and when they hit the straight-and-narrow, he drew his elbows in, cutting air resistance.

Whether he realized he was doing these things, it was anyone's guess, but somewhere in the back of Harry Potter's hindbrain lurked a very good quidditch player, and it was having the time of its life.

The third and fourth laps they spent in a dead heat. On the fifth, Draco made his move. As they approached the goalposts, he wrenched up the nose of his broomstick, forcing a steep deceleration as air resistance threw itself against his body. Using his nose as a pivot point, he hauled the back of the broom around in a sweeping motion — turning like a spoke around the nose of the broom, instead of guiding the whole broom through the curve — and, steadying out, sped off in the other direction. The move gave him a few precious seconds on Potter, who caught what he was doing only once he'd initiated his own turn.

He raced back for the hoops, thinking cheerfully of the way ten sickles would jingle in his pocket.

He was just past centerfield when from behind him there came a great cry, and Potter shot past. The boy was plastered down to the line of his broom, legs outstretched, barely touching the footholds, remaining astride it by sheer arm strength alone; his cheek was pressed to the wood, and his elbows were locked to his chest. At the speed he was moving, the current alone ought to have blown him off the broomstick, but it hadn't. He had reduced his aerodynamic footprint to the size of a dinner plate, which — because he was smaller than Draco — meant that even on an older broom, he could outpace Draco on a straight-and-narrow, since he didn't need to position his body for a turn.

Which the git must have very well known, because as he cleared Draco's nose, he shot him the tiniest, shyest little smirk he'd ever seen.

Then he crossed the line of the goal-hoops and let out a victorious shout.

“Did you see that?” he hollered, circling around and pelting back at Draco. “I got you!”

“Yes, I saw it,” Draco said sourly, starting back down for the pitch. Potter followed him.

“I really thought you’d trounce me,” he said, eyes sparkling. “And when you did that sweeping thing near the end I thought you had me for sure.”

“That makes two of us.”

“You were right about the broom, by the way. You sort of need to yank on it, I think I’m too small.” Potter landed clumsily beside him and staggered off the broom, shaking with excitement. “Still,” he said, “that’s really cool. Is this what wizards do all the time? When they’re not working, or sleeping?”

Draco almost snorted in derision. “For professional quidditch players, I suppose.”

Potter’s eyes became saucers. “You can fly for a living?”

“Sure. If you’re very, very good. And if you don’t mind getting hauled around the continent for nine months of the year, living out of hotels, shilling for fitness potions…”

“And they pay you for it?”

“Not enough, in my opinion.”

“That’s mad,” said Potter dreamily. Casting a last look around the quidditch pitch, he sighed, “I’d pay to do this.”

Draco was still sour about his loss when they made it back to the castle. He managed to get Potter to stop talking about it by appealing to the need for silence while they crept back to the common room, but even so, being beaten put him in a foul mood.

Besides, Potter had cheated. That drop-in from above was patently against the rules of quidditch. It wasn't a real win.

And so what if, as they climbed the second-floor staircase, Draco hopped silently over the trick stair, and continued on his way without bothering to warn Potter about it? So what if, as Potter followed him, he planted his foolish foot right smack in the hole where the stair should be, and toppled face-forward? And so what if, when he did so, Draco — instead of trying to catch him or break his fall — gave a hearty snicker to himself, and kept going?

It wasn't as if Draco installed the trick stair. It was Potter's own fault for not looking.

"Trouble with the leg, Potter?" he inquired, leaning against the banister, enjoying himself.

"It's stuck!" Potter tugged fruitlessly at his ankle. "Give me a hand, would you?"

There was something patently hilarious about Harry Potter fighting a losing battle with a staircase. Draco decided to enjoy it a little longer. "I don't know. I think you've almost got it," he yawned.

A soft meow at the bottom of the staircase made them both jump. A black cat prowled into the puddle of moonlight on the landing, and sat down, staring at them with luminous yellow eyes.

"Mrs. Norris," Potter whispered. He and Draco made eye contact, and they wore the same expression of dawning dread.

"Filch—"

"Second floor—"

" Move!"

Potter tried to take a step, but his leg hauled him down. With a cry of frustration, Draco swept down, seized the other boy by the armpits, and pulled with all his might. With a splinter of wood, the trick stair released him, and the two went tumbling to the floor.

Mrs. Norris let out a piercing MEOW.

MEOW.

“What’s that? What is it you see?” The voice came closer, echoing in the landing, thick with glee. “Have you found some mischief, my love?”

Quick as a flash, Potter popped up and scrambled up the stairs on his hands and knees, followed by Draco. They sprang upright at the third-floor landing and ducked out of sight behind a statue of Helga Hufflepuff.

“I heard that!” came Filch’s shrill cry. “You, there! Stop! Students out of bed! Students out of bed!” And there came the horrible scrape of a cane on hardwood, and the limping thump-thump that meant he was hobbling after them.

“Run,” Potter hissed, and grabbing Draco’s elbow, he took off sprinting down the corridor.

He was shockingly fast: Draco’s legs burned in the effort of keeping up. Hurtling down one hall and then another, it took him a moment to realize that Potter didn’t actually know where they were going — they were taking a zigzag pattern into the depths of the castle in the hopes of losing Filch. It was because of this that they soon rounded a corner and found themselves in a dead-end hallway, with the clattering three-footed footfalls of Filch fast approaching behind them.

“Fantastic,” he spat. “Well done, Potter. Couldn’t have led us anywhere else?”

“I didn’t see you helping!” retorted Potter. “Come on, in here.” He seized the nearest doorknob, which rattled but did not turn.

“Merlin. Out of the way!”

Draco whipped out his wand and blurted a sloppy Unlocking Charm. The lock clicked anyway, and Potter whipped the door open, hustling them both inside.

It slammed closed, and they slumped against it. Through the wood, they heard a cat’s woeful meowing grow louder and then quieter as it prowled past the door. Its master soon followed. “Lost them, did we, my sweet? Not to worry… They must be hiding around here somewhere…”

Potter poked Draco’s arm. “Lock it,” he mouthed.

“You lock it,” Draco muttered, embarrassed. He didn’t actually know the counterspell.

A rumble like a distant thunderclap shuddered through the room. Draco stiffened. Beside him, he felt Potter do the same.

The other boy turned around.

“Malfoy,” he said, in a very thin voice.

“Don’t tell me.”

“Malfoy, we should—”

“I don’t care. Don’t tell me.”

Wordlessly, Potter grabbed his shoulder and whirled him around.

Above them blazed the sallow, bloodshot eyes of a monstrous dog, so vast its bulk covered the distance between ceiling and floor. It had three heads. Its noses twitched and canted in their direction, while three drooling mouths poured slippery ropes of saliva from yellowish fangs. It was standing quite still, all six eyes staring at them, as Draco supposed he himself might stare at an intruder who burst suddenly into his bedroom at some unthinkable hour and disturbed his sleep.

He dropped his head, quite certain that if he continued to look at it, he would faint away. In this way he noticed that between its paws laid a square of wood, hinged, with a small iron handle and a padlock. It was a trapdoor.

Draco remained motionless, stomach roiling, as the abyssal growls increased in volume. Frozen in terror, he barely noticed that Potter had been hissing his name.

Finally, Potter gave up on a coordinated effort. (This was wise.) Seizing Draco's wrist, he flung himself out the door, using his body weight to drag Draco with him. The door slammed shut, and they pelted back down the hallway. Draco regained more and more use of his legs the farther away he was from the dog, and by the time they reached the third-floor landing, he felt very nearly capable of independent movement.

Unfortunately, this came at precisely the wrong time.

"What on earth?" said a thin, watery voice.

Draco startled. It wasn't Filch.

"I believe it is w-w-well past your curfew," said the voice, losing some of its timidity. "You should not be here… Mister Malfoy… Mister P-P-Potter."

And Professor Quirrell emerged from the shadows, gazing at them with an expression of grave foreboding.

"Detention for a month, " Potter groused, dragging his spoon listlessly through his porridge. "After classes every day, and on Saturdays, including quidditch matches…”

“No!” Weasley dropped his sausage biscuit in horror. “Not quidditch, too? Does he know the season’s on?”

Granger sniffed. “It’s your own fault, both of you,” she said. “You shouldn’t have been out of bed after curfew. You’re lucky it was only detention, and not house points. Then we all would’ve been punished.”

“Lucky—” Potter erupted.

“And as for you,” she told Draco. “I thought much better of you. I’ve come to expect a certain degree of recklessness from Harry and Ron, but I thought you took school more seriously.”

He sneered at her. She blinked at him, clearly expecting an apology, but he was more than happy to disappoint. “How dreadful a shock that must be for you,” he said. “I’ll be sure to ask your permission next time, Mum. ”

She withdrew, stung.

“What do they think they’re doing, keeping a thing like that locked up in a school?” said Weasley, changing the subject. “If any dog needs exercise, that one does.”

“I dunno, but it’s protecting something. Malfoy saw a trapdoor, which means it’s probably some sort of guard dog.”

“A guard dog for what?” asked Granger skeptically. “Who’d want to steal anything from Hogwarts? And if it’s so valuable that you’d need a—” She glanced around, and lowered her voice. “A three-headed dog,” she continued, “to defend it, why not put it in Gringotts?”

“Hogwarts is safer than Gringotts,” Draco said boredly, turning a page of his newspaper.

“I dunno,” frowned Weasley. “Seems like if you can get into a room with ‘Alohamora,’ it’s probably not the safest place in the world.”

“Yeah, but still... Where the devil d’you even get a beast like that, anyway? You can’t very well pick it up from the pound.”

“Seems like something Hagrid would know,” Potter suggested, and the others agreed.

Draco shuffled his paper and said nothing. He’d become acquainted with the groundskeeper once or twice, in passing, and decided to keep his distance. Half-blood or muggle-born or whatever they were, wizards were one thing; half-breeds were quite another, and he’d already debased himself quite enough this year by associating with blood traitors and rabble. Besides, the brute’s size intimidated him.

In truth, he felt dismal about the ordeal. He didn’t care so much about his academic reputation as the fact that, since Snape had learned of the detention, his mother would soon know of it as well, and he could already feel her disappointment emanating across the many miles between here and Malfoy Manor.

He had decided to blame Potter for everything. It had been Draco’s mistake for trying to do something that benefited anybody besides himself; clearly, it had backfired, demonstrating once and for all that selflessness was for chumps. If Potter hadn’t tripped, they wouldn’t have been caught by Mrs. Norris, which would have prevented them from running into that awful dog, and Quirrell wouldn’t have found them.

The grudge festered all the way to detention that night. He slouched into the classroom late and tossed his satchel on the desk with bad grace, dropping into his chair. Potter, who was already there, winced at the sound.

Quirrell clasped his hands behind his back. “Good evening, gentlemen,” he said. “Tonight you will be writing lines.” He spoke with an arch and aristocratic accent, vaguely Turkish.

Potter sighed and began pulling out some parchment. Draco, feeling indolent and ill-tempered, did the same, only slower.

“In your best handwriting, I would like you to write the following.” Quirrell flicked his wand at the blackboard. The words I am very sorry appeared in white script. “Please write until you have reached five hundred lines or detention is finished, whichever is coming first. Mister Potter, you have a question?”

“May I borrow a quill, professor? I’ve forgotten mine.”

Quirrell hesitated. Draco glanced up from his parchment.

“Of course,” said the professor. He went and retrieved one from the teacher’s desk at the front of the room. Then moving slowly, he approached Potter’s desk with short, halting steps. He held the quill out by the very point of the nib. A vein pressed out from his temple.

With evident unease, Potter took it. As the quill changed hands, Quirrell gasped and snatched his arm back.

“Professor?” said Potter, alarmed. Quirrell staggered away and leaned on the desk.

Potter shot an anxious glance at Draco and began to rise from his chair. “Professor?” he repeated. “I didn’t hurt you, did I?”

Mastering himself, Quirrell stood up. “Please continue writing,” he announced. “Unfortunately, I have just remembered some urgent affairs that are calling me elsewhere. I trust that you will follow instructions in my absence. Good-bye.”

He swept out.

Draco stared after him. “What’s his problem?” he said.

“I dunno.” Potter paused. “D’you think he’s coming back?”

“No clue.”

“Suppose we could just leave,” he suggested.

“I suppose we could.”

“But if he comes back, we’d get another detention.”

Draco snapped his fingers. “How’s this. I’ll go, and you stay, and if he comes back, you just tell him that we got worried, and that I went to find him.”

Potter lifted an eyebrow. “And what do I get out of that?”

It was a classically Slytherin question; Draco was almost proud. “Well, you won’t get in trouble if he comes back.”

“Yeah, but you won’t, either.”

“I see this as a case of mutual benefit.”

“But you get to leave, and I don’t.”

“We must all make sacrifices for the greater good.”

“Why don’t you stay, then, and I’ll go?”

“Because I’m a terrible liar,” lied Draco. “I’ll crack under the first sign of pressure. If you get me alone with an interrogator, I’ll crumble to pieces. Quirrell could ask me anything, and I’d probably tell him.”

“You think your winning argument here is that you can’t be trusted?”

“Potter. Listen. This is a classic logical dilemma. If we both stay, and he doesn’t come back, we’re idiots. If we both leave and he does come back, we’re cooked. If one of us leaves, and the other lies, we’re both in the clear, regardless. The third outcome is clearly optimal! But it only happens if someone stays back. If we can't agree on who stays back, then we'll sit in here the whole time, and probably come out looking like idiots when he doesn't show."

"Okay, but I don't see how any of that means you should be the one to go."

"Because," Draco said patiently, "I've buried the lede. You see, I'm going to go no matter what. So the only decision you have to make, really, is whether you'd like to keep us both out of trouble, or risk getting us both into more of it."

Potter fell quiet for a moment, mulling this over.

"Right," he said thoughtfully. "So, if you leave, and I stay, what's stopping me from just telling Quirrell the truth?"

Draco slouched low in his chair. "Unbelievable."

"You did have me for a minute, I'll give it to you."

"Can't believe we're going to sit here for an hour and do nothing because you couldn't take one for the team..."

"We're going to sit here for an hour because we've got detention, and that's no more my fault than yours," said Potter fairly. "Or we can both leave. I'd be alright with that, too."

The negotiations were interrupted by the door opening. Instead of Quirrell, however, it was Snape.

"Hello, Professor!" exclaimed Draco.

"Hello, Professor," muttered Potter.

Snape ignored both of them. "Where is Quirrell?" he demanded, his eyes flitting around the room, like Quirrell might be clinging to the rafters.

“Gone,” said Draco and Potter at once. Draco added, “We were just debating whether or not to go looking for him.”

Snape rounded on Potter. “What did he say to you?”

“Nothing in particular, sir.”

“He said nothing to you? Did you arrive before Mr. Malfoy? Did he say nothing to you, then?”

“He said ‘good evening, Mister Potter,’ and ‘you may sit down,’ I think,” said Potter, blinking. “Also, ‘here are your lines.’ Erm, and I asked for a quill…”

Snape dismissed this with a jerk of his head. “What else?”

“Nothing, sir, honestly.”

He scanned Potter’s face for evidence of lies. Finding none, his eyes narrowed. “Students should not be left alone in a classroom. You should have found a teacher. Five points from Gryffindor,” he snapped. Then he spun on his heel and beckoned. “Come, Draco.”

Draco scrambled out of his chair, beaming.

“Wait,” Potter called after him. “Where are you going?”

“Wouldn’t you like to know,” Draco simpered. He sent a nasty smile over his shoulder. “Oh, and if he comes back, do tell Quirrell what happened, wouldn’t you?”

He traipsed out, following Snape, and the door swung shut on Potter’s flabbergasted face.

Buoyed by the sublime satisfaction of this moment, Draco practically floated down the halls on Snape’s heels. He didn’t even think to ask where they were going until they’d climbed the Grand Staircase and were hurrying along a slim corridor hung with portraits of various wizards in purple hats. “Do you have a letter from my mother, professor?”

“Hush!” There was real anger in Snape’s glare. “Do you mistake me for deaf?”

“N-no, professor.”

“Then draw upon whatever dismal reserves of restraint you possess,” he said, “and lower your voice.”

Draco bowed his head, chastised. “Sorry, sir.”

The Potions Master stopped in front of a portrait of Giffard Abbott, a portly wizard from the fourteenth century. “Dragon’s egg,” said Snape.

Abbott sighed. “Oh, to be young again…”

“Dragon’s egg,” Snape repeated tersely, and Abbott swung forward with another sigh.

Behind him lay a small servant’s corridor, dark as night and so narrow that Snape had to step sideways through it. Draco, who could fit easily through, hopped into the passageway and swung the portrait-hole closed behind them.

In a moment, Snape’s wand flared with light. Though it wasn’t necessary, Draco whispered ‘Lumos’ and held his wand aloft, adding his weak torch to Snape’s brighter one. If Snape was impressed by his godson’s proficiency in Charms, he gave no sign of it.

They moved along the passage, their feet shuffling on the dusty floorboards. Through the walls, Draco could hear voices murmuring, and footsteps from the rooms beside them. Pipes rumbled overhead. They were moving inside the castle walls; if he remembered his Bagshot, these passages would have been built into the original castle for staff use, before it was kept by house-elves. Bagshot wasn’t quite clear on who these servants would have been; some scholars thought it was simply a hired corps of witches and wizards, while others suggested the Founders had magically animated golems to cook and clean. But Chroniculus Punnet — whose magnum opus, Decline and Fall of the Wizarding Empire, had been Lucius’s favorite book — went still further, and claimed that the first servants of Hogwarts had been muggles kept under the Imperius Curse. (Bagshot had written a scathing dissent to Punnet’s theory in the Journal of Contemporary Magical History, and Professor Binns refused to answer questions about it.)

When they emerged through an alcove on the other side of the passage, they were outdoors, in the covered walk beside the Transfiguration courtyard. The sun had long since set, and their shadows danced long and freakish in the light from the braziers. They extinguished their wands and as Draco was tucking his back into his interior pocket, voices echoed from the end of the courtyard walk.

“Whyever not? We’ve got the political capital for it. Bones says the DMLE has been spoiling for something to break in the new auror cohort, and Asquith assures me that we have the votes in the Wizengamot…”

“But you will not have mine,” said a calm, elderly tenor. “You have neglected and brushed aside… not the least of which… possibility of a challenger. You have not been half careful enough, I think, with Runcorn…”

Draco looked up at Snape, who wore a tense, alert expression. As the voices came closer, he swiftly stepped into the shade of an alcove, pulling Draco in behind him. He pressed a finger to his lips.

“A protest party,” scoffed the other voice in a hoarse Estuary accent. “With your contingent on-side, we’d have a supermajority…”

“And a consolidated minority of increasing cohesion and drive… I confess, I am surprised I must explain the dangers…”

“I appreciate your candor,” said the voice, sounding like it actually rather did not. “But this will come to vote, and I warn you now, if you align yourself against me, my side… there will be those who paint you as a sympathizer.”

“Are you threatening me, Cornelius?” The voice was almost indulgent, like a parent questioning a child.

“What, I? Never. You insult me with the suggestion. But there are strong voices in my party, sir, strong voices, and I cannot be held responsible for what they say or do.”

“I am, I confess, less versed than you in politics,” the voice said politely, now so close Draco could hear the rustle of robes. “I have much to learn; it was my impression that the job of the Minister of Magic was to lead his party, and the people in it…”

The voices shrank away. When they were on the verge of becoming indistinct, Snape stepped out of the alcove and into the torchlight. “Come,” he told Draco, and they hurried down the hallway after them.

As they turned a corner, Draco saw who it had been. Albus Dumbledore stood in a set of midnight-blue robes, inlaid with silver trim, and a matching cap so long it hung below the ends of his shock-white hair. A pair of golden half-moon spectacles sat on the end of his narrow nose.

Beside him stood a short man shaped like a flower vase, clad in a pinstriped suit, and sporting a receding crown of gray hair underneath a green porkpie hat. Draco recognized him with a start: it was the Minister of Magic.

“Good evening, Professor Dumbledore,” purred Snape, strolling into the light. Less reverently, he added, “Minister.”

“Hello, Severus,” said Dumbledore warmly. “A lovely night for a walk, is it not?”

“It is,” Snape said, “passably temperate.”

This was an obvious lie; it was almost December, and bitterly cold. Draco frowned at him.

“Cornelius and I were out to do a bit of stargazing before he returns to the Ministry,” Dumbledore informed him. He gestured to the skies. “One can see stars out here in the highlands that one never glimpses in the city, no matter how keenly one looks… the smog, of course, obscures them. London, for all its charms, has a problem focusing its eye on distant objects.”

“Of course,” said Snape softly, raking his eyes over Fudge’s person. “I often find it… profoundly enlightening… to stargaze.”

Fudge said: “Yes. Stargazing.”

His Oxford tapped a reveille on the cobblestones.

“I know you for a fellow appreciator of the heavens, Severus,” Dumbledore agreed. “But to what do we owe the pleasure of this young man…?”

There was an awkward beat of silence. Snape drove his heel down on Draco’s foot.

Oh. “Malfoy! Draco Malfoy, sir,” Draco blurted, sticking out his hand. “Pleasure to meet you.”

“And a great pleasure to meet you as well, Mister Malfoy,” said Dumbledore, shaking his hand gently. “I had hoped to make your acquaintance earlier. I hope it is not too bold of me to say that you were the great revelation of this year’s Sorting. There are a few upsets every year. I believe it was a second cousin of yours who caused a similar sensation in… 1970, Severus, was it not? Can it be so long ago?"

"Seventy-one," said Snape.

"Oh, dear, but I do think you must be wrong. Are you sure? It may have been after your time…"

"I was in that cohort, Albus."

"Ah, you must be right, then."

"Malfoy, you said?" Fudge glanced at Draco, appearing to notice him for the first time. "Of the Wiltshire Malfoys, surely? Son of Lucius?"

"Yes, Minister."

The Minister's hands disappeared behind his back. "Terrible business," he said stiffly. "About your father. Terrible business."

Draco did not know what to say. He looked to Snape for guidance, but received none.

"I strongly disavowed it," announced Fudge, seemingly speaking to no one in particular. "I unambiguously and plainly disavowed it. It does not matter what a man's crimes are, or how many number his sins; I do not celebrate unsanctioned bloodletting. In this country, we find justice in a court of law, not in the hands of renegades. Lucius Malfoy was a free man."

Unambiguous and plain are synonyms, thought Draco.

"It was a dark day for the wizarding world, I say, a dark day," rambled Fudge. "It never would have happened in my Ministry. Secretary Bones and I have worked tirelessly to secure Azkaban. We have doubled the size of the auror force, and expect to increase it fifty percent over the next calendar year. The Witness Protection Agency — our invention, by the way — has developed protocols to guard the anonymity of those who give testimony…"

Draco wondered if Fudge knew he wasn't old enough to vote.

"Have you eaten, Minister?" asked Snape suddenly.

"What?"

"Have you eaten dinner? If you have not, you must join us. The kitchens are making blood pudding."

"Oh. No, I couldn't—"

Snape lifted his voice over the Minister's. "The Hogwarts recipe is quite rare. They harvest the fresh blood of suckling piglets, each no older than a day, and mix it with ground sausage carved from the rump of a virgin mooncalf. This is served in a gravy of duck fat and beef stock, seasoned with the sausage drippings, and whatever blood remains from the pigs."

Cornelius Fudge paled. He dabbed his forehead with his handkerchief. "Delightful," he managed. "Unfortunately, I must really take my leave. I am not at liberty to… that is… I have a prior engagement which I must attend. Pardon me, Professor — young Malfoy — Albus." And with a dip of his porkpie hat, he walked quickly down the corridor, disappearing from sight.

Dumbledore sighed. "Excessive," he said, "and a touch unwarranted, I think. He means well."

"He's a simpering, pompous fool."

"He's the Minister of Magic."

"What did I say?"

Dumbledore turned to Draco. "I imagine you are somewhat confused," he said kindly. "I will explain. Professor Snape has elected to foreshorten the Minister's visit. Our Potions Master has even less patience for tedium than I, and politicians do tend to… shall we say, 'pontificate'?"

“I beg your pardon, professor, but I don’t take your meaning.”

Snape’s mouth was flat but twitching.

“The Minister is a vegetarian,” Dumbledore clarified.

Draco burst out with a snort of laughter.

“I am glad you share your godfather’s sense of humor,” said the headmaster indulgently. “Laughter is the most precious of all magics. Now, I apologize for the rudeness of what I am about to do, but would you allow me to borrow your Potions Master? I have a question about the constellation Orion which I believe he alone can answer.”

This dismissal was as gentle as it could be, and Draco did not mind the opportunity to leave: he was wretchedly uncomfortable, and felt up to his ears in matters he didn’t understand.

“Draco,” called Snape, as he was leaving. “Turn around.”

He obeyed. Snape made a show of looking him over, and snapped: “Where on earth did you get all that dust on your robe? Ten points from Gryffindor, for failure to meet standards of public hygiene. Give it here.”

Draco’s mouth dropped open. The dust on his robe came from the servant’s passage, and the same was encrusted all over Snape’s own cloak.

Rendered too speechless to object, he shucked his robe. Snape snatched it and cast a Scouring Charm. “There,” he said coldly, thrusting it back at Draco. “If I catch you flouting the dress code again, it’ll be twenty points. Good night.”

With that, he and Dumbledore strode off together into the night. Dumbledore cast a sympathetic look at Draco as they left, and he heard him say to Snape: “...a certain measure of kindness… a child so very young…”

A chill stole through the courtyard. Fuming, Draco shook out his robe to put it back on. As he swung it about his shoulders, something small and white fluttered out of its folds, and he caught it before it hit the ground.

It was an envelope. The address read simply ‘Draco.’

He grinned and looked up, but Snape was already gone.

The Lady of Malfoy Manor

Chapter 6: The Lady of Malfoy Manor

The holidays arrived far too slowly, and yet somehow earlier than anyone expected. One morning in mid-December, Hogwarts rose to find itself covered in several feet of snow. A glassy sheen of ice covered the lake, and icicles the size of dragon claws dangled from the eaves of the Great Hall. The Weasley twins bewitched some of these to drop whenever a Slytherin passed underneath them. Poor Ulysses, who had fought his way through a stormy sky to deliver Draco's Daily Prophet, sprained his wing, and Draco spent a fretful morning in the rookery nursing him back to health.

He was very much looking forward to going home. His mother's letter had overflowed with encouragement and praise, and tactful allusions to the many presents and treats which awaited him at Malfoy Manor. His absence had a bad influence on her, and led her to be profligate with Christmas shopping, and though she knew she ought to save some of them for his birthday, she might be persuaded, with a certain quantity of hugs and kisses, to release them early unto his keeping.

Granger was going home, too. "My family always spends Christmas at my house," she explained. "My grandparents come to stay with us, and we have the neighbors over for dinner. It's quite nice."

They were working in the Great Hall. Fat Christmas trees strangled in garlands and baubles flanked the walls, christened with a dusting of magical frost. Snow floated past the windows in feathery whirls, and Nearly Headless Nick led a caroling band of ghosts around the castle, guiding them in mostly tuneless renditions of 'Silver Bells' and 'Christmas Time is Here.' Peeves had strapped a bough of mistletoe to a fishing-rod, and with it, took to harrying young couples around the castle, hooting and heckling.

Something occurred to Draco. “Granger,” he said, “what do your muggles do for a living?”

“My parents? They’re dentists. Together, actually. ‘Granger and Granger, Orthodontia and Dental.’” She sighed glumly. “They want to start me on braces next year.”

Draco frowned. “What kind of dents?”

“...What?”

“What kind of dents do they study?”

She hid a giggle behind her hand. “It’s nothing to do with ‘dents.’ Dentists are people who fix your teeth.”

“Oh,” he said, irritated by her condescension. It wasn’t like he ever needed a stupid dentist. “Why are yours like that, then?”

When she didn’t answer, he looked at her. Hurt dimmed Granger’s face like a sudden rain cloud on a sunny morning, swooping out of nowhere and sullying all the fun.

“They’re getting fixed next year,” she muttered. Turning away, she hunched over her book.

His satisfaction from shutting her up evaporated quickly, and the knowledge that she was guilting him on purpose did not help him resist the effort as much as he would have liked.

“It was a rude question.”

“Don’t be silly. Can’t you see I don’t give a fig about your teeth, whether they’re snaggly or otherwise?”

“Snaggly!”

“Snaggly, outsize, crooked, what would you call it?”

“They’re — in need of correction,” she said, shrinking into herself.

Realization struck. “They don’t look like that on purpose?”

“Draco!”

“No, I — listen — don’t hit me, witch — you’re serious? You don’t like them? Why the devil haven’t you been to St. Mungo’s for them, then?”

“I don’t know what that is!” she wailed, and making a sound like a kicked kitten, she scooted away from him.

He flung one hand in the air. “Well, that’s not my fault!”

Weasley, who was puzzling over a chess game with Potter, looked over. “Malfoy,” he said sagely, “you ever hear the one about the wizard in the bottomless pit?”

“No,” he replied, through gritted teeth.

Potter, after ten minutes of deep concentration, ventured: “Knight to D-six.”

Weasley glanced at the board, said “Queen to D-six,” and his queen trotted cheerfully across the board to clobber it. “All right, you’re about to hear an Arthur Weasley classic.” (“Goody,” said Draco.) “So this guy, he’s stuck in a bottomless pit. And he’s been falling for a while, when his mate gets him on the radio, and he says: ‘Where are you?’ and the guy says ‘I’m stuck in a bottomless pit.’ And his mate says ‘Well, you better apparate out of there.’ And the guy says, ‘No, no, that’s impossible.’ So he hangs up. A few hours later, his mate rings him again, and he says: ‘Hey, listen, I’ve had an idea to get you out of the bottomless pit. I’ll apparate in there, grab you, and you can side-along apparate out with me.’ And the guy says, ‘No, I can’t do that.’ And he hangs up. And then a few hours after that, his mate rings him a third time, and says: ‘Okay, I’ve got it. I’ll apparate in there, hand you a Portkey, and it’ll teleport you right back to the top.’ And the guy says, ‘Thank you, mate, that’s really nice and all, but I just can’t do it.’

“And now the mate’s really good and fed up, I mean proper fuming, and he says: ‘What’s wrong with you? You’ve been in there for hours, what’s the problem?’ And so his — oh. Rook to G-eight,” he added, and Potter made a sad noise as his knight was bludgeoned to death. “Check. So his mate’s saying this, he’s saying: ‘What will it take to get you out of this bottomless pit?’ And the wizard says: ‘Why would I leave? Any minute now, I could see the bottom!’”

Draco lifted his eyebrow. “And you decided to bequeath this pearl of wisdom to us, because…?”

Weasley glanced meaningfully at Granger, who was still hunched over her book. “Starting to see the bottom yet?” he said.

The bell chimed four o’clock. All along the Gryffindor table, a line of china teapots shimmered into existence like a row of eggs. Draco filled his cup, and then, after a moment’s thought, he filled Granger’s. She continued to ignore him.

“Here,” Draco said loftily. “Girls drink first, that’s the rules.”

She shook her head.

“Don’t be like that.” He paused. “I haven’t anything against your teeth. Nobody even notices them.” He pushed the teacup closer to her. “Cream or sugar?”

She shook her head.

“Take it black, do you? That’s sort of tough, Granger. I’m impressed.”

“No, I don’t,” she huffed, reaching past him for the sugar. She dropped four cubes into her teacup and stirred vigorously. Draco stared.

“What on earth—”

“I like it sweet.”

“As syrup?”

“They make it bitter here!”

“Are you deranged? Are you, in fact, possessed?”

“Well, how do you take it, if you’re such an expert?”

“Dash of cream and a squeeze of lemon. It’s superior.”

“Blech.”

“Philistine.”

“Blech!”

But she was talking and laughing again, and that was far preferable to the alternative, so he elected not to prosecute the matter any further.

On December twenty-first, he rose at dawn and brought his trunk down to the Great Hall, where a swarm of students buzzed excitedly in anticipation of going home. Some came to see them off, including Fred and George Weasley, who were organizing a massive snowball tournament for all the students staying behind. They had dug up a pair of banker’s visors, and carried around clipboards and quills, offering people the chance to sign up. The morning’s sole point of excitement occurred when Marcus Flint tried to enter a first-year Hufflepuff’s name in the seventh year bracket, and the twins repaid him by jinxing a battery of snowballs to chase him around the courtyard; this lasted until Filch caught wind of the trouble, and chased them all the way back to Gryffindor Tower, cane in hand.

Granger rode with him on the train. She was getting off in London, whereas he was to change trains at King's Cross and continue south. As they were disembarking, she handed him a folded square of parchment.

"That's my address," she said. "I already gave it to Harry and Ron; you can write to me, if you like."

He held it awkwardly, not quite sure what to do.

"And… and I suppose I ought to have yours," she said, crossing her arms, "if I'm to write you."

"You don't have an owl."

"I'll get one!" she said, turning brilliantly red. "Or I'll send it by regular post; it's good enough for most people, anyway."

He was fairly certain that the last muggle to try and deliver anything to the Estate had brought news of the Roman invasion, but nevertheless, he jotted down the address. Granger squinted at it.

"'Malfoy Manor,'" she read, "'Wiltshire.'" She paused. "That's it?"

"Well, yes." He tapped the page. "You'll want to put my name on it, too, or else Mummy will think it's for her and read it."

"What about a postcode?"

They both gazed doubtfully at the parchment. He didn't know what a postcode was, but he was too embarrassed to ask.

"There's only one Malfoy Manor," he observed.

"Right," she said, looking faint. "I suppose so."

He bid her goodbye, and resolved to write her a letter, if only to prove that he hadn't made the address up. Then he was alone on his second train of the day, and speeding through the English countryside towards home.

Malfoy Manor stood dark and resplendent under a cloak of ivory snow. A horseless sleigh carried Draco through wrought-iron gates and a twinned marble gateposts, along the long shaft of an avenue paved on either side by silver-clad lawns, more gates, an arrowhead of a drive in dark stone, and above it, the enormous layer-cake of a Neoclassical mansion in red brick and granite trim. The ground plan of the manor was oriented on a cross-axis, formed by the intersection of a domed central pavilion and wings extending to the east and west, each of which sported twelve windows at least. Over the twelve-foot maw of the entrance loomed a heavy pediment, braced on marble pilasters, with arched loggia and an elaborate relief of a pair of sea dragons doing battle. Marble sculpture clung like crusts of frost to the long, slate-covered ridge roof.

On the plinth stood a small, dark-haired figure in a green velvet peacoat and a cossack hat. At the sight of her, Draco leapt out of the carriage and ran to the door, staggering through billowing drifts of powder.

She hurried down the steps; he went charging up them; they collided in the middle, and she went down on her back in the snow.

"Sorry!" He sprang up, horrified. "Sorry! Sorry! Mother! Are you alright?"

Narcissa flung her head back and laughed not from amusement but from delight. "Goodness, am I really so frail as that?" she said. "Can I not receive an embrace without hurting myself? Perhaps I am old." She held out her hands and waggled her fingers. "Come and kiss your mother that loves you. You're so beautiful I can barely breathe."

He helped her up, brushing snow from her shoulders, and stood somberly at attention while she peppered his face with kisses.

“It was my fault. I oughtn’t have jumped. It wasn’t proper.”

“Boys always down from their first term with terrible manners,” she said mildly, batting away his hands. “I was warned to expect it. Besides, there’s no one here but you and I. Oh, and, well— Dobby is quite desperate to see you, but I told him you would meet him in the dining room. He has been cooking furiously. One would think we were receiving you back from war.”

“Excellent. They only had candy on the train, I’m starving.”

“Did they really? Appalling. When I went to Hogwarts, they served three-course lunches in the dining cars, and you could get bottles of Bollinger delivered to your compartment on request. Sic transit gloria mundi, my darling … shall we go and put poor Dobby out of his misery?”

In the dining room, Dobby had outdone himself. Lifting a silver cloche, he presented a bowl of spiced mushroom soup, a loaf of black rye bread with hazelnuts and pumpkin seed, and a rose of soft yellow butter. The napkins were folded in the shape of a heart.

When Draco entered the room, he bowed so deeply his ears touched the floor. He was wearing his finest pillowcase, with lace trim and hardly a stain on it. “Master Draco,” he said. “We welcomes you home, sir. Dobby has prepared a soup—”

“Dobby!” It surprised Draco how much it pleased him to see the elf. He rubbed the little creature’s head affectionately. “Have you been eating? You haven’t grown a bit since I last saw you.”

“This is a very good joke,” said Dobby with plaintive dignity. “It is getting funnier every time, sir.”

“Isn’t it? I think so. This looks very good, by the way, well done.”

The elf’s ears twitched back in pleasure. “Thank you, sir. There is madeleines and honey date ice cream in the freezer, if the master wants dessert."

"You mean honeyed dates and ice cream, Dobby."

"Indeed, no, in fact. Dobby has been experimenting with ice cream flavors," Narcissa said indulgently, settling herself at the table. "He's working on… oh, what was it, this week?"

"Olive oil chocolate eggplant," he said proudly.

"Mm-hm. Just so." She lowered her voice to Draco. "We decided it was best for him to get a hobby. There was a grieving period when you left in September — meals were inedible for a month. I lost nearly a stone."

"And you eat this ice cream?"

"Oh, yes, some of it. Or somebody else does. I had Constance Crabbe over for tea on Thursday, and I made it clear she absolutely could not leave without trying some of Grandmother Malfoy's Frozen Cricket Surprise…"

Draco snorted. "And she liked it, did she?"

"Well, she couldn't very well say she didn't. That would be heinously rude. Luckily, Constance has an expressive face." She sighed. "She will forgive me. After all, I am a madwoman, and a madwoman must have her amusements."

This was sobering. He set down his spoon.

Narcissa had scarcely appeared in public since his father's death, ostensibly because she was still in mourning, but actually out of a desire to keep away from the Society limelight. As an excuse, she informed people that she was unwell, which at first garnered much sympathy, but after several years, the rumor mill kicked up again. 'Malfoy Manor – CLOSED FOREVER?' speculated one author from Witch Weekly, in an issue Draco had burned before his mother found it. ‘Narcissa Malfoy quits the scene to hide in seclusion with her son! It appears that her husband’s untimely death, combined with her sister’s betrayal, have driven her quite insane.’

It all would have been easy enough to dismiss, if none of it were true.

“I’m sure she didn’t thank you for that,” he said, tearing a chunk of bread.

“I should have done worse,” she said grimly. “She was a terror. Manners that would have had my grandmother rolling… ‘I’m ever so glad that Vince is following in the family footsteps, because you know, family is very important to us Crabbes.’ And then: ‘Oh, but I do hope that doesn’t offend you, Narcissa.’ She thinks that’s subtlety? Why, I ought to have laughed her out the door — ‘very important,’ she says. Constance! An upjumped American dollar princess. Her ancestors were accountants for my ancestors, that’s what her ‘family footsteps’ lead back to. And she has the nerve to pretend she pities me, as if she wouldn’t punt her precious Slytherin son from the Tower to be in my position.”

At the word ‘Slytherin,’ Draco swallowed. “I see,” he said quietly.

Guilt flashed across Narcissa’s face. “Oh, but it’s not a worry to me,” she said quickly. “You must believe me, Draco, it’s not your fault. The Sorting Hat made an awful mistake. I’ve written to Dumbledore but he says nothing can be done…”

“Yes, and it really isn’t so bad,” she said, as if trying to convince herself. “There are lots of successful Gryffindors. And you’ll make all sorts of connections—”

“Such as?”

“Well, I don’t know exactly what connections, but there must be some. Lots of Ministers come from Gryffindor.”

“I don’t want to be Minister of Magic.”

“I don’t care about being Head Boy, either.” He shoved his bowl away from him, and folded his arms, sulking. “I hate it there. It’s loud, and messy, and everyone’s stupid or low-class or both, and there’s barely anyone like us.”

“Have you made any friends, at least?”

He shrugged. “I guess so.”

She smiled encouragingly. “Other boys?”

“No. It’s… well, there’s one girl. But she’s bossy and loud and she annoys me most of the time.”

Narcissa was beaming. “But that’s splendid! I’d like to meet her. Shall we have her over? Would you like to invite her?”

“Probably not,” said Draco, thinking: Absolutely never. He pushed back his chair. “Perhaps some ice cream later,” he told Dobby’s hopeful face.

His mother caught his meaning. She said, “You must be tired, my darling. Shall I show you your room?”

“I remember the way. It’s been months, not years. You should have a lie-down. Have Dobby see to your back.”

“My back is fine. I’m thirty-two, not sixty.”

“Well, fine, but I’m having a lie-down, and I’m not sixty, either.” He stood, and she rose with him. “Dobby, bring Mother’s dressing-gown, would you?”

Narcissa halted the elf with an outstretched hand. “Dobby, don’t,” she said. “I’m not having a lie-down; I haven’t any interest in one.”

“Yes, but if the lady changes her mind, I’d like her to have it.”

“And if the lady changes her mind, she knows where to find her own dressing gown,” she said sweetly. “And she knows how to call for her own house-elf, too. Has her son forgotten?”

“No, it’s just—”

“Never mind. In fact I think I will go upstairs,” she said, striding past him to the stairs. “I have a novel to read, and I may do some painting while you convalesce. I find myself restless.”

“Mother.”

“Don’t fret! I will be perfectly happy to entertain myself, as always. You know where to find me.”

“Mother!”

She turned, and her expression was bright and pained and lovely. “Oh, Draco, you worry too much,” she breathed. “How am I to feel like a mother when you fuss more than I do?”

He bowed his head, uncomfortable. But in a moment, the fire went out of her, and she sank like a punctured zeppelin. “But you’re only looking out for me,” she said. “You’re only looking out for your mummy, aren’t you? My darling boy. You only want to take care of me. I don’t know what I did to deserve — such a darling — darling boy.” She turned, grasping the banister for support, and Draco noticed that beneath her peacoat, Narcissa was terribly thin. “Dobby, please… Please bring me my nightgown, after all.”

“Yes, mistress,” Dobby cried, clearly relieved that his masters’ orders had finally eclipsed, and disappeared.

Draco offered his arm. “I can help you up to your room—?”

“No,” she said coldly.

There was a silence.

“No,” she murmured. “No, that’s all right. Thank you, my sweet one. You go and rest. It’s been a long day, and we all need… some rest.”

And lifting the hem of her skirt, she slowly receded up the stairwell, leaving Draco alone in the vast dining room.

On Christmas Eve, he woke up to the sound of an owl doing its level best to destroy his bedroom window.

“Ulysses!” he snapped thickly, kicking off the covers. “You little airborne rat, I told you not to scratch the glass.”

As he staggered out of bed, slinging on his bathrobe, he realized the bird terrorizing the glass wasn’t Ulysses, but a scrappy-looking screech owl with a letter and a package tied to its legs. He hauled up the sash, and it fled into the room, made a frantic circle around the ceiling, and alighted on his desk. It required several treats before he could coax the letter away from it.

It was addressed:

Mr. Draco L. Malfoy

Malfoy Manor

Wiltshire(???)

The envelope wasn't sealed with wax, but a sticky substance he had to work off with a letter-opener. The letter itself was written in some kind of strange gray graphite-residue instead of ink, and left silvery smudges on his fingers when he touched it.

Dear Draco,

Merry Christmas. I really hope this owl gets to you somehow because I went through a whole lot of trouble to get it. My parents still wouldn't get me one of my own so I told them I had to go to Diagon Alley for more schoolbooks and while they were distracted I snuck into Eeylops and asked them if I could rent an owl for one use only. The clerk didn't want to do it but I begged & begged so he let me use his personal owl for three sickles and a knut. I don't know if that's a good rate or not because I haven't used wizard money much before but I didn't have any other choice. Please do not tell me if I have been robbed.

How is your break? Mine is good. My grandmother is here. I can't talk about magic or Hogwarts or anything around her, because she thinks I go to a girls' boarding school in Edinburgh, but I do give her an edited version. (I have to pretend you and Harry and Ron are all girls. Sorry.) My grandfather is eighty-nine years old and doesn't hear very well, so I have to shout everything around him, he reminds me ever so much of Binns. It's hard to remember that the stairs here don't move and I don't have to worry about the chocolate running away. Everyone was very excited to hear that I have friends now.

I’m sending you a Cadbury bar so you can see that muggles have done at least one thing better than wizards.

Yours sincerely,

Hermione J. Granger

He folded the letter carefully and set it aside. The accompanying package was wrapped imperfectly (there was liberal application of tape) in yellow paper with a pattern of sheep, and tied with a cherry-red ribbon. Inside he found a hardcover book called History of the Peloponnesian War, by Thucydides, with a brown leather cover and a title in gold embossed lettering. He flipped open the cover to read the inscription:

To DLM: Thucydides = muggle!! -HJG.

He rolled his eyes.

There was also a bar of something called Cadbury chocolate, which he nibbled and deemed acceptable. It wasn’t the next Bertie Bott’s, or anything, but he could understand why she kept nattering on about it.

It really was outrageous that her muggles wouldn’t let her have her own owl. Something ought to be done about that. Maybe he’d write to the Minister or something.

Dobby apparated into the room with a crack. “Merry Christmas, Master Draco,” he chirped. “Mistress is still sleeping, but she is asking Dobby to wake her up when her darling boy is awake, so she can come and open presents together.”

“That’s fine, but hold off a minute, would you?”

Draco stooped over his desk, fumbling around for a bit of parchment.

Dear Granger,

I received your letter. It is mildly impressive to me that you managed to find the shabbiest, loudest, most ill-bred owl in the world. I am sending this with Ulysses so you can see what a proper owl acts like.

Thank you for the book. It is very nice. I appreciate it.

He paused again. Then he wet his quill and struck through what he'd written.

Thank you for the book. It is very nice. I appreciate it. You will find enclosed a cheque for 10 galleons, which I will bring your present to Hogwarts.

Merry Christmas.

Regards,

Draco Malfoy

He folded up the letter, strapped it to Ulysses' leg, and released both owls into the bright winter morning. Closing the shutter, he said, "All right, Dobby, go on and wake her."

It was an excellent haul. In addition to dozens of books and toys, his mother had bought him a new broomstick, the Nimbus Two Thousand, and heedless of her pleas, he mounted it immediately and rode it down the stairwell. It flew like a dream, smooth and fast and snappy, and he didn't get around to his other presents until noon.

He knew Potter would be sick with envy. Maybe, if he was extra nice to Draco, he'd let him ride it. (Then it occurred to him that he couldn't take it to school, and the chances of Potter coming to Malfoy Manor were about a Cleansweep Five's against his Nimbus; and he decided he would just have to brag about it enough for Potter to get the idea.)

Dobby had a present for him, too. It was a poppet made from braided string and pillowcase cuttings that must have come from his own supply. Draco thanked him withh an orange, which Dobby tearfully promised to add to his collection.

"Collection?" said Narcissa thoughtfully, once the elf was out of earshot. "So that's the smell coming from the cabinets. I thought we had mildew."

The last gift on the pile, wrapped in plain black paper, was Snape's. He saved it for last.

It contained a note in jagged cursive:

Draco.

This was your father's. Upon his death he willed it to me for reasons unclear. It may have been some sort of joke about keeping one's cauldron lit.

I expect you will appreciate it more than I.

—Professor Snape

The idea of his father making a joke was novel. In his few memories of his father, he did not recall a lot of chuckles to be had.

Under the wrapping was a cedar box with the Malfoy crest inset, and it opened up to a lovely bed of purple silk, upon which rested a silver lighter, engraved ‘L.A.M.’ When he thumbed the wheel, a small blue flame sprang from the top, about the length of his thumb.

He showed it to his mother.

“Oh, that was your father’s,” she marveled, lifting it to the light. “I remember. I wondered where this thing got off to.”

“Is there anything special about it?” He tried not to sound ungrateful. “Or is it just a lighter? Because even I can do a Fire-Making spell.”

She hummed thoughtfully. “It’s very high quality, for one thing,” she said, squinting at it with an expert eye. “It’s goblinmade. Sterling silver, probably varnished with mermaid’s tears. If I had to guess, I’d say Moribund’s, they were the haute jewelers when we were young. Everyone in our year got their engagement rings there… it should have the year...” She turned it over and showed him the bottom. It read: Pro parva lux mea / 25th December, 1975.

“‘For my light’?”

“A gift from his mother, I imagine.”

They were in the drawing-room, and light poured through the bay windows, illuminating the carnage of wrapping paper and boxes surrounding the twelve-foot Christmas tree. The smell of cooking turkey and cranberry sauce filled the house. Dobby was already at work on Christmas dinner.

His mother said, “Oh, and the flame was waterproof, if I recall. He’d make a show of taking it out and lighting his pipe in the rain.”

“No, really?” Draco scrambled to his feet. “It’ll burn underwater?”

“I presume so. A gimmick enchantment, I thought, since what on earth you’d do with a flame underwater — Draco, where are you going?”

He ran to the bathroom and threw on the faucets. Once the sink had about an inch of water in it, he plunged the lighter under the water and thumbed the spark-wheel. The blue flame blossomed under the surface of the water, shimmery and strange, like a feathery bit of kelp.

All Christmas Day, Draco set everything he was allowed to on fire. He insisted on doing the candles for dinner, the sparklers, the stoves, and the dining room fireplace. Then he took the leftover kindling outside and burned that, too. In the evening, he begged his mother to let him light something else, and she condescended to let him do her after-dinner cigarette, which she held in a holder the length of his arm.

The rest of the holidays passed in a blink. He put the Nimbus through its paces on the Manor grounds, scaring pigeons off the roof, and when it was too snowy or too cold to do that, he lit a fire in his father’s library and read Granger’s book. It started far too slow, in his opinion, but after you slogged through the dull bits at the beginning, it got pretty cracking, and it was well worth it in the end.

On the last day of break, with the sun glinting off melting icicles on the trees, Narcissa ventured out in the snow herself. Both Draco and Dobby did much hand-wringing over this, but she brushed them aside with a laugh and a cry of: “Faint of heart! Faint of heart! Entendez-vous dans les campagnes, mugir ces féroces soldats? My mother rode a broomstick, pregnant, through a snowstorm to St. Mungo’s because she was afraid to splinch the baby. It takes more than snow to hurt a Black!”

So Draco and Narcissa spent the afternoon laboring on a Hagrid-sized snowman, the final ball of which had to be levitated by Narcissa while Draco provided support on his Nimbus. Then, she passed the facial details — Dobby supplied a carrot and some coal bits from the kitchen fire — up to him, and he planted them in its face. The resulting creature was tall, wide, crooked, and ugly. Narcissa adored it.

“What a ghastly beast,” she exclaimed in utter delight. She conjured a top hat for it. Draco burst out laughing in a way he hadn’t in months, and she hauled him down into the snow, where he howled and kicked and pleaded for a reprieve from her cruel regime of tickling.

After a meal of turkey sandwiches and whipped chocolate trifle with raspberry jelly, Draco went upstairs to gather his things. Dobby had packed his bags, including his books, his new robes, and a variety of snacks for the train, including a temperature-controlled jar of something frozen that he dreaded to try. (Perhaps he would offer it to Potter or Weasley as a Christmas present.) Looking at his assembled trunks gave him a feeling so dismal that he left his room, and wandered the dark wooden halls of Malfoy Manor: up uncarpeted, noisy elm stairs, following passages of hardwood bisected by black tongues of drugget, through linoleum hallways lined with tapestry and grated windows, whisking here and there up minor staircases and passing by secret doors into hidden rooms, and through the vast atrium where an abandoned ballroom decayed under the dusty altar of a four-tiered diamond chandelier. He ran his hand over the old walls, and something in them hummed back to him, like the magic in his wand, an echo of a call he hadn’t known he’d given.

He found his mother in the portrait gallery. Along one side of the vaulted space sat a row of Malfoy family heirs, direct descendants of the male line dating back to the 1400s. Opposite each on the other wall sat his wife. In the mourning custom, black tarps covered the portrait-frames, and Narcissa had yet to remove these, though the duties of mourning had elapsed two years since.

Narcissa was kneeling in front of the last portrait in the line. It was the only frame that lacked a mate. Her head was bent, and she was mumbling something to herself. The corner of the tarp had been drawn up, he saw, and pinned to the wall with a hatpin.

“Mother?” he ventured.

She did not seem to hear him. Her voice was low and slurred.

He laid his hand on her shoulder. “Mother?”

Narcissa’s head snapped up, and her pupils were the size of sickles. A chill ran up Draco’s neck.

“Lucius?” she said, her voice hoarse and doubled.

Draco stumbled back as if burned.

“Lucius,” she said, excitedly. “Lucius — is that you? Lucius!”

Her hand gripped his robe. He snatched it away from her, and she fell forward, onto her hands and knees.

“Mother, it’s me. Draco. Your son.”

If she heard, she gave no sign. She dragged herself up the wall, her hands scrabbling on the limestone. “Lucius! Lucius, where are you? Lucius, I can hear you!”

He tried to keep his voice low and soothing. “Whatever you’re hearing, Mother, I promise you it isn’t Father.”

Her head snapped around. She stared at him, beady-eyed. For a moment he hoped in vain that she’d heard him, and was giving it consideration.

Then she whirled and ran, her skirts billowing behind her, screaming: “Lucius! Lucius! Lucius!”

Draco swore and dashed after her. “Mother! Come back!”

“I hear you! Lucius, I hear you!”

She let the door to the Portrait Gallery slam closed in his face, and he caught it with a grunt. While he struggled, Narcissa dashed around a corner and out of sight.

Moments later, he rounded it and charged after her, but she was gone: vanished entirely from the hallway. In the distance, he could hear her cries echoing through the house as she moved further away.

“Damn. Dobby!”

The elf appeared with a crack, holding a frying pan in one hand and a scrubbing-sponge in the other. “Master Draco!” he said happily. “You are summoning Dobby?”

“Go and seal the doors, deadbolt them. Lock the upstairs windows, and if you see Mother, come and find me. Don’t do anything she says.”

Dobby was nodding until this last order, at which point he cringed. “Yes, Master Draco,” he said. “But only — if Mistress gives Dobby a direct order—”

“You do what I tell you! I’m the heir. I’m the firstborn of the male line. I’m the master of the house, and you’ll do as I say, or I’ll — I’ll make you iron your fingers.”

Dobby squeaked in terror. He disappeared.

Draco fumbled his wand from his pocket, ignoring the pinch of guilt in his stomach. Fear had made him cruel. He didn’t like threatening Dobby, but sometimes a heavy hand was required.

He lit his wand-tip, and hurried down the twilit halls. His mother's voice had grown distant, and he chased it back through the winnowing heart of the manner, through parlors whose furniture sat under ancient sheets like a herd of ghostly oxen, past marble statues of witches and wizards who all sported his father's scowl, and corridors lit by floating candelabras, and populated by the fading remnants of his mother's cries. He raced up a wrought-iron staircase, burst through a pair of doors into the East Wing, and found himself in his father's chambers.

The hangings had been torn from the king-sized bed, and the pillows shredded, their innards scattered across the room like fresh powder. The doors to the balcony waved softly in the evening wind, while digits of fog pressed in from the gloomy moors.

Narcissa leaned over the balcony railing, bent at the waist, one spectral arm protruding into the gloom. Tears streaked her gaunt face. Her shirtwaist had soaked through, and her long, thick hair, thrown free of its chignon by her frantic escape, fell in dark waves around her waist, swaying as she sobbed.

"Come back," she sobbed. "Come back, please. I miss you. Come back! I promise I'll be good… where did you go? Don't you miss me, too? Don't you love me, Bella?"

At the word 'Bella,' Draco startled: he thought she was calling for Lucius. But whatever specter his mother wanted, it showed no sign of mercy, and her sole answer came from the mournful croon of the wind.

He extinguished his wand and moved silently onto the balcony. She was perilously close to tipping over the railing, and as she gave another lurch, he leapt forward to catch her: but she caught herself, and canted backward, lowering herself slowly onto the pads of her feet.

When he touched her, she gave a hiccuping moan, and collapsed into his arms. He caught her and carefully lowered her to the ground, cradling her.

“Mother,” he said gently, “it’s Draco.”

She turned her head this way and that, moaning.

“Mother. It’s me.” He tried to mask the anxiety in his voice, and failed. “Your son. You’re at home.”

“Home?” she slurred. Her eyes slitted open. “Am I home? But I haven’t been to the Abbey in ever so long…”

“You’re at Malfoy Manor. Don’t you remember?”

“Malfoy?”

“Yes, Malfoy. You married Lucius Malfoy, and I… you had a son.”

“A son? I had a boy?”

“Yes.”

“How lovely. Lucius wanted a boy,” she said dreamily. “I wanted another… have two, I thought… a girl and a boy… a matching set.”

He spoke through a tightness in his throat. “Why didn’t you?”

“Five years in Azkaban, five years, I was alone with my boy… a one-year-old boy. And when he came back, he didn’t want… wouldn’t allow… it wasn’t safe, he said, not for a daughter, a lovely little girl for the whole world to hate…” She turned her head into Draco’s chest, and wept.

He held her until her weeping ceased, and she was still. She had fallen asleep.

He patted her cheek. When she did not stir, he called for Dobby. Together, they lifted her and carried her into the guest bedroom.

When Narcissa was tucked in and sleeping soundly, he slipped out of the guest room and closed the door behind him. Dobby apparated beside him, holding her soiled laundry in a bundle under his arm.

“Did this happen while I was gone?”

Dobby dithered, yanking on his fingers.

“Dobby.”

“The Mistress says Dobby is not to answer questions about her,” he fretted. “The Mistress says that if he tattles, he must knock his head very hard against the wall and be sorry.”

“That won’t happen. I won’t tell her you said anything.” Draco knelt and tipped up the elf’s chin. “It’s very important that you tell me. For her safety.”

This was the ticket. The faithful servant quailed in the face of danger to his mistress, and his lip quivered. “Twice,” he burst out. “Once on Halloween and once on the old master’s birthday, she is having these daydreams, when she runs and yells and takes her clothes off! And Dobby is chasing her, saying no, mistress, please, mistress, but she is not hearing Dobby! She is not listening! And sometimes, she speaks to Dobby, but she is ordering him to do the strangest things: ‘Clear the tennis courts,’ she says, or ‘Go fetch Mistress a peacock feather,’ only we are not having any tennis courts at this house, sir, and there are no peacocks around! And she is not calling me by my own elf-name, but ‘Kreacher’!”

He could take no more. Letting out a wail, he flung himself at the wall, and Draco had to snatch him up like a toddler to prevent him from slamming his head brutally against it.

“No! No, stop it!”

“Dobby is bad! Oh, Dobby is a very, very bad elf! Low, lying, deceitful, thankless…”

“Stop it! That’s an order.”

Dobby broke off as if someone had cut his vocal cords. Suddenly placid, he relaxed in Draco’s arms.

“You’re not a bad elf, don’t be stupid,” he said, trying to infuse his voice with authority. “You’ve done exactly as you were told.”

“I am a bad elf,” Dobby said matter-of-factly. “I am lying and betraying Mistress.”

“You’re not betraying her. Listen. I’m going to give you an order, and it’s very important. You must listen carefully and always follow it. If anyone gives you another order that contradicts it, you must follow this one, instead.”

“What is it?”

“If my mother does something that puts her life in danger,” he said slowly, “or hurts herself, you must do your best to protect her. But if you can’t, you run and get—”

Get me, he was about to say, but what could Draco do? He couldn’t apparate, and he could barely do magic. Even if he could get back to the Manor in time, he’d be less than useless.

“Get Snape,” he decided. “Run and get Severus Snape. He’ll know what to do.” He shook the elf. “Do you understand me?”

“I do, sir.”

“You must swear it. Swear it on… swear it on our house. Like wizards do.”

Dobby swelled with self-importance. It was unusual for a house-elf to be asked to swear or promise anything; the laws of their servitude bound them too tightly to make it necessary. “Dobby swears on the house of Malfoy,” he said. “He swears it by the land and the blood and the name of his young master, to whom he is a good and loyal elf."

"Good. We won't speak of this again. Now fetch my trunk, I'm going to be late for the train."

The journey back to Hogwarts felt short, for he spent most of the time sleeping, and yet when he arrived, he still felt weary. The train arrived late, and he dragged himself up to Gryffindor Tower without a word to anybody, save Peeves, who received a heartfelt four-letter one.

Once term started, it became apparent to Draco the clever trick in which their professors had colluded: they had waited until after holidays to assign the nastiest homework, so the students couldn't run home and tell their parents about it. He resented this as much as he respected it. Slogging through a thirteen-inch essay on the "quintessential similarities between a tea kettle and a piece of flash paper" for McGonagall, he resurfaced to find that he had spent four hours in the same corner of the library, and his right hand had cramped so badly he could barely feel his fingers.

When he returned to the common room, he found that Potter's posse had colonized the good table by the window, and were musing over a carnage of ink and wasted paper. A low fire guttered in the grate, and endless rain pounded against the windows, turning the landscape to a silvery mush. It smelled of candles and woodsmoke, and the Weasley twins were teaching some second years to play Exploding Snap by the fire. Seamus Finnigan had put on the new muggle music he'd gotten for Christmas, so the Gryffindor commons was filled with some throaty-voiced fellow called Smiths yowling to 'take me out tonight…'

Finnigan and Thomas were hopping together in the corner, holding hands and singing along.

“Er, one,” said Weasley, using his quill to clean his ear. “You can step on them.”

Potter nodded vigorously, scribbling. “That’s good. That’s good.”

“Two… you can throw them.”

“Dynamite. Keep going.”

“Three,” he said doubtfully, examining the quill, “you can… cover things with them…”

Granger sighed, lifting her head. “Oh, come on, both of you, she doesn’t want a list. The quintessential similarity between flash paper and a tea kettle is that both of them do their jobs through the application of heat.”

This had also been Draco’s answer, and it secretly relieved him that she thought so. He closed the portrait-hole behind him.

“Oi, Malfoy,” said Weasley, sitting up. “D’you hear about Snape?”

“What about him?”

“Percy just came through and told us,” Potter said, grinning. “He caught a cold over the hols. Can’t teach classes. We’ve got a substitute for two weeks!”

“A cold? Is he all right?”

Granger, hearing his worry, gave him a sympathetic look. He ignored her.

“I dunno. Cracking good luck for us, though,” Weasley sighed, lacing his fingers behind his head. “Bet he was going to give us loads of homework… serves him right for being such a git.”

“He’s a professor, Weasley, have some respect,” snapped Draco. “And what do you mean, he’s got a cold? Can’t Madam Pomfrey do anything about it?”

“‘Sweat it out’? He’s one of the highest-ranking potioneers in the world. You know that, don’t you? He’s an actual, proper genius,” said Draco tightly. “What’s he sick with that he can’t cure?”

“The cure might take more than two weeks to brew,” Granger said reasonably.

He grunted in acknowledgement, though this was the first thing anyone had said to soothe his fears. “Is he taking visitors?”

“Visitors! Blimey, I didn’t ask. We got two Snape-free weeks! You don’t pull a gift unicorn on the horn.”

“Ron, don’t be insensitive,” Granger whispered. “Snape is Draco’s godfather.”

Weasley goggled.

“Godfather?”

“Yes, and even if you don’t like him—”

“‘You’ don’t like him? If ‘you’ don’t like him?! I’m sorry, didn’t he dock you five points for knowing the right answer?”

Draco winced. This was true, and it had been overkill. He hadn’t said anything, but he was fairly sure ‘failing to offer Miss Bulstrode a chance to raise her hand first’ wasn’t listed in the school handbook as grounds for citation.

“Even if ‘we’ don’t like him,” she admitted, “he’s still Draco’s family.”

“That explains so much,” said Weasley fervently.

Draco arched an eyebrow at him. “Such as?”

“Such as… I mean…” He gestured broadly at Draco’s person. “The whole… oh, you know…”

“I never drink… wine,” Potter muttered cryptically. Weasley knocked his head against Potter’s shoulder and buried a laugh in his elbow.

Generously ignoring this, Draco turned to Granger. “Did he say who was replacing him?”

“No, I don’t think so. You might ask Percy. Percy?” she called, and the redheaded prefect, who was reading the Prophet by the fireplace, looked up. “Did they say who was replacing Snape?”

“Great,” said Draco sourly. “So we get the second-rate replacement.”

“One has to imagine staffing first-year Potions isn’t the first thing on Dumbledore’s mind,” Percy said. “After what happened on New Years’.”

“What do you mean?” said Granger.

“You didn’t hear? There was an attempted break-in.”

Draco stood at attention. “Where? When?”

“Oh, seven or eight o’clock, must have been. New Years’ Day. They herded us all into the common rooms and made us stay there until they’d secured the castle. I tried to get McGonagall to tell us what happened but they didn’t want to worry the students. Anyway, nothing was taken, but Dumbledore must be quite concerned. They’ve closed a whole corridor on the third-floor for the investigation.”

“The third floor?” Potter piped up, and the four of them exchanged glances. “Is that by the Charms classroom?”

“Why, yes, I suppose.”

“You mean…” Weasley coughed into his fist, and it sounded suspiciously like “the dog.”

“Use a hanky, Ron,” Percy said disgustedly. “And Malfoy, I assure you, Quirrell will be more than up to snuff. He once studied at the hands of Nicholas Flamel. And he was State Alchemist under the late Prime Minister of Romania.”

“Flamel?” Granger murmured to Draco.

“Famous alchemist,” Draco said, under his breath. “Bit of a niche celebrity in the Potions community. Of course, none of his discoveries have been corroborated or peer-reviewed, but—”

Percy rolled his eyes. “Oh, not this.”

“Allegedly, he succeeded in creating a Sorcerer’s Stone.”

Potter said, “Is that hard?”

Draco guffawed. “Is that hard? Is creating a rock that makes you immortal ‘hard’? I don’t know, Potter, how many of them do you have?”

“But he can’t be really immortal,” Granger said in alarm. “Immortality is impossible. Even through the use of magic.”

“Impossible to demonstrate,” Percy corrected, lifting his finger. “And the trouble, of course, is—”

“Once you go around yelling that you’ve made yourself immortal, the first thing everyone wants to do is kill you and take the thing that did it,” Weasley finished, yawning. “Plus, these things are all guesswork.

It’s the Peverell Paradox. You can’t know if someone’s immortal or not unless they die, and if they die, they’re not immortal.”

Draco stared at him. “What?” Weasley said defensively. “It’s in Beedle the Bard. I read, too, you know.”

Granger, exchanging a subtle glance with Draco, indicated that this was news to both of them.

“Well, if anyone’s immortal, it’s Flamel,” said Draco. “He’s over six hundred. Oldest wizard alive.”

“He claims to be over six hundred,” Percy amended snidely.

“He’s got historical records.”

“What records? They didn’t have birth certificates in the fourteenth century.”

Draco couldn’t fathom Percy’s skepticism; personally, having grown up in a world full of flying broomsticks and literal dragons, he could tolerate the strain that one special rock put on his suspension of disbelief.

“Sorry,” interrupted Granger, “but you said the Sorcerer’s Stone could make you immortal?”

“Allegedly,” insisted Percy.

“And Dumbledore knows him? Flamel, you mean?”

“They co-authored Dumbledore’s star-making paper,” said Percy, obviously pleased to have the opportunity to discuss it. “I’ve read it, obviously, and it’s quite good. If anyone’s interested, it’s called—”

(“They’re not,” Weasley told him.)

“So Dumbledore would, theoretically, know how to make someone immortal,” she said. “If he wanted to.”

“Allegedly!”

Draco rubbed his temples. “I mean, sort-of,” he griped. “It’s not clear if the Stone would work for anyone except Flamel. When you boil it down, it’s just an enormously powerful alchemy stone, so it’s made for the personal use of the wizard who shapes it.”

“But if someone might come to the conclusion that it was worth the risk.”

“Course they might,” Weasley said blithely. “That’s why he’s in hiding. They recalled his Chocolate Frog card upon request a few years ago, because he was getting too much attention.”

“And so,” she said, haltingly, “if he wanted to prevent the Stone from being stolen, might he ask his close friend, Albus Dumbledore, to help him keep it somewhere safe?” She looked at Draco, then Weasley, then Potter. “Maybe somewhere safer than Gringotts?”

“Safe from whom?” Percy said skeptically. “I don’t think immortality sounds very appealing, personally. I dread to think what I’d look like in two hundred years.”

“Oh, I know,” said Potter suddenly, startling everyone. “What about Voldemort?”

Draco and Weasley both flinched so violently that the table bucked.

“Harry, mate, hasn’t anyone ever—”

“Keep that word out of your mouth—”

“—seriously dangerous, there’s a taboo—”

“—show even a modicum of respect—”

Potter raised both hands slowly.

“All right,” he said. “What about ‘You-Know-Who.’ Hey? Big evil bloke who wants to live forever? Killed my parents?” His tone dripped with sarcasm.

When an awkward silence fell, he added aggressively: “Well, he’d want it, wouldn’t he?”

“If he were alive,” said Draco, deeply uncomfortable. “But he’s dead, Potter. You of all people ought to remember.”

“That wasn’t proven, actually!” trilled Percy, delighted by the chance to provide yet another correction. “His body was never found! It was concluded that he died based on circumstantial evidence at the Potter home, and the fact that he disappeared immediately afterwards. But there were no witnesses, except… well.”

He trailed off, glancing sheepishly at Harry, who gave a sarcastic salute.

Granger exclaimed, “There you go. So Voldemort—”

“Don’t say it!” snapped Draco and Weasley at once, and it was hard to say who was more embarrassed.

“Oh, fine! The bad guy, you-know-what, whatever you call him, could still be alive. Theoretically.”

“Theoretically,” said Percy. He checked his watch and stood. “And the Americans could win the Quidditch World Cup next year. But you’d need all the magic in the world.”

The Disappearance of Severus Snape

Chapter 7: The Disappearance of Severus Snape

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

Snape did not come back after two weeks, nor two weeks after that. In fact, the term was halfway over before Draco heard a word about his godfather from anyone.

He threw himself into his studies, not from desire so much as a lack of preferable alternatives. The dismal wet of a Scottish spring forbade any evening excursions with Potter, and as exams approached, the library became more and more crowded with students who, to Draco's recollection, had never made an appearance within its walls before. For privacy, he retreated to Gryffindor Tower, where bleak winds from the moor thundered in the eaves and occasionally sufficed to obscure the atonal wails of Finnigan's music.

Secluded in his four-poster with the hangings drawn, he wrote long letters to Snape, which he left unaddressed and slipped beneath the Potion Master's office door. 'Dear Professor,' read one. 'I hope you are not dead, but if you are, please do your students the kindness of returning as a ghost, even temporarily, so we (read: your godson, Draco Malfoy) are not left in Quirrell's hands for final exams. Best, Draco.'

Snape's absence hurt him in another way. Because of the Ministry's surveillance, he could not write his mother. He received zero letters in the weeks between January and March, and it made him so restless he considered going to McGonagall and begging for leave to go home. He began lighting Dobby's candle each evening before he fell asleep. It gave off an olive-gray smoke that smelled like Narcissa and the Manor, old wood and damp stone, dust and cedars.

The only Gryffindor who shared his dismay at Snape's disappearance was, surprisingly, Granger.

"I hope nothing's happened to him," she said fretfully (once they were well out of Potter and Weasley's earshot.) "He's not my favorite teacher, and I'm certain he doesn't like me, but I don't want harm to come to any professor… and quite frankly, he's ten times the Potions Master Quirrell is. Swap?"

They traded papers. Granger had suggested they review together for a particularly tricky Charms assignment at the start of term, and it had somehow turned into a habit. If it had been anyone else, Draco wouldn't have tolerated criticism of his work, but she was still beating him in Transfiguration.

"Quirell is a hack," he said scornfully. "He doesn't even know the right way to chop a stag-beetle… for a potioneer, his knife-work is atrocious."

Granger leaned in and lowered her voice. "Did you see," she said, "when we did the Forgetfulness Potion, how his model looked? It wasn't at all how the book described — it was yellow instead of green, and the smoke was the wrong shape."

"It was the same with the Pompion Potion," he said disgustedly. "It wasn't just mediocre, it was wrong. Ours both looked better than his."

"I don't understand it. For someone who worked with Nicholas Flamel, he's terrible!"

"I tried complaining to McGonagall."

"Really? What did she say?"

"That I couldn't expect everyone to live up to Snape," he said bitterly, circling a spelling error, "and that Quirrell was a Board Certified Potioneer, so twelve Grandmasters evidently disagreed with my assessment of his abilities. As if a cert means anything. A flobberworm could pass the Boards."

Granger sighed. "Well, honestly, it's not us I feel bad for. You and I will be fine. But the others… I mean, poor Neville, he might have to retake it next year."

"You don't have to tell me about 'poor Neville,'" he muttered mutinously. He knew all about it. He and Longbottom had been working double-time to try and get the boy's Potions grade up to snuff, but the difficulty of the material escalated sharply in the second term, and for someone who had barely fit his mind around the fundamentals, this was too much to ask. More cauldrons were sacrificed to Longbottom's indelible powers of destruction that spring than Draco had seen Snape lose in ten years of potion-making, and with each loss, the boy became less and less motivated, until he barely responded to Draco's instructions, polite or otherwise.

This came to a head in the last week of March. "I'll never get this," Longbottom complained, shoving his chin in his palm and looking longingly out of the Tower window. It was the first really fine day they'd had in months. The sky was a clear, forget-me-not blue, and a group of girls in white dresses were picnicking on the lawn by the lake.

"I'm doomed," he continued glumly. "I'm going to have to repeat the year. Gran will kill me."

"Good," snapped Draco, who had been working with him for far too long to have any patience left for moping. "I'll send her some flowers if she does. Then I'll be free of you."

"It's not my fault! It's too difficult! I've tried the same potion three times, and I've done everything right, it just doesn't want to work…"

"It doesn't 'want' to do anything. You're failing because you're not stirring correctly," he uttered through gritted teeth. "You need to stir slowly and steadily for three minutes, which is not, in fact, an extraordinarily difficult task, but you keep getting distracted, so it curdles—”

“But that’s imp-p-possible,” said Longbottom. “I can’t sit still for three minutes, I get ants-s-s-sy. I want to move around. My gran s-s-says—”

“Oh, please, do tell me what Granny Longbottom says. I simply dribble with anticipation.”

“My g-g-g-ran says,” Longbottom soldiered on, “that I’ve got a, a, a special condition, and I c-c-c-can’t sit in a-a-any one place for very long. She says my dad was the s-s-s-same.”

“Well, that’s a comfort,” Draco said acidly. “Your dad was spastic, so you are, too. Are you sure she was trying to comfort you?”

“That’s r-r-rude,” said Longbottom bravely, “a-a-a-and y-y-you shouldn’t say it. I d-d-don’t c-c-c-c-c-c-c—” He stopped, swallowed, and closed his eyes. He tried again. “I don’t care what you say about me,” he said, pronouncing each syllable carefully, “and you can be as mean as you want, and it’s probably true. But p-p-please don’t say stuff like that about my dad.”

For some reason, this meek entreaty irritated Draco even further. “Why?” he snapped. “I’ll say what I please about your father, Longbottom, and anyone else’s. In fact I bet he is a spastic. You should hope he is, anyway. At least that would explain why he couldn’t be bothered to raise his son—”

Longbottom stood up so fast his chair skittered back and fell over. “My father was a hero,” he said, cheeks blazing, voice clear. “Which is more than anyone can say of yours.”

The common room became very quiet.

“Really,” said Draco, in a voice so low it was almost inaudible. “Is that so. How very proud your grandmother must be.”

Longbottom, to his credit, refused to stand down. He stared at Draco with balled fists, breathing hard. “Yes,” he said. “And he sacrificed himself to stop people like your father from taking over.”

“People like my father?” He gave a joyless smirk. “There’s a word you want that you’re not saying, isn’t there? Go on, Longbottom, have it out. Everyone knows you’re thinking it.”

There was a pause, and Longbottom bit out: “Death Eater.”

“There you go,” Draco sneered, in faux admiration. “Why, you do have a backbone, after all. I say, this is a revelation. Do you get that from your father, too? Of course, being dead, I doubt there’s much more than a backbone left of him by now…”

A susurrus of disapproval wound its way around the common room: this was below the belt, and nobody liked it. Least of all when hurled at Longbottom, who, despite his incompetence, cowardice, and reproachable tendency to leech off the abilities of those around him, was somehow better-liked in the Tower than Draco.

“He’s not dead,” said Longbottom, and he wasn’t stuttering anymore.

“Oh? So he did run away, then. Some hero he is, isn’t he, man could stand up to the Dark Lord but couldn’t stomach you—”

“He’s in St. Mungo’s,” said the boy coldly.

Draco paused. He did a few quick calculations and arrived at the implication of his words. The realization was a bit like a stab to the gut.

“Because of your aunt,” he added, twisting the blade.

Draco couldn’t think of anything clever — or even coherent — to reply to this, so he said nothing. He sat in the horrible silence and fumed, hateful, as Longbottom stood there radiating righteousness like a mounted knight.

Longbottom turned and picked up the chair. He set it right and pushed it into the table. He turned off the cauldron burner (correctly, Draco noticed) and extinguished the flame. Then he said: “Don’t take this the wrong way, M-M-M-Malfoy, but if I were you, I would try to be nicer about other people’s families. You know, considering.”

Then he left. There was a quiet dignity in the sad hunch of his shoulders.

Any hopes Draco had of the fight blowing over were extinguished by supper. Fred and George Weasley spread the story like a virus, and within the day, none of Gryffindor would speak to him. This included Potter and Weasley, who sat apart from him at dinner, pointedly parked on either side of Longbottom.

Only Granger joined Draco.

“Careful, Granger,” he jeered as she sat down. “Don’t want to spoil your reputation. You might get murderer on your sleeves.”

“For Pete’s sake, don’t be silly,” she scoffed, reaching for the pumpkin juice. “To be clear, you were totally horrible to Neville, but that was your own doing, not your father’s, and frankly if you just apologized to him I think he’d be willing to move on.”

“Apologize?” Draco wrinkled his nose. “To Longbottom? Eugh.”

“Alright, don’t,” she said crisply. “But you can’t sulk about everyone being cross at you if it’s your own stubbornness that prevents it from blowing over.”

In fact he could, and did. For the next two weeks, he stubbornly went about his day without talking to a single Gryffindor, save Granger. At first she kept him company, sitting with him for classes and meals, but eventually she tired of this self-imposed pariahdom, and began taking some of her meals with Potter and Weasley again.

“They’re my friends, and I miss them,” she snapped, in response to his (somewhat passive-aggressively) pointing out the change. “You can’t ask me to go cold turkey with you, that’s unreasonable and you know it. And it’s such a stupid fight, I’m sorry, but it is! All you have to do is walk up to Neville and say, ‘I’m sorry, I shouldn’t have said that about your dad, let’s make up.’ That’s it! I can write it down for you, if you want.”

What birds had to do with it, he had no idea. “Get over it, Granger. I’m not begging for forgiveness from the squib son of blood traitors.”

“Three things.” She counted them off on her fingers. “One: it’s not begging, it’s asking. Two: he’s not a squib, that’s rude, and you should be nicer to him. Three: there’s no such thing as ‘blood traitors,’ and if you keep saying things like that, I’m not going to sit with you anymore.”

That this was a real threat with some meat in it, and which was capable of making him nervous, annoyed him beyond measure. He stuck three fingers in the air. “Three things,” he said, mimicking her high-pitched voice. “One: asking for something in exchange for nothing is always begging. Two: everybody’s nice to him, and it doesn’t do him a bit of good. He’s been coddled and carried his whole life, and that’s why he’s so miserably ill-equipped for everything now. Three: ‘blood traitor’ is a perfectly real word for a perfectly real thing, and it’s not even a bad word, so I don’t know why you’re getting hysterical about it.”

“I’m not hysterical,” she said calmly. “It may not be a slur, but it’s still cruel. It’s an unkind name for people whose only crime is not hating muggles. You know — like my parents?”

“Not this again.”

“‘This’ is my family,” she insisted. “For someone who cares so much about family lines, you must be able to understand why it’s important —”

“I’m not saying it’s not important, I’m saying you’re being dramatic about the most irrelevant things. I didn’t insult you! You’re not a blood traitor. You’re not a muggle. You’re a witch, and if you must know, I happen to respect you. You’re probably one of the only people at this school who’s actually earning her place in it, instead of coasting on basic competence and grade inflation.”

Granger, for some reason, failed to be charmed by this compliment. “I know you’re in a bad mood because Snape’s gone,” she told him, regarding him dispassionately with her dark brown eyes. “I understand that you’re worried about him. And I apologize. That must be very hard for you. But that’s no excuse for treating everyone else poorly. I’m sorry you have to hear this from me, but you do have to hear it: Nobody likes a bully, and nobody cares what their reasons are.”

And she said nothing else to him for the rest of the day.

The weather turned warm again in the middle of April, and one balmy Sunday evening, under a cloudless twilit sky, Dumbledore made an announcement.

“Attention!” he cried, as the remains of dessert shimmered off their plates. “Attention, dear friends, peers, and students! A brief announcement, before you wander off to your various evening occupations.” He bowed his head. “It is my great sorrow to announce that your beloved Potions Master, Professor Snape, will not be returning for the remainder of term. He has been recovering steadily but slowly, and wishes me to communicate his disappointment at being unable to share in this segment of your education.”

A chorus of dismayed shouts arose from the Slytherin table, and one sole gasp of dismay from the Gryffindor’s. The rest of the hall shuffled in poorly concealed glee.

Granger, sitting amidst a flock of several Weasleys, shot a worried look down the table at Draco.

“As we cannot in good conscience ask Professor Quirrell to proctor and grade two separate exam periods, Potions will be taught for the remainder of the year by a substitute teacher. His replacement, Professor Sebastian Dagworth, has served for several years as an adjunct professor at Durmstrang…”

But Draco did not hear out the end of the sentence. He sprang up and ran from the hall, heart pounding.

By now he knew the way to the dungeons well, and he made short work of the distance. He threw himself down a flight of stairs, rode the banister to the bottom, and dashed down a stone corridor lit only by guttering torches, skidding a corner and slipping through a crevice behind a statue of Ptolemy. This spat him out in front of the Potions Master’s quarters, and he hurled himself against the door, hammering on it furiously.

“Professor!” he shouted. “Professor! Are you in there? Can you hear me? It’s Draco! Let me in!”

No answer came. He hammered again, shouted some more, and then fumbled for his wand. Fine, he thought. He would break into the room, if Snape wouldn’t come out, and if that didn’t work, he’d blast the door open. Answer me, you greasy old goat. If you’re dead, so help me, I’ll kill you.

“Mister Malfoy? What is the meaning of this?”

It was Quirrell. He had emerged from the Potions classroom, holding an enormous stack of books under his arm, and he peered at Draco as if he couldn’t quite make out his face. Draco quickly hid his wand behind his back.

“I want to speak to Professor Snape,” he said, with a lack of courtesy that would have shamed his mother into hiding.

“Indeed?” said Quirrell mildly. “Well, I hope you do not expect him to answer, if you intend to be yelling at that door all night.”

“…Sorry, sir?”

“He is not in there,” said the professor, nodding at the door. “He has been in the Hospital Wing for some time. I do not think he is taking visitors. I have come several times to see him and Madam Pomfrey is usually shooing me away.” He gazed absently at one of the braziers, his expression distant. Then his eyes snapped up to Draco’s, and Draco was unsettled by the way the flames played across his irises, which were preternaturally pale. “I was bringing him chocolates and flowers, you see,” he added. “To wish him speedy recovery. He is very ill.”

The idea of anyone wanting to bring Snape flowers and chocolates, or indeed thinking Snape would accept them, was perfectly comical.

He narrowed his eyes. “Very kind of you, sir,” he said.

Quirrell stepped forward and held out his hand. “If you have a message you would like to give to him, you may give it to me. I will see that he gets it.”

He stepped backward. “No, sir.”

“You are not trying to give him a message? You were saying you wanted to speak to him.”

“No, sir, I… I’m sorry, it’s nothing important.”

At this, Draco decided it was time for a stylish exit. He turned around and sprinted from the hall, and didn’t stop until he was back to Gryffindor Tower.

“Potter!”

“Mmf.”

“Potter!”

“Mmmgh — Malfoy? What the—”

Draco shoved him a third time, and Potter went flailing off the mattress in surprise. “Wake up,” he hissed. “I need you to do something for me.”

It was past midnight. Draco was still fully-dressed, but the rest of the dorm was fast asleep. Snores rose from Weasley’s bed, thick enough to disguise their whispering.

“What?” Potter said blearily. He squinted. Without his glasses, his eyes looked funny somehow, like they were naked. “Malfoy? Is that you?”

“Yes. Glad you asked. I need to get into the Hospital Wing, and you’re my accomplice. Now, here’s what we’re going to do. You’ll distract Filch, and I’ll sneak in—”

“Hold on. No. Hang on. What?” He sat up, snagging his glasses from the bedside table, and fumbled them on. “It’s the middle of the night. Go tomorrow.”

“I can’t go tomorrow, there’ll be people about. I need to break in.”

“Why?”

“I’m going to see Snape.”

“Great,” said Potter. He put his glasses back on the bedside table, and started climbing back into bed. “Have fun. Don’t get caught.”

Panicking, Draco hauled Potter out of bed by the scruff, like a wayward puppy. He let out the same kind of indignant yip. “Come on! You’re going to help me.”

“NO — leggo, you sallowy git—”

“Stop squirming! Come on, I’ve got your shoes here, there’s no time to waste—”

Potter, who was surprisingly strong, wriggled free of Draco's grip. He scuttled across the bed and glared at him, though because he wasn't wearing his glasses, most of it ended up directed at the wall over Draco's shoulder. "You've got some nerve, after what you said to Neville."

"What I said to Longbottom? Who cares?" He wanted to tear his hair out. "Why is everyone so up in arms about a tiff between me and that snivelling lump?"

"Oi. Because he's our friend," Potter whispered hotly. "And because he doesn't deserve how you treat him, especially given the way he's been singing your praises all year for helping him with Potions."

At this, Draco paused. "He has?"

"Yes. Neville's told everybody who'll listen how you've helped him, how you're the only reason he's close to a passing grade now. He says you're the only tutor he's ever had who makes Potions make sense. He's been incredibly gracious. And all year, you've been jeering at him behind his back. It's cruel."

"I… but he's not passing," Draco said, bewildered. "He's probably going to have to repeat the year. I failed."

"You think he cares?" Potter rubbed one of his eyes with a knuckle. "He knows perfectly well he's failing Potions. He doesn't need you to tell him that. He's just excited to feel like he's learning, for once."

Draco frowned. He hadn't thought that Longbottom was taking anything away from their weekly exercises in failure. He'd assumed that they both hated it equally.

He said haltingly: "So he thinks I'm a… good teacher?"

"For some reason," Potter grumbled. "Don't ask me why, I'd rather eat a wurst-flavored Bertie Bott's than have you for a Potions partner."

“Yeah, feeling’s mutual,” he said automatically, but he couldn’t muster much malice. “I … all right, listen. If I promise to apologize to Longbottom, will you help me?”

Potter looked at him searchingly.

“No,” he said incredulously. “What kind of negotiation is this? Apologize to Neville because it’s the right thing to do, and go to the Hospital Wing tomorrow, when we’re all awake!”

“Shh! I can’t do that, I told you, they won’t let me in!”

“So? That’s your problem!”

“I thought you were a Gryffindor!” Draco whisper-shouted.

“What does that mean?”

“It means you’re helpful! And selfless! And you do stupid things without asking questions!”

“Oi!” A pillow came winging over from Weasley’s bed and smacked Draco in the back of the head. He had the faultless aim of a boy who had been raised in a bedroom with several other boys.

“Quiet, boffaview,” he slurred. “Wuzzall the noise?”

“Nothing.”

“Go back to sleep.”

“Naw,” he denied, blinking. “Wuzzat? Wuzz going on? Are you going somewhere?”

“Yes,” said Draco.

“No,” insisted Potter.

Draco curled his hands into fists. “Potter,” he said, thinly. “I seem to recall, not too long ago, that someone did something rather selfless for you, and it involved both of you being in a place where you shouldn’t have been.”

The other boy’s face flickered with guilt. He argued, “That was hardly selfless. You got to fly around, too.”

“I didn’t need to invite you. I could’ve gotten into the lockers all by myself.”

Potter dragged a hand down his face. He groaned.

Then he rolled out of bed, grabbed his robe, and shrugged it on over his pajamas.

“Wipe that smirk off your face, Malfoy.”

“I’m not smirking,” Draco said, smirking.

Weasley, now fully awake, poked his head through the hangings. “Whaz’ going on,” he demanded. “Where’re we going?”

“Nowhere. Go back to sleep.”

Weasley ignored him. “Harry? What’s Malfoy up to?”

“We’re going to the Hospital Wing. Wanna come?”

Weasley considered this, pursing his lips, and then gave the universal shrug of: ‘eh, might as well.’

“No! We’re not bringing Weasley!”

“Ron can come if he wants to.”

“This isn’t a Gryffindor field trip! This is a clandestine mission!”

“Yeah, sure. Ron, you’ll want socks, mate, it’s cold out there.”

“Good call. Thanks, mate.”

Draco folded his arms. “You lot want to get caught, do you?” he said coldly. “Because it’s hard enough to sneak around with two students. With three, we’re sitting ducks.”

Potter grinned. “But we won’t get caught,” he said.

“Oh? Need I remind you what happened last time?”

“Last time,” he said, “we didn’t have this.” And he produced from the bottom of his dresser a long cloak made of a shimmery material that moved like liquid in his hands.

“What’s that?”

“Invisibility Cloak,” Weasley crowed. “Harry got it for Christmas.”

“You mean a Disillusionment Cloak.”

“No, that’s the cool part. It’s the real deal.”

He rolled his eyes. “Invisibility Cloaks are an urban legend.”

“I thought so too, but you’ve got to check this out. He’s fully invisible, look.”

“No. Weasley. This isn’t one of those ‘competing evidence’ debates, I mean it’s genuinely impossible. There is no Disillusionment Charm strong enough to achieve complete invisibility, so a bespelled cloak, no matter how good it is…”

“...can never… fully… achieve…” Draco spun around in a circle, looking for the dark-haired boy. But there was no sign of him.

“Potter?”

“Right here,” said an amused voice behind him. He jumped.

Weasley snickered.

“Potter,” he hissed, heart racing. “Are you there? How the devil—”

Potter’s face appeared from a crevice in thin air, grinning wickedly. “Cool, isn’t it?” he said. “I’ve been using it to sneak around for months.”

“Where did you get that?” Draco reached out and rubbed some of the material between his fingers, jaw agape. “Do they sell these? Where can I buy one?”

“Like Ron said, Christmas present. No clue who from, they didn’t sign the note. Apparently it was my dad’s.” Potter spread his arms and beckoned Draco in. “It fits Ron and me, so the three of us shouldn’t be a problem.”

“So long as you don’t mind getting a bit friendly,” said Weasley with a leer.

Admittedly, Draco’s resolve did waver. But he steeled himself with thoughts of Snape on his deathbed, subject to the mysterious whims of Quirrell.

“If either of you step on my toes,” he warned, “I’m hexing your tongue into rubber.”

They made it as far as the common room.

The portrait hole was open, and they were almost out the door, when a voice from the corner demanded: “What are you doing?”

Draco tipped his head back and let out a moan of impatience. Weasley patted him on the shoulder. “Told you we should have put the cloak on in the dorms,” he advised Potter.

Granger appeared from behind an armchair, wearing the ugliest pink pajamas Draco had ever seen. They were embroidered with bunny rabbits, and were about two sizes too small for her, so her ankles protruded from the cuffs. “Are you sneaking out?” she asked. “All three of you? Together?”

It sounded like this last part was the hardest for her to believe.

The boys looked at each other. An unspoken agreement formed as to what their strategy would be.

“No,” said Draco.

“Nope,” said Weasley.

“Why would you say that?” said Potter, holding the portrait hole open with his foot.

“No, no, no! You can’t go out! You’ll be caught, and you’ll get Gryffindor in trouble!” She folded her arms and stamped her foot. Draco found this ridiculous and somewhat endearing.

“No, Granger, look. This is important—”

“I won’t let you!”

“Hermione,” said Potter, in appealing tones, “we’ve got the cloak. It’ll be alright.”

“And what happens if someone hears you? Or if Mrs. Norris smells you? Or if—”

“Hang on,” Draco said indignantly, holding up a hand. “You knew Potter had an Invisibility Cloak? And you didn’t tell me?”

She ignored him. “Or if there are alarms on the Hospital Wing? And what do you want in the Hospital Wing, anyway? It’s the middle of the night!”

“His dreadful godfather,” sighed Weasley. “Unfortunately.”

“...might have let me in on it,” Draco was muttering, “not that I’m important or anything, but seeing as half of Gryffindor gets to know…”

“Oh,” said Granger, in a small voice. She looked at Draco. “You’re going to see Snape?”

He shrugged.

She tapped her foot and bit her lip. “Because they won’t let you see him in the daytime,” she guessed.

“Private ward,” he told her.

She fidgeted furiously for a few moments more.

“Fine,” she said. “All right! We’ll go.”

“We?” said Weasley in alarm. “What’s this ‘we’? Who invited you?”

“Well, obviously, I’m going to help,” she said loftily, binding her hair back with a bit of elastic. “I’m not taking any chances of you getting caught and losing Gryffindor any points.”

She glanced at Draco, and he suddenly found himself staring at the ceiling, filled to the brim with uncomfortable emotions.

“I don’t know if four can fit under the cloak,” Potter said uncertainly, shaking out the fabric. “I mean, we’ll try it, but we’ll have to move slow…”

Indeed, as it turned out, he was right to be skeptical. Ample as the cloak’s original owner must have been, even a large cloak could not comfortably fit four children, and they roamed the hallways in fits and starts, stopping every now and then to readjust, or because someone had to tie their shoe. Weasley, who was the tallest, had to stoop so their feet wouldn’t show, and Granger ended up wedged uncomfortably between Draco and Potter. Altogether it took far too long for Draco's liking to reach the Hospital Wing, and by the time they approached the oaken double-doors, the Great Bell was striking one o'clock.

"All right, here's what we're going to do," whispered Granger. "Ron, you wait here with the cloak and watch for Filch. Harry, you come in and watch the door to Madam Pomfrey's office. I'll stay in the main ward and make sure no one wakes up."

"Why am I on Filch Alert?" complained Weasley. "I'm stuck out here, am I, while you lot go in?"

"Oh, honestly, Ron, if you'd like to swap with Harry that's fine—"

"Oi," Potter whispered loudly, silencing both of them. "Quiet."

It was well-timed, for the oak doors had parted. The four of them scurried behind the corner, and Weasley crouched low, so the cloak covered them.

A hooded figure crept out of the Hospital Wing, its face hidden by cowl and shadow. It paused, appearing to scan the area, and then prowled toward them, gliding seamlessly over the floor.

Draco's neck tingled as it drew closer, and he pressed himself against the wall, suddenly terrified for the integrity of the Invisibility Cloak. Though he knew intellectually that it couldn't see them, something in his hindbrain insisted that it was no good, they were done for, of course it could see them, they were standing right smack in front of it.

The figure checked the corner before turning, and stared right through them at the stairwell beyond. As it did so, a ray of torchlight fell on its exposed profile. Granger gasped, and Weasley kicked her ankle.

It was Snape.

The Potions Master looked terrible. Gaunt and sallow, with cloudy bags under his bloodshot eyes, Draco could count the individual beads of sweat on his forehead, plastering his greasy hair to his temples and dripping down his long nose. As they watched, he took a rattling breath, and drank deeply from a silver flask. When it was finished, he seemed to straighten up — though he looked no less miserable — and moved with fresh purpose down the hallway.

“No wonder he’s been sick for ages,” Weasley marveled, at a volume that made Draco desperate to remind him they were invisible, not inaudible. “Somebody poisoned the wanker.”

“Stop it, Ron, you don’t know that,” said Granger, with a nervous glance at Draco.

But quite frankly, Weasley had a good eye, and Draco agreed. He had seen roadkill with more vitality.

“But where’s he going?” Potter wondered, watching the cowled figure begin a long, laborious journey up the stairs. “It’s the middle of the night, and he’s sick as a dog. What’s so important he’s got to do it himself?”

“One way to find out,” suggested Weasley.

Potter shrugged and looked at Draco. “He’s your godfather,” he said. It was clear he did not personally care for Snape and all, and that all else being equal, he would not risk one iota of his own health and happiness in Snape’s defense — but he was extending the offer anyway, because it was obvious Draco cared, and for some reason, under Potter’s maniacal rules of honor, this mattered.

Draco filed away these confounding realizations to address later. “Let’s go,” he said.

The fourth member of the group was kneading her hair in distress. “I really, really don’t think this is a good idea!”

She continued her efforts to deter them all the way up to the third floor. But because she couldn't leave the Cloak without risking being caught, she was trapped in their inexorable march onwards.

It wasn't difficult to follow him: though the Cloak was a slow-roaming, eight-legged animal, Snape walked with a limp, and had to pause to gather his strength.

At the head of the third-floor corridor, they spotted Mrs. Norris skulking around the banister.

"Oh, let's kick her, just the once," begged Weasley.

Draco, who thought this was a great idea, started to say so. But Potter gave his veto with a headshake, though he was grinning.

Snape, on the other hand, held no such reservations. Pointing his wand at the feline, he rasped, "Petrificus Totalus."

The cat snapped to attention, its legs bound together. Its body rigid, it swayed where it stood, and then flopped on its side, stiff as a board.

"Good one," Weasley crowed. "Maybe he'll punt it, and we can watch."

Snape disappointed Weasley, however, by stepping carefully around Mrs. Norris and continuing through the corridor. The four hurried after and watched him slip through the door that contained the three-headed dog.

Weasley made to follow, and Potter and Draco hauled him back. This was not easy: Weasley was as dense as he was tall, and could probably have lifted either of them with ease.

"That's the three-headed dog," said Potter. "He's going after the thing it's guarding. The treasure, or the Stone, or whatever it is."

“It doesn’t sound like he’s fighting a three-headed dog,” Granger pointed out.

“Maybe there’s a Muffling Charm,” said Draco.

“Or the dog isn’t there anymore.”

“Or he’s found another way past it…”

“Hang on, shut up for a second,” said Weasley. Ignoring Draco’s indignant look, he turned his ear to the air, and the others heard what he had: the tinkling melody of a harp.

Potter pushed the door open. Because of the Cloak, they were forced to follow him, even though Draco was feeling queasy and not altogether sure about this. He respected his godfather — certainly liked him, and thought he was one of the better adults out there — but he didn’t much fancy dying for him.

As the door creaked, the harp music swelled. The dog was curled up in a pile of straw at the back of its chamber, dozing fitfully, while a magical harp played lullabies at its feet. The trapdoor in the middle of the chamber was open.

“That’s clever,” said Granger. “You wonder how much trial and error it took to figure that out…”

Without waiting for them, Potter ducked out of the cloak and hurried over to the trapdoor. “It’s all dark down there,” he said. “No ladder, it’s a straight drop. That’s where Snape must be.”

“What do you think he wants down there?”

“Anyone’s guess,” he said, and stuck his hand experimentally into the hole. Draco almost shouted.

But nothing happened, and he pulled it out, waggling his fingers, checking the back for residue. “But if there’s more traps down there, he doesn’t look like he’s in a fit state to take them on.” He looked at Draco. “You still want to follow him?”

In truth, the answer was no, not a chance. He didn’t think Snape wanted anyone following him, and Draco’s sense of self-preservation (which had awoken, bleary and confused, at the sight of the dog) was starting to clang a cowbell in the back of his brain, howling: Not good! Terrible idea! Go back to bed!

“Well,” he said, dithering.

Granger, seeing her opportunity, seized on it. “We should get another professor,” she hissed into his ear. “If we run and get McGonagall, and tell her what’s happened, she can come and find Snape and she’ll be loads more equipped to face what’s down there anyway, and yes, we’ll lose points for being out of bed, but that’s a sacrifice I’m willing to make.”

“How noble of you,” Weasley said dryly.

“It’s better than going by ourselves! What are we going to do down there? The dog is only the first obstacle; do you think they’ll get easier the closer you get?”

“Hermione?” said Potter.

“What?”

“I wish you’d kept your voice down,” he said, in a small voice.

The harp had stopped. A growl rumbled the stone beneath their feet. Draco, still safely hidden beneath the cloak, balked and drew it tighter around himself: but Potter, who was freely visible, was caught in the dog’s yellow glare.

The four of them stood absolutely still. The beast clambered to its full height, shaking itself awake.

Potter, still astoundingly calm, said: “The three of you start walking away, slowly. I’ll keep it distracted—”

He didn’t have time to finish. The dog lunged, jaws snapping, and with a shout, Potter took the only escape he had: he leapt into the black square of the trapdoor, and was gone.

One of its jaws snapped shut over the place he had been seconds before, with a hard crack.

“Harry!” shouted Weasley. He shook himself free of the cloak. Charging, he dodged a swipe of the dog’s massive paw, and hurled himself into the trapdoor after him.

“No,” Granger said, terrified, white-knuckling his arm. “Oh, no, no, no, what if they’re dead?”

The dog, unable to see them under the Cloak, took to circling the chamber, growling and slobbering. Its footsteps rattled the walls. Draco was shaking so badly he was surprised the Cloak hadn’t fallen off.

“Who cares? We’re about to be,” he hissed, edging toward the door. He put an arm around her back and tried to steer her in his direction. “Now come on, let’s get out of here—”

“We can’t leave them!”

“I assure you, we most certainly can!”

“I’m not going to run away, when — when they might be lying at the bottom of that shaft, bleeding out, with broken necks—”

“If their necks are broken, they’re not bleeding to death,” he pointed out, and realized only after she gasped, stricken, that this might not have been the most convincing thing to say. “No, never mind. Listen, do you know what? If we want to be realistic about this, we should’ve heard them hit the bottom by now. If they broke their necks, we would've heard that, too. They're probably not dead or dying. So I say, we do your plan, we go get McGonagall, she goes, gets them, we lose a mountain of points, big deal, we don't get eaten, bigger deal, and we all live happily ever after!"

"We can't."

"Of course we can. What's your problem now?"

"The dog's fallen asleep in front of the door," she whispered.

It had. The three-headed beast, having prowled a full circuit of the room, had laid down in front of the sole exit to the chamber, and closed its eyes once more. Draco moaned in despair. He wracked his brains for how to get around it: a diversion, perhaps, or a Knockback Jinx…

"That settles it," Granger decided. She looked at him, and seized his hand. Her fingers were very small and very cold. Automatically, he let her lace them between his.

"Together?" she said.

"What? No. Not together. Stop. What are you doing?"

He realized her intentions only too late. The barmy witch ran forward and leapt into the trapdoor.

He shrieked in dismay, feet scrabbling against the floor, but Granger was too strong, and they both went tumbling down into the darkness.

Cold, damp air rushed past him. Down they fell in total darkness, tumbling over each other, until after what felt like a lifetime (but was probably only three or four seconds), they landed with a hard thump on something soft and warm.

"OUCH!" roared the something.

"Ron!" Granger said delightedly. "You're alive!"

“No thanks to you!” said Weasley, wrestling his way free of the tangle of limbs. “What’s the big idea, swan-diving onto me with no warning, I’ll be lucky if I still have a spleen!”

Hands wrapped around Draco’s shoulders and hauled him free of the pile. Potter set him upright, and then went back for Granger, whom he helped daintily to her feet. “Glad you’re alright,” he said, with a nod to Granger and — surprisingly — to Draco. “Snape’s gone, by the way. I think he got past whatever this chamber used to be.”

They were standing in a damp, stone cell with walls stained black by moisture. Dozens of chains dangled from the ceiling, and from each chain hung a wilted plant of some kind, its brown and snakelike tendrils hanging limp like rattlesnake skins. It was clearly dead: the dusty brown of the leaves gave no evidence of life, and black scorch marks dotted the skin here and there.

“Wonder what this is,” Weasley remarked, lifting one tendril and dropping it. “Should’ve brought Neville, he’d know…”

“Devil’s Snare, I think,” Granger said, studying it. “It’s a carnivorous plant, and it strangles its victims before eating them. It hates light and heat, though, so I think Snape must have used flames to kill it; that explains these little scorch-marks.”

“Or he just saw a big wriggly thing trying to strangle him and set it on fire,” said Weasley, which Draco had to admit was fairly plausible.

Granger dusted off her pink pajamas, which were distinctly more gray and grimy than they’d been before contact with the cell floor. “Well,” she said, in a bracing tone. She lit her wand, and a beam illuminated the narrow passage leading out of the chamber, which sloped downward into shadow. “That’s our way out.”

Draco looked up. Above them, far in the distance, sat the tiny square of the trapdoor. The walls of the shaft were slick and seamless rock. Even if they could manage to levitate themselves — which he didn’t half trust any of them except Granger to do — they'd still have the dog waiting on the other side.

He lit his wand, too. "If they bury me next to you people, I'm coming back as a ghost to sue," he announced, and marched out of the dungeon cell.

Before long, they passed through a vaulted archway and into another room. It was a brilliantly lit chamber with a high ceiling, and its floor was littered with a host of glittering feathered keys. Across from them, the door to the next room had already been unlocked, and it stood ajar, leading them to the edge of a huge chessboard.

Weasley wandered onto the board. "This was a great game," he said, with feeling. "Look how many pieces they're down. They bled each other out. Black's down to four pawns, a bishop, and the queen, and it's still got White bunched in the corner, except for the poor knight. They knew what they were doing."

He leaned down and picked up a knight's discarded shortsword. When he hefted it, a bead of light ran along the blade: it was real metal.

"Careful with that," Draco said, ill at ease.

"Nah, it's not that sharp," Weasley said, swinging it experimentally. "The edge is wrecked from hacking on stone all the time. Nice to have something meatier than a wand, though. Malfoy, Harry, you want one of these?"

"I'll go without, thanks," said Potter.

"I'll also go without, thank you," said Granger primly.

"Didn't mean it like that, I just figured since you were—"

"A girl?"

“I was going to say a bit smallish,” he said guiltily, and she walked past him with a huff.

In the next room, they passed the corpse of a vast troll, and Draco fought the urge to throw up. The chamber beyond that held a ring of black fire and a row of colorful bottles, along with a note. One of the bottles was empty. The note was untouched.

Granger got to the table before he did. “This is Potions,” she said, which Draco found a bit obvious. “It says one of them lets us through the fire ahead of us, and one of them takes us back towards the entrance… well, that’s a bit useless, isn’t it, since there’s no way to get back up through the trapdoor? I suppose if we’d thought to bring a rope… Oh, well. But if Snape’s already been through ahead of us, and he drank the one that lets him go forward, that means all of these are the wrong ones.”

Weasley, distracted, swept his sword in a playful arc through the air. “Don’t any of the other ones do anything?”

“Three are poison, two are wine. And there’s a logic puzzle, here, to figure out which is which… oh, that’s interesting…”

She drifted off. Draco read the note over her shoulder, quickly, and deemed it useless.

He approached the black fire and held out his hand: it was hot. When he shone his wand over it, they didn’t shimmer or change like an illusion. Holding out his hand, he noticed that the lights over the flames were yellow, bright yellow, like candlewax.

He muttered “Nox,” and then cast Incendio, feeding a stream of red fire into the black. The flames shuddered and warped at the exchange, and when his flames met the black, they shimmered and turned black, too.

He bent and examined the fuel at the base. It was coal, dark and unremarkable, with peppery white bits of cinders flecked here and there. He sniffed. The smell of kerosene was strong.

Potter and Granger were conferring.

“Just strip naked, I reckon, and run straight through?”

“Don’t be stupid, you’ll certainly burn yourself. What if your hair catches fire?”

“I don’t hear you coming up with any other ideas…”

“Oi, Gryffindors,” Draco called, standing up. They attended. “I’m willing to bet an indiscreet number of galleons that the empty bottle was a Fire Resistance Potion. They’re not hard to make, but some of the ingredients are quite hard to get, and they’re not the sort of thing one tends to carry around.”

“Okay,” said Potter, as in: so what?

“Which means I doubt this is Conjured, because the Fire Resistance Potion doesn’t work on Conjured flames — it’s notoriously ineffective against Fiendfyre, for example. So this is a gas-fire, same as you use for a cauldron burner. In fact, I don’t think it’s magical at all: you can turn regular flames black by burning sodium residue under a sodium lamp.” He lit his wand again, and passed the beam over the flames: wherever the light touched, they turned yellow. He smirked. “See?”

“That’s clever,” admitted Granger, which was quite possibly the highest compliment he’d been paid all year. “But I’m not sure if that helps us, exactly, Draco.”

“No, it does,” Potter said suddenly, and he peeled off his cloak. “Because it means you can do this.”

He threw his cloak on the fire and started stamping on it. Granger yelped, but Weasley understood, and he shucked his robe to do the same. Together, they smothered the fire under their cloaks, beating it out with their feet. Smoke poured from the fire in billowing gusts, but slowly, the flames disappeared, suffocated by heavy wool.

“First day of Potions,” Potter said cheerfully, brushing off his hands. “Fire safety. Snape’s a pill, but I did listen to him.”

“Don’t tell him, it might give him a heart attack,” said Weasley.

Granger coughed, waving away blooms of smoke. Her eyes were watering. Feeling bad for her, Draco offered her his handkerchief, and she gratefully held it to her nose, breathing through it.

“Next one?” suggested Potter gamely, gesturing to the passage ahead.

Granger stopped them. “Cloak?” she suggested.

Draco, who had been hoarding the Cloak under his arm, relented to share it. Slowly, cloaked and cautious, they ventured forth into the next room.

They were in a vaulted limestone chamber, shaped like a cathedral, with a tall gilded mirror propped in the center dias. Before it stood Professor Quirrell. He was staring into the mirror intently. At his feet lay strewn a pile of dark robes, which Draco recognized, with a jolt, as Severus Snape.

He must have made some kind of noise, because Quirrell glanced up, checking the doorway in the reflection. His eyes pierced them. Potter gave a sharp intake of breath.

“Who’s there?” he called. His accent was gone, and there was a presence to his voice there hadn’t been before, as if he had finally woken up.

The four of them huddled low, so the cloak covered their ankles. Draco tried to see, from this distance, if Snape was still breathing. He felt sick.

“I can hear you.” Quirrell turned around. He held a long, spindly wand with a bend in the middle, and it was this he pointed at the door. “Reveal yourself.”

Granger let out a small whimper. Draco snatched her wrist and squeezed, willing her to shut up.

Quirrell’s eyes narrowed. He tilted his head to one side, scrutinizing the passageway behind them.

“Ventus.”

A blast of wind exploded from Quirrell’s wand. It raked through the chamber and knocked the four of them on their backs, ripping the Cloak from their shoulders. Weasley’s sword went flying. The Cloak itself swept back up along the passageway, flapping and twisting like a great silvery bat. Draco sprawled out and flipped over, scrambling to his feet. The others did the same.

“Mister Potter!” Quirrell sounded delighted. “I had wondered who would come for Professor Snape first. I confess, I am surprised. And Mister Malfoy! I had not taken you for an adventurer.”

Potter drew his wand. This was almost as admirable as it was stupid. “What’d you do to Snape?”

“Nothing more than was merciful. I admit, I did not expect him to be half so resilient to the henbane; of course, I suspect he ceased to drink Pomfrey’s curatives after his first few bouts of sickness. Such a suspicious mind, has Severus. Nevertheless, he had the right of it. He must have realized, when his morning’s tea came without the usual odor of henbane, that I had something planned for tonight. It was a good effort. Yet he underestimated my strength. He thought I was Quirinus Quirrell, the feeble potioneer, instead of my true self. But who could blame him? No one else could achieve such a perfect disguise. He tested me for Disillusionment Charms, glamour spells, and Polyjuice Potion, but he could never have understood the true genius of my deceit… the idea of using another human being as a mask itself! Even he, a wise and clever Potions Master, could not comprehend the brilliance of Lord Voldemort."

Draco was frozen. Out of the corner of his eye, he saw Weasley shimmying forward on his belly, one arm outstretched to reach his sword.

"None of that," said Quirrell, and flicked his wand. Ropes flew from the tip and snared Weasley, wrenching his arms behind his back and knotting his ankles together. The boy gave a grunt that was more surprise than pain. With two more brusque flicks of the wrist, Potter and Granger met the same fate, and Draco staggered backward, into the shade of the archway, in a fruitless attempt to protect himself. But Quirrell's wand fell still, and did not move again.

"Draco Malfoy," he intoned. "My child, what are you doing here? You should have been in Slytherin."

Draco's mouth dropped open.

"Don't listen to him, Draco," shouted Potter. But neither Quirrell nor Draco appeared to hear him.

"How they have shamed you," said Quirrell sadly. "How they have brought you low! Last scion of the Most Ancient and Most Noble House of Malfoy, denied his birthright, and consigned to live among mudbloods, traitors, and thieves. What a crime it is. This promise I will make to you freely: for these and other injuries against us, they will be repaid tenfold."

Draco could not speak. His tongue was glued to the roof of his mouth. Cold sweat coursed from his temples and slicked his shirt to his skin. He edged still further from the dias, his feet fumbling over uneven stone.

"I thank you, though," mused Quirrell, "for bringing Harry Potter to me. You have served me as well as your father did, in this. Now, attend me, young Malfoy; the night is young, and my work is never-ending.

“The mirror is the key to finding the Stone,” he murmured, tapping his way around the frame. “Trust Dumbledore to come up with something like this… but he’s in London… I’ll be far away by the time he gets back…”

Quirrell came back out from behind the mirror and stared hungrily into it. “I see the Stone… I’m presenting it to my master… but where is it?”

Draco wasn’t sure what the mirror had to do with anything, but so long as it kept Quirrell distracted from talking about Draco, he was content to let him sniff around it. In the meantime, Granger had managed to sit upright, and was rolling her wrists around in their bindings, trying to chafe them free. When Quirrell put his back to them, she twisted around and mouthed, Diffindo!, lifting her bound wrists at Draco.

Terrified, he shook his head. Was she mad? What was her plan after that? Make a run for it? It would take Quirrell all of a millisecond to cast a Killing Curse. Even if he freed her, they didn’t stand a chance.

Meanwhile, Weasley had flipped onto his belly and started inchworming his way across the floor of the vault, his eyes fixed hungrily on the sword.

“I don’t understand,” said Quirrell, tapping the glass. “Is the Stone inside the mirror? Should I break it?”

“It shows your heart’s desire,” said Potter, in a voice thick with loathing. “It can’t make it real.”

How on earth do you know that? Draco craned his neck to get a glimpse of the mirror, but it was too far away, and he couldn’t see anything clearly in it. The best he could make out was a blond man in the doorway, clad in dark robes, which he took to be himself.

“Nonsense. It’s in this vault because it holds the stone. You simply lack the imagination to produce it.”

Weasley hauled himself forward another few feet, rolled thrice, and pressed the binding on his wrists to the edge of the knight’s sword. Draco stared at him. With all his might, he compelled Weasley telepathically not to do anything stupid. This had the sum effect of dropping a water balloon on a rabid wolverine.

“So it’s the Sorcerer’s Stone you want?” said Granger, drawing Quirrell’s attention again. She exchanged a glance of some kind with Potter that Draco couldn’t read. “To resurrect Lord V-Voldemort?”

“Lord Voldemort needs no resurrection,” boomed Quirrell, and his voice was doubled again. “Lord Voldemort is now as he has always been — strong, powerful, magnificent—”

He started to walk backward from the dias. His knees snapped in the wrong direction, and he reached behind his back, contorting the joints of his shoulders in horrible ways. The thing — Quirrell, Voldemort, whatever it was — lurched down from the pedestal and stumbled on its own backwards-facing feet, falling onto its hands and knees. At least, it looked like its hands and knees: it snapped Quirrell’s elbow joints in the wrong direction, and then crawled forward, while from the back of its head, Quirrell screamed.

Granger shrieked and scrambled backwards on her knees. Weasley sprang to his feet, sword in hand, and charged the creature, swinging gracelessly. Quirrell reared up, its knees bent backward, and wrenched its broken wand-arm around, hissing like a snake.

And if it had been any other man — literally anyone, Albus Dumbledore or Harry Potter or Nicholas Flamel — anyone instead of Severus Snape… If it had not been Snape, his godfather, his father's friend, who had lurked in the background of Malfoy birthday parties and Christmas dinners and anniversary celebrations for eleven years… who had saved Draco from drowning in the duckpond when he was four, taught him to make Pepper-Up Potion on the kitchen stove, and shared his umbrella at Lucius Malfoy's funeral — Draco might have taken this chance and bolted out of there as fast as his legs would carry him. He would have indulged, proudly, in the age-old Malfoy family tradition of saving his own skin.

Instead, he summoned every scrap of Gryffindor courage he owned — it was, altogether, not much — to force himself to turn around, and he walked slowly back into the face of death.

It occurred to Draco that he was unlikely to get a better chance. He dove forward and seized Potter's wrists, muttering "Diffindo" at the bindings. It was clumsy, and the spell went wide, slitting a bright red line down each of Potter's wrists, but Potter didn't seem to notice. He hurled himself at Quirrell with the abandon of someone whose plan of action protruded no further than three seconds into the future. His fist connected with Quirrell's jaw.

The Quirrell-creature gave a scream of pain and scrambled backward, ruined limbs flailing. A scorch-mark in the shape of Potter's fist marred the skin of its cheek, black and almost ashen, as if the flesh were wrought from clay. Clutching its face, the thing brandished its wand, and howled, "Avada—"

A sword collided with the back of its head.

Weasley had been right: the blade was dull, but with enough force, anything could hurt. The Quirrell-creature bayed and fell to the ground, a sword-handle protruding from the back of its spinal cord. Weasley ripped it out and made to swing again, but he had to break off to dodge a flash of green light, which jetted under his right arm and created a verdant firework against the ceiling of the chamber. Potter took his chance and lunged, palming the creature's jaw, and the thing gave out a scream that was not human, like ten cats being drawn and quartered at once.

While Potter and Weasley kept it distracted, Draco dropped to his knees and seized Granger's bindings.

“Took you long enough!”

“I didn’t want to get either of us killed! Hold still—”

“Hurry, hurry, hurry! My wand’s in my back pocket—”

“Hold still, I said, or it’ll be your own fault if I open a vein—”

His second Diffindo was cleaner, and the severed ropes fell neatly away. He did her ankles next, and she leapt to her feet, wand outstretched. “Rennervate!” she shrieked, and a flash of brilliant red light flew across the chamber — sailed over the creature’s shoulder — and missed it.

Draco hissed, “Lower, you’ve got to aim lower, it’s not ten feet tall—”

“I wasn’t aiming for it!”

A stirring came from the dias. Slowly, the pile of dark robes drew itself upright. Severus Snape, in what must surely have been the worst shape of his life, hollow of eye, bloody of mouth, soaked in sweat that was pink with rivulets of blood that trickled from a wound in his forehead, stood and drew his wand as if he intended to die fighting. He took in the scene inside the vault, beheld Potter and Weasley locked in combat with the inhuman remains of Quirinus Quirrell. His lip curled.

“Stupefy.”

The Quirrell-creature collapsed. Weasley, who had been about to deal a mighty blow with the sword, dropped it and fell to his knees, panting. There were tears on his face.

Granger gasped with relief, and collapsed against Draco (who felt this unfair, as he was barely up to the task of standing himself.)

“Professor,” he shouted. “Professor, are you all right?”

“Draco?” Snape’s expression transformed in an instant from weary relief to unadulterated shock. “What are you doing here?”

But he didn’t have time to answer. Snape looked up, saw something coming down the passageway, and his expression reverted from shock back to relief.

“It seems I have come too late, Severus,” said a soft, elderly voice.

Snape slipped his wand back into his pocket, relaxing. “Something of a motif, with you, Albus.”

“You have every right to chastise me. We each have our hamartia, as the Greeks would say. Mine, I fear, is to always arrive in the right location precisely five minutes later than I should have been.”

Dumbledore strode into the vault, and Draco noticed that his wand was drawn. It was a long, knobbly piece of wood with a grip of scalloped stone. To his recollection, Dumbledore had never revealed his wand before.

“Meanwhile,” said Dumbledore, stooping to help Weasley to his feet, “it appears our young friends have a knack for arriving precisely when they mean to. I consider this an auspicious sign for their futures.”

“Professor,” blurted Granger, and (bless her) actually raised her hand. “What on earth was—”

“Miss Granger, you have done far more tonight than anyone can justly expect of you, and though I have no right to ask for your patience, I fear I must,” said Dumbledore. “In fact, I must ask for your forgiveness, too, for the impoliteness of what I am about to do.”

“But you haven’t done anything,” she said curiously. Dumbledore smiled and lifted his wand.

A piercing white glow filled the chamber, and Draco screwed his eyes shut against it. When he tried to open them, he felt himself descending into a soft blackness in which there was nothing, no light, no sound — nothing but a woman’s laughter, and a scent that reminded him of home.

A Nice Day to Start Again

Chapter 8: A Nice Day to Start Again

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

He woke to a cramped neck in a small, sweet-smelling room.

He had been laid on a cot in an office of some sort, and a blanket had been drawn up to his chin. The wallpaper in the room bore a cheery print of poppies and hydrangeas, and a vanilla candle guttered on the desk.

In an armchair beside him sat Albus Dumbledore, perusing an issue of Witch Weekly.

Draco sat up.

“Good afternoon, Draco,” said Dumbledore.

“Where’s Snape?”

He did not care that Snape would have boxed him about the ears for showing these kinds of manners. “Where’s Granger?” he demanded. “Where’s Potter and Weasley?”

“Your friends are all quite safe, I assure you. Professor Snape is recuperating in his chambers, having availed himself of the healthful effects of a bezoar. Harry and Mister Weasley are convalescing under Madam Pomfrey’s expert care, and Miss Granger has been harrying that dear lady for some time in an effort to ascertain your location.”

“Convalescing? Did they get hurt?”

“I believe Mister Weasley sprained his arm attempting to wield a shortsword, and Mister Potter has several cuts on his wrists.”

“He got those fighting Quirrell,” said Draco quickly.

“Naturally.” Dumbledore folded his magazine and laid it carefully on the desk. “You will be relieved to know, I expect, that Professor Quirrell is no longer with us. The Stone has been secured, and subsequently destroyed. My dear friend Nicolas and I decided that it was not worth the risk. Both he and Snape, by the way, were quite confounded by your performance in the Potions room; would you ever consider confessing how you did it?”

Draco had any number of responses to this, ranging from the Stone is real? to, what do you mean by ‘no longer with us’? to, so you follow Witch Weekly, do you?

“It was a sodium flame,” he said finally. “I identified it, and — Potter and Weasley stamped it out with their feet.”

Dumbledore laughed and clapped his hands. “With their feet! I could not ask for a better answer. Thank you, Draco. I believe, in exchange for your honesty, you should get to ask some questions of your own.”

Draco thought this was fairly decent of the old man. “Well, good. About time someone had some answers around here,” he said, aggrieved. “I have about a hundred questions about all of this.”

“Goodness, I’m sorry, but that sounds exhaustive. You and I will have to arrange subsequent appointments. As for today, might I politely solicit you to confine your number to three?”

“Three?”

“Oh, dear, you sound so deflated. Forgive me, Draco, I know I have disappointed you profoundly in the past twenty-four hours. I confess I will probably do it again before the next twenty-four have elapsed. If it is any consolation, the disappointment of the young in their elders is one of the most sacred traditions which those same elders pass down.”

“...Why is that supposed to be any consolation?”

Dumbledore’s smile spoke loudly of mischief. “Is that your first question?”

“No.”

He spread his hands, evocatively. Draco swallowed and frowned, thinking hard.

“How did you know we were in the vault?”

“Ah. What a pleasant first question! I anticipated something far more juicy; I was preparing to divulge the entirety of my history with the genus Capra. But I will enjoy answering this much better. To wit: it appears that, in your efforts to enrich and augment his education, you won the loyalty of a very valuable friend in one Neville Longbottom.”

He couldn’t believe it. “Neville ratted on us?”

“We might differ in our choice of verb,” suggested Dumbledore thoughtfully. “‘Rat’ implies a degree of malice which Neville does not possess. The dear boy witnessed the four of you leave the dormitory, and when, after an hour, you had not returned, he alerted Professor McGonagall to the possibility that you might have encountered some trouble. It was this, in part, which delayed my arrival in the Vault: I did not know you had dared to cross the trapdoor.”

“What was the other part?”

“Political matters in London,” he said simply. “And because I decline to elaborate further, we shall not count that as your second question.”

Draco thought some more. During the silence, Dumbledore pulled out a pair of knitting needles and began to clack them merrily, cobbling together the worst cross-stitch Draco had ever seen.

“Cornelius Fudge,” he said.

“Our dear Minister,” Dumbledore affirmed. “What about him?”

“Is he reading my letters?”

The headmaster chuckled. “Is he, personally, reading your letters? I do not claim to know the Minister’s predilections, but if pressed, I would guess not, for any number of reasons. For one, he is a busy man, and we busy men try to let the affairs of eleven-year-olds resolve themselves. For two, I think that Professor Snape’s efforts to conceal your correspondence with your mother have secured you thoroughly against the Minister’s snooping.”

“You knew—?”

“Professor Snape does little in this castle of which I am unaware,” he said simply. “I was aware that he was taking regular visits to Malfoy Manor; he made no secret of his purpose in assuring your privacy. I did not stop him, for I considered it benign, and for I thought that there was little the Ministry could do to protect you here that I could not.”

Draco wrinkled his nose. “Protect me?”

“Protection, yes. That is, of course, the reason your mail is watched.” Dumbledore paused. “Did you not know this?”

“I don’t know anything about any of this. The only reason I know someone was reading my mail is Snape told me.”

“Ah. Yes, Snape and I differ in opinion about why the Ministry does certain things. He is generally more suspicious of its intentions, whereas I — having the rare and unwisely coveted ability to ‘see behind the curtain,’ as it were — attribute its most alarming behaviors to incompetence, not malice.”

“I don’t care if they were incompetent or malicious, or both. Who’s reading my mail?”

“Nobody,” said Dumbledore patiently. “If you had used owl post, however, the document would have been copied and filed away for future consultation should it ever come up in an investigation of yourself or your family. More likely still, it would have been used to gather information about the whereabouts and activities of former Death Eaters who might seek revenge on the scion of a house that betrayed them. As at least one has done before.”

Draco fell silent.

“You don’t like to think of it,” he said softly. “Of course. I apologize for my indiscretion.”

“I don’t care about that,” he said brusquely, but Dumbledore could tell he was lying.

“How much do you know about her?” he inquired gently. “If you would forgive the discourtesy of the question.”

“Not much.”

Dumbledore set down his knitting, and waited.

Begrudgingly, Draco continued. “She’s my aunt,” he said unwillingly. “My mother’s sister. She was a Death Eater. She and my father worked together in the war.”

“Well done.”

“It’s family history. Of course I know it. My mum can do the whole tree back to 1800, it’s mad. Like this: Bellatrix Irma Lestrange, neé Black, born in 1951, eldest child of Druella Rosier and Cygnus Black, first of three — if you’re writing, drop an asterisk — and then: married to Rodolphus Lestrange, eldest son of Rodney and Delphinia Lestrange, first of two, born 1947, died 1988. Childless," he finished.

"Draco."

"Oh, and she put Neville Longbottom's parents in St. Mungo's, apparently—"

"She killed your father."

"So?" he said roughly. "My father betrayed her."

Dumbledore put away his needles and folded his hands calmly in his lap. "Your father bought your family's freedom by cooperating with a Ministry investigation to eliminate the festering remnants of a cause that was long since lost."

"My father gave up his wife's sister for sixty years off his sentence and a government pardon."

"A pardon for his wife," corrected Dumbledore. "Circumstances which, one might think, would buy him some familial fidelity."

"If you think that, you don't understand the Blacks."

"I most certainly do not," he admitted. "There are a hundred things about your mother's family which I shall never understand, and never hope to. But I flatter myself by saying that I do understand loss, and death; and the effect that both can have when suffered by children."

Draco looked at the ceiling. He refused to take the bait.

Dumbledore sighed.

"I apologize. I did not intend to plumb the bony depths of your family closets here today. I meant only to suggest that, were certain dangerous parties to take a renewed interest in you or your family, the Ministry would be interested in protecting you against these threats."

Far from reassuring Draco, this infuriated him. He spat, “Great. So after they let my father get murdered, they decided to start stealing my owls and screening all my family’s mail under the flimsy pretext that they can, what, stop her from killing him twice—”

“The Minister of Magic is undoubtedly a somewhat foolish man, but his shame at the tragedy of your father’s death was earnest. He has no desire to see it repeated.”

“Oh, well, that’s fantastic. Really. I feel so very safe.”

“You are upset.”

Draco sat up. “I want to make it clear,” he said angrily, “that if it weren’t for Snape, I probably would be dead by now. That’s who protected us. Not Fudge. If he wants to help, he can take his promises and his owls and try minding his own business.”

“I have been suggesting the same to him for some time,” Dumbledore said sadly. “Alas, when one is the Minister of Magic, ‘minding one’s own business’ does not in itself constitute a viable option.”

Madam Pomfrey poked her head into the room. “Oh! My apologies, dearie,” she said. “Didn’t realize you were awake.”

“That’s quite all right, Poppy, it sometimes surprises me as well,” said Dumbledore cheerfully. “Thank you for checking in. How fare our recovering heroes?”

“Hearty as horses, each to each. I swear, the things a young body can take. Potter is begging to be released, and I’ve kept Granger at bay with all but force.”

“By all means, retreat, then,” he assured her. “I see no reason to deny young Miss Granger the things she wants, especially when she pursues such simple pleasures with such commendable vigor. I will hold your office hostage but a moment longer.”

“Take all the time you need, Albus.”

When she had gone, Dumbledore turned to Draco. “I expect they will want you as well,” he said. “So I will release you presently. I will say only this: you performed exceptionally last night. Godric Gryffindor himself, I think, would have been proud to see his colors around your neck.”

“Oh, no,” Draco said, alarmed. “Me? I was only there because they made me. I didn’t have a choice.”

“One may exercise a great deal of bravery even in situations where one has no choice,” said Dumbledore gravely. “Great works have been done by those who, despite their own desires, have taken up the mantle of nobility, even with begrudging hands.”

Draco squirmed. “I’m not noble,” he said hotly. “I was scared out of my mind. I froze up. I wanted to run. I was going to run, if I’d just found the right moment—”

“My dear boy,” said Dumbledore, smiling, “there were dozens of moments. Each drifted past you like ships in the night.”

“Not on purpose!”

“Very well. I will ask Mister Potter, then,” he said, “who happens to owe you his life, whether he thinks you acted nobly, or in, as you seem to think, the basest kind of self-interest; and I doubt that his answer will align more with yours than mine.”

“That’s tosh! Weasley hit the Dark Lord with a *sword!*I stood there and cut their bindings, and what, I get a medal?”

“Your concern for ensuring Mister Weasley receives equitable treatment is touching,” said Dumbledore, in tones of happy surprise. Draco fought the urge to tear his hair out: that wasn’t what he’d meant. “Unexpected, but touching. To your question: no, you do not get ‘a medal.’ However, considering the circumstances, I think a reward may not be entirely out of order.”

He perked up. “Like a present?”

The headmaster laughed. “Yes, you might consider it a gift.”

“Do I get to choose it?”

“Within reason.”

“What’s within reason?”

He smiled. “With your father’s ear for caveats. Very well. Any one wish of yours which is within my power, and which I can bring myself, on moral grounds, to grant, I promise to fulfill.”

Draco said, “Put me in Slytherin.”

A long moment passed. The amusement seeped slowly from Dumbledore’s face, leaving the weathered folds a landscape of chagrin and regret.

“Ah,” he said. “You have hit upon a request that meets neither criteria, I am afraid.”

“Professor, please—”

“You are unhappy in Gryffindor?”

“You believe you would be better off in Slytherin?”

“Of course I would,” he said immediately. “I’d be with my own people.”

Dumbledore stared at him for what felt like a long time. His eyes were unspeakably sad.

“This is my fault,” he said finally, removing his spectacles. Withdrawing a polka-dot handkerchief from his robes, he began to polish them. “I never try to interfere in Sortings, if I can avoid it. The Hat, whose wisdom has fed centuries of great wizards into the world, should not be questioned on such matters. But there comes the rare case, now and then, where I think I can predict its judgment… and, when that judgment conflicts with what I believe to be the best interests of the student, or perhaps even the Wizarding World at large, I, in my supreme arrogance, will take it upon myself to interject.”

“Interject?” Anger prickled, like the telltale scrape of a match, at the bottom of Draco’s spine. “What do you mean, interject?”

“The Hat tends to sort each student as the student would sort herself. For students seeking like-minded peers, it sorts them so. For students seeking to be challenged, it does the same. For students who do not know their own heart, it chooses the House most likely to help them find it. This is how, incidentally, your friend Neville Longbottom found himself in Gryffindor.”

“But I asked,” he said in a trembling voice, “I asked it. For Slytherin.”

“Yes. I know.” Dumbledore put down his glasses. His shoulders slumped, and Draco might have felt sorry for him, if he weren’t so angry. “As I thought you would. But — and forgive me, Draco — I thought that for a student like yourself to excel, to prove yourself — you might benefit from some additional help.”

“Help,” he repeated.

“Help, yes. From peers more likely to — how shall I put this? Allow you to see yourself clearly.”

“I was supposed to be in Slytherin,” he said, his voice shaking with anger. “I was supposed to be in Slytherin. You admit that. You interfered.”

“Yes.”

“Well, fix it, then! Put me back!”

“I cannot. The Sorting is permanent. Students cannot transfer between Houses.”

“But I’m not where I’m supposed to be!”

“Do you really believe that?” The headmaster tilted his head curiously.

Draco spluttered. “Do I—? What do you mean? You just said you agreed with it! You said I was supposed to be in—”

“Upon your arrival to the castle, you were undoubtedly fit for the House of your choosing. Now, I am no longer sure.” Dumbledore put his head down, twiddling his thumbs. “Perhaps this is arrogance. If so, I apologize. But sometimes, even a year is quite enough for a House to make its mark on its inhabitants. I confess that Professor McGonagall has certainly come to find you an entertaining and enjoyable addition to her charges, which is an opinion she might not have espoused at the beginning of the year.”

He drew his knees up onto the cot and hugged them. To think of it: all his misery, throughout the year, could have been prevented. He could have had a good year instead of a wretched one. He could have avoided every lesson with Longbottom, every sleepless night lost to Finnigan’s CDs, every bothersome pop-quiz with Granger, the time he’d had to fight a troll…

But also, of course, the evenings in the common room when Finnigan had put on a not-horrible piece of music, and the Weasleys brought up snacks from the kitchens, and Granger nattered on at him explaining the thesis of her latest paper. And the rare quiet nights in the Gryffindor dorms, when the rain came down softly on the windowpanes, and he could hear the full bellows of the frogs beneath the lake blow the evening full of sound, reminding him of summer nights at the Manor.

Those hadn't been awful. He wouldn't choose to forget them, if he could.

"I leave you with this," said Dumbledore. "There are three children outside this door who believe that you are their true friend and housemate; and though I clearly cannot persuade you one way or another, I believe they may have thoughts to share on the subject."

Saying so, he rose, and opened the door. Draco heard him say, "I often reflect on how difficult it must be to eavesdrop when the subject has cast Muffliato. Philosophers often ask: If a significant conversation is not spied upon, is it still significant? With these and other ruminations, I must leave you."

Then he was gone, and there were shadows in the doorway, shuffling their feet and waiting awkwardly to be invited in.

"Draco?" said Harry tentatively, poking his head into the room. "Are you awake?"

Two other heads appeared under his, wide-eyed. "You wouldn't believe how much candy they left us, mate," said Ron ecstatically. "It's nutters. The twins must have raided the kitchens. You like black Licorice Wands?"

"Nobody likes black Licorice Wands, they're disgusting," whispered Hermione, and then: "Draco, I brought our homework from yesterday, I thought you might want to get a head start on it! If you'd like you can copy my answers for part of the Potions homework. I don't think Snape will mind too much, since you couldn't go to class."

This demanded a response. He whipped his head around and glared. "Bite your tongue, Granger, I'll copy answers in Potions when hell freezes over."

“Oh, you are awake!”

She bounded onto his cot, causing a minor pillow eruption. “Can you read my essay, then? Because it’s due tomorrow and I haven’t had time to revise it and I could really use a second pair of eyes…”

“Blimey, you could give the bloke a minute to catch his breath,” said Ron, slumping into Dumbledore’s chair. He kicked his feet up on the armrest and popped a pack of Chocolate Frogs. “But seriously, black licorice? Takers? We need to get rid of it somehow.”

Harry stood in the doorway, grinning, with his hands in his pockets. Feeling defiant, Draco said, “What are you looking at, Potter?”

“Nothing,” he said. “Just trying to remember, that’s all.”

“Remember what?”

“What this looks like,” he said. “So this summer, when I’m back at the Dursleys’, I have something nice to think about.”

And Draco, who found this puerile, and disgusting, to say nothing of embarrassing to everyone involved, rolled his eyes so hard that they hurt afterwards. “For Merlin’s sake, close the door,” he snapped. “I don’t want anyone seeing us associating together.”

“You’re not ashamed of us, are you, Malfoy?” Ron stuck out his tongue, which was stained brown from chocolate.

“Jointly, individually, and of you in particular, Weasley.”

“Feeling’s mutual, you jammy git. Chocolate Frog?”

Draco sighed and rested his head against the cot. He regarded the ceiling with a helpless sense that he was being manhandled brutally by the hands of fate. Or, specifically, the hands of Hermione, who was still trying to sneak her essay into his pocket.

“Yeah. Sure, I could go for a Chocolate Frog.”

It took quite a while for them to unload the Hogwarts Express. It had been a terrible day to leave the castle: June flowers were blooming everywhere, turning the lawns into a patchwork quilt of red and yellow, and the sun filled the sky with a light, watercolor blue. Meanwhile, in King's Cross, the air smelled of smoke, iron, and the intractable scent of human bodies bustling together, queuing up to leave the platform. Harry and Ron had gone first, after trading hugs and promises to write, and then Ron had hauled Harry off to meet Mr. and Mrs. Weasley.

Hermione had grown somewhat teary when saying goodbye to the boys, and now that she and Draco were alone, the waterworks started gearing up again. "Well, I hope you have a good summer," she said. She held out her right hand. "Please give my best to your mother. And if you'd ever like to visit, I'm sure my parents would…"

He snorted.

"Right. Never mind. But do, you know, if you ever feel like writing — I'm just going to be in London, it won't be hard for your owl to find me."

"My owl?" he said. "What's this about my owl? Ulysses is still recovering from a wing sprain."

"If you're saying you're willing to try muggle post, I'd be perfectly happy, but I have to warn you, it's not quite as fast—"

"Granger, I say this without exaggeration: I would much rather die." He pulled the cover off his trolley and lifted the owl cage, which was covered in a tawny curtain. "You'll just have to use your owl, instead."

She didn't take it at first. She stared at the offering.

He rattled it a little, and the creature inside gave a baleful hoot. "Go on and take it," he said. "I've not got all day. If you don't like it, you'll have to take it back to Eeylops, I'm not sure what their policy on returns is. I also don't know how you'd go about sending it away; if you tell it to go, it's bred to come right back, so your muggles ought to have some trouble getting rid of it."

"This is mine?" she said.

She was taking far too long, so he grew impatient and hauled off the tarp himself. The owl inside was on the small side, with a coat of toasted amber and a heart-shaped white face. Its eyes were vast and dark, and it had a lovely little V of a beak that gave its stare an inquisitive effect, as if it were conducting a perpetual examination of the world.

He'd need a cask of Veritaserum to admit it, but he'd picked it because it reminded him of her.

Hermione took the cage, hugging it to her chest, and stared at him in a way that made him fidget and grow warm in the face.

"You got me an owl?"

"Someone needed to. It was beneath both of our dignity. I wasn't about to let you run a parade of strange owls through the Manor grounds."

"You got me an owl."

"Merry Christmas," he said, looking away. "I owed you a present. Sorry it's late."

"How much did you pay for this?"

"Listen, I told Mother, if we have to mortgage the Manor, that's just the way it is."

"You're lying!"

"I never lie about wines or real estate. It's bad form."

“Does it have a name?”

He shrugged. “It’ll answer to whatever you call it.”

She lifted it to her face and cooed. It cooed back with regal dignity.

“Thucydides,” she decided. “Do you like that? You do? I like that, too.”

“That’s the most pretentious thing I’ve ever heard. And mine’s named Ulysses.”

“Thucy, for short.”

“That’s worse.”

She grinned at him. “I have a present for you, too.”

He pinched his nose. “No, see, Granger, the way this usually works is, we both give each other gifts at Christmas. What I’ve done is put mine off for half a year, so I’ve had to pay it back with interest—”

It was. He was surprised; he didn’t remember mentioning it, though his mother had sent him a boxed cake at breakfast in the Great Hall. He’d received a few ‘happy birthdays’ from people in passing, and the Weasley twins had taken it upon themselves to serenade him at lunch, but aside from these ritual humiliations, the occasion had gone unmarked.

“I wrote my parents, asking them to get this from the mall,” she said, digging around in her satchel. “I told them your parents hadn’t enough money to buy you one, which was a lie, obviously, but I thought it might be worth it.”

“What’s a ‘mall’?”

She was babbling because she was nervous. She really didn't need to be; he hadn't expected to get anything from her. "It took me a while to think of it. I tried to come up with something you'd like but you wouldn't think to get for yourself. That's what my mum says the best presents are. I was going to get you another book, but I thought that would be a bit boring."

"Perish the thought."

"And," she said, with satisfaction, "this is muggle technology. So if you like it, you have to admit that you like something made by muggles."

She offered him a small gray box with a black square inset on the face, made of some odd lusterless material. Connected to the box by a cord were a pair of threadbare black earmuffs. The word 'WALKMAN' ran along the bottom of the box.

He tried not to look too disappointed.

"Thanks," he said, with as much feeling as he could. "This is very nice, Granger."

"Silly! You haven't seen what it can do yet. Here." She took back the earmuffs and, going up on tiptoes, slid them over his ears. The cups slid in place, and the band settled into his hair, in what he was certain could not be a flattering look.

"There," said Hermione in satisfaction. She paused — they were standing very close to each other on the platform — and then, seeming to find her nerve, she threw her arms around his shoulders.

Instinctively, he put his arms around her waist. Uncertain where to go from there, he patted her on the small of the back.

It was hideously awkward. But not, altogether, unpleasant.

"Happy birthday, Draco," she said.

She pressed a button on the side of the box.

A sound swelled in his ears. He turned around, thinking that perhaps some buskers had come up behind them while they were hugging, but there were none. The thunder disappeared when he removed the earmuffs, and reappeared when he put them on.

Whatever his expression was, Hermione laughed at it. She waved at him and said something, but he couldn't hear her, because a drumbeat had started behind the ambience.

The music swelled in volume as she disappeared into the crowd of the platform, and he was left standing there, increasingly stunned. It was like Finnigan's music, but it wasn't — it was much better, for one thing — and it was closer, like it was inside him, permeating him, going in and through him and leaving him humming like the magic in his wand.

And so Draco stood on Platform Nine and Three Quarters, holding his box of muggle magic, as his world — as it seemed so often wont to do — changed unalterably and forever.

Hello! Thanks for reading!

I'll be taking a short hiatus while I finish editing Year Two (and continue writing Year Three). Hopefully, it should start coming out in about a week. It'll be the same length as Year One (seven chapters, approximately novella-length), followed by Year Three, also in the same novella range; after that, each year will get a bit bigger. Y3 will also be the last part of what I consider 'Volume One' of this fic, marking the end of this 'act' of the characters' lives. After that… well, after that, everything's in the planning stages, but there's lots of irons in the fire.

Thanks for all the love. If you're reading this, you're the reason I keep updating. And a special thanks to everyone who commented; I read all of them, and I'm grateful for each one.

Love,

And when you've taken down your guard

If I could change your mind

I'd really love to break your heart

—Tears for Fears, “Shout”

Dear Draco,

I knew you’d like it! It’s my favorite album, too. My mum says that if I keep my grades up, she’ll take me to see them for my birthday in September. My cousin Nicole loves them too, and since she’s staying with us, I get to share her cassettes. (You must keep this a secret, but I have to tell someone: She has such a crush on Michael Dempsey, and keeps a picture of him in her underwear drawer.)

It does feel sort of odd to be home. I love them, of course, but whenever my aunt or uncle asks what I want to do when I grow up, I have to lie and say I’m studying to be a barrister or a chemist or something. And sometimes, Nicole and Jason will be talking about something they’ve learned in school, like History or Maths, and I have to keep quiet because they never taught us that at Hogwarts, and if I ask what it is, I’ll sound stupid. But it’s even worse when it’s the other way around! Yesterday I had to sit through a whole conversation about Thracian history, saying nothing, though I was just dying to tell them that the sea-peoples of the Bronze Age were marauding hags!

Even my parents do their best, but they don't really "get" some things, like why we use owls, or why phones don't work on Hogwarts grounds. And I obviously can't tell them about things like the three-headed dog and the Vault, or they'd never let me go back. Do you tell your mum everything, or are there some things you hide from her, too?

Ron invited me to go to the Burrow at the end of the summer, but I don't think we'll get back from Mallorca in time. Also, my parents aren't too keen on me staying over at a boy's house, even though Ron has six siblings, so there'll be loads of people around. I told them they were being puritanical and old-fashioned, and Mum gave me a quid for using "puritanical" correctly but said I still couldn't go.

Also, have you heard from Harry? It's been a while, and between you and me, I don't trust his relatives as far as I can throw them.

I hope you're having a wonderful summer.

Your friend,

Hermione Granger

Dear Granger,

Don't get too excited. I didn't say it was better than Beethoven, I just said that if you wanted to send me some more cassette decks, I'd be happy to reimburse you. I don't know how much they cost, but I'm sure it's no object. They can't be more than a symphony membership, and for some reason Mother insists we keep several of those.

I will say you're onto something with The Cure, though. I liked "Boys Don't Cry" and the one about Friday. It's good flying music.

I am sorry that your muggles have barred you from achieving your full potential as a know-it-all. Rest assured that when you return to civilization, your big head will be fully obvious to anyone who matters. Moreover, I'm not sure why your mother and father can't wrap their heads around the concept of owls. According to Binns, at one point muggles used pigeons to carry messages, so I don't know what's not clicking for them.

*No, I don't tell my mother everything that happens at Hogwarts. I don't know anyone who tells their mum everything, wizard or not. In some ways, muggles have it easier — all sorts of baggage comes with being part of a pureblood family, and it doesn't always bring you closer together. Do you have any aunts you're not allowed to talk about? Or names you're not allowed to say?*

In any case, I wouldn't worry about it. I'm told that angsting over the fact your parents don't understand you is a customary part of adolescence.

I haven't heard from Potter, either. If you're worried they're withholding his mail, I can try sending Ulysses; he's fierce as a lion, and more than a match for any muggle. I'd like to see the Dursleys try to stop him from getting through Potter's window. And I mean that sincerely, I would very much like to see it.

Write soon; do remember about the cassettes.

Yours etc.,

Draco Malfoy

Dear Malfoy,

Hello!! Thanks very much for the letter! Sorry if your owl is missing a few feathers when he comes back — Dudley took a swing at it with a flyswatter, and then it sort of tried to kill him I think? Aunt Petunia insisted on taking him to the hospital for the scratches, even though they were pretty tiny and probably didn't even hurt. Uncle Vernon threatened to call animal control but I told him if he did that you'd sue, and that you came from a super-posh rich family with lots of solicitors. That got him good and scared.

My summer's been pretty boring. The Dursleys locked all my school stuff in the cupboard. Wand, books, Invisibility Cloak, all of it. The wand's not so bad because I couldn't do magic anyway, but I wish I had my Cloak. My neighbor Mrs. Fig is pretty nice, and I used to sneak over to watch TV with her in the afternoons. Now I just have to sit in my room all day between meals.

Anyway, sorry for all the complaining. I really do appreciate your letter. I haven't gotten any from Ron or Hermione because Dudley always scares the owls off with his BB gun. Hedwig is really happy to have the company, too, I think she's been lonely.

Hope your summer's been great. Can't wait to be back at Hogwarts.

Best,

Harry

Dear Potter,

What you describe is intolerable and outrageous. The hell do you mean they won't let you out of the house. Did you permit them to confiscate your wand? Do they know who you are?

I knew your summer accommodations were suboptimal, but I had no idea it was this bad. If you need rescuing, say so at once.

If I do not receive a reply to this letter, I will assume that you have been imprisoned by a pack of deranged muggles, and I will entreat the Department of Magical Law Enforcement to intervene accordingly. I do not know what sort of creature a Dudley is, but I assure you that scratches will be the least of its worries then.

Sincerely,

Draco L. Malfoy

Dear Potter,

It has been a week. I have not heard back from you. Are you dead? If not, indicate.

Perhaps you thought I was joking about the Ministry threat. I was not. I do not care one whit about your muggles and I will gladly bring the full might of magical law enforcement down upon them.

Sincerely,

Draco Malfoy

Dear Malfoy,

Thanks for the tip-off. Situation being handled. Harry's here now. ('Here' is the Burrow). Gonna stay with us for the rest of the summer I reckon. When we go back Mum wants to ask Dumbledore if we can file for partial custody. She's ripping mad because the twins and I stole Dad's flying car which he wasn't sposed to have in the first place, so I'm grounded until my wedding or something, but it was worth it.

Going to Diagon Alley for school supplies on the 17th. Hermione's gonna meet us there. You can come too if you like.

Fred & George say hello by the way. They came over while I was writing and poopy peepee big fat stinker BUTTS BUTTS BUTTS

Gotta go now.

Cheers,

Ron

FRED WAS HERE

GEORGE WAS ALSO HERE

Dear Weasley,

What?

Sincerely,

Draco Malfoy

Around ten o'clock, the midmorning sun cut through a bank of fog, and turned Diagon Alley into a landscape of aquatint. In the small cobbled space between shopfronts, gold-fringed tufts of mist floated here and there like living clouds, and wizards drifted through these in swells of colorful robes like a flock of birds of paradise. The rare glory of a warm day hung over the crowds, and tawny branches whirled and danced over the street, threatening in their flush the approach of fall. The stone storefronts, so old that they lilted against each other for strength, seemed to breathe with life.

Draco leaned against the wall of Gringotts and sipped tea from his carafe. He wore a new cloak of crushed green velvet over a suit, freshly tailored, with a golden pocket square. A fresh stack of galleons burned a hole in his pocket.

As the clock tower boomed ten, he checked his watch and lifted an eyebrow. If someone had stopped to look at him, they might have taken note of the exceptionally well-dressed and impatient twelve-year-old who appeared to be visiting Gringotts on his own.

“Draco! Draco, over here!”

Hermione stood atop the white flight of stairs to the bank, trailing a cumulonimbus of bushy hair. She raced down, taking the stairs two at a time, and he realized too late that she was not slowing down. He locked his knees just in time for her to launch off the last step.

“Oof.”

“Hello! How are you? It’s been ages! Were you waiting for us?”

“Hello, Granger,” he said, detaching her, and setting her straight on the pavement. “Nice to see you. You look well.”

It was true. She’d tanned several shades darker over the summer, and sunshine had laid caramel highlights in her hair. New freckles peppered her heart-shaped cheeks. But the biggest change was the glint of metal inside her mouth, and the way she smiled at him with her lips pressed firmly shut.

“What happened to your mouth?” he said, frowning.

“I got braces!” She peeled back her lips and set her jaw, revealing a grate of metal that ran like railroad tracks across both sets of teeth. “My parents say I have to keep them on for a year, and then I’ll have perfect teeth.”

“Are they painful?” He squinted at them.

“It hurts sometimes,” she admitted. “Especially when I got them tightened. And I have to wear these rubber bands to fix my overbite. But it’ll all be worth it, and I’m lucky I got them young. Some people have to wait until they’re teenagers.”

She smiled broadly, and even the metal bolts on her teeth couldn’t detract from the voltage of her grin. “Don’t they look perfectly horrid?”

He began to agree with her, but he’d made that mistake before, and saved himself at the last minute. “I hadn’t noticed,” he said loftily.

It was the right thing to say. Her smile widened.

“Hermione! Draco!”

Bounding up the crowded street came a veritable legion of redheads, all wearing the same scrappy robes and grin. Ron led them, followed by Fred, George, Percy, and a middle-aged man with Ron’s ears who must have been their father. Roped into the passel was a single dark-haired exception, hurrying alongside them, though his short legs had to step twice for each stride of Ron’s. His expression was of bemused bliss, as if he couldn’t believe his own luck.

“Harry! Ron!”

Hermione went flying at them, and battered them with hugs in turn. Fred and George swooped in and whisked her off the ground in a joint three-way embrace, eliciting a squeal of surprise, and then passed her off to Percy, who balked and gave her a crisp, firm handshake.

Then she pivoted to Ron's father, stuck out her hand, and announced, "Hello! I'm Hermione Granger. I'm Ron's friend. You must be his father, Mister Weasley. I've heard so many good things about you."

Mr. Weasley was a spindly, balding man in glasses, whose height was vast but disproportionate to his muscle mass. Somewhat flabbergasted by Hermione — as he should be, as anyone should be, really — he shook her hand. "Arthur Weasley, and the pleasure is mine, Miss Granger. Ron's gone on about you all summer."

"Dad," Ron groaned.

Draco snickered. Mr. Weasley turned to him, blinked, and extended his hand, too. "And you must be Draco Malfoy," he said, with a quick once-over of Draco's robes. "Ron's told me about you, as well. I hear you helped to save his life."

"Reports of my virtue have been greatly exaggerated," said Draco. Not wanting to be rude, he shook hands, repressing a small twinge of discomfort: his mother would be shocked to see him shaking hands with Arthur Weasley. His father — he couldn't even think.

"None of that. Ron has a great eye for friends. We owe you a great deal."

He shoved his hands deep in his pockets. "Weasley, you dog," he said coolly to Ron. "You didn't tell me we were friends. I would have made a card."

"Shuddup, you prat."

"Language, Ron!"

Another pair of Weasleys came bustling into view, one a pear-shaped matronly woman with a handbag, the other a skinny girl clutching her hand. She was spindly and tall for her age, like all the Weasleys, with a smear of peanut-butter freckles over her nose and eyes of shock-bright blue.

“Oi,” said Ron, eyeing him.

“Draco, this is my wife, Molly Weasley,” said Arthur, taking her under his arm. “And my daughter, Ginny.”

“Draco Malfoy, oh, hello,” blustered Mrs. Weasley, wringing Draco’s hand. “I’m sorry we’ve met this way, I look such a mess. I usually never leave the house dressed like this.”

“Not at all,” said Draco smoothly. “Your father wouldn’t be a Prewett, by chance?”

“He would! He would! Agrippus Prewett, of the Cheshire Prewetts,” she said proudly.

“And do the Prewetts still reside at Capesthorne?”

Her obvious pleasure at the name commingled with a touch of sadness. “Oh, my dear, not for some time, I’m afraid,” she said. “It was shuttered during the war, and then after the war, well, there was no one to care for it, and it couldn’t be kept up, so we passed it off to a cousin of some means. It’s been in their hands ever since.”

“I’m sorry to hear that,” he said politely, and he wasn’t lying; it was a tragedy for a Twenty-Eight family to lose its ancestral seat. He hadn’t known the Prewetts were extinct in the male line, either, but it sounded as if Molly were the only one left. “It was a great house.”

“Oh, yes, it was. Such a pretty place! I meant to take the children to see it, but they never seem to take an interest in family history.”

Fred stuck a finger in his open mouth. George mimed throttling himself. Percy hung on her every word.

“I find there is little like the majesty of an English country house,” said Draco, “to inspire an interest in one’s roots.”

George slumped against Fred, wracked by tremors of invisible vomit. Fred waved frantically for a medic.

“That’s perfectly right!” Molly’s eyes sparkled. She rounded on her children, a little wild-eyed, as if freshly conscious of their defects. “How’d you like to see where your grandfather lived?”

“I would!” Percy piped up.

“That’s the embarrassing part, you would, wouldn’t you, Perce,” Ron muttered. He glared at Draco. “Did you have to?”

“I don’t know what you mean,” he said, smirking.

“Yeah, sure. Joke’s on you, she’ll be plotting to have you betrothed to Ginny before the day’s out. C’mon, Harry, let’s go before she starts trying to rebuild the dynasty.”

“I think we should split up,” Arthur said, distracting his wife from her stratagems. “Percy, you needed a new quill, didn’t you? And new books for you and the twins… Ron, you can use the twins’ hand-me-downs. And Ginny, you need one of everything, since it’s your first year…”

Draco turned to the youngest Weasley. “You’re going up?” he said, surprised. She was so small. He was certain he hadn’t been that small, last year.

She stared at him, wide-eyed, and nodded. Her knuckles strained white in her mother’s grip.

“She’s shy around strangers,” Ron explained, tweaking Ginny’s ear. “Hasn’t said three words at a time since Harry moved in. Just ‘yes, Harry,’ and ‘no, Harry,’ and ‘where’s Harry?’ Honestly.”

“Not true,” she said stubbornly, though this did not exactly prove Ron wrong.

“Where did you board?” Draco asked Ginny, trying to be courteous. She shook her head.

Ron pinked. “Nowhere. Mum homeschooled us,” he said. He added, somewhat snidely: “I bet you boarded at Scrimble’s or Hickinbottom, didn’t you? You could afford it.”

“Actually, my mother tutored me,” he drawled. “She preferred to have me home.”

“Oh. Well, that’s all right, then,” said Ron, suddenly chipper again. “Nothing wrong with it, we’re all still at Hogwarts anyway, aren’t we?”

They separated. Percy and his mother went in search of a quill, while Arthur took Fred and George out for breakfast with their friend, Lee Jordan (a handsome, smiling boy with dreadlocks, who Draco remembered having an uproarious argument with Seamus Finnigan over something about beetles and stones.) Mrs. Weasley hurried Ginny to a secondhand robe shop (“I want to go with Harry,” the girl protested) and Arthur announced they would all meet at Flourish and Blotts at noon.

Then Harry suggested dessert for breakfast, which horrified Draco and thrilled Hermione, so the four of them went to Fortescue’s. Inside the sweet-shop it was cool and the air smelled sticky-sweet, like sugar cones. The flavors ranged from Vanilla to Foie Gras, and he made a mental note to tell Dobby. (On second thought, perhaps he shouldn’t; the elf didn’t need the inspiration.) Harry bought two strawberry-and-peanut-butter cones for himself and Ron, and a mint-chocolate chip for Hermione, and then insisted on getting one for Draco, though he maintained that the whole affair was ill-mannered. More as a concession to Harry than anything, he tried a scoop of green tea in a cup, and they wandered up the alley, eating their sugar for breakfast.

In front of Quality Quidditch Supplies, a crowd had gathered for the unveiling of the Nimbus 2002, and Ron spent some time with his cheek plastered mournfully to the glass.

“A two-thousand series… just imagine…”

“At least you have a broomstick,” sighed Harry.

“You’ll need one this year,” Draco remarked. “Unless you intend to fly a school broom for quidditch, which is suicide.”

“Fred and George fly school brooms,” Ron objected. “So does half the Gryffindor team.”

“Yes, and have you noticed the Gryffindor team gets thrashed every time we play Slytherin?”

“I hope you’re wrong,” Harry said glumly, “because I haven’t got one.”

Draco gave Harry an odd look. “Why don’t you just buy one?”

“What do you mean?” said Harry.

“You’ve got full access to your inheritance, haven’t you? It’s not tied up with an executor?” He nodded at the Nimbus 2002. “Go in there and get one.”

Harry elbowed Draco and nodded at Ron. The ginger had stepped apart from the other three, and was silently walking the rack of secondhand Cleansweeps, his hands deep in his pockets.

“It’d be stupid anyway,” said Harry loudly, “buying a broomstick before I’m on the team.”

They passed Percy and Mr. Weasley outside a junk shop, perusing shelves laden with rusted cauldrons, split-feather quills, and splintering brooms. Percy was reading a biography of Leonard Spencer-Moon, who, if Draco recalled, had been in Slytherin the same year as his grandfather. He pointed out the odd choice of subject to Ron.

“Oh, that’s Perce for you,” he grumbled. “He’s been plotting to get Prefect since first year. He wants to be Minister one day.”

Draco hummed in interest. “Which party?” he inquired, though he had a guess.

“Any party that’ll have him. But Mum and Dad are Pops, and he couldn’t bear to disappoint them, so he’ll probably stick to the left.”

Hermione and Harry exchanged a look that said: Shall you ask, or shall I?

“What’s a Pop?” said Harry.

And Draco and Ron exchanged a look that said: Shall you explain, or shall I?

“Wizard politics,” said Ron, relieving Draco of the burden. “‘Pop’ stands for the Populares Party, they’re the left-wing of the Wizengamot. Main rival on the right is the Ops, short for Optimates. Course, there’s all sorts of smaller parties mixed in, Greens and Liblabs and Cavs and what-have you, but those are the main coalitions.” He gestured to Draco. “His dad was huge in the Cavaliers, for example. My dad came home complaining about him all the time.”

“My Uncle Vernon’s a Tory,” said Harry. “He complains about the government giving all his money to poor people. Are the Cavs sort of like that?”

Draco did not want his father lumped into any group of which Vernon Dursley was a part. “It doesn’t map to muggle politics,” he said sulkily. “It’s a different thing.”

In Gambol and Japes' Wizarding Joke Shop, they met Fred, George, and Lee Jordan. Neither Draco nor Hermione had much interest in that store, so they cut out early for Flourish and Blott's, but were stymied at the door by a large crowd of wizards queuing for autographs with Gilderoy Lockhart.

Across from Flourish and Blott's, the buildings parted, and a dark, winnowing side-street branched off from Diagon Alley proper. Low-guttering candles lit the uneven black cobble, and shabby-looking wizards with hoods drawn high scurried in and out, darting suspicious glances over their shoulder. A gnarled wooden archway over the sidestreet proclaimed its name.

Draco brightened. "Hey, Granger," he said, tugging her away from the bookstore. "You ever been to Knockturn Alley?"

"No, what's that?"

"Diagon Alley's better-bred cousin. Put your hood up, you don't want too much attention down here."

He led her under the archway and they slipped into the shade. Immediately, the light dimmed, and the fog seemed to thicken. The largest shop, Borgin and Burkes, had a great glass storefront displaying the skeleton of some winged reptile, and opposite that, Noggin and Bonce sported a rich collection of shrunken heads, dangling from cords in a smoky window display. Two doors down, a rat the size of a dog shrieked and rattled the bars of its cage, advertising the wares of Mtaw's Menagerie. Two shabby-looking wizards watched them from the shadow of a doorway as they walked by. A vendor selling poisonous candles crooned to them, and Draco put his arm around Hermione, hurrying her past.

"This is all prohibited," Hermione hissed, as they passed another vendor selling what appeared to be fried troll fingers. "I've counted seven different kinds of contraband in three storefronts, and I'm pretty sure that's an endangered species…"

“I know! Isn’t it great?”

“No!” She was shrill. “The Ministry ought to close down everyone here!”

“Ah, they can’t do that. Then where’d they buy all their contraband? You’ll like it when you see the really fun stuff. Come on.”

He led her further, and the fog sealed behind them, blotting out the light from Diagon Alley. In the window of a jeweler’s store, Hermione stopped to look at a magnificent choker of silver and rubies, sparkling on a black pillow. A matching tiara glittered on the plinth above it.

“You don’t want that,” Draco assured her. “See the card?” It read: CURSED! Do not touch. SOLD TOGETHER – ₲10,000.

“Why would anyone buy jewelry that’s cursed?”

“Not to wear it, obviously,” he said. “You’d buy it for someone you really hate.”

“I don’t think I could ever hate anybody that much,” she said, balking at the price.

“I don’t know,” he lied, spinning his signet ring on his third finger. It fit a little better than it had last year, but it still slipped around fairly often. “Perhaps I can. I wouldn’t waste money on a necklace, though, not if I’ve got a perfectly good wand and a right hand to use it with.”

“You wouldn’t do anything awful, though, would you?” she insisted, frowning at him.

“I don’t know. It depends on what they did. Do you have a point? … Oh, look!” He pointed. “Mulpepper’s Apothecary! Snape told me they sell the only hagraven claws you can find in Britain...”

“Draco!” He’d been tugging rather insistently on her arm, but at her cry, he let go. “What are we doing here?” she hissed.

“Just looking,” he said, “unless you see something you want. Isn’t it cool?”

“No! It’s horrible!” She wrapped her arms around herself and cast a fretful look over her shoulders. “All of this is Dark magic.”

“Oh, c’mon, not all of it. Most of this stuff isn’t even magic, it’s just bits and bobs—”

“Which can be used for Dark magic.”

“So what? That doesn’t make it Dark. And even if it does, you have to admit it’s interesting.”

She hugged herself tighter. “Professor McGonagall says Dark magic is a dangerous path,” she whispered.

“And McGonagall’s not a Dark witch, so what would she know about it?” he said, annoyed. “My family’s been patronizing Knockturn Alley ever since it opened, and I’m not a Dark wizard.”

Hermione opened her mouth to object, but the conversation had started to annoy him, and he decided to move on. “Look, here’s something normal,” he said patiently, drawing her across the street. “It’s a pub. Nothing Dark about a pub, is there, Granger? Unless you count the ales.”

Her argument deflated, she made an exasperated sound in the back of her throat, which might have been a thwarted laugh. “That was terrible.”

“No worse than Weasley, I’m sure.”

Beside the door of the White Wyvern, the brick was plastered with posters, advertisements, and community announcements; one baleful flier pleaded for word of a lost cat. The largest poster by far was a black-and-white portrait of an aged, square-faced man in a suit, whose queerly colored eyes stared so intensely at the viewer they appeared to lift their sockets out of his face. Streaks of gray veined his dark, oily hair, which coiled in spirals on his shoulders, and a thick beard swathed his mouth and jaw in smoky curls. The burly mantle of his brow gave him a haunted, hooded expression.

Above his head, it read in big, square lettering: RUNCORN FOR ALL!

Hermione saw him reading it. “Who’s that?” she said.

“Albert Runcorn,” said Draco. “Leader of the Opposition, in the Wizengamot. Interesting, I didn’t think he’d run this year.”

“For the Minister of Magic, you mean?”

“Yeah. He’s this sort of political darling for the Ops, you see. Came up through the Auror program, Director of Magical Law Enforcement, then elected to the Wizengamot, chaired Economic Affairs for three terms, and he’s still pretty young — relatively speaking. Everyone thought he’d try for Minister next, but they assumed he’d wait for Fudge to serve a third term.”

“Because he likes Fudge?”

“Merlin, no. He hates him. But a Minister can’t serve more than three terms, and the sitting Minister usually wins reelection. So it would’ve been typical to wait.”

“Your prime minister has term limits?”

“Of course he does. You don’t want some dopey codger hoarding the seat for twenty years, do you?”

The door to the White Wyvern swung open, and a pair of wizards stepped out. The first was a wiry boy with a mop of mousy brown hair, just shorter than Draco, and dull, smoky blue eyes. The second was a short, pug-nosed girl with greasy black hair pulled into scalp-straining pigtails. They both pulled up short at the sight of him.

“Why, hello,” purred Theodore Nott.

Draco jerked his chin, a cross between a greeting and a warning-off gesture. “Nott.”

“Malfoy.” Theodore hopped down from the stoop, robes swirling. He had a lazy, oily kind of grace; he moved like his bones were made of something viscous and syrupy. “Long time, no see.”

“Almost a year, isn’t it,” Draco agreed.

“I confess I felt somewhat abandoned. I thought we were going to be the best of chums at school.” He polished his fingernails on his robe and sighed, mournful.

“Yes, I wonder why that didn’t happen.”

“I sincerely do. You could have visited us, you know,” said Theodore, verging closer to sincerity. “I mean, some people would raise a fuss, but who cares? There’s not a law against sitting at other House tables.”

“I didn’t see you at mine, either.”

“You can’t expect me to sit with Gryffindors, come on, now.”

The pug-nosed girl, having heretofore held her tongue, broke out in a tinselly soprano. “What, that’s him?” she demanded, running her eyes up and down the length of him in obvious disgruntlement. “That’s Draco Malfoy? Lucius Malfoy’s son?”

“Told you I knew him, didn’t I?”

“But he can’t possibly be a Gryffindor,” said the girl shrilly. “His family’s been in Slytherin for centuries.”

“Sorry,” said Draco icily. “I wouldn’t interrupt, but my ears are burning, and I don’t know who you are.”

The girl stuck up her chin and gave him a short, formal curtsy. He blinked. That sort of gesture wasn’t typical anywhere outside a formal meeting between houses in the Sacred Twenty-Eight, and even then, it was a decidedly old-school move. Draco’s own mother didn’t make him bow to anyone except at balls and business meetings, and Narcissa Malfoy was almost as old-school as it went.

“I’m Pansy Parkinson,” said the girl. That made sense, now that he’d heard it: Parkinson was one of the Twenty-Eight, though not quite as grand as the Malfoys or the Blacks. He could see why she’d opt for the more formal play to assert herself. “My mum heard the Malfoys had a son at Hogwarts this year, and wanted me to find you, so I could deliver our family’s regards.” She stepped closer and lowered her voice. “Tell me honestly. Are you really in Gryffindor? Or is Teddy playing a joke on me?”

Draco took a bracing breath. “No,” he said. “He’s telling the truth.”

“Oh!” She clearly didn’t know what to do with this. “Oh, that’s… that’s… I mean, I don’t want to be insulting, but…”

“But you’ll soldier on, anyway,” said Theodore amusedly.

“But that’s simply silly!” She rounded on Theodore, as if he bore full responsibility for the misfortune. “You should be with your own kind —”

“And what’s ‘his own kind’?” said Hermione Granger, in tones that could have started an ice age.

Pansy paused, and her eyes did a quick elevator trip down-and-up. They settled on Hermione’s teeth. She smirked.

“Well, for starters—”

“I don’t believe we’ve had the pleasure,” Theodore interrupted, pushing off the wall. “Draco, be a lamb and introduce us.”

Draco, who would rather have gnawed glass than be referred to as a ‘lamb’ ever again, shot him a dark look. “This exceptionally charming individual is Theodore Nott,” he said. “Nott, Hermione Granger.”

Theodore held out his hand. Hermione grasped it, and quicker than she could withdraw, he darted it to his lips and kissed the air above her knuckles.

“Enchenté.”

“Oh,” she said, looking rather less charmed than alarmed. “I didn’t think you were French. Your accent—”

“He’s not,” Draco said shortly.

He chuckled airily. “It’s true. I’m a sham. I just like the gesture, I think it’s dashing.”

“I see. Does it impress a lot of people?”

“Enough for me to keep doing it. Why? Did it work?”

“I don’t know if ‘impressed’ is the word I would use,” she said doubtfully, rubbing her hand. Draco smirked.

“You never do that to me,” muttered Pansy, elbowing him.

“And you never give me those kinds of curtsies. One day, Pans, you will be nice to me, and you will learn on that day how perfectly lovely I can be.”

“When kelpies fly.”

“Stranger things. Let me see: Granger, Granger, Granger. Why do I remember that? Do you know the Dagworth-Grangers?”

“No, I don’t think so,” said Hermione.

“No? Worth a shot.” He snapped his fingers. “I know. You were first-ranked in Transfiguration last year.”

Any other student might have taken this compliment with blushing and denials, but not Hermione. She replied, with an astounding measure of indignation: “Not just Transfiguration.”

“A thousand pardons,” he said, with an amused glance at Draco. Pansy scoffed.

“But yes, that was me. I’m surprised you remember.”

“I remember because I wanted to kill you,” he said casually. Draco startled. “I worked myself to the bone for that class, and I thought I was a shoo-in for top marks. Then I see the posting, and who is it instead, but this jammy kid, Granger, who nobody in my circle seems to know, with a name such that I can’t even tell if it’s a boy or girl.”

“I’m very sorry to have disappointed you.”

“Don’t be. McGonagall showed me your paper. You’re either brilliant, or you’re the best cheater I’ve ever met, and either way, I’d like to get to know you.” He spoke with such arch tones it made it almost impossible to tell his sincerity from sarcasm. “Friends like you tend to come in handy.”

Hermione gave a small, polite smile. Draco could tell she’d loathed the reference to cheating; there was a twitch in her cheek. “In that case,” she said, “you might come sit with me and Draco, sometime. Unless it’s really too hard for you — being around all those Gryffindors.”

Draco snickered. Theodore, however, didn’t take offense, but sighed and shook his head ruefully. “Just my luck,” he says. “Why are the interesting ones never respectable? Oh, well. Come along, Pans. I must soothe my shame by spending money.”

He shook Hermione's hand — properly, this time — and Draco's. As they made to leave, he noticed the Runcorn poster. "See that, did you?" he asked Draco. "My dad's giving a small fortune to his campaign. You and your mother might consider doing the same, if you're interested in stepping back into politics."

"I appreciate the advice, but my mother and I will choose our own investments."

He shrugged. "Suit yourself," he said, and both he and his pigtailed sidekick strode off into the gloom.

Once they were out of earshot, Hermione said, "I hope you won't be cross with me for saying so, but if that's who you'd have ended up like, it's lucky for you that you didn't end up in Slytherin."

"Shows what you know," he said grimly. "That's about as nice as it gets."

Draco very nearly did not make it to his second year at Hogwarts. After delays on the train from Wiltshire to London, he scrambled onto the Hogwarts Express just as the engine groaned to life, and were it not for the quick eye and quicker hands of George Weasley, he might have toppled out of the moving car.

"There you are, mate," said George kindly. "We were worrying about you."

"Ta," he said brusquely, straightening his tie. "Got held up. Where's Fred?"

The twin's erstwhile partner was nowhere to be seen.

"Locking Crabbe in the loo, I think," he said easily, checking his watch. "Should be back soon. Thought we were joined at the hip, didja?"

“You do everything together.”

“Life’s easier with four hands instead of two,” he said, shrugging. “But a little time apart does Freddie and me some good, now and then. Lets me hear myself think. Give me that trunk, Blondie, it’s still bigger than you are.”

He hauled open the nearest compartment door and vaulted Draco’s trunk into the luggage rack. “Oi, Perce, Gin. Look who made it.”

“Why, it’s about time,” said Percy. “We were quite worried when you didn’t show on the platform. Weren’t we, Ginevra?”

Ginny glanced up through her hair. She had changed into her robes, which were too big for her, being obviously second-hand; she had rolled them up at the cuffs. “Hullo, Malfoy,” she said. He nodded.

“I’m giving Ginevra some advice for her first year,” said Percy, reclining in his seat with the poise of a French king. “As I was saying, you’ll want to focus on Potions and Transfiguration. Those are the respectable subjects, and they’re the hardest to make the N.E.W.T. History of Magic is essential, but your grade in it is not; the worst is Herbology, and second to it, Charms…”

The train went over a loud portion of track that blissfully obscured whatever Percy had to say. Draco eyed the door. George, who was leaning on it, grinned at him.

“Treat your head of house as your superior officer, not your parent. You’ll spend your second year getting rid of all the friends you made in the first, so don’t worry about socializing in the first year, just focus on your studies. But if you do make friends, try to associate with the right kinds of family — you know, people with reputations.”

It was so similar to Narcissa's advice that Draco could have laughed. He pressed his lips together and looked out the window.

By and by, Percy broke off to use the loo, with a promise to continue upon his return. In the ensuing silence, all three of the remaining inhabitants took a moment to savor it.

“Malfoy?” said Ginny, quietly.

“Weasley?”

“Did you ask for Slytherin?” She darted her eyes at him, then away. “When you were Sorted?”

He set his jaw. “Is there a reason you’d like to know?”

“Not in particular,” she said, and fell silent.

It wasn’t hard to see that she was lying, or why.

“Yes,” he said, after a moment. “I asked for Slytherin.”

“Did it… did it make any difference, do you think?”

“Does it look like it made a difference?”

“But did you really — I mean, when you asked, did you actually say —”

“Gin,” broke in George, in a kind voice. “You know nobody will think less of you—”

“She was talking to me, Weasley,” Draco interrupted coolly. George lifted his hands. “As for you, Weasley — She-Weasley, that is — yes, I asked, and yes, I was clear about it. But I was a special case. Your family is up six on the House front. You’ll be fine.”

“But everyone thought you’d be in Slytherin, and you—”

“Believe me when I say our situations are not alike,” he said. “And, in the unlikely event that they are, and you do end up — it’s Slytherin you’re worried about, I’m assuming? Yes? — if you do end up there, you'll find yourself in the company of people with a great deal more dignity and sense than those you've been brought up with. If I were you, I'd enjoy it." He paused. "And the green will go with your hair. If you've seen your brothers' quidditch uniforms, I really needn't say more. It should be illegal for gingers to wear red."

She cracked a grin.

"Do you enjoy it?" she asked curiously.

"Enjoy what?"

"Your House."

Before he submitted to the harrowing ordeal of answering that question, Percy returned. It was the only combination of circumstances which could have possibly made this cause for relief.

"Have you seen today's Prophet?" he exclaimed, brandishing the aforementioned article. "The Magical Security Act is moving to debate in October. Weeks ahead of schedule!"

George yawned. "My God, what have they done," he said. "Can I get the Sports section, Perce?"

"And let me have it, after you," said Ginny.

But Draco paid attention to the prefect, because for once, he'd said something of interest. "Really? Fudge moved it up?"

Percy, obviously grateful to have someone upon whom to impress the significance of his knowledge, showed him the headline. It bore a picture of Fudge (looking rather gloomy, Draco thought) speaking from behind a podium, while flashbulbs fired madly in his face. The headline read: FUDGE FREES THE DOCKET: LANDMARK LEGISLATION GOING TO VOTE BEFORE WINTER RECESS.

"Cannons are down two in the prelims," said George.

Ginny said, “Well, what can you expect, their draft was pish.”

Draco flipped a page. “Bet he wants to get it out before the election, then.”

“Do you think Fudge is that worried?” said Percy with interest. “I wouldn’t be.”

“What’s this that Fudge is doing?” said George. “Outlawing beards longer than eight inches? Bureaucratizing the trolls?”

“The Magical Securities Act is seminal, ” said Percy, in scandalized tones. “It would imbue the Department of Magical Law Enforcement with legislatively vested executive authority—”

“This is no joking matter! It would let them put the Trace on people convicted of a crime.”

“Charged,” Draco corrected, absently.

“It’d be a great thing for the Ministry. Dad thinks it’s not a half-bad idea, since it’d let Bones finally nail a whole lot of former Death Eaters. He thinks loads of them are still up to anti-muggle activity, we just can’t catch them… No offense, Malfoy," he added thoughtfully.

Draco looked up indignantly. “None was being taken, until that.”

Percy made an apologetic face, which happened to be congruent to a face of indigestion. At that point, Draco decided it was time to find a compartment with a better Weasley-to-non-Weasley ratio, and took his leave.

The second years rode up to the castle in horseless carriages. It was a calm, clear night, and the sky over the Great Hall glistened with the silver pepper of stars. The Sorting Hat sang a song about unity, which Draco thought was a bit rich for an object whose purpose was to Sort people, and then the ceremony began. His ears pricked up at the name “Lovegood,” though he didn’t remember why until Dean Thomas murmured, “Isn’t that the quack who runs The Quibbler? ”

The young Lovegood, a tiny blonde girl in a pillbox hat bedazzled to resemble a bumblebee (which she removed at McGonagall’s request), took the stool with an expression of perfect serenity. She sat there for ten subsequent minutes while the Hat’s silence became more and more tense, her legs kicking idly in the air, until finally it said, in a very unhappy tone: “Well then — I suppose — Ravenclaw,” and she skipped off to cheers that were more relieved than jubilant.

“Longest sort I’ve ever seen,” shouted Oliver Wood, applauding. “I should’ve timed it. I think she beat Katie’s record.”

“Hope nobody else tries, I’m starving,” said Ron.

A few more first years came and went, and then McGonagall called, “PARKINSON, PANSY!” and a familiar pug nose pressed its way out of the line. She stomped up to the stool like it was the electric chair and sat down, her jaw jutting out, arms folded.

The Hat never even touched her perfect pigtails.

“I can’t say I’m surprised,” murmured Hermione, as Pansy hurried (“sprinted” was a better word) to the Slytherin table. Draco saw Theodore Nott stand up and start to say something, laughingly, but he was interrupted by Pansy rocketing into his stomach with such force that he doubled over. Her arms went around his waist, and the Slytherin crowd swallowed them in cheers.

There were only three students left when McGonagall cried: “WEASLEY, GINEVRA.”

The whole redheaded clan woke up and stood at alert. Ginny tugged her skirt straight, squared her shoulders, and hopped onto the stage with a passable impression of someone not about to feint in fright.

“Last again,” said Percy anxiously. “We’re always next to last, every year. Why does it have to be alphabetical?”

“Attagirl, Ginny!” Fred shouted, and the whole Great Hall turned momentarily to scowl at him. “Attagirl! WHOO!”

Ginny shot him a quavering smile.

The Sorting Hat dropped neatly onto her head. She swallowed and stared resolutely at the opposite wall.

“GRYFFINDOR!”

It was like someone had been shot. Fred and George both leapt onto the table, seemingly buoyed by the sheer force of the air being expelled from their lungs. Ron roared his approval directly into Draco’s ear. Percy, overwhelmed by emotion, stood up and shouted: “THAT’S RIGHT!” after which he immediately blushed, shuddered, and sat back down again. Harry and Hermione leapt up and applauded vigorously, while the violent desiccation of Gryffindor’s meager supply of dignity continued all around them.

Ginny, grinning like mad, ripped the hat off her own head, tossed it to McGonagall, and flew to the Gryffindor table. It surged forth to receive her. Fred vaulted the table like a sprinter’s hurdle, snatched her up, and mounted her swiftly on his shoulders, and so situated, he paraded her down the table. It took McGonagall five minutes of persistent bellowing to calm them down.

“SILENCE! SILENCE! Your enthusiasm for Miss Weasley is admirable, but—”

She could not finish, because at the words “Miss Weasley,” George had banged his cup on the table and roared: “MISS WEASLEY!” and the table erupted again.

Miraculously, Draco caught Ginny’s eye. He rolled his eyes and mouthed, Told you.

She saw, and beamed. Then she dismounted her brother and shoved her way in at the table, wedging herself beside Draco.

“You were right,” she shouted.

“Could do without the tone of surprise, She-Weasley. Welcome, I suppose.”

“Thank you!” she said, and then — Draco gave a cry of horror — she flung one arm around his shoulder and squeezed. Then, unconscious or uncaring of his distress, she skipped off to join the other first years at the end of the table.

“What did you say to her?” Hermione asked, still clapping.

“That the Hat tries to give you what you want. If you ask.”

“Is that true?” she said. “I never thought so.”

He watched Ginny flop down beside a mousy lad named Creevey and pump his hand.

“Why not? It gave you what you wanted,” he said, doing his best not to sound sour.

“Yes, but not you,” she said. “And I mean, imagine what would’ve happened if you’d gotten what you wanted.”

He watched Theodore Nott and Vincent Crabbe toast Pansy with goblets of pumpkin juice. The Slytherins were talking boisterously among themselves, impervious to the resentment of those around them, totally insulated by their own self-regard.

“Yes,” he said bitterly. “I suppose the world would end.”

Hermione was quiet for a moment.

“I meant me,” she said, belatedly. “That we wouldn’t have been friends. That’s what I meant.”

“You wouldn’t have known me. There’d be nothing to miss.”

“That’s not true.”

“Oh, isn’t it?”

“No, it’s not.” She pointed at the Slytherin table with her chin. “You don’t know them, and you miss them like mad.”

Welcome to Year Two!

Chapter 10: Tryouts

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

The first day of classes dawned dull and overcast. Draco woke far before any reasonable hour because of Ron's snoring, and resigning himself to the year ahead, he dressed in the cold, gray light of dawn, and went down to the Great Hall early. The only others at the table were some older girls who went jogging in the mornings, and they were sipping coffee together at the end of the table. He put on his headphones and thumbed the side of his walkman, injecting his breakfast with an infusion of melancholy guitar, and made himself a pot of tea, stewed loose-leaf, the way Dobby would have.

Sometimes, when this place gets kind of empty

Sound of their breath fades with the light

A pair of first years came skidding into the Great Hall, laughing obnoxiously at nothing, their cheeks flushed from running. Draco recognized one of them as a Gryffindor from last night, Colin Creevey: a small boy with a cherubic face, whose head rioted with yellow curls, and whose eyes were shiny, blue, and perfectly enormous. The other was a tall Hufflepuff with a narrow, homely face and an aquiline nose, dark-haired, and missing a front tooth.

Because Draco was one of the few at the Gryffindor table, the first years ambled towards him. He dropped his head and hoped they would mind their own business.

"All right, there!"

No such luck.

“I’m Colin! Colin Creevey! Gryffindor!” He climbed into the seat next to Draco’s. “Is this seat taken?”

Draco tipped his head at it, in a sort of ‘as you will’ gesture, and grunted.

“Thanks! Justin, you can sit down, too. This is Justin Finch-Fletchley. We met on the stairs. He got lost when the staircase moved and I found him and then we raced here. Isn’t this castle enormous? I’ve never seen anything this big in my life! I’m from Leeds, where are you from? I’m the first wizard in the family. My dad’s a milkman. Can I take your picture?”

A bulb exploded without warning in Draco’s face. He threw up his hand.

“Aw but please can I take your picture? I’m trying to take a picture of every Gryffindor and also every person I meet and everything I see so I can show my parents when they go home. They still don’t believe it’s actually magic, they think it’s a school for magicians, like people who play pretend? So I’m going to prove it to them. I want to be a photographer when I grow up, if I’m not a wizard that is, I mean being a wizard is my first choice but if I can’t hack it here my dad says it’s always good to have a day job. What do your parents do? Do you think it’s reasonable to plan on being a wizard? Also, where does the food come from during meals? Is it magic? It scared the living heck out of me when it appeared last night, and I’d had a lot of heck scared out of me already by the rest of it, the train and the boats and the cave and the big guy with the lantern, isn’t he huge? Justin, did you see him? Isn’t he huge?”

Justin had seen him, and thought he was huge.

“And now I have to find my way to Herbology in the greenhouses and I don’t know where the heck that is, Professor McGonagall told us to ask a prefect but I can’t find any and they didn’t give us a map which would be pretty useful.”

“No map? Like anywhere? Like they didn’t make a map when they built it or they did but they lost it and didn’t make another one? Or—”

“Hogwarts is unplottable. The structures change. The map would need to move.”

“Oh okay. But hang on a minute. Why can’t you guys make moving maps? Is that like a rule, no moving maps? Are there other rules? Oh my gosh.”

“No,” Draco said, rubbing his temple. “You’d only have to explore enough of the castle that you could plot it. And you’d have to understand how the castle moves. Which is complicated.” At the risk of sounding like Hermione, he refrained from citing Hogwarts: A History, though the temptation lingered.

“Oh that makes sense. Thank you. Wait but also. Um, Peeves said that sometimes they feed first years to the Giant Squid if they don’t get to class on time? And um that was very scary but Percy said he was lying, was he lying?”

“No, that’s true,” Draco said immediately.

“What. Wait no really? Like are you being serious? You’re not being serious. Okay. Wait but are you being serious, though.”

The five stages of grief passed briskly over Colin’s face.

“Justin,” he said gravely, “we’ve got to go.”

“Okay,” said Justin simply, and he left in the middle of a perfectly good sausage.

Draco made a mental note to let Harry and Ron in on the joke, and put his headphones back on.

The Defense Against the Dark Arts classroom was an ample, vaulted chamber with wide windows and lots of sunlight. Blackboards still untouched from the long summer sat at the front of the room, and the excited burble of the first day of classes propelled students to their seats with a vigor that would not soon reappear. Draco, who was determined to beat Hermione in D.A.D.A. this year, found a seat near the front of the desk and took out a new dragonhide notebook with cream-colored pages, wet an eagle-feather quill, and stacked the textbooks neatly to his left. He was still waiting when most of the other Gryffindors came in.

The professor emerged from his office: a tall, broad-shouldered man with a straw-colored coif. He smiled, and crow's feet around his eyes gave his face a kindly affect, as did the twinkling green eyes that crowned his sculpted cheekbones. A long, slender scar ran from his right cheek to his scalp.

Hermione cleared her throat and tucked her hair behind her ear. Draco shot her a suspicious look.

"That's Sturgis Pod-more," whispered Susan Bones. "He was in the Order of the Phoenix. He got the Order of Merlin for saving a town of muggles from Death Eaters in Surrey. I heard—"

But they never learned what it was Susan heard, because Hermione shushed her.

"Good morning," the professor said. "I don't think you know who I am. That's fair enough, you didn't have me last year. I'm Sturgis Podmore — that's S-T-U-R-G-I-S, and yes, my mother hated me. You can call me Professor Podmore, or Professor Sturgis, or just Sturgis, to be honest, I won't stand on ceremony." He risked a grin, looking faintly nervous. A few students tittered politely, unsure if they were supposed to laugh. "I hope to learn all your names, eventually. I understand that not all of you may be fans of this class, and that's fair enough; I didn't give one hoot for it, when I was your age, personally speaking. I'd much rather have spent all my time in Charms. So I don't expect you to come hanging on my every word, but so long as you're here, awake, and on time, I promise not to give you — well, too much trouble."

He grinned, and his teeth glinted. Susan Bones leaned over and whispered something to Hermione, who nodded.

"Anyway. I'm sorry I didn't have you last year. So if I retread any of that material, or if we jump too far ahead, you lot just let me know. There's no shame in asking to slow down, right? Good!" He rubbed his hands. "I see that the curriculum for first-through-third years focuses on Dark Creatures, instead of wizard-to-wizard combat. I think we'll start with something small, since it's the first day… and well, a house-elf is quite small, isn't it?"

Draco frowned. None of the Gryffindors or Hufflepuffs showed any sign of alarm.

The professor pointed his wand at the blackboard. A chalk sketch of a house-elf appeared, spread-eagle.

"Elvus farfadet," said Podmore, and a transcription of his words appeared on the board as he spoke. "The common house-elf. Distant cousins of the erkling, house-elves are by far the most common of the elvish species. They range between two to three feet tall, and can be identified by their oversized heads and bat-like ears — see right there, and there."

He waved his wand again, and the sketch revised itself to show the house-elf's back. "Breeding — was that a giggle, you there? In the back? I thought not — breeding tends to be rare for house-elves, as most are born sterile. Difficulties with conception, as well as other various health problems, come from centuries of selective breeding performed by wizards in order to produce a perfect… magical… slave."

Hermione gave a small gasp. Draco slumped in his chair, quill abandoned, arms tightly crossed.

“Not so funny, is it?” said Podmore crisply. “No. House-elves are conceived under the influence of powerful Dark Magic, and during their gestation period, several wards are laid on the dam to bind her offspring, inviolably, to whatever wizard casted them. When the elf is born, the wizard, usually a professional breeder, will then sell the house-elf into the keeping of its eventual master, and transfer ‘ownership’ by transferring the signature on these wards.

“A house-elf must obey any commands given to it by its masters. If they refuse, their wards punish them by forcing them to inflict grievous self-harm. If a house-elf’s master dies, ownership can be bequeathed legally to an heir of their choosing, or it will pass generally into the master’s family. If none of the wizard’s family survive them, the house-elf becomes part of the estate, and the Ministry deals with it as it would any other… material asset.”

Hermione’s hand shot into the air. Podmore nodded at her.

“How do you free them?” she demanded.

He smiled at her. “What a good question,” he said. “House-elves can be freed at their master’s will. It can take the form of a gift, or a ceremony, or some acknowledgement that the house-elf is a Being, unto itself. Clothes are a good example, but anything could work. You could use a scrap of paper with its name on it, and that’d be enough, if the master assents.”

Her hand went right back up. He waved to continue.

“But what if the master doesn’t want to let them go? How do you free them then?”

His smile lost some of its luster. “You don’t,” he said. “In Britain, it’s illegal to free someone else’s house-elf. It’s considered theft.”

“But they’re enslaved!”

“Yes, they are.”

“And — and that’s all right? Wizards just do that? Nobody stops them?”

Draco sank lower in his chair, scowling.

“I understand your distress, Miss…?”

“Hermione Granger, sir.”

“Miss Granger. Thank you. To frame the question, house-elves are not terribly common. Because of the difficulty in breeding them, they tend to be very expensive, and their population has been declining since the nineteenth century.”

“That doesn’t explain why nobody’s done anything about it,” she said, tone sharp. “Just because there’s not a lot of them—”

“Quite right you are, Miss Granger. And to your question, I think that the Ministry’s position — and I’m entirely speculating, so forgive me — but I believe the Ministry’s position is that if it waits about, say, a hundred years, the last house-elves will die out, and the problem will solve itself.”

Several hands flew up now, including Hermione’s. Podmore called on Susan Bones.

“How many of them are there now?”

“Worldwide? Ten, twenty thousand, I suppose. They’re native to Europe, although some of them were exported to the United States. Yes?”

It was Hermione again. “Is anyone trying to free them?” she snapped. “Have these people been prosecuted at all? Is the production of house-elves even regulated? Or is the whole world all right with a race of creatures that exist to be abused?”

Draco finally couldn’t stand it. He threw up his hand.

“Yes, Mister…?”

“You haven’t given us the whole picture, though,” he argued. “You make it sound like house-elves are miserable.”

Podmore blinked, leaning against his desk. “Do I?” he said. “I don’t think I’ve used the word ‘miserable’ once. Perhaps there’s something about a lifetime of chattel slavery that… implies a certain degree of misery.”

Draco bristled. “Yeah, but have you ever talked to one?” he accused. “They love being servants. They’re delighted. They adore their — the people they work for. They feel like part of the family.”

Hermione scoffed.

“And,” he continued, louder, “most of them don’t want to be freed.”

A rustling of uncomfortable snickers began at the back of the classroom.

Podmore was implacable. “Do you think so?” he inquired, rolling his wand between his fingers.

“I know so. Ask one, if you don’t believe me, Hogwarts has loads of them in the kitchens.”

Hermione’s head whipped around.

“I’m not saying it’s this great thing,” Draco added, uncomfortably, as the whispers intensified. “I wouldn’t… prefer they exist. But they do, and people have them, and most of them aren’t unhappy. And there’s a lot of complicated emotions involved. It’s not black-and-white. Especially if they’ve been with a family for generations, if they’ve watched children grow up—”

“Young man—”

“I’m just saying, it’s silly to be teaching this in Defense Against the Dark Arts,” he said, sweeping his arm angrily around the classroom, “as if it’s Dark magic to own a house-elf. It’s not!”

Sturgis Podmore waited for him to finish. The whispers had reached an intolerable volume, almost a roar. Hermione was staring at him, her shock tinged with horror.

Podmore raised his hand, silencing them.

“Thank you,” he told Draco simply. “I appreciate you sharing your opinion with the class.”

Then he announced, “Page two hundred and seven, everyone. I’d like a volunteer to read…”

When it ended, Draco was the first one out of the room. He shoved through the door and surged down the hallway without waiting for the others, even Hermione.

He was halfway down the staircase before anyone caught up to him. “Malfoy! Malfoy, wait!”

“Leave me alone.”

“I need to talk to you! P-P-P-Please slow down! I can’t — hff, hff — run that fast!”

He paused on the landing, and spun around the banister. Neville Longbottom came trotting down after him, taking the steps as fast as his short legs would carry him.

“Not a word about the lesson,” he said darkly. “Not a word.”

“But I didn’t want to talk to you about that!” Neville doubled over, huffing. “I wanted to tell you — they’re letting me take second-year Potions!”

He rocked back on his heels, his frustration drowned out in a genuine wave of surprise and pleasure. “And how on earth did you finagle that?” he said, almost cheered.

“It’s a funny story,” he said, as if it could have been anything else. “So over the s-s-s-summer my gran wrote a letter to McGonagall, asking her to move me up even though I didn’t p-p-pass Potions I. She didn’t want to, but my gran wore her down, and so she said if I could pass a p-p-placement exam at the end of August, she would let me take P-Potions with the other second years.”

“And you passed it?”

“Right, that’s the thing. Over the summer, my gran brought in this tutor who’s applying for his b-b-board certs, and he was really nice, I really liked him, we spent all summer when I took the test I got an Acceptable!”

“Fair enough,” said Draco, marginally impressed. “That’s one embarrassment you’ll be spared. Well done to your grandmother, I expect she could sell water to a fish.”

“Thank you! So, s-so, I was wondering — f-f-for this year, would you still want to d-d-do that extra Potions stuff? Like last year?”

He could imagine any number of things he’d rather do with his time, and several involved coitus with a hippogriff. “I don’t know,” he deferred, “I’m really quite busy—”

“Gran says she’ll pay you,” Neville blurted. “Name your price! Sh-sh-she said to tell you money’s no object—”

“Do I look like someone who can be bought?”

“I know! I know. But it’s just, it was so helpful, a-a-a-and — and the thing is, I really need to pass Potions the normal way this year, b-b-because McGonagall won’t make another exception for me.” Neville wrung his hands as if trying to shuck the skin from bone. “Gran said if I couldn’t get it right this t-t-time, she’d pull me out and send me to Durmstrang.”

Draco grimaced. “Don’t they still use the rod?”

“Yes! Yes, that’s what everyone s-s-s-says!” wailed Neville. “I’ll b-b-be toast!”

“You will?”

“Yes. Don’t make a thing of it.”

“Thank you! Oh, but by the way, also — if it’s not too much b-b-bother, I mean, only if it’s no trouble.”

“What.”

“Could my friend Leanne come?” asked Neville tentatively. “When I mentioned I might do more of these lessons with you, she asked me to ask you if she could come.”

“No.”

“But she’d be so grateful! She’s rubbish at Potions, too. Only her parents are muggles, and they can’t afford to hire tutors for her…”

“Tough. I’m not running a charity.”

“I’d pay for her!”

“There are a lot of people at this school who are good at Potions,” he said flatly. “She can hire one of them.”

Neville, who could see his window of opportunity shrinking, grew desperate. “I’ll do your Herbology homework,” he blurted.

“I don’t want you to do my Herbology homework.”

“Fine. I’ll help with your Herbology, then.”

Draco clucked his tongue. “And why do you think I need help in Herbology?”

This was something of a misdirection. In fact, he did need help in Herbology, because—

“Because it was the only subject last year where you didn’t make top three.”

He looked sharply at Neville. A specter of animal cunning lurked in the boy’s round face.

“And it wouldn’t matter,” he added, “except I know it probably ticked you off. Because you and Hermione are always competing, and her grade was better than yours.”

Well, then. Apparently it ran in the family. Draco struggled not to be impressed.

“Good pull, Longbottom,” he drawled. “If you only applied it to brewing instructions, we’d be in business.”

“Well?”

“Well, what?”

“Well, is that a deal?”

“Does your gran negotiate like this? I understand why McGonagall broke down.”

“Is that an answer?”

He sighed. Neville beamed.

Aside from Podmore's classes, the first few weeks of second year passed much quicker than last year's. Draco fell into a routine he'd forgotten having, and to his chagrin, found himself enjoying it. He and Hermione were silently competing for first rank in Charms, a contest that led both of them to strain their arms from raising them, and led Harry and Ron to strain their eyeballs from rolling them. In Transfiguration, McGonagall had them start working on the transformation of live flora, a noxiously difficult subject in which Hermione had to haul Draco, Harry, and Ron altogether up to standard before every quiz. In History of Magic, Hermione wore quilltip after quilltip down to nubbins while Draco napped on her shoulder, and in Astronomy, she fell asleep under their telescope while he drew star-charts she couldn't be bothered to transcribe. ("It's not observation, it's math," she said, "if math already tells me where they are, why bother with the telescope?") ("Because you can't math your way through magic, Granger.") ("Watch me!")

In Potions, they so cleanly annihilated everyone that even Snape couldn't begrudge them a few points to Gryffindor every now and then. When a long inspection of their Floriforous Potion yielded a reluctant, "Competent" from the Potions Master, it put Draco in such good spirits that he allowed Hermione to coax him into a muggle "high five."

On the morning of quidditch tryouts, Harry didn't touch a morsel of food. He sat with his elbows on the table, staring into the middle distance with an expression split between nausea and thrill.

Draco, in contrast, ate both their servings of hashbrowns and sausage, and washed it down with two goblets of pumpkin juice.

"Come on, Potter, have a pastry. You ought to eat something, or you'll be a sitting duck in the air."

"Can't," droned Harry. "Already will be."

"Don't be dramatic. I've seen you fly. Mark me: This is your game to lose."

“What if it isn’t?”

“Well, in that case—”

“What if I fall off?”

Draco decided to give it to him straight. He said, “Well, you definitely won’t make the team, that’s certain. So try to avoid it.”

Harry breathed heavily.

“Buck up. You won’t fall off,” Ron said, thumping him on the back. “Barely ever happens. Anyway, George says it’s not so hard. You fly some suicides, you hock the ball around, you shoot a little. Wood blows the whistle, you go home.”

Draco nodded. “You coming, Granger?” he asked, nudging the witch in question, who was buttering her toast with crisp, short strokes.

“Do I have to?” she sighed.

“Only if you want to be a good friend,” said Ron.

“But it’s boring.”

“Bite your tongue,” Draco said indignantly. “You’re talking about the sport of kings.”

“That’s tennis.”

“Fine. It’s the sport of wizards, which is better, anyway. And you don’t even have to watch. Just bring your book.”

“In the cold?” she said weakly. “And the wet?”

“‘And the wet’? I’m sorry, are you lost? This is the Gryffindor table, Hufflepuff’s over there.”

He knocked his knee against hers, chastising. She knocked him right back.

“Yeah, and what if Harry does fall off his broom?” Ron demanded. Harry turned several shades paler and spit up a mouthful of pumpkin juice. “How’ll you feel then? What if Draco bashes his head in on the goalhoop? I bet you’ll be sorry you weren’t there to watch!”

“I certainly won’t be!” she cried, and the insistence in her voice ended the argument; but when the three boys tromped down to the quidditch pitch after breakfast, she tagged along, complaining under her breath.

The evening rains had churned a thick layer of mud on the pitch, and the mist knit a silver crown around the hoops, just starting to glow at the touch of the midmorning sun. Hermione and Ron sat in the bleachers while Draco and Harry queued on the pitch, up to their ankles in mud and grass. Ginny came up and sat next to Ron, bringing with her steaming paper cups of something hot. Hermione had swaddled herself in a wool scarf and a puffball hat, and the wind kept sweeping her hair into her face.

Oliver Wood gave them training pinnies with a number on them and directed them to take a loaner broom. Students weren’t allowed to use their own brooms during tryouts (something insipid about it “not being fair”), so they all clambered onto dingy Comets and did a warm-up lap of the stands. (Harry outpaced them all easily, weaving through the upperclassmen with the ease of someone born in the air, but he was so nervous he didn’t hear the command to stop, and Wood had to go chasing after him.)

The team only had slots for a chaser and the seeker, so Wood didn’t bother having them practice with the beaters’ bats. Each student had to fly the length of the field, passing the ball back and forth with one of the chasers, and then make a shot on Wood at the hoop. Draco got paired with Katie Bell.

Katie was the kind of person one recognized easily. She had choppy black hair and wore a studded choker with matching leather wristcuffs, and she put lots of muggle makeup on her face, great swooping rings of black around her eyes. Despite her alarming appearance, she grinned at him when he pulled up alongside her, and threw a snappy pass into his chest. “All right, Malfoy?” she called.

He snapped it back to her, and she caught it with a grunt. “Just getting old, here, Bell.”

They volleyed easily across the field, steering their broomsticks with their legs, and he lobbed the quaffle at Wood from behind his back. Wood dove and snapped it up, but it was clear he’d had to move quickly.

“Not too flashy, Malfoy,” warned Wood. “This is a tryout, not an exhibition. Next?”

Harry didn’t do as well with the volleying drill. He was paired with Angelina Johnson, who tried to take it easy on him, but he accidentally lobbed the quaffle high over her shoulder and made her dive to go fetch it. His attempt to score on Wood was a hard pitch into the center goal-hoop, which Wood caught as easily as if it’d been a pass.

From the stands, Ron applauded stoutly, anyway.

The last drills were seeker drills. Each hopeful was given sixty seconds to find and catch the snitch, once it was released, and to make it harder, Fred and George were allowed to heckle.

“Oi, Blondie!”

“Over here!”

“Is that a flying ferret?”

“I didn’t know mongooses could have albinism! Mongooses? Mongeese?”

“Hey Malfoy! What’s the plural of mongoose?”

“Oh my God, what is that?”

“Fred Weasley! Duck!”

Fred dive-bombed him, forcing him to swerve and roll.

Even with their harrying, Draco caught the snitch in twenty-seven seconds. He delivered it to Wood with a triumphant expression.

Then it was Harry’s turn. To Draco’s ear, the twins were a bit more soft on him, but it didn’t end up mattering. As soon as he took off, he shot into the clouds, clinging to the Comet like a lifeline, and disappeared into a puff of fog.

“Damn,” marveled Katie, kicking off and hovering. “D’you reckon he lost control of his broom?”

“I don’t like how long he’s been up there,” said Wood, scanning the sky. “Fred, George, take Katie and go see—”

Just then, Harry plunged down from the clouds, soaked to his skin, clutching something gold in one outstretched fist.

“I’ve got it!” he shouted. His glasses were opaque with droplets, and he seesawed wildly across the pitch before sliding off in a clumsy crumple of limbs. “I did it! I caught it! I’ve got it! Wood, I’ve got it!”

“Good Lord,” gasped Angelina. “He does have it.”

And he did: he leapt off his broom and ran the rest of the way across the field, brandishing the ball over his head. Ron, Ginny, and Hermione were all on their feet, clapping.

Hermione cupped her hands around her mouth and cheered, and Draco felt slightly sour. She hadn't done any cheering when he'd caught the snitch. Then again, he thought to himself, it wasn't like she knew anything about quidditch. She wouldn't recognize a Wronski feint if he did one over her head. She was probably just clapping because Ron was.

Oliver Wood had them do a few more flying drills before they wrapped up. They finished around noon, and the five of them met at the foot of the stands to walk back to the castle.

"Well done, Harry," managed Ginny. This was the longest sentence Draco had ever heard her utter in Harry's presence, and she seemed proud of it.

"Thanks, Gin," said Harry, grinning at her, and her face flushed redder than summer roses. She hid her face in her hair.

"You've got it made, Harry!" exclaimed Ron. He might as well have been skipping. "That was amazing! I think Wood was drooling!"

"Draco did really well, too," protested Harry.

"Oh, yeah," he amended, "you, too, Draco. But Harry—"

Draco scowled. He strode ahead of them, shoving a hank of sweat-slick hair out of his eyes.

Hermione hurried after him. He wished she wouldn't. It nearly impossible to sulk when Hermione was after him about something.

"Ron doesn't mean it like that," she said. "He's proud of you, too, he's just excited. He and Harry are — well, you know how they are."

He did. Everyone knew. Ron had been Harry's shadow ever since they stepped off the boats in first year; they did everything together, like two heads of the same being, always snickering together in the common room and tussling with each other in the dorms. You couldn’t say a harsh word about Harry when Ron was in the room. And Harry pretended to love all his friends equally, but in his heart of hearts, in the deepest vault, behind a locked door, there sat Ronald Weasley, reigning from a throne nobody else would ever touch.

“I don’t care,” he lied.

“Besides, you did quite well.”

“And how would you know?”

“Oh, fine,” she sighed. “Be unhappy, then! There’s no dealing with you when you get like this.”

“When ‘I’ get like this? You’re the one insisting I’m upset.”

“I don’t understand you at all,” she said, exasperated. “You insist on pretending that nobody can read you, but you’re a terrible liar, what you’re feeling is written all over your face.”

His cheeks turned warm.

They were interrupted by a group of Slytherins picking their way down to the field, clearly en route to their own tryouts. Among them was Theodore Nott, wearing green-and-silver quidditch robes and carrying a gleaming black Nimbus 2002. Beside him trotted Pansy Parkinson, who was wearing a pair of furry black earmuffs the size of oranges.

“Oh, Pans, look,” said Theodore drolly. “The competition.”

He drew to a halt on the hill above them. Behind him stood Pucey and Bletchley, chasers sporting twin buzzcuts and sneers, as well as Goyle, who — to Draco’s astonishment — was carrying a Cleansweep 9.

“Greg,” he said, incredulously, “you’re not trying out?”

Goyle’s lip curled. “What’s it to you, Malfoy?”

He sincerely hadn't meant it as an insult. He'd been too surprised by the idea of Goyle playing quidditch to moderate his tone. In particular, he was recalling a rather traumatic Christmas in 1986, when a certain someone had broken Draco's toy broomstick by sitting on it wrong.

He hadn't spoken to Goyle since the start of first year.

Harry, Ron, and Ginny, seeing the group of green robes, came hurrying up the hill behind Draco and Hermione. "Nothing, he's just surprised you found a broomstick that can carry you," said Ron, leaning on Harry's shoulder. "Or do you plan on using two?"

Draco winced. Goyle was sensitive about his size. Crabbe wasn't, but Crabbe's mother was a lot nicer to him than Goyle's was.

Goyle shoved past Pucey and Bletchley. "Got something to say, do you? Think it's funny? At least some of us can afford a broomstick."

"I'm gonna think it's hilarious," retorted Ron, "when Flint manages to bag the world's only flying troll."

Goyle lunged, but Pucey and Bletchley both got fistfuls of his robes and hauled him back. Theodore made a show of yawning. "Heel, Greg," he said. "He's a Weasley, remember? He's not worth the snot you'd beat out of him."

"Don't you dare touch Ron," said Hermione, stepping in front of him.

"Don't speak that way to Teddy," snapped Pansy.

"Then you watch your tone with Hermione," said Ginny, shouldering her way to the front.

"Back off, she-weasel," sneered Pansy. "I don't want these robes to smell like blood traitor."

Immediately, Ron drew his wand. Seeing so, Harry did the same. In response, Pucey, Bletchley, and Goyle all drew back, although Theodore did not. He shot Draco a nonplussed look that said: Are we really doing this?

“Do we have a problem, Parkinson?” Draco said, trying to keep his voice dry and disinterested. “I’d remind you that Weasley’s done nothing to offend you.”

Pansy scowled. “She’s a Weasley,” she said to Draco. “The fact that she’s even here, at Hogwarts, is insulting. Almost as insulting as her being here.”

She pointed at Hermione, who startled.

“Watch it,” said Draco warningly, more to Theodore than to Pansy. The boy was starting to look uncomfortable, and opened his mouth, but Hermione spoke before he could.

“I know what you think about me,” she told Pansy coldly. “But it’s far more embarrassing for the school to have students like you than students like me.”

Pansy screeched, “Nobody asked what you think, mudblood!”

Draco moved — he wasn’t quite sure what he was going to do, but he was going to do something — but others moved faster. There was a flash of red, and a flash of green, and a horrible, feminine yowl went up: Ginny had tackled Pansy into the dirt.

The two went rolling down the hill a ways, and Ginny ended up straddling Pansy’s chest. Pinning her arms down with her knees, she slapped Pansy back and forth across the face like an angry rider laying the crop on a disobedient horse. “Don’t! You! Ever! Say! That! Again!”

“Help!” screamed Pansy. “Help! Help! Get her off! She’s feral! She’s going to kill me!”

“Don’t! You! Ever! Use! That! Word!”

The girl had a surprisingly powerful arm. Eleven years and six brothers had schooled her in the arts of martial discipline, and despite her prey's wriggling, she was immovable. The others put away their wands, relieved: Harry hid a bark of laughter in a cough, and Ron looked like it was Christmas and his birthday, all at once.

Theodore was less amused. He dropped his broomstick — the Nimbus went clattering, and Draco mourned, thinking of the scratches — and swept down on the squabbling pair.

"Let her go," he shouted, and his voice boomed like thunder. Draco had never heard him raise his voice before.

Ginny popped up like a boxer, and was clearly deciding whether or not to swing for Theo when Draco intercepted her. He picked her up and plopped her down safely on the other side of himself from Pansy.

Pucey and Goyle had come running forward at the first strike, wands drawn, and Draco was just thinking nauseously how very small Ginny was compared to both of them when Theodore flung out his arm and stopped them. "Oh for Merlin's sake, would you stop it," he snapped, his brogue rising with his irritation, "you want to end up in Dumbledore's office, do you?"

Harry and Ron, who had been preparing a counteroffensive of wands and fists, saw the tension deflate and reluctantly retreated. Hermione was chewing fervently on one of her cuticles.

Theodore knelt by Pansy and helped her sit up. She was sobbing so hard she was about to be sick, cradling her face in her hands. Red welts flowered like rosacea across her cheeks. Draco winced.

"Come on, up with you," murmured Theodore. "You're all right. There's a girl. Stand up for me, or we'll get Greg to carry you."

"Take me to the Hospital Wing?" she asked tearfully.

Ginny stuck her head around Draco's shoulder. "Oh, don't be such a girl," she said scornfully. "You don't need the Hospital Wing."

At this, Pansy burst into tears again, and Theodore swept her out of sight, under his arm. "Draco, get your weasel back on a leash," he said, much colder than he'd been before.

"Talk about my sister that way, and I'll give you a lot more to worry about than a smack in the face," said Ron angrily.

"I didn't start it," Draco said to Theo, taut with frustration. "You heard Parkinson—"

"Yes, I heard her, and I'm sure the headmaster will agree that was perfectly valid grounds for physical violence."

"She should be expelled," cried Pansy, pointing at Ginny.

Theodore discreetly shouldered her further away from the Gryffindors. "Out of respect for your family alone," he warned Draco, "I'm not going to do anything about this, but if your posse comes near Pansy again—"

"His posse?" said Ron incredulously. "His?"

"Then I'm letting Pucey and Goyle have at it, and I might even join in. We understand each other?"

Pansy, her tears momentarily subsided, leaned out and spit at Ginny. The gob landed on Ginny's shoe. Ginny looked up.

In one movement, Harry, Ron, and Draco all lunged and caught her. She thrashed a bit, shouting: "Let me at her, oh, come on, let me go!"

"Get her out of here, or it'll be her own fault if she gets her teeth kicked in," Draco snarled at Theodore, indicating Pansy.

With a last glare at all persons involved, Theodore turned and whisked Pansy up to the castle, his arm laid around her shoulders.

“God, but I wish I could’ve punched him,” said Ginny, gazing after the pair like it was her life’s only wish.

Harry stared at her. She noticed, blushed, and said, “What?”

“Nothing,” he said. “It’s just that I’ve never heard you — talk before.”

“She talks loads,” said Ron comfortably, slinging his arm around her shoulders. “Just never around big famous wizards with pretty hair. Is that right, Gin?”

“Gerroff,” she said, pained, “I hate you,” but he laughed and tweaked her ear.

The others started cracking jokes about it on the way back, and in each retelling, the gravity and scope of heroism performed by both Weasleys increased tenfold. But Hermione was subdued while they walked up to the castle.

“Granger,” he said gruffly. “About what Parkinson said—”

“I’m very fine,” she said tightly. “And thank you for your concern, but we all knew she was thinking it, so it was honestly refreshing that she came out and made it clear.”

“Yes, but it was… she oughtn’t to have said it.” He didn’t know how to explain his feelings about it, but of that much, he was certain. She had been very wrong to say it, and Ginny had given her more or less what she deserved.

“No, but she did,” said Hermione crisply, “and I’m sure I’d be cut up about it, if I gave a split what she thinks about me.”

Unduly relieved, he said, “Good. It scarcely matters, anyway.”

They picked their way up through the frosted grass, their shoes crunching on the stiff blades.

“Sorry,” he said, “did you say ‘split’?”

She cleared her throat. “It’s a word for — you know, when you don’t care about something. At all. It’s a strong word for that.”

“You’re kidding me. This — this is a joke. You’re having me on.”

“Don’t say it.”

“Hermione Granger,” he said, in dumbfounded joy, “did you mean ‘give a shit’?”

“Oh don’t make that face, Ron made that same stupid face, and I told him too, it’s not my fault my parents don’t let me swear!”

“Give a split? How old are you, again?”

“I have young cousins!”

“No, seriously, you’re having me on. You know it’s not actually—?”

“I know what the word is.”

September came and went like a burglar in the night. Draco woke to Ron’s snores or Finnigan’s CDs, and dressed in companionable jockeying with the other boys, making fun of Neville’s haircut and Dean Thomas’s un-subtle attempts to show off his new white trainers, arguing about homework and teachers and quidditch. Seamus Finnigan was putting together a small betting league for the season among the boys, and Draco, in an effort to be sporting, put twenty galleons on Puddlemere United to take the whole thing. Ron consulted his pockets and put four knuts on the Cannons. Harry consulted them both as to where his money should go, and the resulting argument lasted for the better part of three days. By the third night, the original question of Pud U or Cannons had been almost forgotten, so intricately had the tangents bred and braided together.

“...you’re mad, and I mean you’re barking mad, if you think Firch could have taken Erkstein. In his prime? In his prime?"

“This is what Cannons fans don’t understand. You’re delusional about this. You actually are. You’re delusional if you think Erkstein was anywhere near Firch, when he was playing two decades later, and the broom technology was whole fathoms better. It’d be like pitting a thoroughbred against a mule…”

Hermione groaned and buried her head in her arms.

“You two,” said Harry sternly, interrupting them. “Either write a book together or shut up about it. I’m putting five sickles on the Kestrels, and that’s all I’m going to hear on the subject.”

Draco and Ron looked at each other.

“Might as well just give five sickles away.”

“Yeah, I don’t know where I lost you, mate—”

“Entirely wrong, and I’ll tell you why…”

Hermione went up to the common room early, declaring her tolerance had reached its limit. Draco and Ron kept up through dinner and all the way back to the Pink Lady, whereupon Draco split off from the others for Neville’s Potions lesson.

He had booked one of the workrooms in the dungeons, and to save himself time, he took one of the secret staircases down from Gryffindor Tower, emerging behind a tapestry of Aggripus. From there he was within sight of the Potions classroom, where the door was ajar, and a yellow knife of light spilled into the dim hallway.

Feeling in uncharacteristically high spirits after his argument with Ron, Draco decided to say hello to his godfather. He stopped, however, when he heard voices behind the door.

“I fear I made a grievous mistake, Severus.”

That was Dumbledore. Draco stopped with his hand poised over the doorknob.

“Refusing to hire that farceur,” said Snape, “was not a mistake.”

“It would be a small sacrifice for the greater good.”

“And a reprehensible breach of your students’ trust. Answer this. Do you believe, for one minute, that he would have served as a competent teacher?”

“More easily than I can believe he would serve as a competent Minister of Magic.”

“Don’t be absurd. He won’t win.”

“I daresay not.”

“He’s a showboat. A grandstanding braggart. Announcing is a play for attention… he’ll stay in the race for a month or two, reap some free publicity for his next piece of drivel, and drop out to go sell more books… you think he wants to be Minister of Magic? He’s never held a real job in his life, he’d loathe it. These things simply happen in politics, Albus, you can’t be scared of them.”

“Everything that happens in politics scares me,” said Albus calmly, “and not without good reason. I should have given him the position… I could have controlled him, from here…”

“And what of your students?” Snape’s tone dwindled on the edge of anger. “What of their education? What of the seventh years taking N.E.W.T.s in Defense Against the Dark Arts? Your seventh years — our future Aurors, who will be your soldiers in the wars you think to come? What do you think they would have learned from Gilderoy Lockhart?”

Dumbledore did not reply.

“Less, do you suppose, than they would from Sturgis?”

“Sturgis did not want the job. I had to bully him into it.”

“And how very hard it is,” drawled Snape, moving to the door, “for you to compel people into things they would rather not do.”

“I have never had to compel you.”

“A dog that knows the length of its own leash does not pull it.”

“Severus.”

Snape moved closer to the door, and Draco scuttled further into the shadows. “Forget the business about Podmore. Lockhart will drop out before winter, and Fudge will scrape by with the votes, God help us all. In the meantime, you should try to soothe Asquith; I hear he grows frustrated with Fudge…”

The door closed, and Draco was left blinking in the darkness, totally unsure of what he just heard.

He was still reeling when Neville arrived for his lesson. He was so distracted that he failed to even scold Neville for being ten minutes late, and allowed him to set up his cauldron incorrectly, twice.

“Where’s your friend?” he said. “Lena, or what-have-you?” After all his begging and bartering, the boy had come alone.

“I don’t know,” Neville said, frowning. “I t-t-t-told Leanne to meet me outside the Pink Lady at seven f-f-forty-five, but at seven f-f-fifty she wasn’t there. S-s-so I wondered if she’d come early and m-missed me, and I asked the Pink Lady if she s-s-saw a Hufflepuff girl with f-f-fringe come by, but she said no… so I eventually gave up and came d-d-down.”

“Hm. A mystery,” said Draco disinterestedly, still mulling over Snape’s conversation with Dumbledore. “Perhaps she decided she didn’t need remedial potions, after all.”

“M-M-Maybe, but that’s totally unlike Leanne,” said Neville. “She’d never stand a-a-anybody up. She’s very s-s-sweet, and s-s-socially anxious. She’s never late for c-c-class…”

“Take it easy on the salamander blood, Longbottom, you’re not making a cocktail.”

One grueling trek through a Strengthening Solution later, and they climbed back to Gryffindor Tower. It was slow going, since Neville was carting his book and his cauldron with him, and had to stop every other flight of stairs to catch his breath. At this time of night, the halls were mostly empty, and black slabs of night pressed against each window. The torches flickered dimly, and long shadows scurried on the floor.

On the last flight, a first year came thundering down from the Tower, knocking into Neville, and sending the cauldron flying out over the banister. Neville gave a forlorn wail as it spiraled down nine flights of distance, and hit the bottom with a distant crack.

“Oi,” Draco said sharply, catching the first year by the scruff of his neck. “What’s the big idea? Apologize to Longbottom.”

It was Colin Creevey. He was shaking so badly he could have vibrated into another dimension.

“Let me go! Please! I’ve got to get a teacher!”

“Colin, what’s wrong?” cried Neville.

“She’s — she’s — I think she might be dead—”

Draco dropped him unceremoniously and sprinted up the last flight.

A crowd had gathered outside the portrait hole. There was shouting and weeping, and a lot of people were on their knees. The Pink Lady was nowhere to be found. Something shone on the wall above the Pink Lady, barely legible in the torchlight.

As he drew closer, he could make out a row of letters, each a foot high, daubed in dark red on the stone.

NO MORE MUDBLOODS

The crowd parted, and he realized someone was lying on the floor beneath the portrait-hole.

He shouldered through, and saw it was a small girl in a Hufflepuff tie. She had a long, dark fringe, and she clutched a used copy of Magical Drafts and Potions to her chest. She was pale, her skin leeched of color, and stiff as stone.

Samhain

Chapter 11: Samhain

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

“Petrified,” announced Madam Pomfrey, and the Hufflepuffs broke out in cries of relief.

“Thank goodness, ” said Hermione, squeezing Draco’s wrist. They and several other Gryffindors had joined in the long sigil of the Hospital Wing. Draco was sure they’d been a bother to Madam Pomfrey during her examination, but the matron hadn’t the heart to turn them out. “My, but she looked dead.”

Harry rubbed his face. He was still in yesterday’s clothes. “I’m going back to help scrub off the lettering,” he said.

“McGonagall said Filch would do it,” murmured Hermione. She had dark bags in her eyes and wrinkles in her shirt. Ron had borrowed her jumper to use as a pillow.

“Yeah, in the morning, but I’m not going to sleep until it’s gone. Ron?”

Ron jerked awake. “Hm?”

“You any good at Scouring Charms?”

“Reckon so,” he yawned, shoving himself upright. “Can always borrow a mop from the broom closet, if that doesn’t do the trick.”

“I’ll come, too,” said Lavender Brown, who was sitting on the floor nearby. Her hair was in curlers, and she wore a baggy blue sweatshirt instead of robes; her eyes were red and puffy from crying. “I have some acetone and hydrogen peroxide, they’re both good for stains. I don’t know if it works on stone, but I know it gets blood out of clothes.”

“How d’you know that?” Ron said, bewildered. Lavender stared at him.

“Ron,” said Hermione, exasperated.

“What?”

“You have a sister.”

“Wh— oh! Sorry, Lav, I didn’t think.”

“We should all go back,” Hermione agreed, pushing herself off the wall. The Hufflepuffs showed no sign of leaving: some had unrolled sleeping bags, while some of the older students were passing out blankets. The hallway outside the Hospital Wing was rapidly turning into an encampment. “It’ll be better in the morning. Madam Pomfrey will take care of her.”

But she was wrong. The next morning, Leanne had not returned to the Hufflepuff table, and Madam Pomfrey announced at breakfast that she would lie in residence at the Hospital Wing until Professor Snape could brew the cure for her condition.

“How long will that take?” Hermione said worriedly. “If Madam Pomfrey can’t cure it, she must have been seriously cursed.”

Dismayed cries erupted from the Hufflepuffs. Madam Pomfrey labored to assure them that Leanne was in no pain, merely a dreamless, comatose state, and that she would be perfectly well once the cure was administered, but this did little to soothe them.

“About six months, give or take,” said Neville sadly. “Poor Leanne. She’s going to m-m-miss so much of second year… maybe they’ll let her do summer classes to catch up, like me."

Draco, who had been about to say the same thing, dropped his bacon.

"How did you know that?" he asked.

Neville blinked. "I don't, exactly," he admitted. "I assumed P-P-Professor Snape is making a Restorative Draught, and he needs m-m-mandrakes for those, which take nine months to grow. And P-P-Professor Sprout's crop just finished their first trimester."

"Rare form, Longbottom," he said, surprised. "That's correct."

"Yeah?" said Neville, with a cheeky little twitch of his eyebrow. "Well, anyone could t-t-tell you that, if they p-p-paid attention in Herbology."

"Don't get saucy."

"Sorry."

"Do they have any leads on who did it?" Harry wondered.

"I'm sure Dumbledore is doing nothing else," said Hermione, upending half the pitcher of maple syrup on her pancakes. Draco tried to take it from her, and she deftly avoided him. "And McGonagall. All the Gryffindor muggle-borns are supposed to go see her after breakfast… I think she means to try and comfort us. I expect all the heads of house are doing the same."

Draco took a gulp of tea, neglecting to state the obvious: for at least one head of house, there would be no need.

"And how are you feeling about it?" said Harry gently.

Hermione tossed her hair. "Well, it's not the sort of thing one likes to find above one's front door," she said coolly, though her voice was trembling. "But I'm not going to let it bother me. That's just what the culprit wants, is for me to feel like I'm not welcome. But it'll take more than a cruel prank to scare me off."

Draco and Harry exchanged a glance that suggested neither of them would describe what happened to Leanne as a "prank." Saying this, though, seemed unlikely to help Hermione, so they changed the subject.

A flurry of movement occurred in the entryway. Students of all houses started to throng the Announcements board near the door.

"Quidditch rosters are going up," Ron said, craning his neck. "I can't read them at this distance. Wood's handwriting is so damn small… why can't he write nice and big like Davies, I could tell you the Ravenclaw seeker from here…"

"I'm going to be sick," mumbled Harry.

"Would you like me to go look f-for you?" offered Neville courteously.

"Yes. No, no, I'll... Actually, would you?"

"Finish your crumpets," said Draco, tossing his napkin on the table. "I'll look, I'm going up anyway."

He elbowed his way through the crowd of disappointed hopefuls in front of the Announcements board, hip-checking a third year Hufflepuff out of the way. The rosters had been pinned on top of the board, identical except for the names and the stamps on the bottom.

Before Draco could work up the resentment to feel properly snubbed, his eyes fell on the last line.

RESERVE SEEKER: Draco Malfoy (2)

“I confess I’m relieved,” said a droll, familiar voice behind him, “though it’s bad form. I’ll take far more satisfaction from thrashing Potter than thrashing you.”

Draco said nothing. Theodore cocked his head, scanning the Gryffindor roster. “Reserve,” he said, clucking his tongue. “Almost worse than a rejection, isn’t it? Knowing they wanted you just a bit less than the other man?”

Draco bit down on his tongue. Then he turned, smoothly, and said, “Yes, it’s quite the slap in the face.”

Theodore’s mouth flattened. “You know, Pansy’s scared of going to Potions, now. Because it’s a double block with Gryffindor.”

“The luxury of a stress-free life,” said Draco, “is cheaply purchased by learning to watch one’s mouth.”

“Are we going to be enemies? Because I’d rather we not be enemies, especially over something as silly as this. Let’s at least have an argument of substance before we start being brats to each other.”

Privately, Draco agreed; outwardly, he wasn’t going to give Theodore the satisfaction of playing peacemaker.

“Nott, I’m flattered, but I don’t think about you half enough for us to be enemies,” he drawled. “I apologize if that’s a disappointment.”

“Well, it’s no ‘Reserve Seeker,’ but I can’t say it doesn’t sting.” He snapped his fingers. “Here’s your daily dose of miracles. Greg made the team. He and I are going to be Beaters.”

“Good for him,” said Draco, so surprised he forgot to sound ironic. “He’s certainly got the arms. Is he pleased?”

“As punch. Of course, he’s trying to be stoic about it, but the big lump’s been giggling to himself all morning.”

“Greg never could lie for love nor money.”

“No, indeed. Vince is sulking; I think he’s jealous.”

“Vince wouldn’t want it, anyway,” he said absently. “He’d hate the practices. Getting up early and exercising, they’re his perfect nightmare.”

“I think that’s right,” said Theodore after a moment. Draco shrugged. Of course it was. He’d had Crabbe over for sleepovers, and it took a small army to get the goon out of bed.

“Tell you what, Malfoy,” said Theodore suddenly, slipping his hands in his pockets. “What are you doing for Samhain?”

“What, Halloween?”

“Don’t be a pleb. I’m talking about Samhain, the proper holiday. Are you doing a bonfire?”

“I hadn’t planned on it.”

“Would you like to?”

Draco arched an eyebrow. “Are you throwing?”

He grinned. The expression was rather wicked. “Nah. Slytherin is, though. Didn’t you go last year?”

“Couldn’t make it. Got tied up fighting a troll.”

He also hadn’t been invited, but Theodore didn’t need to know that.

“All right, don’t tell me, then,” Theodore said easily. “But if you happen to find yourself troll-free on the night of, swing by the Whomping Willow around eight. Sans entourage, if you please, I don’t want any problems with Pans.”

“I’ll think about it,” he said, noncommittal, and strolled back to the Gryffindor table.

He had no particular intentions of going; he knew full well that most of Slytherin still viewed him with disdain. Nor, frankly, did he trust the intentions of Theodore Nott, who struck him as perhaps the least trustworthy member of a uniformly untrustworthy bunch. But nevertheless, as the end of October rolled around, he found himself making excuses not to attend the Gryffindor Halloween Party being planned by Fred and George.

Autumn spread her damp, cold fingers through the castle. After the attack, Prefects were assigned to walk first years to their classes, and it became commonplace to see Percy Weasley sprinting, red-faced and puffing, from one side of the castle to another to pick up his group. Madam Pomfrey churned out batch after batch of extra-strength Pepperup Potions, which left the imbibers smoking from the ears for hours, and so a smoky scent began to linger in the hallways, along with the odor of damp stone and rain-soaked earth. Raindrops the size of fists pelted the castle windows, and the lake overflowed its beaches, laving up the pebble banks and turning the hills above it into a marsh. The flower beds drowned, and Hagrid's pumpkins reached the size of carriages.

Harry, who spent many of these rainy afternoons at practices, took to trailing mud all over the common room. While everyone felt very sorry for him in practice, Draco did less than most, because every muddy footprint became a reminder of the position he held and Draco did not.

"I spoke to Wood about it," Harry told him. "He says that reserves are really important, and you shouldn't give up. He wants you to try again next year."

"Like hell," Draco said immediately.

"No, he does! And there's other things he has to consider. It doesn't look so good for him to have two second years on the team. It makes us look inexperienced. And Ron says when you're picking a Chaser, you typically want someone bigger, like Ishika—"

"So what you're telling me," he said, "is you're the reason I'm not on the team."

"The Reserve Seeker is still part of the team," said Harry. "And if you do want Wood to take you seriously, you should probably come to practice."

"I say again: like. Hell."

Draco had not attended a single practice that October, and had no intention of doing so. If Wood wanted him to slog out at the crack of dawn, in the cold, rainy muck, and spend two hours working himself to the bone, he should have given him a real position. He told Harry as much.

“I understand,” said Harry, “but Draco, I’m just saying, it doesn’t make you look like much of a team player, does it?”

“I’ll be a team player once he puts me on the actual team, ” snapped Draco, and went to go read somewhere else.

On Halloween night, he feigned a cold. The other boys dressed for the Gryffindor party while he reclined in his four-poster, hacking and sniffling, and generally had a wonderful time pretending to be sick.

“You sure you d-d-don’t need anything?” said Neville, peering at him from a safe, antibacterial distance. “Soup from the kitchens? Hot t-t-towel?”

“No, thank you.” He coughed so violently into his elbow that Neville balked.

“If I were you, I’d chug a Pepperup Potion and push through,” advised Ron. “It’s going to be a madhouse. Fred and George have been plotting for weeks. They’re bringing food up to the Astronomy Tower from the kitchens, and Lee Jordan’s deejaying.”

“Does this look right?” said Dean Thomas, turning in the mirror. He wore a puffy red vest over a denim jacket and a pair of muggle jeans. “I charmed the color to match, but it doesn’t look like the film…”

“Of course it doesn’t look like the film, Michael Fox has two feet on you,” said Seamus. “Check my zip.” He was wearing a hideous beige jumpsuit and carrying some kind of backpack-cum-vacuum cleaner.

Draco didn’t know what they were doing, and didn’t want to ask.

Ron made a final press. “Everyone’s going to be there, mate. The twins say everyone shows up for Gryffindor parties, even Hufflepuffs and Ravenclaws. Percy’s coming. Hermione’s coming!”

“Granger? Really?”

“Well, she said she’d stop by,” he amended. “She had a meeting with Podmore, before, I think. Wanted to talk house-elves.”

Draco scowled. “I expect she’ll have a liberation movement going by All Hallow’s Day.”

“Yeah, most likely,” Ron said amicably. “Anyway, you sure?”

“Quite.” He blew his nose pointedly.

The others trailed out, and he waited for the sounds of their voices to fade from the common room before climbing out of bed.

He pulled on a dark green cardigan, traded out his Gryffindor tie for a black one, and pinned his cloak with an emerald broach he hadn’t yet occasioned to wear at school. It was hardly the Royal Caledonian, but it wouldn’t do to come underdressed.

The last drops of sunlight suffused through the mists and vanished into a blue twilight. Its last fires burned low behind the trees, and the castle’s silhouette turned shadowy against the purple velvet of night. The air smelled of wood and dew and fallen leaves, and a pack of crows migrated musically from tree to tree, cawing. Draco’s shoes crunched over a carpet of fallen leaves and twigs. Down by the lake, near the foot of the Whomping Willow, a trio of Slytherins floated out of the gloom like phantoms, their murmuring voices echoing queerly over the field.

Draco called out. The tallest of the three turned, and revealed himself to be Theodore, his dark hair windblown, wearing a black tailcoat and an encrustment of rings on his fingers. He carried a lantern and a horned mask carved from what looked like bone.

Beside him was Pansy, her hair in braids instead of pigtails, wearing a black babydoll dress with a round collar and knee-high socks. In addition to a bone mask of her own, she carried a picnic basket.

The third Slytherin was a stranger. She was almost as tall as Theodore, with heavy dark-blonde hair and a hard, beautiful, androgynous face, lips full, eyes lidded. She wore the most unusual costume of the three — beside two dark-haired wraiths in black, the fair girl wore a white dress, cinched with a pale brown corset. In the gloom, the contrast between the three was as stark as gargoyles and cherubs.

“Hail and well-met,” said Theodore, swinging high the lantern. “Glad you can make it. We weren’t sure if you were going to come.”

“I hope you weren’t waiting,” said Draco, glancing at his watch. It was ten past eight. He’d made a point not to leave the dorm until five after.

“Not at all. Draco, have you met…?”

“I don’t think so.”

“This is Daphne Greengrass,” said Theodore. “Daphne, meet Draco Malfoy.”

The blonde girl stuck her hand out, fingers-down, and he touched it lightly.

“Is it true that Gryffindor Tower has a cat?” she said, without preamble.

“Daph,” laughed Theodore.

“What? I’m curious. I wanted to bring Duchess to Hogwarts, but they wouldn’t let me keep him in the commons. And I overheard a seventh year Gryffindor telling Marcus that the Tower has its own cat.”

“I’m not aware of one,” said Draco, though now he thought about it, he did remember noticing a tabby cat slinking around the common room on sunny afternoons. Neville liked to feed it biscuits.

“Oh. That’s a shame. I keep telling everybody that we should petition Snape to let us get one. I think it would be good for morale. And more importantly, we need pest control in the dungeons. I’m sick to death of the sound of rats. Millie found one in the bathroom the other day and screamed so loud I think she woke the mermaids.”

Draco, who had never once encountered a rat in Gryffindor Tower, repressed a shudder.

“But you’re Draco Malfoy,” Daphne said suddenly, as if alerting Draco to the fact. “Did you see the Witch Weekly article about your mother?”

His hackles sprang up on instinct. “I don’t follow tabloids.”

“It came out last week. ‘Lies, Spies, and Bloodlines: An Oral History of the House of Black.’ It’s trash, but I ate it up like candy. It says Bellatrix Black had an illegitimate child with the Dark Lord, and Rodolphus and Narcissa were planning to elope after the war.”

His hand went to the pocket where his wand rested. Daphne’s eyes followed it.

“That’s my mother you’re talking about,” he said coldly.

“Well I didn’t write the article,” she said brazenly. “Besides, my mother and father were second cousins. I think it’s perfectly normal.”

“Let’s get to the party first,” suggested Theodore, “and we can sort out whose mothers were bedding whose cousins later.”

They set off for the Forbidden Forest, trailing the beam of Theodore’s lantern.

They picked their way through the scrubby glades on the edge of the forest and winnowed deeper into the trees, down a worn footpath that only Theodore seemed to particularly recognize. Past the first row of pines, it was dark as midnight.

Daphne and Pansy walked on either side of him, unbothered by the darkness.

“Not to be a total marplot,” Draco drawled, “and not that I’m objecting, but isn’t this all verboten?”

“Being in the Forbidden Forest? Yeah, usually,” said Theodore. “But we get special permissions for Samhain. Religious observance, you know, means you can bend the rules.”

“They don’t want us setting the lawns on fire,” added Pansy.

“That, too. Besides, it’s more fun in the forest. Pucey says a long time ago, there used to be three or four bonfires going on every Samhain, all in different places, and you’d hop from one to one as the night went on… Dumbledore put the kibosh on that when some seventh years tried to sacrifice a goat. Bit of an overreaction, if you ask me, it was only one goat. But the townsman they stole it from kicked up such a fuss.”

“Woe is us,” sighed Daphne, “that we’ve just one fabulous party, instead of four.”

“Are you faking? Because I’m sincerely distressed.”

Music began to strain through the trees ahead. An uptempo drumline thudded, and a medley of fiddles and woodwinds played a fast, harsh melody. Light flickered from behind the trees, drawing them towards a clearing up ahead.

In the center of the clearing roared the greatest bonfire he had ever seen. A pillar of flame surged skyward, singing the highest boughs of the pines, pumping voluminous bellows of smoke into the sky like the unrolling of a gray silk bedsheet. It fed on a hearth the size of a collapsed house, ringed by a bed of ruby-red coals, and around the fire danced rings and rings of wizards in horned bone masks, whirling and clapping to the music, their robes undulating in an unbroken chain of dark silks. The trees were strung with garlands of red leaves, and skulls hung from their branches like baubles, each carrying a lit candle in its jaws. In one corner of the clearing, a band of enchanted skeletons hammered on kettle-drums with mallets made of their own ribs, and a scarecrow with a jack-o-lantern head sawed furiously on its violin.

The air was full of smoke and sparks and cackling cries. Those who did not dance sat on benches made from hay-bales and fallen logs, or drifted on broomsticks overhead, sipping from goblets of wine, and nibbling on roast apples or hazelnuts or slices of pumpkin pie. Every so often, one of the dancers would break off, and seize the hands of someone sitting — there would be cheers, protests, a brief and meaningless struggle — and then the victim would be hauled into the circle.

As Theodore stepped into the clearing, he lowered the lantern, sighing. No sooner had his foot touched the clearing than a skeleton melted out of the trees and seized him by the shoulders. Pansy shrieked.

“Not to fret, it’s only helping,” said Theodore, shrugging off his coat. The skeleton folded it over one arm, and then held out its other hand to Draco. He realized it was asking for his cardigan. He shook his head, and it retreated into the trees.

Another skeleton bobbed out of the smoke, carrying a tray of wood goblets. “Drinks!” said Theodore gladly, and took two. “At last! I’m tired of that bilgewater they call pumpkin juice. I want to toast properly.”

He handed one of the goblets to Pansy, and another to Daphne. Draco took one from the skeleton, peering curiously at the contents; they were dark red, and left ruddy stains on the mug. He glanced at Theodore, who was taking a long, contented drag from his own, and putting aside his apprehension, he raised it to his lips. The drink was hot and spiced and sweet, fragrant with cinnamon and ginger and nutmeg and cloves, fused with the sweet sting of brandy. It was mulled wine, he realized, with more relief than he was proud of.

“To Samhain,” said Theodore, lifting his goblet. “To the living, who join us here tonight, and to the dead, whom we invite to do the same; and in particular, to our dearly departed ancestors, whose spirits we shall immortalize by indulging in their very favorite kinds of bad behavior.”

They toasted and drank. Draco and Pansy took moderate sips; Daphne drained her goblet and threw it into the trees. “I want to dance,” she announced. “Theo, lead me in.”

“Splendid idea. Draco, keep an eye on Pans for me?”

“I don’t need babysitting,” snipped Pansy.

“Certainly not. But it would be the height of discourtesy to abandon a lady at a party, especially one you’d come with.”

Draco and Pansy eyed each other without affection.

“It’s that, or Draco has to lead Daphne in,” added Theo, “because one of us gents has to be good for something. It doesn’t have to be me, but I refuse to let down the sex.”

“All right,” said Pansy unhappily.

Theo proffered his hand to Daphne and bowed. She snickered, and folded into an over-elaborate curtsy, full of frivolous hand-twirling and shimmying, ending with her nose nearly flush to the ground; then they joined hands, and went galloping into the ring, where they were soon whisked into the whirling crowd.

Draco and Pansy stood in silence, sipping their wine. He had no idea what to say to her, and she seemed even less inclined to speak to him. The preponderance of masks made it hard to recognize anyone else, and he doubted he would, in any case.

By and by, she said, “Would you like some food?”

“Yes, thank you.”

They fetched plates from another skeleton attendant, and sat at the foot of a giant, gnarled oak tree, whose roots erupted from the earth and fashioned makeshift chairs. The heat from the bonfire warmed their cheeks, and Draco had lost the ability to smell anything but smoke. He and Pansy took thick slices of barmbrack — a sweet bread stuffed with dried fruit and nuts — smothered in yellow butter, and highball glasses of cranachan, a whipped trifle of raspberries, honey, rum, and toasted oats. A skeleton carried around a fat cauldronful of roast hazelnuts, fresh from the fire, and they each took a handful for themselves.

When the sound of wordless chewing became too much to bear, he ventured: “You and Nott seem to know each other well.”

She snorted. “Our fathers have worked together since before either of us were alive.”

Which answered the question of how the Parkinsons spent the war.

“What does your father do?” he said politely.

“He’s an Unspeakable.”

He frowned. “Nott’s father doesn’t work in the Department of Mysteries.”

“I didn’t say they had the same job,” she snapped. “His dad’s in the Wizengamot. He’s on the Committee for Economic Affairs, he oversees the Department’s budget.”

“Silenas, wasn’t it?” he said, trying to remember. “Silenas Nott?”

The eleven-year-old crossed her legs at the ankle and pursed her lips.

“If I were trapped in a room with Sibelius Nott and a hungry werewolf,” she said, “and you gave me two doses of poison, I’d pour the man a double.”

“Parkinson,” he said, surprised. “You’re talking about a member of the government.”

“So?” She lifted her chin. “I would. Theo knows it.”

“Doesn’t he like his father, either?”

To Draco, if one had the good luck to get a father, it seemed ungrateful in the extreme to resent him. He would much prefer the imperfect ministrations of an unsatisfactory father over the absence of his own.

“It’s complicated,” she snapped. “Theo’s mum died, and he hasn’t got siblings, only… I mean, my dad’s no prince, either, but I’d kill anyone who came after him.”

“That’s the second death threat you’ve made in as many minutes.”

“I’m aware.”

“Do you feel you should slow down?”

“Why.”

“People might get ideas.”

“I’m not a nice person,” she said matter-of-factly. “People already think I’m rude. Why should I waste time convincing them?”

He blinked. “I didn’t say you weren’t nice.”

“No, but you think so,” she pointed out. “You think I’m rude. And I am. I’m not charming, and I can’t make people like me, and I get bored to death trying, so I might as well say what I think.”

“That,” he said, “is one strategy.”

She shrugged. “Why should I care? I’m rich and well-bred and probably going to grow up pretty, so I’ll just graduate and get married and have some babies, and then I’ll be free to do whatever I want.”

“That being…?”

“I don’t know. I’ll figure that out when I get there. There’s no point in thinking about it now.” She picked at some barmbrack and threw it on the ground, where a squirrel snapped it up.

“It’s early for you to be trawling the market,” he said, leaning back on the root. His head tipped against the trunk of the tree, and he took in a comfortable eyeful of smoke and stars. “Are you accepting applications now, or will there be a posting on the Announcements board?”

She smoothed her skirts. “My mother debuted at sixteen. I think that’s a perfectly appropriate age.”

“To be married?”

“To debut, you dolt, check your ears. Your mother did it the same way. Come out at sixteen, have your Season, meet a man, have a nine-month engagement, you’re married at seventeen. Quick and painless.”

“Ah, romance,” he said dryly. Draco thought the whole concept of a Season sounded dreadful: stuffy balls with girls in old-fashioned gowns throwing themselves at you, or worse, prowling the sides of the dance floor, performing the mysterious female art of crowd-conduction to isolate and corner the bachelor of her choice. The idea of meeting the person he’d end up marrying there, while every wizard of any significance watched him like hawks, did nothing to warm him to the prospect of matrimony.

She shot an amused look at him. “Don’t tell me you’re a romantic.”

He crossed his arms behind his head, reclining. “Why shouldn’t I be?” he said lazily. “My parents were a love match.”

“Your parents were heirs to the biggest families in Wizarding Britain, and your mother was in- famously beautiful. If it was a love match, that’s only because they had the good sense to fall in love before someone told them to.”

“So young, and so cynical.”

“I’m just telling it like it is. My mum always said if you wanted romance, you should sleep with the help.”

Draco choked. “And this is advice she took?”

“I think she actually meant you shouldn’t do either,” she said, frowning, “but I admit, it’s unclear.”

Theo came bounding out of the circle, hauled off his mask, and collapsed onto the root between them. Sweat slicked his hair to his face, and his cheeks shone. “There you are,” he laughed. “What are you two conspiring about?”

“We’re gossiping about your mother,” said Pansy.

He turned to Draco. “Is she being mean?”

“Exceedingly.”

“Good girl.” He stole a piece of barmbrack off her plate, and she hoisted it out of his reach too late.

“Get your own!”

“Mm-hm. Does this little number sound familiar? ‘I don’t want my own, I want some of yours.’”

“It’s all right when I do that, I’m a girl.” She lifted her nose. “It’s unchivalrous to take a lady’s food.”

Theo dunked the barmbrack in his mulled wine. “And it’s not ladylike to gossip, but I like you anyway.”

Daphne stumbled out of the circle, laughing like mad. “I need a new partner,” she said, “I wore mine out.” Her eyes alighted on Draco. “Malfoy!”

He shook his head. But she came forward, holding out her hands, and Theo and Pansy began jeering. “Go on, why don’t you,” said Theo, “it’s a tradition, if a witch asks, it’s terrible luck to refuse…”

He was manhandled to his feet, and Daphne seized his hands. “It’s easy,” she said, “you’ll see, it’s just a chain, nothing fancy at all—”

“I know how to dance, Greengrass,” he said, with infinite dignity. “I wasn’t raised in a barn.”

And taking her hand, he led them into the ring.

This confidence vanished in a nonce when he had to take a lurching double-step to avoid being bowled over. The ring moved far faster than he’d expected, and he nearly went down under the stampede. But Daphne, who was surprisingly strong for such a small girl, dragged him upright and spun him neatly under her arm, looping them into the ring with such grace it made his own mistake look deliberate. He suspected she could have danced just as well with one of the skeleton servants, or perhaps an anthropoid rock.

For the first several seconds of the dance, his brain took leave of his skull, triggering a panic response from his limbs, which were quite understandably relying on it to tell them what to do. Seven years of dance lessons vanished in the stagger of a heartbeat. Someone looped their arm through his, and he was hauled into the first set of claps and twirls, and by the third turn about the bonfire his brain re-established residence between his ears, eager to claim credit for the hard work being done in its absence.

Daphne swung herself around and jumped. One of the other dancers caught her seamlessly and spun her, and she landed again, cackling, her blonde hair scything a pale arc through the air. She linked arms with Draco and spun herself hard around on the axis of their elbows, giggling, and he found that dancing and flying weren't so different, when you got down to it: a series of calculations and movements in space, a game of bodies where the prize was thrill.

He went to spin her. Willingly she went, turning under his arm, as neatly and elegantly as any princess ever born — and he didn't see what happened next, but there was a cry, and her right ankle folded where it should have held firm, and she disappeared under the crowd.

He lurched after her. She had rolled out of the path of the dancers, curling up close to the coals, so she wouldn't be stepped on, and was cradling her right leg with a grimace of frustration and with poorly mastered pain. "Damn," she said. "Damn, damn, damn! Stupid old thing."

"Greengrass, look, I'm sorry—"

"It's not your fault," she snapped, "don't apologize, you didn't do a thing wrong. Damn, damn, DAMN! Daddy's going to be so mad."

"That's ridiculous. He can't very well be mad at you for tripping." He knelt and helped her hop upright, bracing her weight on his shoulder. "Come on. Don't put weight on it, now, don't be stupid."

"You sound like Daddy."

"He sounds like a smart man. Can you walk? Don't lie."

“Yes.”

“Right, so that’s lying,” he said, when she took a wobbling step and almost went down again. “We discussed this, I thought.”

“I can walk,” she said stubbornly.

“You look like a drunk ostrich. Look me in the eye and tell me you can stand on your own.”

She set her jaw and shook her head, pain bringing out the vein in her temple.

“Thank you. Now step here, and here…”

He navigated her back to the oak tree. Theo and Pansy swarmed her at once. “Daph! What happened? I saw you go down, but we didn’t see…”

“Oh, I’m fine,” Daphne twittered, flapping her hand. “Must have slipped on a rock. Goes to show you, dancing’s serious business. Did you save me a drink? You did? I love you.”

“We’re all due a break from dancing, I think,” said Theo. “Time for cake and sweets.”

“Pish. All I need’s a quick Episkey, and I’ll be right as rain.”

“If it’s broken, you’ll need more than Episkey, ” said Pansy severely.

“You could out-weep Niobe, Pans. I’m fine.” Daphne glugged half the cup of mulled wine in one go. “But I’ll take a break. For cake and sweets.”

They reclined and watched the dancers for a while. Theo and Pansy amused Daphne by keeping up commentary on the dancers’ skill, and then speculating on who might lie beneath each mask. This period of repose gave Draco the opportunity to look at the other partygoers, and among those few without masks, he recognized a few: Adrian Pucey sat on his broomstick a few meters above the fray, eating a roast apple; Tracey Davis and Terrence Higgs were chatting on a log, looking quite cozy; Gemma Farley, Millicent Bulstrode, and Bridget Gogol were perched under an elm tree, braiding each other's hair. As the night moved on, these groups dissolved, reformed, traded partners, and otherwise thoroughly cross-pollinated each other, giving everyone an opportunity to see and be seen by everyone else. There was laughter, and cheering, and none of the sneering coldness that possessed them when they walked the Hogwarts halls.

"Cracking, isn't it?" said Theo. He sighed, and tipped his head on Draco's shoulder. "Wouldn't it be nice if Hogwarts was always like this?"

Draco moved his shoulder, pointedly, and Theo removed his head.

"On fire?" he inquired.

"This way ." He gestured at the circle with his goblet. "Fun. Easy. Everyone here knows each other, everyone respects everyone else. Everyone's playing by the same rules."

"It's a big fire," said Draco, playing dumb. "There's not very much to get."

"You know what I mean. You notice how nothing here stinks of muggle?"

Draco swirled his cup. He had known what Theo meant.

"Careful, Nott," he said instead. "They keep an eye on people who talk like that."

"No one who can hear me disagrees." Theo's eyes slid sidelong. "Unless, of course, you do."

Draco took a sip of wine, swallowed, and wet his lips.

“I’m sure I don’t know what you mean,” he said.

“Well, you spend a lot of time with them, up in Gryffindor Tower. It’d be understandable if it made you something of a sympathizer.”

“With whom? There are certainly no muggles in Gryffindor.”

“No, mudbloods,” said Theo casually. “They’re all over the place, aren’t they?”

“I don’t ask.”

“Yes, but you can tell.”

He couldn’t, actually. He knew most of his year because they’d said something, but for those who hadn’t, he had no clue.

He made a noncommittal noise and drank again.

“I didn’t know Granger was a mudblood,” said Theo, after a beat. “That came as a surprise, I’ll be honest. Figured she’d be half-blood, at least, with marks like hers. Bit of a shame, I might’ve fancied her otherwise—”

Draco choked.

“Oh, don’t be that way. It’s not the sixties, we can acknowledge when a mudblood is fit. I wouldn’t do anything with her, obviously. She’s no Daphne, of course, what with the teeth, but there’s something about clever girls—”

“You can talk about something else now.”

“All right, fine. Didn’t realize you were so old-school, but have it your way. Speaking of,” he said, sitting up, “have you heard about Thompson?”

He meant Leanne.

“That she’s in the Hospital Wing?” said Draco, carefully neutral.

“For half the year! Snape told us in confidence. What a windfall. Wish whoever did it would come out and say, even just to other Slytherins, I think we’d all like to buy him a drink.”

The phrase — just to other Slytherins — stuck in Draco’s mind. “You think it’s a Slytherin?”

Theo gave him a look that plainly said what a stupid question this was. “It’s vexing. I’ve gone around asking all the upperclassmen, and nobody will own to it. I suppose they’re being cautious, and for good reason. The consequences of getting caught would be tremendous.”

“I can’t imagine they wouldn’t be expelled.”

“Expelled? Bother that, you’re in for the lawsuit of your life,” said Theo mildly. “Luckily, her parents are muggles, so they wouldn’t know how to sue, but there’s all sorts of dribbly advocacy groups... The Allegiance of Muggle-Born Wizards, the British Anti-Discrimination League, Coalition for the Protection of Magical Rights…”

“It doesn’t seem worth the risk.”

“That’s what I thought,” he admitted. “Certainly not for a Slytherin, because everyone suspects us. That’s why I thought it was you, at first.”

Draco’s head snapped up.

“It wasn’t.”

“No, I don’t think it was,” Theo agreed. “Doesn’t seem like your style, now I know you better. But I wondered there, for a moment. I mean, wouldn’t it be the perfect crime? No one would suspect you. You’re a Gryffindor. You’ve got the headmaster and deputy headmistress both around your pinky finger.”

“It doesn’t work like that.”

“Sure it doesn’t,” said Theo, unconvinced. “At any rate, I told Pansy: if it was him, then we’ve really done him a disservice, because that’s the funniest thing that’s happened all year. I mean, here we are in the dungeons, doing nothing, hurting no one, and still getting pulled aside for lectures about ‘muggle-born equality’ from McGonagall, and meanwhile, the kid who did it is sitting pretty up in her own house ! And she doesn’t suspect! It would’ve been Christmas.”

His tone was wistful.

Draco found something distasteful about the conversation. Something tasted sour about it. He was, of course, a staunch traditionalist, in his mother’s fashion and his father’s, but tradition was one thing, and harm was another altogether. One didn’t have to like muggle-borns to think there was something unseemly about wanting to do violence to them. It wasn’t — mannered. It was ill-bred.

His lips thinned. “Funny,” he said.

“Yeah. Pipe dream, I suppose.” Theo lifted his goblet. “To our faceless friend.”

Draco knocked his cup against Theo’s. He lifted it to his lips, but did not drink.

House-Elves and Marigolds

Chapter 12: House-Elves and Marigolds

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

“Mister Malfoy,” said Snape, “are you aware of when class starts?”

There were few more dangerous phrases Snape could utter. Draco was not actually sure he wouldn’t have preferred the Cruciatus Curse.

He closed the door behind him. The assembled second years of Gryffindor and Slytherin House watched with macabre interest. “Yes, professor.”

Ritual humiliation was Snape’s favored style of punishment. It was, in fairness, no more than Draco had earned. He had overslept after the bonfire, and woke up five minutes past the bell, his hair rumpled, the smell of woodsmoke still clinging to his clothes.

There were two empty seats left. The first, near the front of the room, sat to Hermione’s left. The other was at a four-top with Theo, Crabbe, and Goyle, who had sequestered near the back. Theo caught his eye, and nodded to it.

Hermione turned over her shoulder and grimaced sympathetically at him. She indicated his seat.

“Ten points from Gryffindor,” announced Snape, and Draco’s housemates grumbled and sighed. “Consider it leniency that I do not take more. In the future, expect more serious repercussions for disrespecting your professors’ time.”

He didn’t know precisely why he did it — whether it was embarrassment, and a desire to sit as far from Snape’s glare as possible, or whether something Theo had said at the bonfire was still percolating in the back of his mind — but Draco dropped his bag at Theo's table and sat down quickly, before anyone could give him any more strange looks.

"Don't look so wretched, it could have been worse," said Theo, as Draco sat down. "For any other Gryffindor, it would've been twenty."

"That makes me feel ever so much better, thank you."

"Have a sulk if you like. McGonagall will give the points back in Transfiguration, anyway."

He was not wrong. McGonagall tended to hand a lot of points to Gryffindor, but that was only because Hermione routinely ran circles around the rest of the class, and with such flair it would be insulting not to award points for it. Last week, she had transformed a box of dandelion seeds into a four-foot ice sculpture of a swan so lifelike it seemed on the verge of flight, and then charmed it to waddle around the room, honking.

McGonagall had clapped. It was almost offensive.

"What's the potion?" he said briskly, flipping open his book. He wasn't interested in discussing inter-house politics any further.

"Swelling Solution. We're in teams. Shouldn't be too much work, but it calls for pufferfish eyes, and of course, we've only got whole pufferfish…"

He unbuckled his knife set. "Hand them over," he said curtly.

"No, I've got it," said Theo absently. "You measure the nettles and get the brew going."

He blinked. He was used to butchery because he usually worked with Hermione, and working with dead animals made her sick. She pretended it didn't, but she'd always volunteer to do the other tasks first, and he'd end up taking care of the butchery by default.

“Eyes can be tricky,” he said, eyeing Theo’s inexpert grip on the knife-handle.

“You don’t trust me to hack out an eyeball? Should I feel insulted?”

A muscle in his cheek twitched. Hermione wouldn’t have protested; she would have accepted that if he was asking to do something, it was because he knew he could do it better, and the potion would be better off for it. “I don’t care,” he said shortly. “Just don’t crush them while you’re getting them out, we only get two fish.”

“You make it sound like I’m trying to carve myself a carpaccio. I’m being careful, look. I can still — oh, damn.”

The first eyeball collapsed, severed by a stray nudge from his knifepoint.

“As I said,” Draco said irritably, “it’s tricky. We need three, so be more careful on the next one.”

“Someone’s quite fussy,” Theo said mildly. “You know, it won’t be the end of the world, if—”

“Excuse me?”

Hermione stood in front of their table. Draco’s heart sank. He wondered what the hell she thought she was doing, coming over here, as if Crabbe and Goyle didn’t already look prepared to spit fire at her for the audacity of showing her face.

She was holding a bag of dried nettles. “Sorry to bother,” she said tentatively, and deliberately not looking him in the eye, “but I wondered if you had any extra pufferfish eyes?”

His heart sank even further.

She hurried to explain, “I had some extra dried nettles, so I thought I could trade you, to save you some time—”

“And why would we do that?” Theo said coolly.

Hermione balked slightly. “Well,” she said, “apart from saving you time, as it happens, I’m not terribly fond of butchering, so I thought…”

“That you’d ask us to cover for your weakness?” Theo clucked his tongue. “Come now, Granger, that’s not how it works.”

“I’m not asking you to cover for anything,” she said indignantly. “It’s a perfectly fair trade. I didn’t come here hat-in-hand—”

“It seems to me like you’re getting something you need in exchange for something we don’t.”

She scowled. “I’m not talking to you, anyway,” she said haughtily. “I’m talking to Draco.”

“Yeah? Doesn’t seem like it benefits him, either.”

“I’ll let him answer that.”

Draco, who was staring at the floor, lifted his eyes. “We don’t have spare pufferfish eyes,” he told her. “Nott fudged one. Ask Potter for help cutting yours.”

He felt, rather than saw, her scowl of confusion. “Are you all right?” she asked.

“Of course I am. Why wouldn’t I be?”

“You were late this morning, and you’re not sitting in your seat.”

“I fancied a change. You should sit down.”

“Is something wrong?” she said. “Did I do something?”

This was excruciating. If one could bottle the earnestness in her voice, they could use it for interrogations in Azkaban.

Unexpectedly, Goyle grunted, “She bothering you, Malfoy?”

Draco looked at him, alarmed. From Goyle, this was an unprecedented declaration of fidelity, and some part of him was warmed by it, at the same time as the rest of him was panicking about what to do.

“No,” he said. To Hermione, he said, “You really should sit down.”

“You haven’t answered me! Why are you sitting back here?”

“Granger—”

“I don’t think Malfoy’s been particularly unclear,” drawled Theo, resting an arm on Draco’s chair. “He’s asked you twice, nicely, to leave us alone. I think if it gets to a third time, I’d have cause to tell Snape you’re trying to distract us.”

“I’m not!”

“Professor?” said Theo, raising his hand. “Granger’s bothering us.”

Snape looked up from the lectern, his sneer cold. “Find your seat, Miss Granger,” he called. He spoke so loudly the whole class could hear him. “Let Mister Malfoy and Mister Nott finish their potion. I hope yours is not so mediocre that you feel the need to sabotage others’ work.”

“But I wasn’t, professor! I came over to ask—”

“You were asked to find your seat, not to explain yourself,” said Snape, examining his fingernails. “Five points for Gryffindor, for the inability to understand instructions.”

Hermione’s hands curled into fists at her sides. Her jaw hardened, and she blinked back tears of frustration. Stonily, she marched back to her seat.

“Knacker,” said Ron, in a low voice.

“What was that, Mister Weasley?”

Draco hoped against hope that Ron would take the chance, for once in his life, to simply let the thing be.

But Ron never missed an opportunity to prove Draco Malfoy a fool.

“I said, she was asking for help,” Ron said loudly, throwing down his knife. Harry nodded, his expression furious. “If you don’t want her to get up, maybe you ought to — I don’t know — offer to help her? Like a teacher would?”

Titters rose from the other Gryffindors. Hermione shrank in on herself, looking miserable. Theo muttered something about weasels under his breath.

Snape said silkily, “Twenty-five points from Gryffindor, for cheek. One word and it's detention, Weasley.”

“Shocker,” said Ron, undeterred. “Didn’t see that coming. Here’s another one: why don’t you ask what Nott and Malfoy were saying to her? You notice she’s looking pretty upset? Is that something you’re worried about, or can you only see it when the student’s wearing green?”

“Detention,” said Snape, with a stare that could have leveled castles. “Two weeks. If you continue to disrupt class, I will remove you from it.”

Ron blew out a long breath, and fell silent, folding his arms. Hermione covered her face in her hands.

Theo leaned over and gave a low whistle in Draco’s ear. “You have to admit, they bring it on themselves. Snape’s only being fair.”

He scowled. “You didn’t have to make a scene.”

“What are you talking about?” Theo was dumbfounded.

“With Granger. You didn’t have to go after her.”

“I didn’t go after her.”

“You were rude.”

“It was competitive banter,” said Theo, bemused. “It was — a bit of inter-house competition, that’s all. Daphne hears worse than that from me every morning—”

“Granger doesn’t,” Draco snapped. “And it’s not inter-house competition, Nott, need I remind you. That’s thirty points you just lost me.”

Then, spitefully, he seized the remaining pufferfish from Theo’s station, and freed the eyeball in three brisk cuts.

Draco arrived at second-period Defense Against the Dark Arts prepared to offer Hermione Granger two arguments, three excuses, and several very good lies explaining why she shouldn’t be angry with him. As it happened, he didn’t have the chance to try any of them: Harry and Ron had arrived first, and wedged an extra chair in at their desk, so she was sandwiched safely between them for the duration of the lesson, and Draco was left by himself.

It became apparent that he was being punished once the lesson started. He tried to get Hermione’s attention, first by waving, and then a harsh: “Psst!” and finally a written note, which he crumpled up and lobbed across the aisle at her head. But Harry snatched it out of the air without looking, and deliberately dropped it beneath his foot.

“Potter,” he hissed. Harry lifted an eyebrow at him.

“What?” he mouthed.

“Give that to Granger.”

He frowned and shook his head.

“What? Why not?”

Harry glanced at the professor — Podmore was occupied answering a Hufflepuff’s question about gnomes — and leaned over. “Because you’re a git,” he informed him.

“Me? I didn’t do anything!”

Harry gave him a flat look.

“I sat with someone else! Is that a crime?”

He rolled his eyes and turned back to his book.

“Hey! Potter!” Draco threw another wad of parchment at him. “Listen!”

This one smacked him on the side of the head. He glowered.

“I didn’t mean for Snape to dock her points,” he said in a low voice. “Nott called him down, not me.”

Harry stared at him.

“That’s it?” he said. “You think we’re cross because you lost points?”

“Well, in point of fact, Weasley was the one who—”

“You’re barking if you think that’s all it is. If you really don’t understand, then I really don’t want anything to do with you.”

“I don’t understand,” said Draco, only half lying. “I didn’t do anything to you. ”

Harry shook his head.

Draco sat back in his seat, huffing. Podmore was saying cheerfully, “Now, of course, the curse you’ll want is a clever little spell called Rictosempra Minor, which will slow its heartbeat to a state of slumber…"

"Much like this class," he muttered, loud enough for others to hear. Susan Bones gave him a dark look and pressed her finger to her lips, but Hermione gave a little snort that might have been a chuckle.

For the rest of the day, Harry and Ron flanked Hermione like a pair of guardsmen.

It was intolerable. He hadn't even done anything wrong. And he was expected to apologize — well, he wouldn't, not to them. His father never would have let himself be bullied into an apology, and neither would he.

Now, for Granger, perhaps, some amends might be in order. But only because she had been trying to ask him an innocent question, and because Nott had been a tosser. That wasn't her fault, and she had a bad time of it. It didn't seem fair that her day ought to be ruined on account of Nott's bad judgment, or Snape's preference for Slytherins.

At dinner, he sat by himself, stewing. After the meal was over, he hopped up and dashed up to the common room early, taking the stairs two by two. Hermione would be there before anyone else. She always left dinner early on Mondays, because she did her Charms homework for Friday on Monday evenings, like the maniacal little over-achiever she was, and Harry and Ron always stayed late for pudding. Ron's appetite was a constant more reliable than gravity.

Her habits didn't fail him; as the bell struck seven, she came hurrying through the portrait hole, absent either of the boys.

"Granger," he said briskly, striding out of the shadows. "This is silly."

"Draco!" She dropped her books, and they landed with a punctuating thump. "Why are you lurking in the common room?"

He paused, put out.

“I live here,” he said indignantly.

“Yes, I know that, but—”

“And here’s another thing, I object to that term, ‘lurking,’ when I’m only standing here—”

“Lurk,” she said, “verb: ‘be or remain hidden, so as to wait.’ Is that not what you’re doing?”

“It connotes some sort of ambush.”

“Yes, I’m aware.”

“I’m not trying to ambush you.”

“Aren’t you?” she asked.

There was a pause.

“Are we going to talk about this morning?” she said stiffly. “Because if we’re not, I’d — I’d rather like to go up to bed, please. I have reading to do.”

“Charms,” he said automatically.

“…Yes.”

“I know.”

She adjusted her grip on her books. He shuffled his feet. For some reason, neither of them did anything.

“Merlin. Come on, then,” he snapped. He strode past her and hauled open the portrait door.

“No,” she said, blinking. “Where are you going?”

“I’m not going anywhere with you unless you explain yourself!”

“Yes, you are.” He stepped down the portrait-hole and held the door.

“I’m not! And here’s another thing,” she said, stepping after him. “I think I ought to make you apologize for this morning before we go anywhere. I didn’t do anything to you, and it was horrid, and I felt incredibly stupid, and you didn’t say a word.”

She continued to explain herself, in his wake, as he trotted down a back-staircase to the ground floor, and cut through a secluded courtyard to the lawns.

“...and I really did feel awful about it, not to mention the thirty points, which might have been Ron but he wouldn’t have done them if you’d only been a little more decent, and I don’t think —” She stopped. “Where are we going?”

“No, keep going, we’re almost there,” he said, feeling almost cheerful. He headed down the gentle slope of the lawns from the castle, down a set of stone steps, past the place where Ginny had knocked down Pansy.

“Well, as I was saying,” she huffed, “I’m not going anywhere with you until I get an apology.”

“Right. This morning was an unmitigated disaster, and it won’t happen again.” He would do a better job of keeping Theo apart from Hermione in the future. They clearly couldn’t be trusted to interact on their own.

She frowned. “That’s not really an apology.”

“Isn’t it close enough?” he said irritably, as they drew up to the quidditch pitch. “I’m not going to drop on my knees and beg your forgiveness, for anything, and least of all a little tiff with Nott. Besides, if you'd pay attention, I'm about to make it up to you."

"That's not — you're what?"

"Alohamora. Making it up to you. Keep up."

"Making it up how?" she said suspiciously.

"Doing something nice. Merlin knows why, it's never once helped me."

Hermione seemed to notice where she was for the first time. "I'm not sure that we're supposed to be here," she fretted. "If we're not practicing for quidditch…"

"Nonsense. Students can use the pitch whenever there's no practice or a game on, so long as it's their own broom and they're not breaking curfew."

"Those rules only apply to members of the quidditch team," she said doubtfully.

He hip-checked open the door to the Gryffindor locker room, and grinned at her. "Right you are, Granger," he said. "And you're looking at Gryffindor's only Reserve Seeker."

The locker room was dustier and smellier than Slytherin's, but otherwise the same. He noticed one of Fred's robes draped over a bench, and a bespelled speaker that Wood used to give orders at practice. His Nimbus was tucked in the back of the spare broom closet, locked in its case, to discourage sticky fingers.

She eyed it warily. "I told Harry," she said, "I'm not watching you practice flying. It's all fun and games for you, but it's terribly boring for those of us on the ground."

"I quite agree." He hauled out the set of practice balls and mounted his broom on his shoulder.

“Oh, no,” she said, alarmed. “I’m not — I don’t like it. I’m no use with sports. I’ve no interest in them. It’s helpless. My mother enrolled me in girls’ football, it was disastrous, I scored twice on my own goal and got hit in the head.”

“Were the two events related?”

“What?”

“Nothing. And anyway, of course you didn’t like that rubbish, it’s muggle sports.”

“It’s not rubbish,” she said unconvincingly. “I'm just not interested in it. And anyway, wizarding sports aren’t any better, they’re loads more dangerous, and flying is a nightmare—”

“How do you know?” He flexed his fingers, warming the leather glove.

“Because I’ve tried it, and I loathed it utterly!”

“You haven’t.”

“I have, in fact, Madam Hooch made us all spend a miserable forty-five minutes—”

“That’s not real flying.”

“Was so. I was twelve feet in the air,” she said primly, “and hated every second.”

“That doesn’t count,” he said. “The only person you’ve ever flown with is you, and you’re rubbish. You ought to try it with someone who knows how.”

“You mean — oh, no.” She shook her head forcefully. “No. No, Draco, no.”

“Don’t be such a priss.”

“Well I’m not going to do barrel rolls with you on the back, am I,” he said, irked. “Listen. If you try it, and you really hate it, you’ll get to hand me a big stinking ‘I told you so.’ Won’t that be a treat?”

She pouted. But she followed him onto the pitch, muttering that she could do that just as well with both feet on the ground.

November’s first evening bloomed cool and still, and her sky was veined with clouds and stars like a piece of lapis lazuli. The grass crackled wet beneath their feet. Draco set down the practice set and unlatched the trunk. “Pay attention,” he said, “because I’m tired of explaining the score every time there’s a game. Quaffle, bludger, snitch. Quaffle: goes in the hoop, ten points. Snitch: you catch it, one hundred and fifty points, game over. Quite simple.”

“That doesn’t make any sense,” she pointed out. “Why wouldn’t everyone just dash after the snitch?”

“Because then you wouldn’t have a game, first off, and second off, it’s an automatic forfeit if anyone but the seeker touches it. Anyway, they usually disappear for the first quarter or two — they go hide in the stands or something, give the Chasers a chance to rack up points.”

“So what if a spectator catches it?”

“Interesting question,” he said brightly, unbuckling the snitch from its berth. “Happened a couple of times in the major leagues. The first time, in 1947, the referees couldn’t figure out what to do; they ended up giving the points to the fan’s team. Obviously, this was heinous. So the League gets together and decides that it doesn’t count, and to discourage pilfering, anyone that tries to tell the seeker where it is incurs a penalty of seventy-five points on the seeker.” The snitch’s wings sprouted from its sides, and spun like a hummingbird’s. He showed it to Hermione. “Rarely happens, anyway. Most people are too busy watching the match. Real snitchionados—”

She burst out laughing.

“What’s funny?”

“Snitch– snitchion– snitch-whats?”

“It’s a perfectly legitimate term,” he said crossly. “People who spend the match watching for the snitch instead of watching the game.”

“This is why I can’t take sports seriously, it’s so — I mean, honestly! And with a straight face, too!”

He scowled. “What, because that’s so much sillier than ‘football’? Foot-ball? That’s the stupidest thing I’ve ever heard. Do they call pottery ‘hand-clay’? Is music ‘sound-make’?”

“Go on, then, have a laugh. We’ll see who’s laughing when we’re in the air.” He released the snitch, and it darted off into the blue night.

“Oh, don’t say that, I’ll puke,” she said, sobering.

“Do it and I’ll drop you,” he said, swinging his leg over the Nimbus. “On my father’s house, I will drop you. If I feel so much as an intimation that vomit may be at any time approaching my person, I’m offloading all passenger cargo, immediately.”

“Draco!”

“You think I’m joking? This is cashmere.”

He kicked off, and hovered at waist height. She stood at his hip, dithering. “There’s not much room on the broom,” she said hesitantly.

“No, it’s not a tandem bicycle. You’ll have to hold on to me, I’m steering.”

“And — and it won’t be too hard for you to do? With the extra weight? It’ll change the center of balance.”

“I’ll manage.”

“Have you done this before?”

“Why, you’re stalling,” he said, intrigued. “And you, being a lion and all.”

She wrung her hands. “But it’s really not safe—”

“I understand,” he said sympathetically, shaking his head. “And you know what, when we get back to the castle, I’ll help you find Flitwick, so you can ask if there are any slots left in Ravenclaw.”

She gave an indignant cry, and said, “Oh — you sneak, don’t think I don’t see what you’re — hold it still, I’m coming up!”

He grinned and held out his arm, which she grasped to haul herself up. She did it remarkably smoothly, for her first time, straddling the broomstick with only a slight wobble, and then sat down hard behind his hips. He gripped the handle to keep it from bucking.

“There,” she said tightly, putting her hands on her knees. “I did it. See? Not scared.”

“Masterfully done. You’re going to want to lean forward, now, unless you fancy sliding off the back.” He pulled the broom a few feet higher, and his toes lifted off the ground.

She lurched forward, whimpering.

“That’ll do, I suppose. Arms around my waist.”

“What?”

“My waist, Granger, do I have to explain everything? Haven’t you ever seen — never mind, stupid question. Just… here, give me your hands.”

He fastened her hands around his sternum like buckling a harness. She scooted forward, and her cheek pressed against his shoulder.

“You’ll have to speak up if you want me to hear something,” he said. “The wind kicks up and it’s rather loud.”

“Actually,” she said, “I’ve changed my mind. This was a terrible idea, and I’d like to go down, please.”

“Oh, certainly,” he agreed. “Eventually.”

“Oh, no, no, no—”

He took off, and her scream lifted a flock of starlings from the trees across the lake.

They soared to the crest of the quidditch towers and did a loop around the pitch, slow, crawling by Draco’s standards, but Hermione didn’t stop screaming until they leveled out and flew parallel to the ground again. Handling the broomstick was more difficult with someone else on the back, and he couldn’t move as fast, but that was perhaps for the better, because every time he changed direction, she gave a scream and clutched his waist like a liferaft in a monsoon. In so doing, she drove the breath from his lungs, and he grunted, “Easy,” at which she would lessen her grip, but not by much.

He drifted out of the pitch and drew an S-curve over the treetops, careful to turn slowly, so the witch wouldn’t try to put out his eardrums again. She had buried her face in his back when they took off and had not looked up since.

“Granger, you’re missing the view.” The sun was crawling beneath the lake, and shards of gold bloodied the sky around it in a carnage of gilded pink.

“No, I’m not.”

“You are. Your eyes are closed.”

“You can’t know that.”

“What am I pointing at?”

“The sky,” she said. “A tree. The lake.”

“Trick question, I wasn’t. Open them up.”

“You can’t make me.”

“You’re perfectly safe. I haven’t dropped you yet, have I?”

He felt her head rise. “That’s a fallacy,” she informed him. “Actually, a rather common one, and quite insidious. It’s called the gambler’s fallacy, and it refers to the belief that separate, independent events can jointly affect the probability of future independent — oh God.”

She headbutted him in the back.

“You see it?”

“Why did you take us so high! There’s no need for us to be up here!”

“No need?” he repeated, as the valley of Hogwarts unfolded beneath them like a diorama. The sunset crowned the castle parapets in deep shadows. “Well, there’s no need for the Elgin Marbles, either. But you’d still like to see them, every now and then.”

“Not if it could kill me!”

“People have died for beauty. Take Hector.”

“In the context of war,” she said, “and also, incidentally, not his choice, which is the point of — oh, you did it again!” And she buried her head back in his shoulder.

“I’m actually rather proud of this,” he said, to no one in particular. “Flying with a passenger isn’t difficult at all. I thought it’d be harder.”

“YOU’VE NEVER DONE IT?”

“Ow. We’re the only ones up here, there’s no need to shout.”

“YOU SAID YOU KNEW HOW!”

“I do know how,” he said, proudly. “I’ve seen it done loads of times, and I’ve ridden tandem before. It didn’t look that complicated, and it’s not.”

She moaned nauseously. He sent a suspicious look over his shoulder, but the vomit forecast seemed clear.

“I’m going to jinx you,” she said, into the back of his neck. Her fingers dug into his waist like she was imagining his neck between them. “When I get down from here, just wait till I get my wand, and I’ll jinx you. I’ll find that nasty one Fred was talking about, the one that makes you puke slugs.”

“You wouldn’t dare.”

“I’m trapped on a floating twig three hundred feet in the air, Draco Lucius Malfoy, do not tell me what I would and wouldn’t dare.”

He wrinkled his nose. “Don’t do that, you sound like my mother,” he said. Banking, he cut a lazy swoop down to the canopy level, and coasted around the edge of the lake. Hermione, clinging tightly, peeked over his shoulder.

“There it is,” he said, pointing. “Do you see it?”

The snitch was speeding steadily along the surface of the lake, its wings skimming a line of foam up from the surf.

“The ball?” she said. “You’re not going to try to catch it, are you? Oh!”

He dipped and sped along the water, so low that sprays of foam brushed their ankles. A wind off the water hopped up and ruffled his hair, and he bent low, forcing Hermione to bend with him, his arm outstretched.

The snitch swerved hard, and he turned, following the arc of the ball. The end of the broom drifted close to the water, kicking up a splash, and Hermione shrieked.

Cool metal struck the surface of his palm. He hauled it in, and pulled up, and they rose from the surface, spilling lakewater and mist. The trail of his broom drew a rainbow over the lake.

“Did you see that?” he called, exhilarated. “Did you see it? Now, that was a catch!”

She didn’t answer, being reduced to inchoate muttering.

“Reserve Seeker, my arse,” he announced. “Goes to show you. If Wood had seen that, he’d be sorry. He’d be begging me to take Potter’s place. What’s that? Oh, don’t whinge, we’re going back down.”

“You know, that really wasn’t so bad,” she said brightly. “It’s not my sport, but I can see the appeal.”

“Sorry, what was that? I’m a bit deaf.”

“Oh, excuse me. I said ‘nice try, I’m not repeating myself.’”

They ended up in the kitchens afterward, because Hermione kept complaining that flying made her cold, and he promised to get her a hot drink if it would shut her up.

They stooped through the portrait door. The kitchens were a warm, brassy space, filled with steam and wood and copper pots and pans, with a roaring fireplace at the back that filled the room with light. A host of house-elves animated it, and filled it with a breathless energy: everywhere one looked, there was an elf chopping vegetables, stirring sauces, carrying dishes, all of them chatting jovially in a series of clicks and squeaks.

One of them greeted Draco at the door. The elf wore a potato sack with the Hogwarts embroidered on the shoulder, and epaulets.

“Evening, Spratt.”

“Good evening, sir,” it said, in a voice that was slow, sad, and deeply nasal. “Might we interest you in some nibbles?”

Draco rubbed his hands together, trying to work the chill out of them. “That sounds excellent. Something simple, we’d like it quick.”

“Very good, sir. And would sir like some hot cocoa with his nibbles?”

“If it wouldn’t trouble you.”

They sat at a low wooden table near the fireplace. Draco wriggled out of his shoes and set them by the hearth, so they could dry, and hung his robe over a rack close to the fire. Hermione followed slowly, staring at everything with naked astonishment.

“Come on and sit down,” he urged, nudging the other stool with his foot. “It’s warm over here, and you were the one fussing about the chill.”

“Draco,” she whispered, “these are house-elves.”

“What about it?”

“You remember what Podmore said about them!” She stumbled onto the stool, still staring. “Do you think they’re all… I mean, they can’t all … Dumbledore wouldn’t let them be enslaved, would he?”

He rolled his eyes. “Spare me.”

“I’m serious!” she whispered. “It’s horrible, what wizards do to the house-elves, and it’s even more horrible that no one seems to care about it! I’ve asked every professor since that lesson what’s being done at Hogwarts to advance house-elf rights, and none of them have an answer! There’s no student groups, no activism, no nothing!”

“That’s not true.”

“What do you mean?”

“There are lobbyists for house-elves,” he said. “It’s just that they’re all nutters, and nobody pays attention to them.”

“It’s not nutters to want to free slaves!”

He leaned on his knees, impatient. “First of all, Hogwarts elves aren’t bound, they’re paid. You see those little badges?”

“Yes, what about them?”

“That means they were given clothes. They’re not chained to Hogwarts. They can leave if they like. But where will they go? They’re house-elves. They can’t own property. They can’t hold a job. They can’t very well open a Gringotts account to keep their savings, even if they could, not with goblin-elf relations being what they are, and anyway, they couldn’t spend the money, even if they wanted to. If you’re a house-elf, Hogwarts is the best life you’re likely to get.”

While he spoke, Hermione had grown more and more excited.

“But that’s exactly why people need to advocate for them!” she exclaimed. “Because they can’t do any of those things! Because they ought to be able to own property, and get jobs, and spend money on their own! Can't you see?"

He thought about Dobby, at home, carefully wrapping a box of gifts to ship off to Hogwarts. He wondered if Hermione would think differently if she met him, and then immediately nixed the idea. That would require Hermione coming to the Manor, and meeting his mother, and there was a myriad of diversely catastrophic reasons that couldn't happen.

"I can see that you have a lot of feelings about this."

Spratt reappeared with two tall mugs of cocoa and a silver cloche. "Bruschette, with a balsamic reduction, sun-dried tomatoes, and fresh mozzarella," he intoned drearily. "And: cocoa."

"Thank you, Spratt," Hermione said stiffly. "We appreciate that very much."

Draco lifted an eyebrow at her.

"At ease," he mumbled.

"Shut up."

Spratt bowed, and left them.

"These are so posh," Hermione said, marveling at the little canoes of bread, which were each piled high with a flotilla of greenery, a rosebud of a tomato, and a pillow of mozzarella. "My parents always gave me string cheese or graham crackers."

Draco shrugged, sipping his cocoa. It was hot and creamy, with a hint of espresso. "Spratt knows what I like," he said.

She shook her head ruefully. "I bet you've never even had a graham cracker."

"I don't know what those are, so odds are slim."

“So you’ve never had a s’more, either!” The prospect appalled her.

“You needn’t sound so surprised,” he said sourly. “You didn’t know what a Chocolate Frog was when I met you.”

“I knew what they were, I just didn’t know they could move. But you’ve never heard of a s’more at all? With the little Hershey’s bars, and marshmallows?”

He brightened. “Oh, I know what those are.”

“Marshmallows?”

“Yes. My mum likes them,” he said, carefully lifting one of the little towers.

Hermione hummed thoughtfully, and licked up a drift of whipped cream. “I don’t know why that surprises me,” she said, after a moment. “I suppose I don’t know much about your family, except that they’re wizards. And that they’re rather posh. So I wouldn’t see your mother as the marshmallow type.”

“She won’t admit it. My Aunt Andy — we’re not supposed to talk about her, she was disinherited — brought them home one summer, after her boyfriend gave her some to share. Mother told me they ate the whole pack in one go. Granny Black never knew.”

Hermione blinked, as if she wasn’t quite sure where to start. “Your aunt was disinherited?” she said. “That’s… dramatic.”

“Well, she married a muggle-born,” he said matter-of-factly.

There was a beat of silence, a powerful one, like someone had dropped something heavy.

“It was a long time ago,” he said, presently. “My grandfather was very traditional.”

“Of course.” Her tone was deliberately neutral.

He sighed. “Granger, it’s nothing to do with you. The Blacks have been pureblood for centuries; they're Sacred Twenty-Eight. My aunt would have put an end to all of that. Most wizards wouldn’t care. If it were Potter’s family, or Weasley’s, it wouldn’t matter.”

“But yours is different,” she said, rolling her mug between her hands. “For some reason.”

“Yes, it is. The Blacks were related to most pureblood families in Britain. They were the family, the magical line. It mattered what they did.” He paused. “It didn’t matter so much, for everyone else.”

“Past tense,” she said suddenly. Her eyes glinted like she’d caught a trick question.

“Hm?”

“You used the past tense. To talk about your family. Did something happen to them?”

He palmed his cup, and felt the warmth seep into his fingers. “My mother’s the last one,” he said shortly. “It’s a long story. The Blacks — there was something of a collapse, twenty years ago. A whole generation of them vanished, died, or left in disgrace.”

“Oh,” said Hermione softly. “I’m very sorry.”

He flinched. “I didn’t know them.”

“For your mother, I mean,” she said. “That must have been horrible for her. I very much hope she’s all right.”

He found himself staring at her knees, because he was certain her face was doing something earnest and kind and unendurable.

“Don’t let her hear you pitying her,” he said, aiming for flippancy, landing in weak sarcasm. “She’d have your tongue out for it.”

“I don’t pity her. Well, I suppose I do, a little bit,” she amended. “But mostly I was thinking how miserable my mum would be, if my dad died, and she didn't have any family to comfort her. I wouldn’t wish that on anybody. Even your mother, though I know she probably wouldn’t like me very much.”

It would not have comforted his mother in the least to hear herself compared, in any way, to a muggle. But he knew Hermione was trying to be kind, and a warm stir of gratitude was happening somewhere in his traitorous chest, despite his best efforts to stifle it.

He spun his signet ring. It had become something of a tic. His mother would have pinched his wrist and told him not to fidget.

“What’s that?” said Hermione.

“Is it? No, really?”

He smirked. “It’s a signet ring,” he said, slipping it off and handing it to her.

She held it to the firelight and inspected the stone. “It’s very intricate,” she remarked. “Oh! I recognize this from your letters. The wax.”

“I used it to seal them.” He took it back. “The signet is the mark of authenticity. So you know a letter is from the head of house.”

She frowned. “Why wouldn’t that be your mother?” she said. “She’s older than you. Or can’t women be heads of house, in the Wizarding World?”

He heard the suspicion in her tone, and he smiled. “They can,” he said. “But not by marrying in. Inheritance passes through strict primogeniture, girls or boys. Something to do with wards and blood signatures. Anyway, she’s head of the house of Black, and I’m head of the house of Malfoy.” He slid the ring back on, and fluttered his fingers. “The last one.”

“For now,” she pointed out.

“Fair point. Although I haven’t any designs on that in the near future.”

“I should think not.” She sipped her cocoa, and said idly, “You know, I’m quite surprised by how backwards all your technology is. If it weren’t all backed up by magic, muggles would be miles ahead of you.”

He arched his eyebrow. “Really.”

“Yes. I mean, take wax sigils. They’re quite unsafe; if you take a hot knife and run them under the seal, you can pop them off and pop them back on again. It’s terribly insecure.” She daubed primly at her mouth with a napkin. “I’d imagine wizards get their mail stolen all the time.”

He rankled. “That’s still better than leaving your post in a box outside your house.”

“I’m not saying it isn’t, and if muggles and wizards put their heads together on this, I’m sure we could come up with something so nobody got their letters stolen.”

He acknowledged this with a grunt. “It’s not the most secure thing in the world,” he admitted. “But you’re not the first to think of it.” He paused, and then — without fully knowing why — he added, “My mother and I write in code to each other, sometimes.”

She looked up in interest. The full weight of Hermione’s attention was a palpable thing, heavy, and pleasurable, like a warm blanket. He felt the quantity of intelligence being concentrated on him, and it made him glow with self-importance.

“Really? Like a cipher?”

“Nothing that complex. It’s all symbology. She’ll write to me about her ‘garden,’ and references to different flowers mean different things.”

“Like Victorian flower language,” she said, delighted.

“Conceptually, I suppose. White roses mean safety; red, danger; yellow indicates a question… carnations mean an insult, marigolds, forgiveness, and so on. Jasmine means me, so she might write, ‘I’m putting red roses in with the jasmines, this year,’ and it would mean ‘you’re in danger.’”

“Jasmine,” she said thoughtfully. “Where does that come from?”

“Sincerely no idea. She came up with it all.” He drained his cup. “Are you finished? I’m knackered, and you’ve still got your Charms for Friday to do.”

“Goodness, I forgot about that,” she said, smacking her forehead. “I’m so behind! I’m wrecked. I won’t finish before midnight, and then I’ll be tired, and then I won’t do well in Transfiguration tomorrow, which is really such a shame; I was so excited, we’re starting on animal transfig, that’s supposed to be really hard—”

“True,” he said blithely, helping her to her feet. “You’re probably screwed. I’ll be shocked if you pass the year.”

“Draco! You don’t mean it? Oh, you’re joking.”

“No, I’m serious. Your academic career is done for,” he said, as they picked their way to the door. Hermione insisted on saying thank-you to every house-elf they passed, which slowed them down considerably. “You’ll have to take a Kwikspell course. In fact, you might as well pack your bags tonight, instead of wasting your time with Charms.”

She hit his shoulder. “Don’t say that! Knock on wood!”

He reached for her head, and she swatted his hand away, laughing. “Git.”

“Madwoman. Do your Charms on Thursday, like the rest of us.”

“But Thursday’s when I do my Potions.”

“For Monday?”

“Naturally.”

“And on Sunday night…?”

“Wednesday’s Astronomy,” she said simply.

He gave a strangled laugh. “You should donate your brain to science, so they can study it for worms.”

“You should donate yours,” she said, breathless, and with the excitement of someone about to commit a violent crime: “Then at least someone would get to use it!”

She skittered out of reach and tumbled out the portrait-door, laughing. He gave chase, wrestling with his facial features to get them into some sort of dignified order.

Their laughter died as they crossed the threshold of the portrait-hole: not for lack of mirth, but because lying beneath the door was something so arresting that Hermione gave a shriek and leapt away. Draco scrambled to avoid stepping on it, and his foot crunched on something brittle. He checked under his foot, and the shattered remains of a flashbulb lay strewn across the floor, littered beside the rigid body of its owner.

It was Colin Creevey.

Yuletide

Chapter 13: Yuletide

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

“Tell me again, Mister Malfoy, what you and Miss Granger were doing when you found him?”

It was late. The candles guttered low in McGonagall’s office, and two pieces of hair hung loose somewhat from her scalp-straining bun, suggesting that she had been indulging in some version of leisure before Filch hauled them in.

“We were getting some food,” blurted Hermione, ever incapable of leaving a teacher’s question unanswered. “We’d just come back from a walk around the grounds, and we were hungry. Percy said the kitchens were open to students.”

Draco marveled proudly at the dexterity with which she (1) lied, and (2) punted Percy Weasley unceremoniously under the bus. He could’ve done no better himself.

“And you were alone? Just the two of you, no other students?”

“No one. Ask the house-elves,” he assured McGonagall. “Spratt will remember us.”

McGonagall paced. “And you heard nothing, while you were in the kitchens? No disturbances? No sound of a fight?”

“It’s rather loud in the kitchens, professor,” Draco objected. “And the possibility of nonverbal magic—”

“I know.” She sank into her chair, massaging her temples. “My apologies. You understand the extraordinary worry that this has caused among the faculty.”

“Of course,” said Hermione. Her voice was wooden. “He was muggle-born, wasn’t he? Colin? That’s why he was attacked.”

Draco had known that, but he hadn’t remembered it until she brought it up.

“He was.” McGonagall’s tone, while far from soft, lost a fraction of its usual steel. “I assure you, Miss Granger, Hogwarts will do everything possible to ensure the safety of its muggle-born students.”

He couldn’t imagine this was a very comforting promise, considering what had just happened. Hermione didn’t seem assured either.

“In the meantime, we are concentrating on measures to secure the school. Curfew will be moved up to sunset; professors will escort students of all ages to and from their classes. You will be required to check in with a prefect at mealtimes—”

“That’s not fair!”

“Mister Malfoy, restrain yourself.”

He scowled.

“Other security measures will be taken,” she continued, “as we continue to investigate. I acknowledge that these are sacrifices. I apologize to both of you, on behalf of the school, and on my own behalf, for the fear and worry that has been inflicted on both of you tonight. If you would like to discuss these events at length, I would offer my office hours as a place to do so.”

A knock came at the door. McGonagall said, “That will be Filch. Mister Malfoy, he will escort you back to Gryffindor Tower. Miss Granger, if you would linger for a moment; I would like a word.”

Draco almost objected, but Hermione’s face was still white as a sheet. She glanced at him and nodded.

He decided not to raise a fuss. “See you tomorrow,” he muttered to Hermione, and slunk out of the office.

As he was shutting the door, he heard McGonagall murmur, “Have a biscuit, Granger.”

The new rules came down hard and fast. Ron complained loudly of how breakfast check-ins forced everyone to get up earlier. Percy Weasley planted himself on the grand staircase with a massive scroll, crossing off names, and editorializing whenever someone was late: “Safety is no laughing matter, Mister Jordan!” or “Spending a little too much time in the powder room, are we, Miss Patil?”

“Should’ve been a Slytherin,” Ron muttered one afternoon, when he and Draco were three minutes late to lunch. “Righteous git. Bet he’s glad this all happened — who cares if someone’s in the Hospital Wing, so long as he feels important?”

“He would’ve done quite well in Slytherin,” Draco agreed.

“Don’t say it like a compliment.”

They laid Creevey next to Thompson, and the Gryffindors took turns keeping him company. On Monday, Fred and George played a game of Exploding Snap at his bedside, pretending to let the immobile Creevey win; on Tuesday, Lavender and Parvati painted his nails, and fastened a friendship bracelet around his tiny wrist. On Wednesday, Seamus Finnigan somehow snuck in his boombox, and played him a new album called “Rage Against the Machine,” or as much of it as he could finish before Madam Pomfrey chased him out.

Besides these visits, one guest remained an erstwhile presence at Creevey’s side. A first year Hufflepuff named Justin Finch-Fletchley had parked himself by the bed and refused to leave. Evidence suggested he slept in his chair, and subsisted on whatever food Madam Pomfrey could force on him. When Harry and Draco visited later in the week, Finch-Fletchley was still there, reading aloud from The Standard Book of Spells.

“I don’t want him to get behind,” he explained, when Harry asked what he was doing. He had a low, dull voice, and Draco was reminded of how much louder Creevey had been when they’d met. “Mum says people in comas can hear what people are saying, sometimes, even if they can’t talk back.”

Draco was about to point out that even if Creevey could hear, listening to someone read a description of a spell he’d never cast wouldn’t help him with exams. But Harry, perhaps intuiting that his next remark would be along these lines, stepped on Draco’s foot, and said, “That’s really nice, Justin. Let us know if you need anything, yeah?”

“Okay,” said Finch-Fletchley dully, in the tone of someone who had heard this dozens, if not hundreds of times, and went back to his reading.

Ginny Weasley, who sat next to Creevey in Charms, had become agitated by the changes. She rallied some of the other pureblood and half-blood first years and traveled in a phalanx around the muggle-borns. Rarely did a muggle-born first year request to use the bathroom without Ginny or one of her friends springing up and begging to go, too.

Meanwhile, hidden from the teachers, a roaring trade in talismans, amulets, and other protective devices was sweeping the school. Neville Longbottom had taken to hanging a fat, odiferous green onion from the foot of his bed, and allowed a newt tail to rot on his bedside table, before the smell finally drove Percy to put his foot down and Vanished both with a judicious sweep of his wand.

“Neville, you’re a pureblood,” Hermione sighed, when Neville complained of the loss. “If anyone’s safe…”

“That’s no help. It’s muggle-borns first, but squibs next,” said Neville miserably. “That’s the way it always goes. I’ve read history books.”

He had been acting gloomy of late because his Potions score had dropped ten points on the last assignment, and despite Draco's coaching, and he was once more within range of a failing grade.

In the second week of December, Professor McGonagall collected the names of those staying for Christmas. Harry and Ron signed up immediately, as did Fred, George, and Ginny (who sprang for a quill once she saw Harry's name on the list). Draco and Hermione numbered among the few Gryffindors going home.

They trained down to London together, while the first snow descended on the countryside like a curtain of goose-down.

"What are you going to tell your muggles?"

She wanted to use her last few hours on the train to practice spells, and they were taking turns shooting sparks into the air.

"Verdimillious. I don't know," she said, as red constellations flowered on her wand-tip. "I know it's bad of me, but I'm rather tempted not to. They'll get worried, and they'll want to keep me from going back, but they won't really be able to do anything about it. Then I'll have to reassure them, which is awfully hard… it might be easier not to say anything."

She glanced at him furtively, as though she expected a reprimand, but he shrugged.

"Why don't you?"

"Because they're my parents?" she said slowly. "And lying is wrong? Usually?"

"Only if you get caught and it hurts someone. And in this case, it's impossible for you to get caught, because your muggles will never know anything about Hogwarts that you don't tell them." He polished some soot from the tip of his wand. "Anyway, they can't help. All they can do is keep you from going back, and then we'll have to stage another extraction, like we did for Potter. Personally, I'd dodge the hassle and take the train."

She smiled. "It's true. I don't think they'd like it if I got kidnapped by strange wizards in the middle of the night."

"Who are you calling a strange wizard? Verdimillious." His sparks leapt up in a profusion of lime green. "Plus, it'll hardly make them feel better, will it? Knowing it's their fault their daughter has it rough."

She frowned. "It's not their fault," she corrected, sternly. "My parents aren't the problem. It's the people who hate them."

He rolled his eyes. "Wizards are not the problem."

"The person who paralyzed Colin wasn't a muggle," she reminded him. "Zero students have gone to the Hospital Wing because of muggles. Wizards, on the other hand…"

"It's not that simp— look. Agree to disagree on this, Granger?"

"If you like, but you ought to know I'm right," she said primly. "McGonagall says so."

"And if McGonagall says so," he muttered. But by then they were pulling up on King's Cross.

The Manor was alight with music when he returned: his mother had enchanted the piano to play Christmas carols, and she and Dobby were decorating the tree when he came in. At the sight of him, his mother dropped the star she'd been levitating (Dobby apparated to catch it).

"Darling!" she exclaimed. "I missed you so much I nearly perished. Do you know, I wanted to write to you, but that beastly Severus didn't come visit once, all term? No matter how I begged and begged! I mean to send him a Howler."

“Things have been rather busy at Hogwarts, Mother. The professors have much more to do.”

She kissed his cheeks, and snuck a third onto his forehead before he swatted her away. “So I’ve heard,” she laughed. “What a silly business it all is! Dumbledore couldn’t be handling it worse.”

“I quite agree. Mother, it’s the most ludicrous thing, we’ve got to check in with prefects at meals.”

“Oh, horrid!”

“We can’t even leave the common room after dark, not even in groups.”

“What have they done to that school?” Narcissa sighed, smoothing one hand over her temple. A bit of glitter from the garlands clung to her fingertips and streaked her scalp, where he noticed a rim of gray hairs edging the black. “It’s enough to make one think about Durmstrang — not seriously, darling, don’t fret. I’m only making a point. Two students in the Hospital Wing, and the whole place falls to pieces… in my day… well, mudbloods had more serious things to worry about, I’ll leave it there.” She kissed him on the forehead, absent-minded, and said: “Now tell me everything you would have written me. Leave nothing out. Is it true they’ve stolen your rightful spot on the team and given it to Harry Potter?”

The Manor sparkled at Christmas, as it always did. In the drawing room, eight-foot candelabras of burnished brass wore stoles of silver and gold garlands, braided with emerald chains of greenery, and drooping fingers of mistletoe lurked from every eve. Red wool stockings, fat with presents, swung pendulous from the mantlepiece, and through the great bay windows, a constant gentleness of snow paraded past the windows, cloaking the ribbed fields in a gloss of white. At dawn on Christmas morning, Draco woke and ran down to the drawing room in time to see a family of reindeer tiptoe across the great lawn, leaving delicate constellations of hoofprints in the fresh snowfall.

Then his mother came down, yawning and rubbing her eyes, looking disheveled and dramatic in her black silk dressing-gown. She rang the breakfast bell, and soon platter after platter of French toast emerged from the kitchens, fat dark slices drooling syrup and coronated with powdered sugar, and spotted with bloody slices of caramelized strawberry. Draco ate two plates and begged off finishing the rest, and thought fondly of how Ron could have managed it without hesitation; and then he set to eviscerating the stack of presents under the fir tree, while his mother reclined on her chaise and sipped espresso.

Narcissa had given him a pair of dragon-hide gloves, scaled in green so dark it looked black. The lining was velvet and unicorn fur, and it was soft as anything. From Snape, he received a copy of Moste Potente Potions, the inscription of which read: For an aspiring potioneer. The rest of the book was covered in the same slanted longhand, comments scrawled thick in the margins and spilling over the footnotes.

“He’s given me a second-hand book,” Draco said, mildly outraged. He hadn’t expected a set of crystal gobstones, but his presents from Snape were usually much better than this.

“Surely not, darling.”

“He has, look. It’s full of scribbling. Practically useless, you can’t even read the recipes. And we don’t start on anything in this book until fourth year, anyway.”

Around ten, a pair of owls came fluttering up to the balcony doors, and Dobby let them in. One was Ulysses, a great horned owl approximately the size of a spaniel. The other was a much smaller barn owl, which went by the unfortunate callsign Thucydides, because its owner was a ridiculous witch. Both carried a package and a letter apiece, and joined forces to pester Draco until, grumbling, he fed them some crumbs of French toast; taking these, they roosted together on the mantelpiece, preening. Thucydides liked to bite Ulysses on the tail when she wanted something, and the fact that Ulysses tolerated this with the long-suffering hoot of the resigned, rather than attempting to annihilate her, showed the extent to which captivity at Hogwarts had broken his owl.

He'd sent Ulysses back to Hogwarts a few days ago. He'd carried a box of German chocolates filled with cherry liqueurs, some sweetmeats, and a deluxe package of special edition Chocolate Frogs, along with a note: Dear Mssrs. Potter and Weasley. Please find enclosed an opportunity to educate your palates. Sincerely, your generous benefactor, Mssr. Malfoy. (A postscript, scrawled in a different ink: Merry Christmas, or what have you. DM.

He hadn't expected anything back; he'd meant it almost as a joke: Wouldn't it be hilarious if I sent you a present? But when he opened Ulysses' letter, he found it covered in familiar chicken-scratch.

Dear Mssr. Malfoy,

Please find enclosed an opportunity to pull your frankly enormous head out of your woeful arse.

OK seriously though. Thanks very much for the chocolates & choc frog cards. We shared them with the other boys and everybody says thanks. Unprecedented levels of goodwill for Mssr. Malfoy currently running wild in Gryffindor Tower. Must correct soon. Return pronto!

To be honest our present isn't anything very good, but hopefully it's better than nothing. Ron won them in a game of chess w/ Percy. I can't wear them and Ron says they're too posh for him.

Hermione says you made up. Really glad to hear it. It would have sucked to pick a side, I hate it when friends fight. (Ron is reading over my shoulder & says I should make sure you know that part is just me talking and not him, and that he would not have any trouble picking a side and that it would be Hermione's. The rest of the letter is both of us though.)

Merry Christmas, dolt.

Love,

Harry & Ron

“What’s that, sweet one?” said Narcissa, sweet with false nonchalance.

“Letter from some people at school,” he said, tucking it safely into the breast pocket of his pajamas. No use leaving it around for her to snoop. He loved his mother, but he knew from the glint in her eyes that any scrap of information left unguarded would find its way into her possession.

“Oh, but how darling,” she cooed, as he snapped the twine on Harry and Ron’s package. “They sent you presents!”

“We’ll see,” he sniffed. “Knowing them, it might be rat droppings.”

She tittered. “When he started courting Bella, Rodolphus would send Christmas presents for the whole family. Andy and I both got bouquets of six white roses apiece, and I got a set of pearl earrings with gold thread. Hers were pearl and silver.”

Draco went still. They rarely, if ever, mentioned either of his mother’s sisters, albeit for very different reasons.

“And Bella got twenty red roses, and a diamond necklace worth six thousand galleons,” said Narcissa dreamily. “She made such a fuss when Mother wouldn’t let her wear it to Christmas dinner. Lord, how those women could fight! But then Rodolphus showed up that evening with fifty roses and a set of mother-of-pearl caviar spoons for Mother and Father, and Mother went sweet as a lamb…”

She faded, as if drifting back to earth, and broke off.

Draco cleared his throat. “I don’t think these blokes are trying to court me, Mum.”

“No? Their loss,” she said, coming back to herself. “They would be lucky to have you. What did they send?”

It was a set of round gold reading glasses, the sort that might hang by a chain from one’s waistcoat. One lens was red, the other blue. He put them on, doubtfully, and they sank down to the tip of his nose. Narcissa broke out giggling.

“Mother.”

“No, I like them! So stately and dignified. You look like Lucius.”

“Mother, please.”

“I swear it’s true.” She squinted through a pair of lenses made from thumb and forefinger. “He had these fishbowl spectacles for reading. He loathed them! I had to carry them in my purse at restaurants, because he wouldn’t bring them himself, but he’d not be able to read the menu otherwise.” Sadness tinged the edges of her laughter. “He’d give me that same scowl when I brought it up, too.”

Draco set the glasses aside. He hoped Percy didn’t need them to see.

He knew what Hermione’s gift was as soon as he shook the package: the rattle of a cassette deck made him grin. It was a tape called “Substance,” by a muggle group called New Order. Attached was a short note from Hermione, wishing him a Merry Christmas and thanking him for the book Social Sorcery: An Encyclopedia of British Wizarding Customs, by Nicodemus Scrimgeour.

“And that?” teased Narcissa. “More rat droppings?”

“I like inside jokes.”

“It wouldn’t be funny if I explained it.”

She sighed, pillowing her chin in her palm. “How soon they grow up and have secrets,” she said. “It was only yesterday my boy told me everything. Dobby, wasn’t it just yesterday?”

“Quite so,” squeaked Dobby, who was furtively trying to corral the strewn wrapping paper into a manageable pile for removal. “The young master is so tall now, and Dobby is always remembering when he was two and three, and shorter than Dobby!”

“Oh, yes. Do you remember that, Draco? You were always after Dobby to play trains.”

“Dobby was the blue conductor,” said Dobby proudly. “He was second-in-command of the whole railroad.”

“That’s enough. Both of you.”

“Dobby,” said Narcissa delightedly, sitting up, “do you still have the hat?”

“Mother. No.”

“Dobby knows for certain where it is, miss!” agreed the little traitor, slyly. “Dobby put it away with Master Draco’s baby clothes. Dobby can fetch it now, if she likes!”

He glared at his elf. “Et tu, Dobby?”

Dobby’s ears snapped back to his skull, and his eyes grew wide, evoking a very small, very sad basset hound. “Dobby would never try to embarrass Master Draco,” he said earnestly. “Dobby only wanted to reminisce about the small master, who was a little boy so recently, and who he misses so much…”

“I think that’s enough Christmas for today,” Draco announced, climbing to his feet. “I’m going flying. Don’t wait for me; if I don’t hurl myself from the roof, I should be back around noon.”

“My little dramaturg,” said Narcissa wistfully, beaming at him. “I always thought that you might make a great actor, in another life. I told Constance that you would do a splendid Coriolanus…”

A thump came at the window. Another owl alighted on the balcony, even bigger than Ulysses, with sabled feathers and talons the size of razors, between which dangled a small envelope sealed in red wax.

The bird gave a horrible, rattling cry, and Dobby hurried to let it in.

Narcissa took the letter from Dobby’s hands, but almost immediately handed it to Draco, who moved to sit with her on the chaise. “It’s for you,” she said, in a voice of queer formality.

He took it. It was addressed in curling, ornate green script, so thick he could barely read it:

The Most Noble and Most Ancient

House of Malfoy

Malfoy Manor

Wiltshire

The crest was a sword plunged through a hangman’s knot. Draco broke it and slipped out the card, which was a thick sheaf of cardstock, embossed in green and black.

Mr. Sibelius Nott requests the honor of your presence at his annual

YULE HUNT

Tuesday, the 26th of December, 1992

At five o'clock in the evening

At his ancestral home of

KNOTSCLIFF PEAK

reception to follow

Narcissa read over his shoulder. "The Notts?" she said in surprise. "Or 'Nott,' rather, I suppose? That's a small wonder."

"Why?" Draco flipped over the card, which had an R.S.V.P. form, and the simple order: Come!, scrawled in a different hand from the rest of the card. He could guess whose it was.

"They haven't thrown in some time. After the wife died, that house shut up like a lockbox. Not that they were ever at the heart of the scene to begin with… Sibelius Nott was an odd duck, I always thought." Narcissa tucked her hair behind her ear and cleared her throat.

"Odd how?"

"Oh, I hesitate to say."

"No, you don't," he said in amusement. She gave a tinkling laugh.

"Well, I wish I did! Gossip was always my vice, I could never help it. All right, I'll tell you, since my cover's blown. Governesses seemed to come and go very quickly in that household. If you get the idea."

Draco wrinkled his nose. "Eugh," he said. "Is that what you meant, 'odd'? He's a lecher?"

“How squalid.”

Her lips twitched. “Society was like that,” she said, “back in the day. We had a scandal with every meal. I think your father was one of the few who ever managed to keep his nose clean, and even then…”

“Mother, please.”

“Don’t be such a puritan, Draco. I was a modern woman, I understood the way of things. I wasn’t a saint at Hogwarts, either—”

“Dobby! Where are you? I need a glass of bleach at once!”

Narcissa cackled, and snatched him into an embrace. He squirmed like a chained octopus, but this served only to rumple his hair and his pajamas. His mother’s grip was unyielding. Finally, he went slack, like a fish falling limp on a hook, and resigned himself in beleaguered moaning to the cuddle assault.

“Do you want to go, then?” he said, once she’d freed him. “It seems rather an insult to refuse. But I don’t know. We might say we’ve a standing commitment, or something.”

Narcissa paused, and then said in delicate tones: “An invitation to a house is meant for its head, dear. What do you think?”

He read the invitation once more, frowning. “Is there a game here I’m not seeing?”

“Oh, almost certainly,” she said airily. “But that’s no reason to turn down a nice party.”

Knotscliff Peak, fulfilling the promise of its name, perched astride a white sheet of stone, ensconced by several hundred feet of air from a black froth of waves below. The side of the estate not facing the sea overlooked a dense skirt of forests, which ran from the house gates down several miles of unbroken woodland, and ensconced the house soundly from any neighbors. The power of the wind cresting the cliff’s edge could be gauged by the severe angle at which the first line of these trees peeled away from the house, as if reeling from a heavy blow. In response to the natural challenges of location, the architect had built it low, square, and strong, with stone washed dark by the perpetual fog, and from its belly three turrets impaled the hostile sky.

Theo met them at the gate. Draco, his stomach still queasy from side-along apparition, nevertheless stepped forward first to shake his hand, while his mother hung back.

“Welcome, Lord Malfoy,” Theo said, with a toothy smile of appraisal. “A pleasure to see you out of uniform.”

Draco wore an ash-gray three piece suit, with a tie striped in green and gold, and a fur-lined cloak of black mink. His mother’s dress, a high-collared evening gown, matched the green of his tie, and for jewelry, she wore only a gold hairpiece and her rings: wedding and signet. Sword and shield, he thought.

“Mister Nott,” he said pleasantly, and enjoyed how Theo’s face flickered with irritation. “Allow me to introduce my mother, Narcissa Black Malfoy.”

Theo bowed. “Mrs. Malfoy. An incomparable pleasure.”

Narcissa extended her hand. “Hello, Theodore. Draco’s spoken well of you.”

“My dear lady, you have charm enough without such lies,” he said solemnly, taking it.

“That’ll be a handshake, not a kiss, mind you,” Draco said sharply. Theo laughed.

“No, I’m on my best behavior tonight. I’ll not be seducing any widows, unless they seduce me first. Now, we’re having cocktails in the sitting room, and the hunters will set off in a quarter-hour; would either of you care for a saddle?”

Narcissa smoothed her skirts demurely. “No, thank you. My hunting days are quite behind me, and I’m not at all dressed for riding.”

“I’m certain we could find a habit for you, but I won’t badger. Draco? You could borrow my jodhpurs, we’re about the same size.” He looked Draco up and down. “Though on second thought, they’re perhaps a bit large.”

“Next year, perhaps,” Draco deadpanned, and for some reason that made Theo chuckle, too.

Inside, the sitting room bloomed red with firelight. From atop the gnarled stone mantle gazed a trifecta of deer’s heads, each one festively collared in a Christmas wreath, while oil paintings of giant stags and dark-haired wizards on horseback chased each other across the walls, shining muted in the firelight. Witches and wizards in glittering finery promenaded around the room, holding flutes of champagne and hors d'oeuvres harvested from the silver platters that orbited the room, levitating, like a celestial host. A floating orchestra, moved by the hands of an invisible virtuoso, rendered a selection from The Nutcracker.

There were a startling number of faces there. Brutus Travers stood at a table with Corban Yaxley. Sibelius Nott held court on a sofa in front of the fireplace, surrounded by the Parkinsons, the Goyles, and a pair of Rowles. With a start, Draco recognized the sallow profile of Severus Snape, lurking in the corner with Constance Crabbe and Pius Thicknesse, looking bored to the point of violence.

“Let me seat you,” Theo said courteously, leading Narcissa to a free armchair. “Can I offer you a drink? Champagne, firewhiskey?”

“If you force a glass down my throat, darling, I won’t stop you,” Narcissa said idly, settling her skirts. “But I warn you, I won’t respond to anything less than absolute force.”

“Back in a nonce, then,” said Theo, and with a wink at Draco, he was gone.

The woman beside her, a steel-haired witch whose nose strongly evoked a hawk, did a double-take when Narcissa sat down. Then she leaned in and clamped her bony fingers on Narcissa’s arm. “Narcissa Black,” she screeched. “You homely, thankless wretch! How dare you!”

Draco surged forward, his hand moving to his wand, but before he touched it, something hard smacked his shin. He stumbled, cursing: Narcissa had kicked him.

“Aradia,” she said, turning to the other woman. “You starveling matchstick. All these years, and you still can’t afford a dress that flatters your hips.”

“If I’d married Lucius Malfoy, I’m sure I could have. Though apparently even his millions couldn’t buy his wife a tolerable personality!”

Draco made a noise of shock, but Narcissa merely tossed her hair and said blithely, “But it’s strange you say that, darling, because your beaux always tolerated me quite well.”

She smiled, all teeth, at the gray-haired woman. The woman's scowl deepened, hardened — and then cracked open into a cheek-splitting beam.

"You deplorable bitch," she said, and seizing Narcissa's face, she kissed her cheek so hard it left a flush. Narcissa, laughing, returned kisses on both cheeks, and then they were wrapped so tightly around each other that their faces vanished into each other's hair.

"...can't believe you! I haven't seen you for years—"

"—come to visit me ever, I should have you hanged—"

"—shut up in that big old house like a poltergeist—"

"—always did take an army to get you to answer an owl—"

Theo reappeared, holding two flutes of champagne. "Ah," he said pleasantly. "Good. They've found each other."

"Who's that?" Draco demanded. His mother and the other woman had plunged into chatter so fast and furious that he feared losing a finger if he tried to intercede. "And why is she so…"

"Rude?" Theo handed one of the flutes to Draco, clinked it, and drank from the other. "Aradia Burke. Slytherin, Class of 1975."

"I've never heard of her."

"No, I suppose not," Theo said mildly, steering Draco away. "She doesn't come to these things often, she spends half the year in France. Never married, you see. Some people — not me, mind you, but some very scurrilous people I'd never claim to know — will tell you she's a friend of Artemis. Wink, wink, et cetera. Fantastic witch, though. Hunts like a bloodhound, drinks like a fish. Would you like to see the kiddie table? We've made a home of it, Pansy and I."

In a secluded corner, a sapphire sofa foamed with cushions, and Pansy Parkinson sprawled across it like a sensuously toppled box of hatpins. She wore a frilly pink dress which flattered precisely nothing, and was brutalizing a monstrous slice of chocolate cake.

“I am warning you now, Teddy,” she said, tonguing her fork, “if one more pimply brat asks me to dance, I shall rend my clothes and scream.”

“Forgive them,” Theo sighed, flopping down beside her. “Hypnotized by your beauty, they know not what they do.”

“Har de har. Why don’t you dance with me, if I’m so pretty?”

“I’m not half worthy of the honor,” said Theo, swiping a fingerful of frosting. “And I wouldn’t want to discourage the pimply brats. My good looks might afflict them with a jealous rage.”

Draco leaned against the wall. Pansy lifted an eyebrow at him. “Malfoy.”

“Parkinson.”

“I like your outfit,” she said.

“Thanks. I don’t like yours.”

She guffawed. “It’s dreadful, isn’t it?” she admitted, plucking a frill. “My mother picked it out. I wanted to wear pants.”

“Jealous wretches, mothers,” said Daphne, emerging at Draco’s elbow, wearing an unusually girlish pouf dress of red tartan. “You’d think they don’t want us to have any fun. Mum has Tori in gingham. Merlin wept. Hello, Draco. Smashing tie.”

“Thank you. My mother chose it.”

“Narcissa? Is she here?”

“Squirreled her off with Aradia,” said Theo, waving his hand. “We’ll have Draco for an hour or so.”

“More like a week,” said Pansy, spearing a rose of frosting with vim. “She cornered me earlier. If I hear the phrase ‘when I was your age’ one more time tonight, I swear…”

“You’ll rend your clothes and scream?” suggested Draco drily.

Daphne said, “You might as well, it can’t possibly make that dress any worse. Oh, Tori, there you are. You remember the name Draco Malfoy?”

The child squinting up from under Daphne’s arm was a copy of her in miniature: lovely and round-faced, with a sheaf of silken hair a few shades darker than Daphne’s. “Hullo,” she said shyly. “I’m Athtoria.” Her tongue slipped thickly over a pair of missing teeth.

“Tori’s seven,” said Daphne. “She’s going to be eight in three days. Aren’t you, Riri?”

“Two dayth and theventeen hourth,” said the girl proudly.

Theo kicked up his legs lazily. “And you haven’t a beau yet?” he demanded, looking at Astoria severely. “No courtiers? Almost eight, and no marriage prospects? Goodness, you’re practically a spinster.”

Astoria trembled with the rage of the unfairly treated. “Daphne’th never had a beau!” she cried. “And I don’t get to have one until thee doeth!”

“Well, Daphne’s a lost cause, obviously,” Theo said, gesturing at her. “I mean, look at her. What man could possibly bring himself to come home to that every night?”

Daphne gave him a smile and a lonely finger. “In fact I have had one,” she said sweetly, “so suck it, Nott. Tori, don’t tell Mummy, or I’ll turn Duchess into a spider.”

Astoria gave a cry of dismay, and clung to Draco’s leg. Draco looked down in disgruntlement.

“Remove yourself,” he told her. She did not.

Theo sat up straight. “You have not,” he said to Daphne, half in disbelief, half excitement.

“Have too.”

“Who?”

“Who do you think?” Pansy said, bored. “He only trailed her like a duckling all first year.”

“...Stefan? Stefan Petrovsky? That rat-faced one, with the mouth?” Theo gave a rude bark of laughter. “He got shipped up to Durmstrang for breaking that kid’s nose.”

Draco had heard something about that secondhand, from Harry; there had been an altercation in the stands during a Ravenclaw vs. Slytherin quidditch match, and a third-year Ravenclaw had “tripped” down two sets of bleachers.

He lifted an eyebrow at Daphne.

“Allegedly,” insisted Daphne.

“Did you kiss him?” demanded Theo.

“A lady never tells.”

“Yes, she did,” said Pansy, tossing her plate aside. “Twice. In the Astronomy Tower.”

“Rat! The moment you get a boyfriend, I’m telling your mother.”

“Do it, she’ll be thrilled. I wish I could go to Durmstrang,” Pansy sighed, abruptly changing the subject. “They’ve much better faculty. And they don’t make you take Defense Against the Dark Arts.”

“Podmore isn’t so bad,” Daphne piped up. “His politics are rubbish, but he’s so dreamy you almost don’t care.”

“I hate him,” Pansy spat. “He’s horrible. I’d go to Durmstrang just to get away from him. At least there they wouldn’t — wouldn’t bully you around, like him.”

“Yeah, except for the corporal punishment, Pans,” said Theo, slinging his arm around the back of her seat. “One smack, and you’d be running back to Hogwarts.”

One of the adults broke away from the floor and stepped into their corner. He was thin, short, thin of muscle and hair, and wore an ascot of white-and-gold stripes. Looming behind Theo’s chair, he pressed his hand down on Theo’s shoulder, and Theo went stiff as a board.

“Theodore,” he said. His brogue was a thicker, colder version of Theo’s, like the same melody in a minor key. “Happy Yule. I hope your friends have yet to grow bored of your chatter.”

Daphne tittered, uncomfortably. She was the only one. Pansy had found something terribly fascinating in the crown molding.

“Thanks, Da,” said Theo flatly. “Happy happy. You remember Daph and Tori. Pans, obviously. Have you met Draco? He’s our token Gryffindor.”

They shook hands. “Forgive my son’s disrespect, I beg you,” Sibelius ordered, in such a way that it did not sound like begging at all. “He means well.”

“Slander. Libel,” said Theo dully, staring at his shoes. “No, one of those is written. Someone get him a cocktail napkin, then he can libel me.”

Sibelius squeezed his shoulder. “Haranguing is Theodore’s language of affection,” he said coldly. “Among the perennial joys of raising one’s children is to be so often reminded of one’s spouse.”

“Zing,” said Theo. “Aren’t you menfolk supposed to be hunting something? Leave the women and the children to our girlish devices.”

“I offered you a mount this year.”

“In fact he did,” said Theo, speaking to Draco. “But negotiations fell apart over the condition that I not embarrass him. It was simply too steep a price to pay.”

Sibelius’s fingernails were carving dents in the fabric of Theo’s tailcoat.

A bell rang, and the music stopped. The crowd in hunting gear migrated to the door, while the others followed in their wake, murmuring excitedly. Sibelius excused himself, and cut through the crowd to lead them out of the manor.

Draco cleared his throat, but Theo refused to meet his eyes.

“Well, that’s the hunt,” he said, slapping his knees. “Fancy watching?”

“Nothing better to do,” muttered Pansy, and that served to motivate the group. They rose and followed the crowd out to the great lawn, where a row of thoroughbred stallions snorted and clawed the turf, reined by struggling groomsmen. The hunters mounted these with varying degrees of success: while Garrett Goyle hauled his ample bulk astride the horse without difficulty, Brutus Travers flailed and toppled from the stirrup, and had to be boosted up by a pair of horsemen.

Sibelius Nott spurred his horse ahead of the others, and drew them all to attention with a piercing blast from a silver whistle. Lifting his wand, he shot a firework of green and silver sparks into the air, which exploded into the shape of a stag; the crowd cooed and applauded politely. Then he gave another short blast on the whistle, and with a bevy of cries, the riders charged from the lawn, and rode cheering into the forest.

The crowd whooped and jostled merrily. Draco found himself and Theo boxed in next to a pair of gentlemen who'd stayed behind.

"He's getting stronger in the South, you know. There are new numbers coming out of Lancashire…"

"Let's not inflate our expectations." This was Corban Yaxley, a stern wizard in his late forties, with a buzzcut and a tendency to speak through his teeth.

"No, but these numbers! You wouldn't have believed them, a year ago! I don't know where all of Nott's money is going, but I hope it stays there."

"It's because Fudge is getting steamrolled in the Wizengamot. He promised to have the MSA on the floor by December, but after Dumbledore's editorial, the thing ground to a standstill..."

"Bless Dumbledore. Age-addled fool. I suppose he thinks it's a great victory for deliberative democracy, when all he's done is prove to the world that the Pops like to run their mouths and then sit on their thumbs..."

"Don't underestimate him," said Yaxley coldly. "Once Fudge and Asquith rally the block, the act will pass, and the polls will rebound. If that happens, Runcorn is dead in the water. And Nott will be, too."

"Sibelius is no idiot. He never commits unless he sees a path to victory."

"Sibelius is excitable," intoned Yaxley, moving away. "He smells the winds of change, and goes rowing after them, instead of waiting for them to come fill his sails… excuse me, Orpheus. I promised a word to Prescott…"

Theo snapped his fingers in Draco's face. "Word of warning," he said. "I do love a good eavesdrop, but I'm reliably informed that it's rude to stare."

Draco swatted his hand away. "It was interesting," he said irritably. "I haven't heard anything about the election. They don't talk about it much at school."

Theo sighed, "Yaxley's got the right of it on this one, I fear. My dad's prone to get carried away. I just hope there's some of my inheritance left once Fudge wins."

Daphne appeared at their side, holding a glass of something pink and bubbly. "What's happened to Theo's inheritance?" she inquired. "If it's gone, I have to leave, I can't be seen with poors."

Draco snorted. She grinned at him. "Hello," she said. "That's the first time I've heard you laugh, I think, stoneface."

"Maybe that's the first time you've been funny."

"No, he only laughs at the misfortune of others," said Theo plaintively. "Like me, for instance, now my inheritance is going to Runcorn."

"That is hilarious," Daphne agreed. "Is Runcorn that fellow Daddy keeps prattling about?"

"Theo thinks he's going to lose," Draco said, searching the crowd for Yaxley. He and the other man seemed to have disappeared. Draco thought this was odd, and he wanted to keep listening to their conversation.

"Because he hasn't got a chance."

"What about Lockhart?" said Draco, remembering the conversation he'd overheard between Snape and Dumbledore.

“That joke?” Theo snorted. “He’s polling single-digits. Even Witch Weekly is too embarrassed to shill for him, anymore, and that tells you something.”

They floated through the crowd of bedazzled witches and wizards, as the winter sun slipped down over the sea. Torchlight flowered along the walls, and garlands of fairy lights gleamed to life in the hedges. Music resumed, and some danced, although Daphne made no attempt to coerce Theo nor Draco into a bout; her ankle was still wrapped in surgical tape, and she demurred that her father had quite forbidden all calisthenic activity.

“Which wouldn’t stop me for a moment,” she whispered to Draco, “if he weren’t about ten feet away and ready to jinx my legs together if I tried.”

Another round of hors’d’ouvres came floating out of the parlor, and they rescued Pansy from an encounter with an amorous thirteen-year-old from Romania, and then Draco (after much badgering) danced not one but two pavanes with her, to fully dissuade her suitor from his quest; this job being accomplished, he parked her at a table with Astoria and her mother, and excused himself to get a drink. On his way back, Draco saw Snape standing with Narcissa alone under one of the eaves, murmuring to each other in tones so low they verged conspiratorial, and Draco decided, somewhat spitefully, to interrupt them.

“Uncle Severus,” he called. He sauntered over with a fingerbowl of sparkling cider cocked in his fingers. “Happy Yule.”

Snape greeted him with a meager grunt.

“I received your Christmas present,” Draco continued, unfazed. “I must say, after last year’s, it was something of a letdown. Are you perhaps still cross with me for being late to class?”

Narcissa clucked her tongue. “Now, Draco—”

Snape's mouth twitched. "I apologize for having disappointed you," he said silkily. "And have you attempted to brew anything from that book?"

"Certainly not, I've been on holiday."

"So you have judged it wanting without using it."

"Not 'wanting,' but—"

Narcissa said, "Draco is very grateful for all your gifts, Severus. As am I. Now, Draco, I'm terribly parched; if you could fetch me some champagne?"

"You're trying to get rid of me," he said, indignant. "What are you two gossiping about over here, anyway?"

"Not at all, darling. In fact, nothing could make me happier than a good long chat between the three of us. Severus was just filling me in about all the exciting things happening at Hogwarts, and explaining some of Dumbledore's decisions. It always helps to have the faculty perspective. Don't you think, Severus?"

Draco could not discern from either of their expressions whether Narcissa had been lying. He didn't get to ask, either, because someone cried, "Narcissa!"

They all turned. It was Brutus Travers, riding out of the forest at a full gallop, his hair mussed, his robe billowing behind him. His gray hair had tumbled free of its braid, and his wizened face blazed with excitement.

"Oh, good Lord," Narcissa muttered, and Draco shot a surprised look at his mother.

"Narcissa! We've got it! We've got it!" He pointed around the house, toward the great lawn. "Garrett got it on the run, they're herding it up the lawn for the final drive — come quickly, we're going to bag it! Will you come to watch us?"

"In a moment, Brutus," she called, fluttering her fingers at him.

"I've a seat for you! It's near the front! It's a very good seat! Will you come?"

"Yes, of course. I'll be there in a heartbeat, I really will."

"Watch me, Narcissa!" he added, daringly. "It'll be me or Garrett! We're the fastest. You'll want to be watching Garrett or me!"

"As if I needed the invitation," she cooed, and with this reassurance, he wheeled his steed around to rejoin the others.

As soon as Brutus's back was turned, Narcissa's smile melted into a grimace. Snape chuckled to himself softly. This startled Draco even more than his mother's sneer.

"Does he want children, do you think?" inquired Snape, leaning leonine against the wall. "Or would he be content with Draco?"

She gave him a distraught look. "Severus."

"Why, Cissa, you must make haste. There is a very good seat waiting for you."

He watched with fascination as his mother turned pale, then pink. "Don't be blue," she said primly, and stalked past with a snap of her skirts.

He turned to Snape when she was gone. "What did you mean?"

"I hear you have still been helping Longbottom in Potions," said Snape suddenly, interrupting him.

Draco paused, confused. "...So what?"

“Have you?”

“Yes. He asked me to.”

“And what are you getting in return?”

He shuffled uncomfortably. “The confidence that he probably won’t blow up his cauldron while I’m sitting near it.”

Snape regarded him, calculating.

Again, seemingly at random, he said: “Granger is ordinarily your Potions partner.”

“Yes, sir.”

“Why?”

The question confused him. “Because she’s brilliant,” he said. “She’s the only Gryffindor who’s half decent at Potions, besides me. And she’s good at working with me. I mean, we have a system.”

Snape hummed in thought. Draco thought about it. He thought of how Hermione sucked her lip between her teeth when she puzzled over a question; he considered the deep knot of her brows, the ceaseless drumroll of her fingers on the nearest available surface, including, if available, his arm. Then he thought of how she tugged frantically on his sleeve when she found the answer, or hit his shoulder, or knocked his knee; how familiar the glow on her cheeks as she rushed to tell him, rich red and thrilling, brighter than a sunburst. It was almost impossible not to smile back at her, when that happened; it would be like a mirror choosing not to reflect light.

“And,” said Draco, finding that he couldn’t stop, “she’s clever about — little things. She thinks about why things work, she understands it. She can work around holes in the recipe, she can think around them. And she remembers everything. I mean, if you’ve never seen — the witch has a brain like a library. She reads something, and she never forgets it. It’s sickening. Arguing with her is like arguing with a wall. You can’t get anywhere. And she won’t stay quiet if she thinks you’re doing something wrong. She’ll tell you. Which is profoundly annoying —”

Snape said, “That’s enough.”

Draco shut his mouth quickly, embarrassed.

“You consider her your friend.”

“Yeah,” he said automatically. Then: “I mean, we just spend a lot of time together. It doesn’t… I mean, she is muggle-born, but there are worse things.”

Snape closed his eyes, and Draco tensed, wondering if he’d said something to upset his godfather. He’d never put his finger on where Snape landed politically; obviously, he ran with a certain crowd, but he didn’t come from any pureblood family that Draco knew.

“Be careful, Draco,” he said softly.

Draco’s brow furrowed. “Careful about what?”

Screaming erupted from the front pavilion. Draco instinctively started off for the front lawn, but realized after a few steps that his godfather had not joined him; when he looked over his shoulder, Snape was walking swiftly in the opposite direction.

When he reached the great lawn, the crowd had knit into a bustling mass near the treeline. The trees were trembling, and a chorus of shouts swelled from within the forest. As Draco watched, the trees broke apart, and a giant white stag erupted from their enclosure.

It was twice the size of a grown stallion, with antlers the size of scimitars, and a coat of shaggy white fur, matted with soot, earth, and blood. Arrows protruded from its back and peppered its flank. As it broke the tree line, it reared up on its back hooves with a mighty low of pain.

He scanned the crowd for his mother. He found her near the front, folded elegantly into a lawn chair, and fanning herself with a napkin. Another woman was talking to her, but she seemed distracted; her eyes flit frantically from face to face, and her nails drummed on her armrest. As the stag screeched, she screwed her eyes shut.

When she opened them, they were distant, glassy, fastened on something far away. Her mouth went slack.

Draco dropped his glass and ran.

He smacked into a wall of bodies and shoved his way through, spilling drinks and bowling over guests wherever he went. Several gave indignant shouts when he pushed through, but these were lost to the bellow of cheers that erupted when the hunters broke through the treeline, their hoofbeats thundering on the turf. Glass cracked, and something wet and sticky slipped down Draco's neck, but he ignored it, pressed forward, threw an elbow, and squirmed back within sight of his mother.

One of the riders fired a green spell that missed the stag by a foot, and it let out a scream, galloping for the cliffs. A cry of dismay went up from the crowd, and they shot spells after it, crackling bursts of light that squealed and boomed like fireworks, scaring it away from the cliff's edge. "TOO SOON!" roared Brutus. "Too soon! Bring it back this way! Wear it out! Closer, men, closer!"

Narcissa had stood up, on trembling feet, and was trying to escape the crowd. But it pressed closer, a wall of bodies, herding her towards the great lawn, where the stag was sprinting back toward the forest.

Draco seized her arm. She didn't notice.

"Mother, are you all right?"

Narcissa whispered, “Lucius?”

“Mother, no, ” he said, panicking. They were in public; worse, they were in a crowded, formal setting, populated by most of the important people they would ever meet; if she had an episode, there would be no way to hide it. “It’s Draco. It’s 1992. What you’re seeing isn’t real.”

“Lucius?” She stared at him, unseeing. He gave up, and threw his arm around her, herding her away from the crowd.

“Come on. We’ve got to go.”

“Lucius, they’re going to kill it,” she said shrilly. “That poor innocent animal, they’re going to kill it.”

“I know, Mother. It’s tradition. Come this way.”

“It’s just a baby,” she said, and a tear slit the plane of her cheek. “It’s just a little baby animal, and they’re going to kill it.”

“That thing?” Draco glanced over his shoulder. The stag was a behemoth, and going by its horns, it’d been alive far longer than Draco had. “That’s no baby.”

“How could they be so cruel?” she demanded, ignoring him. “How can you bear it? Lucius, you have to stop them.”

“Okay, M– Narcissa. All right. After we get you out of here, I’ll go and stop them. How’s that.”

“Promise me? Promise you’ll save it?”

“I promise.”

She sagged against him suddenly, and he stumbled, going down on one knee in the grass.

“I knew you would,” she said dreamily. “And you did, too, didn’t you? You went and stopped them all… your father was furious, but you didn’t care. You said, I don’t care, it’s upsetting Cissa…”

“Please get up,” he begged. “Mother, people are going to see.”

“Draco?”

It was too late. They were halfway between the great lawn and the front gate, and Draco knew who it was.

He looked up into the stunned face of Theodore Nott. Behind him stood Daphne and Pansy.

His mother preempted him. “Lucius?” she said in a small voice, clinging to his sleeve.

Theo’s eyes flickered between Draco and Narcissa. The appraisal taking place behind them was swift and ruthless.

Draco pulled out his wand.

“Nott,” he said in a low voice.

Theo glanced down.

“I don’t want to hurt you,” said Draco.

“What a coincidence,” said Theo tonelessly. “I had the same thought.”

“If you stand aside, I won’t have to.”

“But if I don’t?”

The silence grew sharper than dragon fangs. He gripped his wand tightly.

“It’s my mother,” he said.

Theo pressed his lips together.

“Yeah,” he said, to no one in particular. “All right.”

Then he turned to Pansy and Daphne. “Either of you have a decent Muffling Charm?”

“We’re not allowed to use magic outside of school,” Pansy said immediately.

“It’s just the Trace, and there are about a million wizards here right now, you think the Ministry’ll notice if you cast a measly Muffliato? I say again: can either of you produce a Muffling Charm? For I cannot.”

“I can,” Daphne interrupted, drawing her wand. “And I don’t give a fig about the Trace, they can take me to court if they like. Daddy’s solicitors will make a snack out of them.”

“Good. Draw the boundaries from here to the pavilion, nice and big. Pansy, get the Lady Malfoy on her feet.”

Pansy whined, “But—”

“Pans,” said Theo. Something passed between them.

Wordlessly, Pansy stepped under Narcissa’s arm, and helped Draco drag her upright.

“This way,” Theo said, turning back to the house. “We’ll Floo you home. Dad keeps the powder in a hidden compartment under the grate. He uses it when he doesn’t want me to know he’s going out. He won’t notice if a pinch is gone.”

“Muffliato,” cried Daphne, and her wand cut an arc through the sky, leaving a queer ripple in the air. The cheers from the pavilion dulled as if submerged.

She turned, grinning. “I’ve never done magic outside of Hogwarts before,” she stage-whispered. “I feel naughty.”

“Nicely done,” Theo said admiringly. “This way.”

They carried Narcissa into the house and through the empty sitting room. Her head lolled on her neck, and the stray word slipped from her lips, but otherwise she was numb to the world. At the hearth, Theo pointed his wand at one of the bricks under the grate and said: “Reducto, ” and it exploded in a small crater of dust.

He plunged his hand into the remains and withdrew a small snuffbox of Floo powder. To Draco, almost apologetically, he said: “Dad uses a password to open it, but I don’t know what it is, and frankly, I’ve always wanted an excuse to use that spell.” He held out the snuffbox. “Bottoms up.”

Pansy, who had been struggling with all her might, leaned Narcissa against the mantelpiece. Daphne came hurrying after them, holding Narcissa’s cloak, and tucked it gently around her shoulders. She tucked a strand of hair behind Narcissa’s ear and said wistfully, “You’re so pretty. I hope we’ll meet properly someday, even if you are a raving nutter.”

“Andy, don’t be rude,” murmured Narcissa, her eyes rolling up. Daphne tut-tutted, fastened Narcissa’s cloak, and stepped back.

Draco took a handful of powder. He paused on the hearth.

“Thanks,” he said shortly. “You — you didn’t need to do this.”

There was much shuffling, pshaw-ing, and muttering of demurrals.

“Slytherins stick together,” said Theo. He looked Draco up and down. “Well. And honorary Slytherins, I suppose.”

“Honorary?” snorted Pansy. “Since when are we doing ‘honorary’? What’s this business about hall-pass Slytherins?”

“Have a heart, Parkinson, he’s a legacy admit.”

Draco was floored by a humiliation of gratitude.

“Piss off, you brats,” he said roughly. “If any of you think you can hold this over my head, you’ll regret it.”

“Draco Malfoy, you’re a remarkable fool,” Theo said. “Get the hell out of my house.”

He held out his hand. Draco shook it.

The Floo powder sizzled and turned the flames green. Narcissa leaned on his shoulder, her head pillowed on his collarbone.

“Malfoy Manor,” he called, and stepped into the fire.

The Unspeakable Word

Chapter 14: The Unspeakable Word

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

“My goodness, that does all sound very embarrassing. But are you certain I wasn’t just in my cups?”

Draco sat cross-legged at his mother’s bedside. In the antechamber, Dobby laid out her clothes for the morning, whistling a carol under his breath.

“Quite certain. You called me Lucius.”

She covered her mouth. “No.”

“You did.”

“How many did I have?”

“I don’t know. But I don’t think it was—”

“We must be glad you have such caring school friends,” she said, and rang the bell on her nightstand. “Dobby! Some coffee, please? And bacon.”

“Oh, dear. We are having no more bacon from the morning, Mistress. Would she like some Christmas ham?”

“Out of bacon? What time is it?”

“It’s nearly noon,” said Draco.

“Impossible! The clocks are wrong,” she declared, flopping back on her pillow. “It’s seven-thirty. I’ve just decided. Dobby, go put on a fresh pan of bacon and a pot of coffee, I'm starting the morning over."

"Would mistress like the clocks reset, as well?" said Dobby politely.

"Smashing idea!"

"No," said Draco. "That'll be all, thank you."

The elf bowed and apparated away.

Narcissa touched Draco's shoulder. "Darling," she whispered, "I'm really all right. It was a touch of Dionysus. Nothing more."

"Mother, I know you're lying."

"I wish I knew what about," said Narcissa hopelessly, opening her palms to the ceiling. "I swear. Perhaps I'm wrong, but if I am, I've no memory of the truth. If I'm mad, I really don't know it."

Her expression contained such a potent tincture of helplessness and anguish that Draco had to look away.

"I think we should talk about a Healer."

"Oh, no. It's not possible."

"We'll use private practice, it's discreet—"

"Yes, but I can't. I simply can't, darling, I won't."

"You're sick." It rattled the floorboards. "We had to run out of a party last night. You collapsed."

"So you say, but I've no reason to believe you," Narcissa snapped. "Honestly, you've no faith in me. What if I was merely drunk?"

"You were dead to the world! You were raving about Lucius, and you called Daphne 'Andy'—"

She was shaking her head. “No. No.”

“You looked me in the eye and you didn’t see me.”

“And I’m sorry for that,” she snapped. “But a Healer won’t help. You’re just like your pighead father, he was always trying to—”

But then she balked at whatever she saw in his expression. Changeable as the wind, she gentled. “Dar-ling,” she cooed, reaching for him. “I’m sorry. I’m tired, and I haven’t had my coffee yet. I didn’t mean that. Let’s not fight.”

He stood up. “I have to pack,” he said stonily.

Alarm flit across her face. “No,” she said, struggling upright. “Come, let’s make up. I can’t part on bad terms with my sweet boy. Sit down and let’s make up, shall we?”

“Draco!” She reached for him again, and he stepped out of the way. “Please? Why won’t you speak to me? Don’t leave.”

Just then, Dobby appeared with a cloche and a silver carafe. “Bacon and coffee,” he squeaked, and then paused at the expression on both Malfoys’ faces. “Should Dobby come back?”

“No,” said Draco. He moved the chair away from the bed and strode to the door. “Serve the mistress. Then come help me with my trunks, once she’s dressed. Don’t dally.”

“Yes, Master Draco.”

“Draco!” Narcissa reached out longingly from the bed. “Don’t be like that,” she called. “Don’t walk away! Make up! Oh, be nice, please!”

She was still calling when he slammed the door behind him.

The sun clawed itself back to life in January, and the mood inside Hogwarts waxed hopeful. For the first few weeks of term, there were no attacks, and Neville reported that the mandrakes were attempting to sneak into each other's pots, which was a good sign.

"A few more weeks," he said cheerfully, as they shoveled dirt in Herbology. Draco, sweat-drenched and moody, failed to catch his enthusiasm. "They're maturing miles ahead of schedule. Sprout says we'll have Leanne and Colin b-b-back in no time. Oh, watch that, you'll break the root!"

"I don't care if I break the stupid root."

"Let me d-d-do it then, will you? These are ex-p-p-pensive b-b-bulbs, and Sprout can't get m-more of them."

With the thaw came a softening of tensions. The curfews remained in place, but prefects would look the other way if students slipped into mealtimes late, and professors no longer walked students to class. Percy chalked up the slippage to Dumbledore's absence; the headmaster spent several nights away from the faculty table.

"He's working in the Wizengamot, I'm sure," said Hermione. "With an election coming up, he must be quite busy."

"Doing what, it remains unclear," Draco said, disgruntled. She stole some of his Daily Prophet, and they were reading together over toast and jam.

She said, "He's a great wizard, I'm sure he can be helpful in all sorts of ways. Perhaps he's helping Fudge pass the Magical Security Act."

"Nah," said Ron. "Dumbledore hates it, remember? Dad said he wrote a whole column in the Prophet going after it."

"Aren't Dumbledore and Fudge in the same party?" said Hermione, confused.

“Yeah, but the Pops are huge, and they don’t always agree. ’Sides, Dumbledore doesn’t like it when the Wizengamot gives the Ministry more power. He tanked a bill three years ago that would double the size of the Auror force, said it was ‘unnecessary excess.’”

“‘Unnecessary excess’ is redundant phrasing,” yawned Draco, stealing a triangle of Hermione’s toast. He tapped off some globules of jam — she’d upended about half a pot on each slice — and nibbled it. “He’s right, of course, but that’s incidental.”

“Of course you think that, you’re in Runcorn’s party.”

“I’m not in anybody’s party, I’m a second year,” Draco said mildly. “I don’t vote. I can’t be held accountable for the state of our democracy until I’ve at least had the chance to ruin it personally.”

Harry said, “Maybe it’s because I don’t read the Prophet, but what’s his law about, anyway?”

“It would expand the purview of the Department of Magical Law Enforcement,” answered Hermione. Draco was proud of her; this was the sort of thing he wouldn’t have expected her to know, a year ago. “They could put the Trace on anyone charged of a crime. Dumbledore thinks it’s invasive.”

“And the other party thinks…?”

“That it’ll lead to a lot of former Death Eaters getting placed under twenty-four hour surveillance,” said Draco shortly. “Which is a problem, if ‘former Death Eaters’ is the largest voting bloc in your party.”

Harry looked up from his eggs. “Would you go under surveillance, Draco?” he asked earnestly.

“I regret disappointing you, Potter, but I have not, in fact, been charged with a crime.”

“Yeah, but your mum,” he said, and Draco swallowed.

“What about her?”

Harry and Ron traded a glance. Ron said, “Listen, you know we don’t mean anything by this, mate. I’m sure your mum’s… well, to be honest, I’m pretty sure she’s a weirdo, but no more of a weirdo than you are. But you know…”

“She was fully pardoned,” he said brusquely. “Cleared of all charges. My father made sure of it.”

“Did he?” said Hermione curiously. “How did that work?”

“Look at the time! I didn’t realize it was the Draco Malfoy Radio Hour. That’s my business, Granger, mind your own.”

“Fine, don’t tell me. Either way, it won’t pass,” said Hermione confidently. “Dumbledore is opposed to it, and everybody worships him.”

In Defense Against the Dark Arts, Podmore had moved from creatures to defensive spells. Draco welcomed this change, not least because it led to much fewer controversial conversations, and he found most of the spells useful. By mid-February, Podmore had them practicing in pairs.

“Excellent, Harry!” he roared. Harry had a knack for the Disarming Spell, and had used it to great success on Dean Thomas, whose wand now lay somewhere in the rafters. “That was Auror-quality, young man! You’re a natural! Very well done! Ten points to Gryffindor! And you know what? Another five, Granger, for an inspired use of Ventus! My, but you’re an impressive class!”

Hermione beamed at Draco, bouncing on the balls of her feet. He sent her a sarcastic salute, and then shot a jinx at Susan Bones that locked her wrists together. Naturally, the professor didn’t notice, having skipped off to effuse at some Hufflepuffs.

Podmore handed out points to Gryffindors like candy. This rankled some of the Slytherins, including Theo Nott, who would gladly say as much to anyone willing to listen.

“Say what you will about Snape, but he’s not over-generous,” Theo muttered, as they climbed the stairs up from the dungeons. “He gives Slytherin two points for every one to Gryffindor, but he only ever gives us as much as any other professor does.”

“It’s Podmore’s first time teaching,” said Draco, though he found it a bit hypocritical, himself. “He’s overeager.”

“Easy for you to say, but that doesn’t help us. If you lot didn’t rack up demerits like you need them to live, you’d have this year’s Cup locked up already. Pucey always said that House points were a crock of hippogriff dung, but I didn’t believe him until now…”

They approached the Great Hall. Podmore stood at the entrance, chatting sternly to the Slytherin prefect on attendance duty.

“...no excuse for lapse in judgment… I understand the temptation to go easy on younger students, but it’s that sort of laxness that leads to people getting hurt. I’m not blaming you, you understand, I’m just asking you to promise it won’t happen again.”

“What’s going on?” Theo said casually. “Hullo, Julia. Nott, with an ‘N.’”

The prefect, Julia, scratched his name off the list. “Pansy’s late,” she muttered.

Theo frowned. “That’s strange. D’you want me to find her?”

“No need, Mister Nott,” sighed Podmore. “We’ll not have students wandering the halls alone at a time like this. Tell me where the girl is, I’ll go get her.”

Draco glanced at Julia, who was glowering at the professor with vehemence. Her quill was digging into the parchment.

“That’s all right, sir, really,” said Theo in silken tones. “She wouldn’t want you to miss your lunch on her account.”

“Not a bother, and I insist. It’s a professor’s duty to protect the safety of his students.”

“Respectfully,” Theo said, with an ever-so-slight twang of sarcasm, “being that she’s likely in the Slytherin girls’ dorm, sir, I still think my suggestion is best.”

This was in the way of a conversation-ending argument. Podmore scowled. “Ten points from Slytherin, for Miss Parkinson’s tardiness,” he said. As Julia and Theo gave cries of protest, he added: “And five more for every minute she’s late. Tell her that I want to see her in my office after lunch.”

“But professor—!”

“No buts.”

“Tosser,” Theo muttered, once Podmore was out of earshot. “No wonder Pansy loathes him. I’ve half a mind to tell her to skip, and just take the demerits. We’re not going to win this year, anyway, what’s the point in trying?”

Draco frowned, rubbing his jaw.

Theo nudged him. “What?” he said drily. “You’re not even going to gloat?”

“Pansy’s a pureblood.”

“Right. In other news, mermaids swim.”

Draco ignored him. “So why is Podmore worried about her?”

Theo shrugged. “Good excuse to dock points,” he suggested. “Classic rule of war. Never miss an opportunity to kick your enemy when he’s down.”

Gryffindor’s fortunes were truly on the up-and-up, because their quidditch team was well on its way to victory in the House tournament. Harry was, to Draco’s misery, a sickeningly talented seeker, even on the miserable Cleansweep Five that Wood had him flying. Rarely had Lee Jordan had so much fun as when he got to commentate the Gryffindor matches, and even though he spent most of it playing a game of keep-away for the microphone with McGonagall.

“AND OH, HE’S MOVING, HE’S HUSTLING, HE’S A BULLET TRAIN, HE’S A PEREGRINE FALCON, HE’S MUSIC IN MOTION, HE’S A SCIENTIFICALLY PERFECT AERODYNAMIC OBJECT! LOOK AT HIM GO! FLY, POTTER! FLY!!”

“Jordan! The game!”

“What? Oh, yeah. Flint scores, rah, rah, ten points. Anyway, LET’S HAVE A HOLLER FOR HARRY POTTER, THE EMERALD-EYED KING OF—”

He broke off: McGonagall had tackled him.

In Gryffindor Tower, Jordan and the Weasley twins had invented a chant to be deployed whenever Harry caught the snitch, and taught it to the first years, who were too thrilled by the prospect of winning to have any fear of being annoying.

Let’s have a holler for Harry Potter!

The emerald-eyed king of the skies!

You’re in for a treat if you want to be beat

For he plays just as well as he flies!

To his credit, Harry gave every sign of loathing this chant, and turned the color of beetroots whenever it was deployed. Ron sang it in the shower for weeks.

In the last week of February, with only one game left in the year, Gryffindor took the lead. Loath to rest on his laurels, Wood doubled the number of practices, and gave Harry a practice snitch to drill with when he wasn't on the pitch. In Draco's opinion, this was the worst thing he could have possibly done — because Harry, either from eagerness to please or some mischievous impulse, started using it in the Gryffindor common room.

Ron was thrilled. "Fred says we haven't played like this in years," he said. "We're getting the Cup, Wood's sure of it. McGonagall's over the moon. Yesterday she gave me ten points for holding the door! Oh, hi, Harry."

Harry had come back from the pitch covered in mud and sweat, still wearing his quidditch robes, his hair sticking up electrically in all directions. Increasingly, these days, it was his default state. He flopped on the sofa next to Draco and Hermione, and said, "Wood's a madman. I can't feel my pelvis anymore."

"You're getting mud on the sofa," Draco informed him. Harry grinned and wiped his hand on the cushions.

"Eugh!"

"Scourgify," Hermione said primly, polishing off Harry's mess. "He's keeping you boys out there far too late, if you ask me. It's not safe flying in the dark."

"Boys and girls, Hermione, don't be rude," announced Katie Bell, as she clambered in the portrait hole with Angelina. She gave Hermione a chivalrous grin, to show she was joking, and slapped Harry on the back. "Alright, Harry? Not too sore, are you?"

“Nah,” said Harry quickly, sitting up. Draco snorted, and exchanged a snide look with Hermione.

“Attaboy. What’re we listening to? Something new from Seamus?”

The boombox, which lived on top of the hearth whenever Seamus wasn’t carrying it around, thumped placidly in the background. It was playing “Temptation,” a track from the album Hermione gave him for Christmas.

“Actually, it’s Draco’s.”

“Really?” She cocked her head at Draco, appraising. “You a fan of muggle music, Malfoy?”

He shrugged. “When it isn’t awful.”

“Yeah? You should come with George and me to Hogsmeade sometime, then,” she said casually. “There’s a music shop off Main Street, and they sell used CDs. Can get them for half price, quarter-price, sometimes.”

He looked her up and down. She vaguely resembled Harry, with mud on her face and black choppy hair standing all on its end, and there was something jaunty and boyish in the way she stood with her hip cocked, black nails drumming on her waist. She wasn’t remotely respectable, but she carried herself with such brassy confidence that she could have stood in file with a marquess. She was well-liked in Gryffindor.

“Alright, Bell,” he said slowly.

“Aces. I’ll let him know. Night, lads.”

She and Angelina tromped up the stairs to the girls’ dorm. Eyeing their muddy tracks, Hermione cast a muttered “Scourgify” after them.

“Oi, Draco,” said Ron, scratching his head with his quill. “I can’t get this one. What d’you get if you combine minotaur bone meal with liquified azolla?”

He made a face. “Piss-all. And a dirty cauldron. Why?”

“Aw, no, I thought for sure I’d got it.” Ron sighed, grabbing a new scroll of parchment. “What about bunyip nails?”

Draco shut his book and rubbed the bridge of his nose.
“...Substituted for which?”

“I dunno. Either?”

“Well, it matters which, Weasley.”

Hermione stopped writing. “Why are you asking him?” she said, in tones so delicate he knew she was suspicious.

“Because he’s… the Potions bloke?” said Ron, helplessly. His eyes darted between Hermione and Draco, growing aware of the danger afoot. “Because he… likes it?”

“You asked me for help on that assignment just last night.”

“Right, yeah,” said Ron quickly, “which is why I asked Draco today. To give you a break. From answering.”

“Yes,” said Hermione, narrowing her eyes. “Which is why you had me do half of your Transfiguration at lunch.”

Draco sat back, enjoying himself. Harry was busy turning into a curdled ball of mortification, the same way he did whenever his friends fought.

“Do you think he’s better than me at Potions?”

“No! I mean, not no, but not not no—”

“Because our grades are just the same, and if Snape hadn’t docked me a point on the last exam for handwriting , we’d be dead tied.”

Draco hid a snicker behind his hand. It was typical Hermione to care about something like this: not just who was better at potions, but who Ron thought was better. Hermione didn't even particularly like Potions. She had complained ceaselessly about the same assignment Ron was doing. Nevertheless, Draco liked that she had a competitive streak; apart from being delicious fun to provoke, it made him wonder what she would have been like in Slytherin.

A high CRACK split the air. Ron jumped, spilling ink everywhere, and Harry was on his feet at once, wand in hand.

A house-elf stood atop the coffee table. His ears were pressed low to his skull in fear.

"Dobby?" blurted Draco.

"Master Draco! Come at once, sir!" Dobby seized Draco's hands and tugged him to his feet. Distressed tears welled in his eyes. "You must come! Intruders at the Manor! Thieves! Burglars! The mistress has removed!"

A cold wave rolled down Draco's spine. He shot up. "The Manor? Who — when did it happen? Where's my mother?"

"The mistress has removed with Mister Snape, sir! It is happening just recently, sir! Dobby hears the house wards are being broken, and the alarms are ringing! And Dobby sees strange wizards in masks, and they are inside the Manor when they are not supposed to be, and when the wards do not want them there! And he remembers Master Draco's order, and goes to Mister Snape! And Mister Snape calls Mister Dumbledore, and says to alert Master Draco, and tells Dobby to bring him at once!"

Draco gripped the front of Dobby's pillowcase and hauled him up like a doll. The elf gave a shrill cry.

"Where is my mother?"

Dobby squeaked, hands scrabbling for purchase on Draco's arm. "Safe!" he cried. "Safe with Mister Snape! Dobby makes sure of it, sir! Dobby would not leave her, otherwise!"

Repenting, Draco slackened his grip, and lowered Dobby to the floor. He closed his eyes and took deep breaths.

He became aware that the other three were staring at him. He could feel Hermione's eyes on his back, and he dreaded turning around.

Ron was the first to speak.

"What the hell is that?" he said.

Dobby gasped, and quaffed a bow. "The young master's friends!" he said. "A thousand pardons from Dobby, who has not introduced himself. This is Dobby, and he is the loyal elf of the Most Ancient and Most Noble House of Malfoy."

Hermione inhaled sharply. Draco winced.

"And Dobby knows who you are!" exclaimed Dobby.

"You do?" said Harry, curiously.

"Master Draco has told Dobby about you! You are his Pooter and Wheezey!"

Harry choked. Ron gave a strangled belch of laughter.

Dobby turned to Hermione. "And Miss Grain Jar!" he said generously. "It is an honor to Dobby! Master Draco is told Dobby how clever his Grain Jar is." He bowed so deep his ears swept the floor.

"Hello, Dobby," Hermione said through gritted teeth. "It's very nice to meet you."

Draco risked a look at Hermione. She was rigid all over, and her hands fisted her skirts, white-knuckled. She did not look back at him.

Ron said weakly, “Draco, mate, I knew you were rich, but this is…”

“Is that a pillowcase?” interrupted Harry.

Dobby looked down at his shift, plucking at the hem. As the others goggled, Draco saw Dobby as if through fresh eyes: he saw the patchwork of miscellaneous stains on his grubby pillowcase, the trailing threads, the places where rips and tears had been stitched together by tiny hands. He saw, too, for the first time, the bandages Dobby wrapped around his feet in lieu of socks or shoes, and the long scar running up the back of his skull, where Draco had once, as a toddler, accidentally pushed him down the stairs. He recalled Dobby’s fretful declaration: Mistress says he must knock his head very hard against the wall and be sorry…

“Yes, sir,” the elf admitted, fidgeting. “Dobby is sorry. Dobby would have worn a nicer pillowcase, if he knew he would be representing the family…”

“A nicer pillowcase,” said Hermione, in a trembling voice.

Draco interrupted. “We have to go,” he said roughly. “I’ll — explain later. Dobby, take me to my mother.”

“Yes, Master Draco,” Dobby said pleasantly, and held out his hand. “Dobby will apparate us.”

He turned to Hermione. “I’ll explain later,” he said. “When I get back. Just don’t… jump to any conclusions, Granger. All right?” He tried to keep his tone light and practical. It really wasn’t a big deal, and he’d make her see that. She was a reasonable witch; if he explained things properly, she’d understand.

Hermione looked at him. Her eyes were narrow and breathtakingly cold.

“What conclusions?” she said, tonelessly. “I don’t think there’s anything to infer.”

“Don’t — just wait up, will you?”

A vein throbbed in her neck.

He gave her a beseeching look. Reluctantly, she nodded.

“Okay,” he said. “Dobby, let’s go.”

He took Dobby’s hand, and with another CRACK, and a terrible twist in his gut, the world flickered.

When it solidified again, he was standing in Snape’s office.

In an armchair by the fire sat his mother, dressed in a nightgown and slippers, a shaggy quilt draped around her shoulders. Her hair was loose and tumbled down her shoulders in a striking gradient from white at the crown to black at the tips. In one hand, she cradled a drawstring pouch, while in the other, she clutched her wand.

“Draco,” she cried, and surged up to embrace him. He flung his arms around her and buried his head in her shoulder. As one, they took a deep, jagged breath.

A cauldron bubbled on the Potion Master’s desk. Snape stepped away from the brew to greet them, brushing off his hands. “Draco,” he said shortly.

“Hello, Professor. Mother, are you all right—?”

“Fine,” she said, waving it away. “Fine, fine, all fine. I was quite asleep, when Dobby woke me; they were already in the library before I heard a thing.”

Draco quelled a spasm of panic at the thought. “You didn’t hear the wards go off?”

“No.” A shade of guilt flickered across her face. “I had — well, I had taken a dose of Dreamless Sleep, you see, and — you know, it is rather strong.”

“Have you been sleeping ill?” he murmured, frowning, but Snape interrupted them.

“It matters little. They did not come for your mother.”

“How do you know?” Draco demanded. “She’s a well-known witch. They could have been there to kidnap her, to ransom, or, or hurt her, or Merlin knows—”

“If they wanted your mother, they would have her,” Snape said crisply, picking up his knife. He began chopping greenery in a flurry of strokes. “They were inside your house well before the elf heard the alarm. If your mother was the object of their mission, why tarry with petty larceny?”

“How did they get through the wards?”

“I do not know. They were gone by the time I arrived.” He swept the greenery into the brew and replaced the cutting board. “I have notified Dumbledore, who has departed to assess the damages. If you wish to notify law enforcement, that is your prerogative, but I would advise you that Lucius always vehemently refused to let Ministry agents see the interior of the Manor, and to my understanding had good reasons for doing so.”

Narcissa shook her head. “No Aurors,” she ordered. “In fact, I would really prefer you hadn’t even told Dumbledore, Severus. I don’t trust that man.”

“It was not my choice.” Snape’s voice was flat. “You came to Hogwarts. You asked for my help. It comes at a cost.”

Draco swallowed. Not for the first time, he wondered what the nature of Snape and Dumbledore’s relationship was, that Snape spoke of him with such begrudging reverence; it went far beyond the usual respect of professor and headmaster.

The flames in the fireplace leapt up and turned green. Snape flicked his wand at the hearth, and the grate folded itself neatly to one side just in time for Albus Dumbledore to stride through the fireplace.

“Narcissa,” he said solemnly. “Welcome to Hogwarts. I cannot express my regret that you could not visit under more auspicious circumstances.”

“Professor Dumbledore,” she said coolly, and allowed him to clasp her hand between his own.

“I hope it is some comfort to you that the Manor is, for the most part, quite untouched. Only the library has been disturbed — although, I admit, it is a conspicuous disturbance…”

“What do you mean?” said Draco sharply. “What happened to it?”

Dumbledore looked down at him. “Hello, Draco,” he said kindly. Bits of ash clung to his hair from the Floo, giving it the color of cinders. “Thank you for joining us. I apologize for the upset. I know you must have been very worried for your mother.”

“Yes, yes, but what about the library?”

“It was ransacked,” Snape said shortly. “At least one shelf was pried off the wall. Evidence indicates it was a hasty search.”

“Of course it was,” said Narcissa, sitting down. She braced her forehead delicately on two fingers. Draco stepped to her side, and placed his hand protectively on her shoulder. “Once the wards broke, they would have been racing the clock.”

“To find what?” asked Draco incredulously. He looked from Narcissa to Snape to Dumbledore. “Why the library? It’s magnificent, certainly, but even the most expensive book in that collection… I could name fifty more expensive artifacts in the house.”

“I concur in full,” said Dumbledore gravely. “Whatever they took, I very much doubt they intended to sell. Narcissa, I warn you, I am about to ask a somewhat impolitical question.”

She arched her neck and leveled him with a stare that could freeze oceans.

“When Lucius was assembling his collection of… I will call them antiques,” said Dumbledore politely, “did he come into possession of a particular book, or perhaps a scroll, or volume, that would arouse malign interest?”

“Albus,” snapped Snape, setting down a bottle of hippogriff bile. “Of all times. Narcissa, don’t answer that.”

“I assure you, I mean nothing by it. I ask only to abet the course of our inquiry. You may answer in as much or as little detail as you like.”

Narcissa rubbed her forehead, deep in thought.

“Father collected lots of things,” Draco volunteered. Dumbledore turned to Draco, his eyes alight with interest and a glimmer of something hungrier. “He had an excellent library. He loved to read. He had a first edition of Most Potente Potions, and a box set of the Stoddard lectures, and a handwritten draft of Godelot…”

“And did others know of this collection? Was there any tome of which he was especially proud, or which he made a point of showing to others?”

“No. He wouldn’t have… not my father. No.”

“Nevertheless, someone might have known he possessed them?”

“I know what it was,” murmured Narcissa.

The men stared at her.

“...I imagine it would be very difficult,” said Dumbledore, “to say with confidence, at this juncture, considering the vast inventory…”

“Narcissa?” said Snape. She looked up at him, and her eyes were shiny.

“It was a diary,” she said quietly.

A beaker slipped through Snape’s fingers and shattered on the stone.

Cold fingers ran up Draco’s spine at the sight of the Potion Master’s face: he had never seen his godfather struck with terror.

Having lingered in the background for the wizards’ conversation, Dobby now hurried forward, producing a dustpan from the aether, and tried to sweep up the shards. Dumbledore noticed, and said kindly, “My dear little friend, I should never dream of allowing a guest to stoop to such work while at Hogwarts. Reparo.”

Dobby squeaked as the shards flew out of his grasp and reassembled themselves on the desk.

“You have done much for us all, tonight,” Dumbledore added, kneeling. He held out his hand to Dobby. “May I offer you something to soothe your tested nerves? A warm drink, perhaps?”

Dobby goggled at the hand like he’d grown a tentacle.

“I see you do not belabor yourself with chatter. Too wise, too wise! So many wizards who speak much say little.” He patted Dobby on the head. Dobby trembled. “Be well, and happy. You have earned, if not the gratitude of your lieges, then at the very least, the gratitude of my not-so-humble self.”

Snape cut the burner under his cauldron. “It’s finished,” he said. “For ideal performance, it should rest for several days, but on such short notice, you will simply have to accept an inferior product.”

“What’s that?” Draco asked, pointing at the cauldron. Everyone ignored him.

Dumbledore rose to his feet. “I’m sure it will do quite well, Severus. Narcissa, if we still have an understanding…?”

“Yes.”

“Excellent. May I suggest, then, that we all retire to my office, where I have called for some hot chocolates and crumpets? I find it much easier to face the trials of the world when armed with a sweet snack.”

Nobody laughed. Snape and Narcissa remained stone-faced.

“Hang on,” said Draco aggressively. “I still don’t understand. What happened? What’s this diary Mum thinks they took? How do you know they took it?”

Severus and Dumbledore both looked at Narcissa.

She sighed, turning to Draco. “Darling, it’s a very long story,” she said. “I would tell you, but it’s late, and Professor Dumbledore and your godfather and I still have ever so much to talk about. I know how absolutely horrid it feels to be kept in the dark, but you must try to bear it, out of love for me. Will you? Can you?”

“But I don’t—”

“It is very important. And I wouldn’t ask it unless I thought it was necessary, but it’s simply too complicated to explain all at once.”

“I’m not a baby,” Draco snapped. “I can understand complicated things. What, is it some sort of Dark Arts book?” He looked at Dumbledore and Snape, who were staring gravely on, watching the altercation between mother and son. “It is, isn’t it? That’s why you’re so skittish, and why you won’t tell me. You think I don’t know we own Dark artifacts? I lived in that house for eleven years! I walk past three of them on the way to breakfast!"

"Draco," Snape said uneasily.

Draco pointed at him. "You're nervous," he accused. "Nervous enough to tell Dumbledore, so it's important. But not just important to us, either, because he thought it was worth seeing himself. And whatever it is, it scares you all to death, because I can't think of another reason my mother would willingly let Albus Dumbledore into our house."

"Darling, please be courteous," murmured Narcissa.

"It's Death Eater stuff, isn't it?" He laughed humorlessly. "Don't answer that, it obviously is. It's his diary, isn't it? My dad's? And you're worried because it has a bunch of information about the Dark Lord, and — and all the Dark magic they did."

Dumbledore gazed at him. "Draco," he said gently, "would you be so kind as to make a deal with me?"

Draco folded his arms. "What deal?" he said suspiciously.

"I would like you to return to your dormitory, right now, and remain there for the rest of the night."

"No w—"

"Please allow me to finish. In return for this considerable favor," said Dumbledore, "I will personally repair the wards around Malfoy Manor from this evening's breach, and I will give you my word — on my house, if you prefer it — that I will never again cross the Manor's threshold unless invited by a member of your family."

Draco breathed out. He looked at his mother.

"Do you want me to go?" he demanded of her.

She looked up at him sadly. “Darling,” she began.

“No. Stop it. Never mind. I’ll go.” He extended his hand. “Dobby, come.”

“Dobby should return to the Manor, I think,” Dumbledore interrupted, gentle as ever. “He has had an eventful night, and he has earned a rest.”

“Can’t he take me back to the dorm first?” Draco heard the whinge in his voice, and loathed it.

Dumbledore folded his hands behind his back and spoke calmly. “In fact, I would prefer that Dobby make as few appearances as possible to the other students,” he said. “I respect the right of each family to conduct its affairs as it may please, but the keeping of house-elves in bondage is not a tradition I would like modeled to your young peers, especially those in Gryffindor Tower who look up to you, of whom there are several. There is a reason we do not permit students to bring their servants to Hogwarts.”

“He’s my elf!”

“But it is not your school,” said Dumbledore, ever soft, and ever unyielding.

Draco rounded on his mother, but she had turned her head away, her brow knotted in guilt and worry.

“Fine,” he spat, balling his fists. “Goodnight, then. To all of you.”

“Draco—”

He stalked out of Snape’s office, letting the door bang against the wall.

The stairs to Gryffindor Tower had never felt longer than they did that night. By the time he reached the top, his thighs burned in the familiar way they did at the end of the week, and he had worked himself into a proper fury. He couldn't stand the insult of the dismissal, the lack of one word spoken in his defense. How his mother and godfather failed to lift a finger while Dumbledore sent him off to bed.

What rights did they have to dismiss him? He was the head of household; he was the Malfoy heir. If anyone should have been in the room, it was him. To dismiss him like a child — not to mention stripping him of his house-elf — was condescending, patronizing, paternalistic in the extreme…

His fortunes didn't improve when he reached the Tower. Curfew had come and gone, and so had the Pink Lady; the portrait had become a pastoral landscape.

He tried the password anyway — his plaintive exhortation of "Pustule nuggets" achieved nothing — and then, in a swell of rage, pulled out his wand to try and blast open the door. But the moment passed, and he lowered his wand, sighing.

He hammered on the wall instead.

"It's me! Let me in, I'm locked out!"

The portrait hole swung open. Hermione stood in the door, her expression cold. His heart sank.

"Well, come in," she said. "You don't want Filch seeing you."

He clambered through. The common room was empty: at this hour, and everyone had gone up to bed. The fire guttered low. Neville's toad was croaking peaceably from somewhere in the rafters.

Hermione shut the door. "I waited for you."

He dragged a hand down his face. "Merlin," he said. "Can't this wait?"

“You were the one who asked me to wait. I wasn’t going to say anything.”

“Yes, you were.” He fought the urge to snap. “You took one look at Dobby and you were ready to give me a sermon, Granger. Don’t deny it.”

“I didn’t say anything!”

“Yeah, well, you wanted to.”

“I wanted to?”

“Of course you wanted to,” he said, spiteful. He was aware of a defensive edge in his voice, and he resented it, which only made him more irritated. “You’re Hermione Granger. You always want to.”

“I can’t believe you!” Her jaw dropped in outrage. “You have a slave —”

“Right. Here we go.”

“An actual, living, breathing slave, in the year 1993, and you brought him into Hogwarts, where we could all see him, and I’m the bad guy? Because I thought about saying something about it?”

“Don’t be ridiculous. He’s not a slave.”

“Really!” she shrilled. “Is that so! So he can refuse an order, can he?”

His shoulders crept up. He scowled.

“He can leave at any time?” she continued, advancing on him. He spun around and walked away, but she followed him, her voice rising. “He can choose not to work? And you pay him, of course, don’t you?”

“You know, I have had one hell of a night, and I’m really not in the mood—”

“Well, that’s tough, because you decided to bring it up!” He turned to go up the stairs, and she pulled him back. “I’m in shock,” she cried, “in shock, Draco, that you ever could be so cruel! After everything Podmore said about Dark Magic—”

“Podmore doesn’t know what he’s talking about.”

“Podmore fought in the Order of the Phoenix!”

“Fantastic!” he roared, whirling on her. “Good for him! What a saint! Why don’t you go nag him about what monsters my family are, then? I’m sure he’ll agree with you!”

“Nag? Nag?”

“Yeah, and while you’re at it, ask him what my dad did during the war! If house-elves are where you draw the line, then I’m sure he’ll really open your eyes for you—”

“I don’t care what your father did,” she shouted. “He didn’t make you keep that house-elf! You could have freed him whenever you wanted!”

“I’m getting really sick,” he snarled, “of you calling me a bad person just because my family has certain traditions that you can’t understand.”

She gave a high, inarticulate cry of outrage. “Can’t understand,” she shrieked. “Can’t understand? Can’t? I understand everything about it!”

“Yes, can’t. And frankly, it’s quite rich of you to try and judge us, since it’s not your culture.”

She stepped into his face. He could count the pieces of hair that floated free of her braid, and individual crosshairs of her braces when she bared her teeth. “Not my culture?” she repeated dangerously. “And what does that mean?”

“It means— oh, come off it, you know perfectly well what it means.”

“No, I don’t. Why don’t you tell me, Draco? Why don’t you tell me exactly what you mean by ‘your culture’? What is that culture, exactly?”

“You’d feel differently if you were…” He gestured, vaguely and angrily.

“If what? If I was what? ”

“A pureblood!” He threw up his hands. “It’s different! I can’t explain how, it just is!”

“Right,” she seethed. “Right. It ‘just is’ different. And purebloods ‘just are’ better than muggle-borns. That’s what you’re thinking, aren’t you?”

“Oh, piss off,” he said coldly. “That wasn’t what I was thinking, and you know it.”

“I don’t know anything about you,” she snapped. “I don’t know why you expect me to trust your intentions. I thought I could, but apparently I was very wrong—”

“Merlin’s beard, don’t be such a — a bloody—”

“What? Don’t be a what? A nag? A harpy? A shrew?” Her voice rose on every word. Her eyes were shiny. “Why are you so angry at me? What did I do? How is it that in your mind, Draco Malfoy is once again the victim?”

“I AM the victim!” His voice went so high it cracked, and upstairs, one of the doors creaked. “Someone broke into my house tonight, if you didn’t recall!”

“Poor you!” she shouted. “That’s really awful! That doesn’t mean you get to stomp in here and yell at me about it!”

“I didn’t start yelling at you!”

“You picked a fight, and you know it!” Hermione was on the verge of tears. “You were sour at me from the minute you walked in! Before I said a word!”

“Because I didn’t fancy getting lectured by a mudblood!”

The word was there before he knew what it was. He listened in horror as it surged up from somewhere deep and bitter and secret, a place he hadn’t known existed, and slipped between his teeth like spittle, tasteless and invisible.

It hadn’t even fully left his mouth before he wanted to take it back. But it was too late: it was there, hanging in the air between them, hard and sharp and clear as a piece of broken glass. He got to watch as it struck Hermione like a punch to the throat.

She stumbled backward, her mouth slightly parted, and the expression on her face did something to his insides that made him feel like he was dying.

Then she slapped him.

His head whipped around on his neck. Slowly, he lifted his hand to the fiery plane of his cheek. His signet ring burned cold against the skin.

“Muggle-born,” he said, quietly. Then, in a firmer voice, he repeated, “Muggle-born, I meant.”

But it might as well have come twenty years too late. Hermione’s mouth trembled, and she buried her face in her hands.

“Granger,” he said, numbly. He reached out. “Granger, I didn’t—”

She shoved past him, knocking him aside, and sprinted up the girls’ staircase.

He followed her, growing conscious that he had made the sort of mistake from which something precious, being lost, would not return.

“Granger! Come back here!” At his touch, the girls’ staircase flattened into a slide, and he went stumbling back to the bottom. “Granger!” he shouted, cupping his hands around his mouth. Panic tinged the cry.

“Malfoy.”

It wasn’t Hermione’s voice.

He turned, and saw Harry and Ron standing at the top of the boys’ staircase. Harry wore oversized flannel pajamas with the sleeves rolled up, and his glasses were askew on his nose; Ron wore a giant Cannons t-shirt and drawstring pants. Both were holding their wands, and looked disheveled, as if they had received a rude awakening.

Their expressions left no possibility that they had not heard him.

Any Living Thing

Chapter 15: Any Living Thing

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

In the end, it wasn't the silence that broke him.

No, it wasn't the silence: not the silence that greeted him every morning while the other boys dressed, wordless, and went down to breakfast without him; not the silence that swept through the common room when he stepped through the portrait hole, dousing laughter, killing smiles; not the silence that whisked over his housemates when he passed them in the halls, and descended anywhere at the Gryffindor table he chose to sit. No, not the silence of Harry Potter and Ron Weasley, who ignored him as well as any two people sleeping in the same room could, and on whose account, he suspected, he found a cache of stink bombs buried in his sock drawer. It was not the vengeful scorn of Fred and George Weasley, who (none too subtly) jinxed his shoelaces together while he was coming down the stairs; nor was it the quieter scorn of their prefect older brother, who became mysteriously deaf and blind to their hijinks whenever Draco happened to be involved.

It was not even the unendurable silence of Hermione Granger, whose boisterous, warm, know-it-all chatter had narrated his life at Hogwarts for almost two years, and who now showed no sign of remembering he existed.

What broke him was, of all things, Ginny Weasley, whom he made the mistake of sitting next to at lunch.

He had just set his bag on the table when she turned, made a face, and said coldly: "You know, Parvati, I'm not really hungry today."

Parvati paused, bewildered, mid-sandwich. “Oh?” she said. “Oh. Oh.”

“In fact,” said Ginny, standing up, “I’ve rather lost my appetite.”

Parvati glanced at him, then to the sandwich, and seemed to make up her mind. “Me, too,” she said. Then, bravely, as she stood up: “In f-fact, I wouldn’t want to — bother anybody by sitting near them. Being a half-blood and all.”

Draco closed his eyes. He was very tired; Seamus had ‘accidentally’ mistaken Draco’s Potions essay for kindling while building the common room fire last night, and he’d been up past midnight rewriting it.

“Good point, P. And I’m sure anywhere half-bloods aren’t welcome, blood traitors aren’t, either.” Ginny shouldered her book bag. “Let’s go find some of our own filth to sit with.”

They moved down the table to sit with Dean and Neville. A burst of laughter flowered from the group, and Ginny slung her arm around Neville’s shoulders, ruffling his hair. Hermione, who was sitting between them, looked up and smiled at Ginny.

And finally, after a week of silence, Draco broke. Grabbing his bag, he shoved out his seat and stalked away from the table, ignoring the chorus of whispers that ignited in his wake.

Theo jumped when Draco slammed his bag down in front of him.

“Goodness, that’s an entrance,” he said. His eyes did a comical sweep up Draco’s person. “Have you been Confounded? This isn’t your table.”

“I’d like to sit here,” Draco muttered. His jaw was so taut his mouth barely moved.

Slytherins were staring, but he didn’t care. It couldn’t possibly be worse than the Gryffindor table.

Pansy, who was sitting across from Theo, squinted at him in bemusement. “Why?” she asked. “What happened?”

“Does it matter?” Draco said tightly. “There’s not a rule against it.”

Theo shrugged.

Draco sat down. He grabbed a turkey sandwich and forced himself to take a bite. It tasted like ash.

He chewed. He swallowed. He took another bite.

Pansy watched him with an expression of alarm. “Teddy, they broke him,” she said.

“Oh, rats. This is why I never share my good toys.” Theo poked Draco’s arm, tentatively. “My good man, did you get Confounded? I was joking, but now I’m concerned.”

“I’m fine.” He took another bite.

“You are most certainly not. You’re a taciturn fellow, I grant, but you don’t usually act like a goblin clubbed you in the head.”

“I’m fine enough to hand you your arse, if you don’t bugger off.”

Theo and Pansy both sucked their breath through their teeth in the same mildly impressed way.

“Perhaps living in that Tower finally drove him to violence,” suggested Theo. “No shame in it. It took two full years, he’s still a man of more patience than I.”

“Don’t joke, it might be serious.”

“I’m deathly serious. Stuck in that loony bin till graduation? He’s got good reason to be depressed.”

“Or it’s about his M-O-T-H-E-R, you muppet,” she hissed.

“Ah,” said Theo, somewhat sheepish. “You know, I didn’t think of that. She is well, isn’t she, Draco? Please say she is, or I may have to faint in humiliation.”

Reassuring, they were not, and polite they were not, but carrying on a real conversation with people his own age went a long way to making him feel like a human being again.

“Narcissa is fine.”

“Thank Merlin.”

“Hermione Granger?” said Theo in surprise. “The swot? Didn’t think she had it in her.”

“She and I had a verbal altercation.”

“Mm,” he said. “Tragic. Well, can’t be helped. Say, can I glance at your Potions homework—”

“What could she have said that would upset you?” said Pansy. She fixed him with an intent shock-blue stare. “You’re Draco Malfoy. Your ancestors were the greatest wizards in the world. What is she? A gap-toothed baseborn freak?”

“Shut up,” Draco snapped. They both stared at him.

“This is our table,” Theo said slowly. “You can do whatever you like, in Gryffindor, and they’ll tolerate it — or they won’t, apparently. But if you’re going to lean on our hospitality, it’s custom to keep our manners.”

It was more than a little sinister, Draco thought, how quickly Theo could flip from merry indifference to the cool, commanding tone of a superior officer. He was the only son of a pureblood family; he'd likely never been told he couldn't have his way. Draco knew the type. He was one of them.

Except — it grated at him, for some reason. He didn't used to care, but he felt something intrinsically objectionable about Theo's slippery smile, as if there was something disrespectful in it. He found himself thinking of Ron, who could be heedlessly rude on scant prompting, but who never pretended to feel anything he didn't.

Draco never had to worry about where he stood, with Ron. Or Harry, or Hermione. When they were angry, they just came stomping over and yelled at you until you made it right again. It was sort of marvelous.

Pansy leaned back and flipped her hair. "Fine. Be miserable about it, I don't care," she sneered. "But mind you don't drag us into your mess, whatever it is."

He gave a bitter bark of a laugh. "You have absolutely nothing to worry about."

"No?"

"Unless you happen to have friends in Gryffindor Tower, I assure you, you're in no danger."

She snorted. "Only one, regrettably," she said. Then she caught him staring. "What? Don't look at me like that."

Theo beamed. "Parkinson, you dog," he said. "That was just about the sweetest thing you've ever—"

"Finish that sentence and I'll replace one of your colognes with Itching Potion," she said furiously. "And I won't tell you which one."

“And that’s the second sweetest.”

Draco snorted. It crossed his mind, absently, that Pansy and Percy might enjoy each other, if they could ever tolerate each other for long enough to have a conversation. Then he realized that Harry would probably laugh at all of Theo’s jokes — except the snobbiest ones — because Harry thought practically everything was funny, and that nothing would delight Theo more; and then he was thinking about the sorts of explosive arguments Pansy would have with Seamus, and how Daphne would adore Lavender’s muggle nail polish, and probably flirt with Dean; and most of all, he thought about Hermione, who would sit in the corner with him, and narrate the whole exchange under her breath, and laugh when he said something witty.

This thought occurred to him with a pang, like a physical needle through the left side of his chest. He rubbed the spot.

The afternoon post swept in, bringing with it a lighter haul than the morning. Ulysses made an automatic sweep over the Gryffindor table, doubled back twice in confusion, and finally cut across to land at the Slytherin table. He carried a scrap of tawny parchment.

Theo caught his Prophet before it hit the table. “Double edition,” he said, surprised. “There was already one this morning.”

“Why? Is there a crisis?” Pansy was ever hopeful. “Did somebody die?”

“Seems not,” said Theo. Then he exclaimed, “No! Really?”

“What? Don’t be mean! Tell me tell me tell me.”

“Asquith’s declared for Minister,” he gasped, paging through the paper. “Against Runcorn and Fudge. That makes four candidates, with Lockhart… the vote’s in a week! Of all times…”

Draco unrolled his scroll of parchment. It was written a scrawl so thick and stubby he struggled to parse it.

Dear Mr. Drako Malfoy,

Ye don't know me very well and that's because I reckon we haven't met proper yet. I reckon it's about time to fix that too, since any friend of Harrys is a friend of mine, and I heard enough about ye from Hermione that it seems like I know ye already. I know things aren't right with you two at the moment, but as I see it, that's all the more reason a bloke might be needin a friendly ear.

(Don't worry. I ain't mad at ye.)

Come down to the hut around 4 if ye can make it for tea + a chat.

Rubeus Hagrid

"...don't know what would possibly possess him to do it," Theo was saying, scanning the article with barely concealed glee. "It's mad. He must not think Fudge can beat Runcorn, even with the coalition behind him… it's that or he knows something we don't. My father must be jumping for joy…"

Draco balled the note in his pocket. "Who's Asquith, again?" he said dully.

"Speaker of the Wizengamot. Left wing bloke, Pop party. Just how disorganized are things up there?"

"Dumbledore wrote an editorial criticizing Fudge," Pansy said, wrinkling her nose. "Maybe Asquith took it as a declaration of war?"

"You'd think they'd communicate about these things. This is funny, though. I admit, I thought Lockhart would have dropped out."

Draco couldn't muster the enthusiasm to feign interest in politics. At that moment it couldn't have been less important to him who took the Minister’s seat, whether it was Fudge or Runcorn or Hagrid. He pushed away the rest of his sandwich, muttering, “I’ve got to get ready for Transfiguration.”

The bell rang. Pansy sprang up like a shot. “Me, too,” she announced. “Draco, walk me.”

Theo frowned at her. “You don’t have Transfiguration.”

“No, Defense, but the classrooms are close. Draco?”

She rocked on her heels, fingering the strap of her bookbag. A disorganized and unusual energy animated her body, as if she had been struck by a current and was still riding out its unpleasant aftershocks.

In the archway, Professor Podmore was chatting to Professor Snape, and making no effort to keep his opinions discreet.

“...particularly,” he was saying, “at a time like this. I mean, don’t get me wrong. Asquith’s my man. But the best thing would be to wait. Don’t you think? Better for the coalition, better for Fudge, better for the party. Our party, that is. Isn’t that right, Severus?”

Snape turned his head so slowly he seemed like an automaton.

“In front of students,” he said, choosing each word like he was plucking petals from a rose, “it is custom to address one’s fellow faculty by their title.”

The force of each consonant could have leveled a building. Draco’s mouth twitched.

“Right, of course. Sorry, Professor Snape. Rookie mistake. Still learning, you know! Ha, ha. But seriously, what do you think? Asquith or Fudge? For your ballot.” Podmore clapped Snape on the shoulder. Snape closed his eyes; he appeared to be praying.

“I am a humble Potions Master,” he said. “I am unprepared to speak on the matter without inquiry.”

“Dodgy fellow,” laughed Podmore. “No such thing as a ‘humble’ voter, in a democracy. As long as it’s not Runcorn, eh? Oh, Miss Parkinson! There you are. We were worried about you, the other day!”

“Walk faster,” muttered Pansy, seizing Draco’s elbow.

“Miss Parkinson! Hold on a moment! A word?”

Draco stopped, seeing no other option, and Pansy gave a high-pitched groan, stamping her foot.

“Make an excuse,” she begged Draco in a whisper. “Say — say you’re about to throw up.”

“What? No.”

“I don’t know! Think of something!”

Podmore hurried forward, eager. “Miss Parkinson, you’re on your way to my class, I suppose? Very good, I’ll walk you. Mister Malfoy, you go on ahead, I shouldn’t like to keep you.”

Pansy stared woodenly at her feet. All the nervous energy had gone out of her, leaving her limp and listless.

Draco tried to think of an excuse, but he couldn’t find a reason to deny the professor; Hermione was, ironically, much better at lying. So he watched as Podmore placed a hand between Pansy’s shoulder-blades, and with a gesture like someone guiding livestock, he swept her up the stairs.

At four fifteen precisely, Draco put away his watch, climbed the stairs to Hagrid’s hut, and rapped the knocker.

“Jes’ a mo!” Great thumps echoed behind the door, and with a riotous squeak of hinges, the half-giant peered out. At the sight of Draco, his craggy face broke into a grin. “Mis’r Malfoy!” he said grandly, flinging the door wide. “Good to see ye. Thought ye might not be able to come.”

“Hello, Mister Hagrid,” said Draco, in strained tones. He eyed the giant’s hands, and tried not to think about how one errant backhand could punt Draco into a wall. He held out a wicker basket. “Thank you for the kind invitation. This is for you.”

It was a basket of fresh tomatoes under a piece of cheesecloth. They came from the kitchens, so they weren’t exactly his own, but Narcissa had raised him better than to appear empty-handed.

“Thank ye, lad,” said Hagrid, quite touched. “These are beau’iful. Well, come in! Come in! I got a kettle on. Don’t mind Fang, he jus’ wants to lick ye.”

The door swung shut, enclosing Draco in the hut’s only room. Fat hunks of ham and pheasant hung from the ceiling, and a copper kettle burbled merrily on the open fire. It was ample space, but it all seemed small in relation to Hagrid, who made even the largest piece of furniture — an overstuffed armchair the size of Draco’s four-poster — look like a child’s playset.

A black boarhound larger than a Shetland pony came bounding up to Draco in the entrance, barking madly. Draco, whose recent past included less than favorable experiences with dogs, gave a shout and flung himself against the door.

The dog butted him hard in the stomach — he ducked, groaning — and then began licking him furiously. Draco began to reconsider whether he was in desperate enough need of companionship yet to stoop this low: perhaps he could try talking to Peeves, or the Giant Squid.

“Jus’ push him away, if ye don’ like it,” Hagrid called, lifting the cauldron of a kettle off the fire and decanting into a red clay teapot.

Setting his jaw, Draco carefully pushed the dog’s head away. Fang gave a disappointed sigh and relented, trotting over to sit at Hagrid’s feet.

“See? There ye go. Gentle hand, that’ll do it.” Hagrid scratched behind Fang’s ears, and Fang gave a world-weary woof. “Go on n’ have a seat. Cream an’ sugar?”

“Dash of cream and a squeeze of lemon,” he said automatically. “If it’s no trouble, thank you, Mister Hagrid.”

“Hagrid will do fine,” said Hagrid cheerfully. “No ‘mister’ for me. And you’re Draco, is tha’ right? Harry an’ Ron an’ Hermione’s friend.”

“Did they call me that, sir?” he said hopefully.

Hagrid snorted. “No,” he said. “Ron called ye a weaselly git in need of a spanking, and Harry said ye were an embarrassment to Gryffindor.”

Draco swallowed, dropping his chin.

“And I suppose Granger agreed with them,” he said.

“Nah. She did say ye were a ponce and hadn’t any more manners n’ Fang here, but she didn’ call you a disgrace.” Hagrid pushed Draco’s mug at him. “They’re jus’ mad at yeh. They’ll come aroun’ once you apologize.”

Draco looped the teabag string idly around his finger. “Right,” he said dully.

“Ye don’t believe me. Listen, I’ve been here for near fifty years, an’ there’ve been folks in here whingin’ about everythin’ under the sun. I mean name-callin’ an’ bullyin’ and catfights, even real fights, too, sometimes. They all come in here spittin’ mad, an’ you know, every one of ’em swears that that’s it, they’ll never speak to each other again, this is the end times. Some kids I have in here every week, with that story.”

“Let me guess,” he drawled. “They all made up in the end.”

“Eh, not all of ’em,” said Hagrid frankly. “Some of ’em meant it. But those folks weren’ the ones who were angry, you understan’? Usually, the folks what meant it jus’ didn’ care enough to go back and make up. They’d come in and tell me, Hagrid, it’s over, an’ they wouldn’ even be sad about it. Because they’d been angry so long it didn’ matter to them no more. They’d wore themselves out, an’ jus’ wanted to stop cryin’ over it.”

Draco gripped the handle of his mug. “Thanks,” he said tightly. “That’s comforting. Thank you.”

“Don’ look so low, lad. I’m tellin’ ye, there’s a long way to go before tha’ happens, with Hermione and yeh.” Hagrid nudged a tray of rock cakes at him, and out of politeness, Draco took one. “She’s still spittin’ mad at yeh, don’ get me wrong, but she’s not done with yeh. When she was in here jus’ yesterday, cryin’ about it? Sayin’ how awful it hurt her feelings, what yeh did? Not done by a long shot.”

The thought of Hermione weeping at Hagrid’s table made him want to sink through the floor. He took a scalding hot sip of tea, and the burn was almost pleasant in comparison.

“So here’s what ye do,” Hagrid said cheerfully, tapping the table. “Yeh go back up there, an’ yeh do somethin’ real nice for her, to make it up. An’ yeh show her yer not done with her, either, an’ that you mean to be friends. An’ yeh try not to do nothin’ stupid again.” He eyed Draco sternly. “Because it was real stupid, what you said to her. An’ yeh know that, don’t yeh?”

“I know,” he said defensively. “I didn’t mean to.”

“A horrid thing to say at all. If we were back in my day, I’d have yer mouth scrubbed out wi’ lye for tha’.”

“We were already having a row at the time,” he muttered. “Did she tell you that? We were both yelling. It was tense.”

“And yer the only wizard on the planet what ever got mad, were yeh?” said Hagrid calmly, without judgment or ire. “Think yer the only one who ever wanted ter say something mean? Think Hermione weren’t mad, too? What’s the worst thing she said to yeh?”

Nothing cruel: the truth, mostly. He scowled. He took a bite of rock cake to avoid the question, and almost cracked his jaw.

Hagrid shook his head, setting his great shag of hair aquiver. “She tol’ me everythin’. An’ now I’m telling yeh: she’ll forgive ye, she wants to, but she can’ do that unless ye show her ye want tha’, too.”

“I don’t… I don’t know what to do.”

“Ye’ll think of something,” said Hagrid confidently. “Yer a creative lad. Hermione’s always goin’ on about how good yeh are in Potions. An’ a rich boy like yew can always get some flowers, if yeh run out of ideas. Yer father was orderin’ these massive deliveries o’ lilies an’ jasmines up the castle grounds, an’ I had to sign for ’em and haul ’em up for him ter collect…”

Draco sat up straighter. “You knew my father?”

“Lucius Malfoy? ’Course,” he crowed, leaning back in his chair. “He kept to himself, but he had a reputation aroun’ the castle. Tha’ whole year with yer parents in it, they all had reputations. Pompous git, if you ask me. No offense, o’course, he’s still yer dad. Jus’ reminded me too much of some other slimy folks I knew when I was in school.”

“You went to Hogwarts?”

He realized belatedly that his surprise was somewhat rude, and tried to appear innocent.

Hagrid grunted idly. “Long time ago,” he said.

“...You’re a wizard?”

“Aye. It’s a long story, an’ with due respect, Draco, we aren’ that close friends yet, you an’ me—”

“Yes, sir. I understand, sir. I didn’t mean to pry—”

“—but les’ jus’ say tha’ I tried to do somethin’ kind for another livin’ thing, and a lotta people at Hogwarts don’ take well to tha’ happenin’, ’specially when it’s somethin’ tha’ scares ’em.” He set his mug down hard, a faint scowl creasing his weathered face.

Draco’s brows furrowed. “...All right.”

Hagrid shook his head, lost in thought. “I still can’t barely wrap my head aroun’ it,” he muttered. “How much hate some people have in their hearts for jus’ about any livin’ thing.”

Draco, thinking of Fang’s massive bulk, wondered what size of ‘any living thing’ Hagrid had been trying to help.

A crawling sensation prickled his arm. He hissed, and smacked at the tiny spider that had been scaling his wrist.

“Don’ do that!” Hagrid barked, and Draco jumped, slamming his knee on the table. Hagrid hurried around and scooped the spider up, cradling it in his massive hands. “Don’ hurt the spiders,” he scolded, opening the window and tossing it out. “Yeh don’ have to like ’em, but yeh don’ have to hurt ’em, neither.” He sent Draco a severe look. “Especially this close to the Forest.”

“The Forest?” He wrinkled his nose. “What’s the Forest got to do with it?”

“Don’ ask,” Hagrid said darkly. “Jus’ do me a favor, and don’ go killing no more spiders. And if ye have ter, don’ do it near the Forest.”

“But it wasn’t a dangerous spider, it was just a little…”

“All the more reason yeh shouldn’!” Hagrid cried. “Never done you no harm, did it? An’ they’re not all of them that little, are they?”

“...I suppose not?”

The half-giant lumbered back to his seat. “Don’ mean to yell at ye,” he said apologetically. “But you jus’ remember what I said, alrigh’? About Hermione, and about the spiders.”

Draco blinked. “Yes, sir.”

“No sir,” Hagrid laughed, thumping him on the back. Draco heard one of his shoulder joints crack. “I ain’ yer professor. Jus’ a friend.”

This was the last of a series of surprising revelations in a thoroughly surprising conversation. He wasn’t sure it was accurate to call him Hagrid’s friend, especially since he’d spent most of the visit fearing that the man might accidentally sit on him.

Deaf to these doubts, Hagrid shrugged. “Hermione vouches for ye, when she’s not mad at yeh, and tha’s reason enough,” he said gruffly. “Yer a quiet one, an’ odd, to be sure, but she likes ye, and she’s not been wrong about anythin’ important yet. If ye ever need anythin’, ye jus’ come on down here and let me know.”

“Thank you,” said Draco, and surprised himself again by meaning it.

Then, forgetting his earlier lesson, he took another bite of rock cake and promptly lost a tooth.

He sat with Theo in Potions. This was his only option, as Neville — who usually worked by himself in the back — had started sitting next to Hermione. But as soon as Snape put the recipe on the blackboard, Draco was out of his seat.

He had thought about what Hagrid had said. Thought for a while, all alone in Gryffindor Tower, while he stared at the page that was supposed to be his Transfiguration essay, and then, instead of writing the essay, he'd written down a list of things he could do.

The essay still didn't exist. That was fine. He'd ask Hermione for help, once she was talking to him again.

He stood by her desk with a tray full of lionfish spines and said, "Ahem."

Hermione didn't turn her head. Neville did, though, and said, "Oh. Um, hi, Draco. I don't think you're supposed to be over here."

"Hello, Long– Neville." When he practiced it in his head, Neville hadn't been there. That was fine, too. He'd adapt. "I don't want my seat back, don't worry. I just brought these over." He added, "To share."

"Oh!" Neville peered at them doubtfully. "Thank you? I suppose?"

Hermione finally looked up. She had tied back her hair for safety but some pieces always drifted free, and the cauldron's heat drew a flush to her face. She looked like a tired shopkeep dealing with an unpleasant customer. She looked at him like she'd rather be looking at any other face in the world.

He swallowed around something hard in his throat. "Here," he said, thrusting out the tray. He'd had words prepared, but they abandoned him under the cool pressure of her stare.

She said nothing.

"Lionfish spines," he explained. When she gave no sign of recognition, he added helpfully, "The recipe calls for them."

“I know the recipe calls for them.”

It was the first thing she’d said to him in over a week. It was a very sad, very small kind of relief that warmed him; perhaps some part of him had worried that she truly couldn’t see him anymore.

“Well, you can have these,” he said. He set them down, somewhat lamely, on the edge of her desk.

“For what.”

“For… for what? For the potion.”

“What do you want,” she said flatly, “in exchange for them.”

“Nothing,” he said quickly. “They’re for you. You don’t like butchery, so I did them.”

Hermione lifted her chin. “Neville?” she said.

“Yes?”

“Can you get me a fish knife? It should be the small one.”

Neville did so, despite his confusion, for the not insufficient reason that Hermione Granger told him to.

“Just use these,” Draco said, with an edge. “I already did them all for you. They’re perfect.”

“That’s great. I’m sure they are. And the lionfish, please, Neville? I’m going to need three of them.”

“Look, there’s no strings here. It’s a present. Take them.”

“How generous.”

“I didn’t mean — see here! Would you look at me? Please? I’m trying to say—”

“Professor Snape,” said Hermione, lifting her hand.

Draco flinched. He leaned in and hissed, “What are you doing?”

She met his eyes and didn’t blink. “Professor? Malfoy is out of his seat. He’s bothering me.”

Snape sighed, closing the book on his lectern. “Mister Malfoy, please find your table.”

“In a moment, professor,” he said. He searched her eyes, but there was nothing there except frostburn-worthy scorn.

“You mistake me, Mister Malfoy, that was not a suggestion. Relocate, or I will have no choice but to take points.”

“Sit down,” said Hermione coolly. “Or you’ll lose points for Gryffindor.”

“I couldn’t give a rat’s arse about Gryffindor—”

“Yes, you’ve made that very clear!”

“Five points, Mister Malfoy,” called Snape, amid a rustle of groans from the Gryffindor side of the room. “Tarry further, and I will double the sum.”

He went back to his seat.

Still stirring their own cauldron, Theo gave a low whistle. “What crawled up her— ow!”

Draco had pulled out his chair, and in an entirely unavoidable accident, had clipped Theo’s ankle with the leg. “Sorry,” he said blandly, and sat down.

When class was over, Hermione left nearly at a run. Harry, who had not been sitting close enough to overhear anything about lionfish spines, shot a dark look at Malfoy, and ran after her.

“Draco,” called Snape. “A word.”

Theo slapped his shoulder sympathetically and shuffled out the door with the last of the Slytherins, leaving Draco alone with Snape.

The classroom was empty save for the burble of dying cauldrons and the creak of floorboards overhead. Snape presided over a bubbling cauldron at the teacher’s desk, the steam from which was effervescent green. He emptied the contents of a small vial into the cauldron, which turned the steam purple.

Draco shoved his hands deep in his pockets and waited.

Snape did not look at him; he continued to prepare the potion, corking and uncorking vials with such speed it seemed random to the untrained eye. “You have changed your seat partner.”

“I guess so.”

“The year is soon over. You have chosen an unusual time.”

“Wasn’t my choice. Sir.”

Snape nodded, as if this did not surprise him. “You have fallen out with Miss Granger.”

Draco set his jaw.

“Am I incorrect?”

“No,” he gritted. “Sir.”

“On her account, and not yours.”

“There were extenuating circumstances,” said Draco, inspecting the floor between his shoes.

“Are the differences irreconcilable?” Snape cracked a bundle of twigs in half. “Understand that I do not ask out of any degree of interest in your personal affairs. I ask because it has twice now interfered with my class, and if you are not capable of conducting yourself civilly with Miss Granger, I will have her moved to the back of the room, and out of your line of sight."

"Don't do that. She didn't — that's not fair."

"Not fair? Why, to whom? Is Miss Granger's eyesight so terrible she must sit in front, or call it punishment?"

Snape understood perfectly well, of course, how Hermione would react to being moved to the back of the classroom, and the humiliation it would bring her. For what it was worth, Draco doubted very much that the threat was genuine; this was Snape's roundabout and somewhat slimy way of commanding him to set his house in order.

Draco rubbed his eyes until colors spun in front of his eyelids, and dragged his hand down his face.

"I called her a mudblood," he said. He was aware of how miserable he sounded, but his pride had taken such a beating already that he didn't care.

When Snape said nothing, he lifted his hands from his face. The Potions Master had stopped brewing. His hands rested in fists on the desk.

"Professor…?"

"That is a foul word," he said coldly. "Its use is not tolerated on Hogwarts grounds."

He blinked. "I know. I've been through—"

"Did you mean to use it?"

"No," he spluttered. "I didn't… I mean, I said it, but it wasn't… I didn't think. My mum uses it. I hear it at home all the time."

“You didn’t think?” Snape’s tone hovered near absolute zero. “You called your friend the foulest word that lies within your arsenal to describe her, and you did it thoughtlessly.”

“I wouldn’t have said it if I knew—”

“What it meant?”

“I meant muggle-born!” he shouted. “I wanted to say muggle-born. I don’t know why I said — the other thing. And I don’t need you to stand there and tell me it was a mistake, because I’ve spent the past two weeks getting treated like dirt by everyone, including Granger, and I can’t even be angry because I don’t have the right! And I know what she’d say, which is stop whinging, you’re not the victim, but actually I think I am, for once, because at least Granger’s got all her friends to be nice to her! Nobody gave me two chances!”

He kicked a table leg. Its cauldron rattled spitefully right back.

“It astounds me that it has not occurred to you,” said Snape quietly, “piddling as your faculties of comprehension may be, that this is your second chance.”

“What?”

He killed the burner. The cauldron gurgled to a still.

He spoke haltingly: “I had a friend, once.”

“Merlin,” Draco said, alarmed.

Snape glared.

“I had a friend,” he repeated. “And that… person… was lost to me, not entirely, but in no small part… because of a grave and singular mistake. And that, like yours, involved… a word that could not be taken back.”

“You mean m—?”

“There is no need for you to say it,” snarled Snape. “Now or ever.”

He paused, trying to show that he was taking the advice to heart. And he was: he didn’t want to say it, didn’t like the way it felt on his tongue. He couldn’t even think it anymore without Hermione’s face popping up in his mind’s eye, bright-eyed and agonied. “Y-Yes, sir. Sorry. But what happened to them? Your… friend?”

Snape shook his head.

“That’s it?” Draco said, chilled. “You just… they didn’t forgive you?” Incredulously, he added, “Ever?”

Snape drew his wand. Draco instinctively stepped back, although he realized belatedly how silly this was.

The Potions Master swept it over the scrapped cauldron, and the potion inside it disappeared.

“It does not matter.”

“What do you mean? Balderdash, of course it does.”

“I mean the point is moot,” said Snape icily. “Desist in asking; I have told you this for the purposes of instruction, not to subject myself to juvenile interrogation.”

“Instruction! What instruction? You haven’t told me what to do!”

“I have told you precisely what to do. If you are too thick to see it, that is your trial to face.” He flicked his wand at the door, and it swung open. “You may leave.”

“Oh, great. Thanks, Uncle Severus,” muttered Draco. “I’ll just go, then.” He stomped up the aisle, making a point of knocking over every cauldron he could reach.

“Draco.”

“What?”

Snape had not moved from the spot, and was turning his wand over in his hand. He closed his eyes, and spoke as if each letter were being carved into his flesh.

“It is not… the word itself… which requires apology,” he said. “That was… the mistake.”

Draco frowned. “Okay,” he said.

He wasn’t being facetious. He was trying to understand, he really was. But whatever Snape meant to convey, it had slid right over Draco’s head, because as he left the dungeon, he felt worse, not better, than he had before Snape said anything.

“Neville.”

“Mm-hm? Oh. Uh, I don’t think I’m supposed to t-t-talk to you.”

“You’re still passing Potions because of me.”

“...Fair. What d-do you need?”

“Is there a secret way into the greenhouses?”

“Yeah, ’course. You come through the d-dungeons and behind the portrait of B-B-Bambi the Tenebrous. Pops you up under the l-l-loose flagstone by the Venomous Ten— wait! Where are you g-going?”

The loose flagstone was somewhat heavier than Neville had implied, but a well-placed Wingardium Leviosa put paid to that. Draco hoisted himself into the plant nursery and rose, brushing loose dirt and cobwebs from his robes with a displeased twitch of his lip.

The sun was still an inquisitive firefly on the far side of the forest. Crickets purred in the warm silence of the greenhouse, and a spiky plant with thorny tendrils waved one coil curiously at him. He gave it a wide berth. A long tray of mandrakes were making a rather lot of noise, for plants, and their planter was shuddering with the force of movement happening within it. He gave this, too, a wide berth.

Professor Sprout grew flowers in the corner of the nursery. Most of them were used for brewing, and some for the kitchens. The pale flutes of a few dozen lilies sprouted from a small bush, and Draco severed these with a muttered “Diffindo.” He wrapped them in a bit of red ribbon he’d filched from Parvati’s sewing kit and examined them. The bulbs were perfect, shock-white bells, so pale the morning light turned them translucent. They were lovely, but just didn’t feel like quite the thing, somehow.

He pointed his wand. “Flositerum tagetes.”

The white bells withered away, and in their place erupted a dozen thick knots of gold petals, suffused with red at the heart. Draco was pleased: the marigolds barely retained any of the lilies’ shape. McGonagall would have been proud.

He cast a clumsy Notice-Me-Not Charm and headed back up to the castle. The library opened at six o’clock on Saturdays, which meant one could reliably find Hermione Granger at the door by six fifteen. The chances of anyone else appearing there so early — especially on the morning of the last quidditch match, when some students were camping in the stands to save seats — were slim enough that he could count on a measure of privacy.

There was a piece of paper in his pocket. He’d written down what he wanted to say. He’d been careful. He hadn’t had much luck coming up with things to say in person, so preparation seemed appropriate. It was like a cheat sheet for an exam. Hermione would appreciate the comparison, he thought. She didn’t find people easy, either. He’d rarely seen her apologize to someone for hurting their feelings; surely she’d appreciate how hard it was to do.

Then again, maybe she wouldn't. But he didn't dwell on that. He didn't really know what he'd do if this didn't work.

He found her favorite table. It was a wooden round in the back of the Transfiguration section, settled under a great east-facing window that filled the room with clear blue light as the sun rose, and sandwiched between thick stacks of old leather books that other students rarely, if ever, attempted to explore. It was quiet, and smelled of old pages, dust, vellum, the velvety scent of libraries. He sat in Hermione's usual seat, put the marigolds on the table, and waited.

Six fifteen came and went. So did six thirty, and seven, and at seven fifteen, he stood up, needled by worry. It was impossible that she'd slept in. Perhaps something had happened? Had she seen him coming in, and left to avoid him? That seemed uncharacteristically dramatic. Hermione wouldn't let a quarrel interfere with her study habits.

He left the library. In the hallway off the library antechamber, he ran into Theodore Nott, who was stepping out of a dark classroom.

"Morning, Draco," he called, tossing off a wave. "Early to be up, isn't it?"

Draco eyed him warily. "I could say the same of you. Shouldn't you be down at the pitch?"

"Who are you, Flint?" said Theo humorously. "No, I'll go down in a moment, I'm just looking for Pansy." He tapped the doorknob behind him with his wand and said, "Colloportus."

The lock clicked into place.

"Why?"

"She promised to watch the game. Can't find her, though. Are you going?" He leaned against the wall, twirling his wand through his fingers. “You’ll regret missing it. I’m thinking of punting a bludger through your seeker’s kneecap.”

“I’ve an errand,” Draco said stiffly. “I’ll come if I can.”

“Sure. You can sit in the Slytherin stands if you want, Daphne will appreciate the company. Just don’t wear your scarf, you might get punched.”

“I’ll keep that in mind.”

Theo straightened and chopped a jaunty salute. “ Au revoir, mon petit transfuge. See you later, then.”

“Fais gaffe à ta gueule, crétin,” he said, and enjoyed the way Theo’s eyebrows hopped all the way up to his hairline. As if it was bloody hard to learn French. “And I’m less worried about Potter’s kneecaps than Higgs’s eyes. Let me know how it feels to lose to a seeker in glasses, will you?”

He gave Theo a hard clap on the shoulder and strode out of the corridor.

The Gryffindor common room was empty, as was much of Gryffindor Tower; by eight o’clock, most people had flocked down to breakfast, or ventured out to procure seats. Even those uninterested quidditch had turned out at the prospect of winning the Cup. The only one left in the Tower was Lavender.

She emerged, red-nosed and swaddled in blankets, after he hollered himself hoarse for her at the foot of the stairs.

“Quit that yelling,” she sniffled, peering balefully down the staircase. “What do you want?” When she saw the flowers, she brightened slightly. “Are those for me?”

“Don’t be daft. Is Granger up there?”

Lavender scowled and blew her nose. “No,” she said thickly. “She left early, like always. It’s rather hateful, if you ask me. She always wakes me up…”

“Did she say where she was going?”

“How should I know?” shrilled Lavender. “I was trying to sleep.” She dabbed at her nose, and then added, “You might try the library.”

“I did. She’s not there.” His foot bounced.

“Well, golly, Malfoy, let me pull out my crystal ball and check,” she said irritably. “It’s none of my concern where she goes… Maybe she’s at the game, I know she’s friends with Harry. Besides, everybody’s there.” She groaned. “I so wanted to watch… it’ll be the last chance to see Wood play, and he’s so fit…”

“That’s enough. If she comes back, will you tell her I’m looking for her?”

Lavender blinked, rubbing a bit of sleep from her eye. “I suppose,” she sulked. “Not sure I should, though. Everyone says you were really awful to her.”

He snapped, “And I can’t very well make up for it if I can’t find the damn witch, can I?”

“Oooh, fine! I’ll help. But only because I’ve been trapped up here for days, and I’m bored to death.” She blew her nose again, pointedly.

He felt an unanticipated twinge of pity. “Doesn’t Pomfrey have anything for you?” he demanded. “You sound heinous.”

“I went and asked, but she gave out all her Pepper-Up, and she’s been so busy with Leanne and Colin she hasn’t made any more.”

“Why don’t you just brew it yourself?”

“Because it’s hard! And I hate potions! And I’m sick!” She gave a honking cough, for emphasis. Miserable as she was, he narrowly managed not to laugh at her.

“Good lord, this House is hopeless. Fine. You can have some of mine, but only if you promise to stop whinging.”

“Really? I can?”

“And if you tell Granger I’m looking for her.”

“Okay!” chirped Lavender, beaming. Her attitude improved instantaneously. “Is there anything you’d like me to say?”

“Tell her to meet me by the quidditch pitch,” he called, crossing to the portrait door. “And to hurry.”

The sun had risen cold and clear in a watery sky, and spring winds carried the scent of pollen on the breeze. The stands shuddered in tumultuous applause, and as he descended the lawn, his heel crunched on a paper-mache finger in red and gold, with ‘GO GRYFFINDOR’ printed on the bottom. He had just crossed the shadow of the stands when Professor McGonagall came striding out of the pitch, her robes billowing in haste. He had never seen her move so quickly.

“Professor—?”

“The match is canceled.”

“What?”

On cue, a cacophony of boos and shouts arose from the stands. He could hear Madam Hooch squawking through her megaphone as she tried to quell the school’s dismay.

He started after Professor McGonagall, who was scaling the hill at a breakneck speed for someone in ankle-length skirts.

“Professor, why—”

“All students are to make their way back to the House common rooms, where their Heads of House will give them further information. As quickly as you can, please.”

“You’re my Head of House,” he reminded her, bewildered.

She slowed, and the fact of who he was seemed to finally register. “Malfoy,” she said. “There you are. You… hm.” She pursed her lips, and after a moment of thought, she jerked her head. “No. You may as well come along.”

“What? Where?”

“I sent Potter and Weasley ahead. You’ll see.”

He followed her back into the school. His heart started a terrible drumroll against his ribs.

The halls near the infirmary were preternaturally empty, because of the match, and he could hear his own pulse in his ears.

McGonagall swept her wand at the doors, and they burst into the hospital wing. Madam Pomfrey was bending over a fifth year girl in hijab, and Draco drowned in guilty relief, until he saw the bed next to her.

Harry and Ron were already there, clustered at the bedside of a second-year girl whose face was buried in her nest of brown curls. She was frozen stiff, with one hand braced aloft, as if shielding herself.

Ron looked up when Draco and McGonagall came in. Harry didn’t lift his gaze from the body, his expression glassy with fear and grief.

“Malfoy,” he began hoarsely. “Where’ve you been? It’s—”

Draco shoved him aside and lurched over the bedside, reeling with nausea. The flowers scattered to the floor, forgotten.

For Hermione stared sightlessly at the infirmary ceiling, her mouth parted in a perfect ‘O’ of surprise.

The Election

Chapter 16: The Election

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

“They were found near the library,” said McGonagall. “I don’t suppose either of you know what they were doing there? Or if they were meeting someone?”

“Near the library?” Draco repeated faintly.

“Filch discovered them in an empty classroom. Whoever paralyzed them had hidden them behind a locked door.”

A wave of dizziness struck, so strong Draco swayed back from the bed.

A locked door.

Wish whoever did it would come out and say, even just to other Slytherins… I think we’d all like to buy him a drink…

“Hermione always goes to the library on Saturdays,” said Harry quietly. “I don’t think she was meeting anyone.”

Theo, hoisting his goblet skyward with an insufferable smirk, as if he had a secret worth toasting… To our faceless friend…

“She must’ve been there for hours,” Ron mumbled. “Poor Mione…”

You notice how nothing here stinks of muggle?

“I will escort you back to Gryffindor Tower,” said McGonagall heavily. “I need to address the students, in any case.”

Draco spun on his heel and took off at a sprint for the infirmary doors.

“Mister Malfoy!” cried McGonagall in alarm. “What are you doing?”

“Malfoy!”

“Hey, wait!”

He slammed into the doors, and they burst open. Footsteps scuffled on the stone behind him: Harry and Ron were following.

“Draco!” shouted Harry. Draco ignored him and thundered down the stairs, three at a time, his feet almost flying over the steps. “Where are you going?”

“I know who it is.”

“What?” demanded Ron. They stumbled after him, feet scrabbling on the stone. Harry was still wearing his quidditch robes, and Ron had red war paint smeared all over his cheeks. “Who?”

“Theodore Nott.”

“That maggot!” snarled Ron. Then: “Who is Theodore Nott?”

“Yeah, who?”

“Slytherin,” Draco spat, rounding the banister and plunging into the dungeons. “Pureblood as they come. Sacred Twenty-Eight, which means, for reference, Potter, his blood’s nearly blue as mine. Blood purist, naturally.”

“Naturally,” echoed Harry. “But he’s — he’s a student? Like us?”

“Temporarily, seeing he’s about to be dead,” snarled Draco. Ron grunted in approval.

“Yes, but,” panted Harry, as they dashed down some stairs, “how’d he do it? Madam Pomfrey said it was a — a complex spell—”

“He’d find a way. He could ask his father for help, he’s a former Death Eater.”

“You say that like yours wasn’t,” Harry said, not unfairly.

“Yes, but mine’s six feet underground, so he’s not exactly a reservoir of paternal advice!”

“He’s talking sense,” agreed Ron. “I mean, check the boxes, Harry. Slytherin? Pureblood? Son of a Death Eater?”

“That’s not a reason, though,” Harry said incredulously, “that’s just, like — I’m as angry about Hermione as you are, mate, but you’re describing half of Slytherin House.”

“I saw him this morning,” said Draco. “Early. He said he was looking for Pansy — in the library, on a Saturday morning, of all places — God, someone should have me put down for idiocy, I’m as bad any other Gryffindor—”

“Oi! That’s Hermione you’re talking about!”

“Almost any other Gryffindor.”

The Slytherins were still trickling in from the match, a dispirited troupe of green and silver. Draco spotted Theo’s quidditch robes at the tail of the line, chatting idly with Daphne and Pansy.

He found his wand already in his hand.

“NOTT!”

Theo turned around. “Draco!” he said, breaking into a smile. “Did you hear about it? The election? Tell me you didn’t come running down here just to celebrate, you know we would’ve invited you to the party —”

“FLIPENDO!”

He went sailing into the wall, and his head cracked against the stone.

“THEO!” Pansy screamed. She dashed to his side and fell to her knees, cradling his head.

“Blimey,” mumbled Ron.

The Slytherins broke into shrieks and surged away, clearing a path for Draco’s approach. His pulse thundered in his ears.

“Get away from him,” he ordered Pansy.

“You shit! ” She glowered up at him, her face knotted in loathing. Theo stirred in her arms, groaning. “You could have killed him!”

“Move,” he said, pointing his wand at Theo.

“What the hell, Draco?” Daphne demanded. She seized his arm, and he shrugged her off forcefully. “What was that for?”

“Nothing he didn’t earn.”

“What are you talking about?” Theo shouted blearily, struggling to sit up. Pansy made a noise of distress and forced him back down. “I haven’t done anything!”

“This is for Hermione, you tosser,” said Ron grimly, adding his wand beside Draco’s.

“Granger?” Theo repeated, dumbfounded. “What’s her problem with me?”

“Don’t play dumb!” roared Ron. He shoved his wand so close that it almost poked Theo between the eyes.

Theo threw up his hands. “I swear I’m not playing,” he said smoothly, darting a nervous glance at Draco. “Really. Just dumb.”

“Hermione’s in the Hospital Wing,” said Harry quietly. He’d taken out his wand, but hadn’t pointed it at anyone yet. “You wouldn’t know anything about that, would you?”

Theo’s mouth fell open. “No,” he breathed. “Granger? I had no idea. Is that why they canceled the match?”

“Oh, ‘is that why’? Don’t be cute,” sneered Draco.

“He’s not,” said Daphne calmly. “They didn’t tell us anything. Hooch said to go to the common room, and the Head of House would explain after that.”

“There was another attack,” Harry told her. “Two. Hermione, and a fifth year Ravenclaw.”

“They were found near the library,” said Draco, and watched in satisfaction as Theo’s face went rigid with shock.

“That’s a shame,” said Daphne, still calm. “We guessed it was an attack, but we didn’t know who it was. I swear.” She pointed. “Theo’s been at the quidditch pitch all day, Draco. It couldn’t have been him.”

“He wasn’t, though,” said Draco. “I saw you at the library this morning.”

“And I told you, I was looking for Pansy,” Theo said patiently.

“Yeah? Looks like you found her pretty easily.”

“I don’t know what you want me to say. Yes, I did find her. She was in the loo. No, I didn’t paralyze Granger.”

“Why should I believe that?”

He spluttered, “Why? Why should you — because it’s none of my business. And it’d be bad form.”

“Bad form?” repeated Ron furiously. “That’s your problem with it? It’d be impolite?”

“I know it’s not of much importance to you, Weasley,” sneered Theo, “but some of us take pride in our manners—”

“She’s a human being, and you’re worried about hurting her because it’d make another PUREBLOOD SAD?”

Ron was roaring. On each of the last three syllables, he poked his wand sharply into the soft part of Theo’s neck. Theo gave a yelp — more of surprise than pain, Draco thought — and Pansy let out a scream like a ferret, and threw herself at Ron.

“Expelliarmus!” shouted Harry, and a jet of red light knocked Pansy to the ground. Her wand sprang out of her hand and clattered to the floor, inert.

“Pans!” Theo surged to his feet, wobbling slightly, and slid his wand from his pocket. It twirled through his fingers while he stared down Harry, expression dark. “You’ll regret that, Potter.”

“Not before you do,” snarled Ron. “Petrificus tot–”

“Petrificus totalus!”

Theo’s jinx barely missed Ron’s chest, as he jerked out of the way. He rounded on Harry. “Reducto,” he snarled, slashing his wand and Harry hit the floor, just in time for a red curse to sail over his head and shatter a huge crater in the dungeon wall behind him.

Daphne jumped in front of Pansy, wand outstretched. “Stop it!” she cried. “Stop it, stop it, stop it! Draco! Make them stop!”

“Expelliarmus!” shouted Harry again, and Theo threw up a sloppy Shield Charm that did not absorb the spell so much as refract it — it bounced off the shimmering curtain and struck Ron, whose wand sailed to join Pansy's on the floor. But now Theo's back was turned on Draco.

"Petrificus," Draco spat, and the spell caught Theo's wand-arm, which locked stiff as a board.

Theo swore foully, and tried to pry his wand from the newly-formed vise of his fingers.

"Expelliarmus," Draco added, and Theo's wand flew free, only for Harry to snatch it neatly out of the air. Draco advanced, twitching up the sleeve of his wand-hand, and with a coil of anger burning his gut, he put his wand to Theo's temple.

"Draco," said Theo, with a trembling veneer of calm. "Let's be reasonable about this."

"Give me one good reason my next word shouldn't be the Reductor Curse."

"Draco," said Harry sharply. "No. Hang on. What?"

"Butt out, Potter."

"We're not going to kill people!"

"Give me a moment, I'll get back to you." He ground his wand-tip into Theo's temple.

"Hermione wouldn't want you to," Harry said. "She'd stop you."

"Hermione is in the Hospital Wing because of this bit of venomous slime," Draco snarled, "and for that reason, she's not here to stop me, so it'll be his own fault, won't it?"

"Venomous slime?" said Theo weakly. "And to think I invited you to my Christmas party."

“When I make it to ‘one,’” said Draco, “the next word will be Reducto. Five. Four—”

Pansy screamed. Daphne had to throw herself in the way to prevent the smaller girl from leaping at Draco. “NO!” she screamed. “TEDDY! Malfoy, stop it, you — you vile, loathsome — muggle-loving blood traitor!”

It was remarkably easy to ignore being called a blood traitor; Draco marveled at how something that would have devastated him just a year ago now seemed to have no effect at all. “Three,” he reminded Theo coldly. “Two.”

Theo laced his fingers over his head, cracking his knuckles anxiously. “Because it’s a nightmare to get brains out of silk,” he suggested. “Especially when one’s threatening to spill quite so much.”

“Nott.”

“Merlin, I thought you had a sense of humor. All right, one good reason. See, I’ve only got the one, but you don’t want to hear it,” he said, with false levity. “I didn’t do it. The thing you’re angry about. It wasn’t me.”

“My next word, Nott, if you think I won’t then you don’t know me—”

“STOP!” Pansy screamed, writhing Daphne’s arms. “Stop it! It wasn’t him, I swear, please — don’t kill him!” She added, in a wail: “Granger’s not even dead! None of them are!”

“What, that’s your winning argument?” said Ron acidly. “No harm done, she’s only comatose?”

“No! Paralyzed, only paralyzed! He promised!”

Draco lowered his wand.

“He promised?” he repeated slowly.

“Yes!” Pansy slumped in Daphne’s arms, sobbing. “He — he — I didn’t, I couldn’t, so — but he said, he promised, and they didn’t die, they’ll be fine, so— so—”

“Pans?” Theo’s voice was thin with disbelief. “What are you talking about?”

She shook her head violently. “I didn’t,” she sobbed. “I wouldn’t. He wanted me to — but I wouldn’t! He took me and said, he said, it would — it would be funny, and — to get D-D-Dumbledore in trouble, you s-s-see, and — but he wanted me to use the Killing Curse but I couldn’t, I tried to do it first but I couldn’t, so I used Rictosempra major instead—”

“It was you?” Ron said hoarsely.

She ignored him. “A-a-and then I wanted to s-s-stop,” she wailed. “Because I got s-scared when I s-saw her in the Hospital Wi-i-ing, and everybody said the person who d-d-d-did it would go to Azkaban, and I can’t go to Azkaban, I just can’t, I’m only eleven! But I told him, and he s-s-said now I’d done it once I had to d-d-do it again, I c-couldn’t back out or he’d tell Dumbledo-o-o-re—” She broke into a howl, and Daphne hauled her into an embrace, cradling Pansy’s head against her chest.

“Shush,” cooed Daphne. Her cheeks shone with tears. “Shush-a-shush, Pansy, it’s okay. You’re alright. It wasn’t your fault.”

Theo looked murderous. He said, “Someone forced you?”

“Mm-hm,” moaned Pansy. “He said if I told anyone he’d fail me, and I can’t fail, or my parents will be s-so angry.”

“Which professor?”

“N-n-n.” She shook her head, her pigtails flying.

“Which professor, Pansy.”

“It was Podmore,” Draco said suddenly. Pansy flinched. “I’m right, aren’t I? It’s Podmore. That’s why you wanted me to walk you to Defense.”

“You mustn’t tell anyone,” she whispered.

Theo looked at Draco. Then he looked at Harry, then Ron.

“Truce?” he said.

Harry nodded. “Truce,” he agreed. He tossed Theo his wand, and he caught it. “But what are we going to d—”

Wordlessly, Theo strode from the corridor. His green robes snapped sharply in his wake.

“Teddy?” called Pansy in alarm. “Where are you going? Come back!”

“Podmore,” Harry groaned. He raked a hand through his hair. “We’ve got to — yeah, no, we’ve got to help.” He broke into a jog after him.

“Merlin,” muttered Ron, retrieving his wand from the floor. “Here we go again. Can we maybe take a minute to think about it, this time, before we go charging off—?”

“He’s going to need us,” shouted Harry. “He can’t duel a professor alone.”

“Technically he can,” Draco muttered. “What he can’t do is win. Now, I, for one, can see myself coming to terms with—”

“It took four of us to beat Quirrell!” Harry climbed the stairs two at a time, disappearing. “Come on!”

“Quirrell?” repeated Daphne. “Beat him? Is that — is that why he left?” She gaped at Ron. “Did you kill our Defense Against the Dark Arts Professor?”

“Don’t worry, he was actually You-Know-Who in a trenchcoat,” Ron assured her. “But we didn’t kill him. I just hit him with a sword, and then Harry turned him to dust.” He paused. “Actually, now you mention it, we might have done.”

“What the hell? Draco, he’s joking, right?”

But Draco was running after Harry, because he was right: it had taken four of them, and he didn’t particularly want Theo dead, either, now he knew he hadn’t hurt Hermione after all. Ron, swearing in exasperation, soon followed him.

“Idiots!” Daphne shouted, still cradling Pansy. “Where are you going?”

The answer was Podmore’s office. They rocketed into the Defense Against the Dark Arts classroom, and found it empty save for a sixth year Ravenclaw boy with cornrows, who Draco recognized as Podmore’s TA, grading papers in the corner.

“Where’s Podmore?”

The Ravenclaw blinked at Theo. “I don’t usually answer questions put to me in that tone.”

“It’s about the recent attacks,” said Draco smoothly, stepping in front of Theo, in the hopes of hiding the other boy’s homicidal grip on his wand. “We have urgent news.”

“Well, if it’s urgent,” said the Ravenclaw doubtfully. “He went down to the greenhouses to harvest mandrakes. The Restorative Draught should be ready soon… good Lord, what’s all the hurry about?”

Theo was out at the word ‘greenhouses,’ and Harry only a heartbeat after him.

Ron sighed. “Thanks, mate,” he said to the Ravenclaw, and then he and Draco followed.

Running down from the D.A.D.A. classroom to the greenhouses took less time than usual, because Theo only touched every third or fourth stair. On the last flight, he hopped onto the banister and rode it sidesaddle down to the Great Hall, then thrust open the oak front doors with a blast from his wand, and surged out onto the sun-bleached lawns.

“You know,” said Ron to Draco, as they brought up the rear, “if we could get Nott to wait, we might be able to go get McGonagall, or Dumbledore.”

“Great idea,” said Draco under his breath, winded from running. “You go fetch him and say so.”

The chances of this were slim: both he and Harry, well-conditioned from quidditch, easily outpaced Draco and Ron on the race down the lawns.

They reached the greenhouses, the door to which hung open. Inside, flames flickered bright and shimmery through the frosted glass.

“The mandrakes,” Ron said, horrified. He skidded to a halt at the bottom of the hill, as did Draco and Theo. Only Harry, upon seeing the fire, continued to charge: without pausing, he shucked the top piece of his quidditch robe, tossed it aside, and charged into the burning greenhouse.

“HARRY!” Ron bellowed. “ARE YOU MAD?”

For a moment, there was nothing, no sound, just the crackle of flames ravaging the flora.

Then Harry staggered back out the doors, carrying a heavy terracotta planter in each hand. The leafy follicles of the mandrake plant protruded, singed but whole, from the top of each planter. His face was stony from effort: he was a small boy, and each planter was about half his size.

Ignoring Ron’s cry of relief, Harry dropped these, wiped some ash from his forehead with the back of his hand, and plunged back into the greenhouse.

“Merlin,” Draco snapped. “Perfect fool of a Gryffindor. Get out of my way.”

He shoved Ron aside and strode after Harry.

It was boiling hot inside the greenhouse, and flames danced everywhere, walls of fire, singing the glass. The air tasted of ash and soot and dead leaves, and he could barely see through the billows of smoke that foamed from every planter. Draco threw his sleeve over his nose, breathed shallow, and shouted: “Aguamenti!”

Water poured from his wand, in a wide jet, like a hose. He swept it over the flames, and where the twin jets met, great plumes of smoke erupted like the breath of a volcanic eruption. He put out a ring of fire around the mandrakes, and then moved the jet over to a crop of pygmy trees whose branches had turned black from soot. But it wasn’t enough: no matter how much water he poured, the fire was still greater, burned higher, and billowed more smoke that made it hard to breathe.

Harry seized his shoulder. “It’s no use,” he shouted. “It’s not enough. We’ve got to carry them out.”

“But the smoke—” He broke off, coughing.

“I know! We’ve just got to be fast!”

“I can’t carry—”

“You can! You have to!”

He began to explain that it didn’t matter, and that the mandrakes would burn to death before they managed to evacuate them all. But at that moment, a muffled voice cried, “Reducto!”

The front wall of the greenhouse exploded, and a million glass shards fell like raindrops to the floor.

Smoke unfurled from the greenhouse and poured into the afternoon sky, staining the clouds black. Immediately it became easier to breathe. Draco dropped to his knees, gasping, as he raked fresh air into his lungs for the first time in what felt like days.

Theo stood with wand outstretched, a triumphant expression on his face. “God,” he said, “I love that spell.”

And with a swish-and-flick that would have brought tears to Hermione’s eyes, he levitated the largest mandrake planter from the burning wreckage of the greenhouse, lifting it high over their heads, and depositing it safely in the lee of Hagrid’s cabin.

Harry laughed, part relief, part delight. “Thanks,” he called to Theo.

“Don’t mention it, Potter.” Theo, breathing heavily, lowered his wand. “Your friends are barmy,” he said to Draco. “Properly mad.”

“Takes one to know one, Nott,” he said, dabbing sweat from his forehead discreetly.

“That is the weakest of all possible comebacks, and the only reason I can’t do better is I’m still flustered from saving your skin.”

“HARRY? WHAT THE HELL DID YEH DO TO THE GREENHOUSE?”

Hagrid had heard the commotion, and came hurrying out of his hut. He held the largest, frilliest, most hideous pink umbrella Draco had ever seen, and was wielding it like a poker.

“There was a fire,” said Harry, unnecessarily. “We fixed it. Hagrid, it’s urgent. Did you see Professor Podmore come by here?”

“Podmore?” Hagrid was distracted, and stricken, by the site of the charred greenhouse. Draco sympathized immensely. “He came by jus’ a minute ago ter harvest some o’ the mandrakes. Wha’ happened ter you lot?”

“Never mind that. Where did he go?”

“He wen’ into the forest,” Hagrid said, looked wildly between them. “Said he had ter get another ingredient fer Snape. I — oi, you there! Where d’you think yer goin’, lad?”

Theo had plunged down the path into the forest. Ron moaned in exasperation.

“Hagrid, Podmore’s behind the attacks,” Harry said urgently. “You have to get McGonagall. Get Dumbledore. Tell them Podmore set the greenhouses on fire and went into the forest.”

“Tell him to ask Pansy Parkinson,” Draco interrupted. “Ask her about it. She’ll tell you.”

“All righ’, but — Harry! Where are ye goin’?”

Harry had sprinted into the forest.

“Theodore Nott’s going after him alone,” said Ron, “and Harry’s got a complex about these kinds of things. Unfortunately, so do I. See you, Hagrid,” and with a sigh, he took off after Harry.

Draco had never been this deep into the forest before. He could vividly remember Dumbledore telling the first years not to cross the forest threshold at the Opening Feast, a warning he’d always taken gladly and without reinforcement. But now, with the castle far behind them, and nothing but the sourceless rustling of invisible creatures in the thick foliage around them, did he realize how big it was. They had been hurrying along the path for almost fifteen minutes, wordless in their haste, and he had no idea how far they’d gone from the greenhouses, or how much path was left ahead. The woods stretched out for miles beyond the Hogwarts grounds, he knew; if they kept going, they might very well be there forever.

The path shrank, and they had to clamber over fallen logs and tree stumps, ringed in the teeth marks from some giant pair of jaws. Spiderwebs clustered thickly in the foliage, and Ron walked into one without paying attention, yelping and swatting it away.

“Careful,” hissed Draco. He cleared the cobwebs from Ron’s shoulders with a quick Scouring Charm and brushed him off. “Don’t go flailing about, you’ll bring the whole forest down on us.”

“I hate spiders.”

“I’m not in love with them, either, but keep your voice down.”

“Will you lot keep up?” Theo’s voice wafted out of the darkness, irritated.

Draco exchanged a foreboding glance with Ron and re-lit his wand.

A clearing appeared in the distance, lit not by sunlight but a watery blue gleam. The boys extinguished their wands as they came in sight of it, and dropped to a crouch, creeping through the brush. Theo and Harry went down on their hands and knees, clambering under the roots of an oak tree older than Draco’s fortune, and with a quiet whine of displeasure, Draco did the same.

In the clearing stood a man in a dark pinstriped suit. A skein of yellow hair clung like a cap to his skull, and his pale eyes glowered from deep within a square, leathery face. Professor Podmore knelt at his feet.

“...burned, and soon gone. The girl has grown difficult…”

“Irrelevant,” said the wizard coldly. “Why are they not yet dead? Why have you tarried?”

Hunched in the dirt, Theo stiffened at the sound of his voice. “Yaxley,” he whispered to Draco.

“It is impossible,” said Podmore dully. “The infirmary is warded. Poppy Pomfrey has refused visitors.”

“Why did you not execute the deed yourself, to begin with?”

“I do not… I cannot…” Podmore shuddered. He dropped onto all fours.

“Imperio. Answer me.”

Podmore gave a strangled cry.

“ Imperio,” cried Yaxley. “Imperio! Answer me!”

“...Dumbledore… asked to inspect… my wand…”

“And what do I care for that? I ordered them dead! Crucio!”

Screams filled the clearing. A flock of ravens lifted from the boughs above and fled, cawing.

The baying of Podmore’s agony made all of them squirm in discomfort, but for Harry, it was too much. He leapt up. Draco gasped, “Potter, no,” but it was too late. Harry vaulted the tree root and ran into the blue light, shouting, “Petrificus totalus!”

The spell flared and died against Yaxley’s wards. Yaxley turned, and Podmore collapsed, the curse broken.

“Mister Potter,” he said.

Harry brandished his wand. He had on his side not one single weapon besides a wand and heart far too big for its own health — that, and one very angry Theodore Nott, who had jumped into the clearing after him.

“Yaxley!” he barked. “Explain yourself!”

“Theodore?” Yaxley had been surprised; now he was shocked. “What are you doing here? Where is your father?”

“At home, celebrating his victory,” said Theo coldly. “And I’m sure he’d be very interested to learn what you’ve been doing with his best friend’s daughter.”

“What Sibelius doesn’t know won’t hurt him,” said Yaxley, “and what Prescott Parkinson doesn’t know could fill a book.”

“You’re telling me, but you can’t — this is a school, it’s not—”

“What is happening at Hogwarts is absolutely essential to what comes next,” he said calmly. “Dumbledore must be ousted.”

“So you’ve been terrorizing Pansy all year?” he snarled. “I don’t like Dumbledore, either, but this isn’t how we do things.”

Yaxley began to reply, and then gave a bark of laughter: Draco had stepped into the clearing.

“And the young Malfoy. Fitting, that you should join us so belatedly.” He pointed his wand at Draco, conversationally. “This was your father’s idea, you know. Years ago, at the height of our glory, he confessed to me an idea for how one could dismantle the Hogwarts administration and replace it with a more suitable infrastructure for our purposes.”

“You mean Voldemort’s purposes,” snarled Harry. Yaxley flicked his wand at him, and Harry’s jaw snapped shut. Sounds of panic emitted from his throat as his teeth refused to part.

“He was a brilliant man,” Yaxley told Draco. “I know he would have approved of the work we do today.”

Draco shivered. Trying very hard to keep his voice flat, he said, “I rather think he wouldn’t approve of you pointing your wand at his son, Yaxley."

Yaxley reached into his robe and withdrew a small black book. The cover was unvarnished leather, split from age, and the pages were yellowed from use. It bore no title. "He told me it would begin with a diary," he said simply. "No mere book only, but an artifact of enormous power, which the Dark Lord had entrusted to him many years ago."

A rustle came in the bushes behind them, and Ron gave a yelp. Draco glanced backward, and watched a large black spider hurry out of the underbrush, about the size of a rat. At the sight of it, a rough craggy voice filled his ears.

Don' hurt the spiders.

He glanced at Yaxley, who was distracted by Ron. Shifting subtly, covering the movement with his robes, Draco lifted his foot and brought it down hard on the spider's head. It crunched under his heel.

At the sound of Ron's voice, Yaxley's head cocked, and he swept his wand in an arc at the trees. Foliage wilted in a curtain of death. Roots shrank, leaves blackened, and fat sheaths of bark rolling into ashy coils at the feet of withered trees. The rosebush hiding Ron sagged and wilted, revealing him.

"How many of you are there?"

"At least one more," said Ron brashly, lifting his wand. "Dumbledore's on his way. You should be scared."

"Of Dumbledore?" Yaxley smiled, fanning himself with the book. "How could I fear Dumbledore? He is an old man, and he allowed my poppet—" He flicked his wand at Podmore's body, and his limbs twitched — "to run amok in your castle for a year. Even now, the Ministry has sent a detail of uniformed goons to place him under investigation, and now, without Fudge to protect him, he will find it much harder to interfere with the course of justice…"

Theo said, "But I don't understand—"

Yaxley's lips twisted in irritation. With a shadowy cousin of what might have been patience, he said, "Theodore, you are young, and you have much to learn. Leave us. Take Draco. Attend your father. Our victory is in hand, and celebrations will be in order. Meanwhile, it will be fitting… if Mister Potter… christens our Lord's second regime with his blood."

Ron roared and leapt in front of Harry, but Yaxley's wand was already moving. With a slash, he killed the blue lights in the clearing, and they plunged into pitch darkness.

Somewhere in the slate of black, a booming voice roared, "AVADA KEDAVRA," and green light shot across the clearing. There was a cry and a scuffle of movement, and something knocked Draco back into a tree. He slammed his head against the bark, and felt it tear at the back of his robes.

"Expelliarmus!"

"Crucio!"

"Verdimillious!"

Bolts of red light flickered here and there across the clearing like a lightning storm. Yaxley seemed to flit from one place to another, his weathered face contorted in fury, wand chasing Harry's gleaming golden shape through the darkness — now Harry dived out of sight, and Yaxley was pointing at Theo — and Draco never knew quite how it happened, whether Yaxley had seen one dark-haired boy and mistaken him for the other, or whether in his rage he had decided it no longer mattered — but Yaxley cried, " Serpensortia," and a long, black cobra leapt airborne from a seam in the air, hissing, its eyes fixed on Theo, who saw it and screamed — Harry hurled himself in front of the other boy, and opened his mouth, and a sound like sand running over stone came slithering out—

But now the snake was pausing, lifting its head, swaying back and forth in the rhythm of Harry's voice. Draco gaped.

He was a parseltongue. The Boy Who Lived, the Chosen One, Gryffindor's favorite son, and he was a parseltongue.

Where the hell had he learned that?

The snake bowed its head and slithered into the trees, harmless. Harry slumped against Theo, gasping for breath.

" LUMOS MAXIMUS!"

Yaxley's wand blazed like the rising sun, and the clearing filled with blinding light. Draco clapped his hand over his eyes to shield them and threw a Body-Bind Jinx vaguely in Yaxley's direction, hoping against hope that it hit something. Someone gave a cry of fear.

When he opened his eyes, he saw that Yaxley had gone stiff, not from the Body-Bind, but in terror of something large and black and furry that was crawling out of the trees behind Harry and Theo. It dangled from the trees on six immensely long, hairy legs, and from its bulbous head, studded with eight ruby eyes, hung a pair of shining curved pincers, sharp as the edge of a scythe. It clacked them together, and it made a sound like swords being crossed.

Ron made a sound like a dying goat. Draco, frozen in fear, watched as the thing hauled itself over Harry's head, its gigantic bulk passing so close that it ruffled the hair on his head. Harry had closed his eyes, and his shoulders heaved with each breath.

Yaxley shrieked, "Avada kedavra!"

The curse struck the spider square beneath the eyes, and it sagged from the trees, keeling over onto the clearing with a terrible crunch.

Its corpse landed on Yaxley's cobra, crushing it. Venom welled from its inert fangs.

Theo groaned, out of disappointment or disgust or terror, or perhaps all three. Ron whimpered.

Yaxley's breath came in gasps. "Acromantula," he said. "The Forbidden Forest teems with them. Dark Creatures — lamentably large — but no mere Beast, regardless of size, is a match for a true wizard—"

The second spider sank its pincers into his shoulder.

Yaxley's howl was lost in the rumble of the trees. Spiders poured out of the darkness, waves of them, hordes, a swarm of hairy wiggling legs. Spiders the size of carthorses, spiders the size of dogs, spiders the size of carriages, and at least two or three as large as Hagrid's hut, whose massive bulk knocked the trees together as they waddled into the light. Pincers clacking, the spiders converged with horrible hisses and screams.

The net of them drew tight around the clearing, forcing the boys into the middle, near Yaxley, who was writhing and screaming as the spider above him drove its pincers again and again into his neck, leaving a mess of carnage that Draco was grateful he could not see.

Ron, with a wailing sob, leapt onto Harry's back to try and escape the flood. But there was no escaping, for they were everywhere, above them and below them and walling in the forest on all sides, and the large ones were beginning to cast thick nets of cobwebs between the trees, erecting silver walls of glistening sticky rope as thick as steel girders…

Moving fast, Draco seized Harry and Theo with an arm each, and hauled them in back-to-back in the center of the clearing. They needed to leave, but how? They couldn't apparate; none of them had a Portkey; and they couldn't get out without fighting their way clear…

He had an idea.

“Dobby,” he mumbled.

He screwed his eyes shut and thought about the Manor on Christmas morning, the smell of roast chestnuts on the great fireplace, snow thick on the gables and wafting past the windows… he thought of swimming in the lake in summertime, and the smoky smell of the kitchen after breakfast had been prepared, coffee grounds and bacon grease, and the smell of rotting oranges in a secret cabinet under the silverware…

“Dobby!”

A crack split the air.

“Master Draco?”

The elf stood in the center of their little ring, holding a bread knife and a pat of butter. At the sight of the clearing, he gave a shriek and dropped them. Then he said a word Draco hadn’t ever heard from him before, and loudly.

“DOBBY!” Draco could have kissed him. “Apparate us!”

He didn’t hesitate. Dobby seized Draco by one hand, and Harry by the other, and twisted hard on his heel. Draco snatched Theo’s wrist as they went, and with a winnowing tug in his gut, the clearing vanished.

They snapped into existence in a high-ceilinged circular room. A number of strange silver instruments whirred and trailed smoke. The walls were covered with portraits of old headmasters and headmistresses, and at the back of the room sat an enormous, claw-footed desk; behind it, high on a shelf, a shabby, tattered wizard’s hat. A large bird with feathers the color of flames perched on a mount suspended from the ceiling, and at the sight of them, it gave a curious chirrup.

“Good Lord!”

Professor Dumbledore stood by the mantelpiece, next to Professor McGonagall, who was taking great, steadying gasps, clutching her chest. Between them sat Cornelius Fudge, who sat hunched in an armchair by the fire, cradling a glass of something amber. He and McGonagall modeled Dumbledore’s mystified stare in triplicate.

Draco risked a glance in the mirror behind Dumbledore’s desk. The four boys looked awful: wild-haired and muddy-kneed, their uniforms ripped and studded with twigs, scrapes darted here and there like smudges of clay. They would’ve been chased out of most reputable establishments with a broom.

He took a deep breath. “Headmaster,” he said. “Professor. Minister.”

“Former minister,” Theo corrected, under his breath.

Harry stepped forward, silencing both of them. “We figured out who’s behind the attacks,” he said. Then he withdrew a small black book from his robes. Theo gave a small hiss, as if in pain. “And we have this.”

Dumbledore’s mouth parted. Swiftly, he crossed the room and took the book from Harry. He paged through it with an energy that Draco had never seen in the old man before, touching each blank page almost reverently, as if it contained the deepest secret of his heart.

At length, he snapped it shut, and slipped it into some secret pocket of his voluminous periwinkle robe.

“Cornelius,” he said, “I believe I must take leave of you.”

Fudge pushed himself to his feet, leaning heavily on the chair. “Of course,” he said blearily. “Of course. Serious business. I think… I must go, as well… there is much to be done, at Ten Downing… I must prepare the transition.”

“Transition?” said Ron. It was the first thing he had said since they escaped the spiders, and it was weak from strain. “What d’you mean, transition?”

Dumbledore was still gazing at Harry with an anguished admixture of worry and pride. “I suppose your adventures have sequestered you from worldly news,” he murmured.

Ron pointed at Fudge. “Didn’t you win?” he said, in accusatory tones.

Fudge balked. “Young man,” he sneered, drawing himself up, “your friends and yourself have achieved a great victory. We should not sully your triumph by allowing politics to intrude…”

“He lost,” said Theo quietly. Fudge turned a baleful eye on him, but Theo did not so much as quiver. “It was cocked. Fudge won Northern Ireland, Runcorn and Fudge split the South, Runcorn and Asquith split the North. Fudge had a plurality, but without a majority candidate, the second ballot goes to the Wizengamot. The top two candidates go head-to-head for a bare majority. That was Runcorn and Fudge.”

“So what?” Ron rounded on Fudge. “You’ve the majority, haven’t you?”

“But Runcorn is Leader of the Opposition,” said Theo, speaking over Ron. “So he recused himself, obviously, but his party cut a deal. One vote for the Magical Security Act, in exchange for each vote for Runcorn.” He added, “My father wrote me as soon as he heard.”

“They’d never,” said Draco instantly. “That’s tosh. The Coalition wouldn’t—”

“Five seats flipped,” said Theo, shrugging. “They passed the bill this morning. Runcorn’s getting sworn in tomorrow afternoon.”

Fudge listened to Theo with a greedy sort of dread. Ron gaped.

Harry, who had a lump on his head where a Death Eater's curse had thrown him into a tree, plucked some brambles off his robes and glanced around like he was anxious for the conversation to be over.

"You're a precocious young man," Fudge croaked to Theo. "Your memory for detail, if nothing else… I am sure you will go far. Our children are the most important…" But where he seemed on the verge of launching into another stump speech, he suddenly faded, and the gusto leached out of him. Tiredly, he said, "Albus, I must go. The next twenty-four hours will, perhaps, define my administration's legacy more than the previous two years… I am very, very busy…"

"With what?" said Ron angrily. "Got any other elections to lose?"

"Mister Weasley," snapped McGonagall. Chastened, he fell silent.

"Doesn't anyone want to know," Harry said loudly, "who was attacking the school? And how we stopped them?"

With immeasurable chagrin, Fudge cringed and retreated. Draco watched him in disgust. He'd rather lick someone's shoe than seem so small.

"Harry, I would like nothing more," said Dumbledore sincerely. "And I should be honored to reserve an hour of your time to do so, after these lovely people have taken their leave of us.

"In the meantime, I believe all your friends have earned some food and sleep." Theo twitched, hard, at being referred to as Harry's 'friend.' "I suggest that you all find your common rooms for a moment's respite, and then help themselves to some well-earned victuals in the kitchens. I will instruct our friends to prepare something suitably hearty… and to prepare a berth for our guest," he added, inclining his head to Dobby.

Dobby hid behind Draco's leg. "Dobby is greeting Master Dumbledore," he squeaked. "Dobby is sorry for intruding, but Dobby was trying to save Master Draco, and he went to the safest place he knew."

"'Dumbledore' will do perfectly well," said Dumbledore gently. "You will forgive me for being unorthodox, but I have never much liked the title of 'master.'"

With a start, Draco noticed that a spider had bitten Dobby's arm, and a ring of pincer marks wept blood down to his elbow. Pointing his wand at it, he muttered "Episkey." Dobby made a sound of surprise, fingering the wound.

"Dobby is forgetting to heal himself," he said. "A thousand pardons, for embarrassing the House of Malfoy—"

"Don't — that's not — don't say that," Draco mumbled. Dobby fell silent as if compelled, which of course, Draco realized, he was. "I mean. You can talk if you want to."

Dumbledore watched the exchange with an unreadable expression. "Draco," he said politely, "could you spare your servant for a moment? I should like a word with him."

"Yes, sir." Draco patted Dobby's head. "It's alright," he advised him.

He trailed out of the office behind Theo and Ron.

In the hallway, Ron yelped and smacked something on his shoulder.

"Spiders," he said. " Giant spiders. I hate magic, actually. If I ever see one of those things again, I'm going to snap my wand and go live as a muggle."

"I'm telling Pucey to move the bonfire next year," Theo muttered. "Acromantula. Merlin. Why don't they tell anybody about them? They ought to have an exterminator in."

"Good thinking, calling your house-elf," Ron said fervently. "Think he saved our skin."

“Yes, it was a neat bit of household magic,” sniffed Theo. “I wish I could’ve done it. My father doesn’t let me call Mimsy, he says I’m to wait until I’m old enough.”

Bewildered, Ron said, “You’ve got one, too?”

“Oh, yes. Ten of them.”

“Ten!”

Draco buried a cough in his arm that sounded like “excessive.” Theo narrowed his eyes.

“ Some of us run a full household, and like to host parties from time to time. It’s not like living alone with your mother in the middle of the country, where you’re practically self-sufficient…”

The next cough was “frippery.”

“Bully for you, you’ve a house-elf and a thesaurus.”

They reached the stairwell, and Theo hopped down the first step before realizing neither of them followed “Ah,” he sighed. “I forgot I was among barbarians.”

“Piss off,” Ron said warmly. “You nearly got us all killed tonight, running after him like that.”

“Mm, yes. That was quite uncharacteristic of me.” Draco noticed that Theo didn’t apologize. “I suppose you expect me to be grateful.”

Ron rolled his eyes. “Why can’t you lot just say ‘thank you’?” he asked philosophically, though it was pointed in Draco’s direction. “It’s right in there with all that rot about ‘manners’ and ‘form.’”

“Can’t,” yawned Draco, leaning against the banister. “Implies you owe them something.”

“He does owe us.”

“Ah, but it’s not polite to say so. You’re supposed to wait around for a few decades, stumble into a miscellaneous bit of trouble in a totally unrelated situation, and then write him a veiled missive explaining your predicament, so he can respond by secretly intervening on your behalf and call in one of his other favors to exculpate you without ever breathing a word of it to another living soul.” Draco polished his fingernails on his robe. “Or let him die for you, or something.”

Theo was nodding vigorously. “That was my preference,” he admitted.

Ron shook his head despairingly. “You’re so weird,” he told Draco.

“Your face is so weird.”

“Oi! Fair enough.”

He lifted his hand and engaged Draco in the celebratory majyyks of the Muggle High Five. Draco’s palm smarted.

Theo watched with fascination and horror.

“You’ve gone native,” he said to Draco. “Astonishing. Your father would weep, you know.”

Draco considered this. Then he shrugged.

“I’ve still got twice the class in my pinky finger that you’ve got in your whole family tree.”

The corner of Theo’s mouth twitched.

“Snot-nosed weaselly bastard.”

“Ratty, mop-headed tosser.”

“Blood traitor.”

“Chauvinist.”

Theo turned to Ron. “Tea is at four on Sundays,” he said formally. “You will wear a tie. You will button your shirt. You will not be late. You will compliment Daphne’s accessories.”

“Wot?” said Ron. Draco snickered.

“See you both in hell,” called Theo, trotting down the stairs. “Or Potions, I guess.”

Once he was gone, Ron turned to Draco.

“Pretty sure there’s a match on,” he remarked. “Lee Jordan’s got a Spell-O-Vision projector in the fourth year boys’. Fred said something about popcorn.”

“Who’s playing?”

“You really care?”

This was fair.

“I want to change into good clothes, first,” he said. “Wandering around like this, people are going to start thinking I’m a Weasley.”

“Not to worry, mate, you haven’t got the looks,” said Ron. And jostling each other roughly, they started up the many stairs to the Gryffindor Tower.

Hermione Granger snored when she slept.

He hadn’t known that. Of course, he’d never spent the night in the same room as her before.

It made it nearly impossible to sleep, but he didn’t mind. The chairs in the infirmary were damn near impossible to sleep in, anyway, and he much preferred her snoring to silent.

Madam Pomfrey said it would take several days for the potion to work. Paralysis had given way to unconsciousness, and Colin had even begun to murmur in his sleep, but everyone still “had to be patient, Mister Malfoy, we can’t wave a wand and have them all back, now” — though precisely why that was so beyond the realm of comprehension, in a magical castle, was rather beyond Draco.

Still, he could be patient. He was an extremely patient person.

No, you’re not, Hermione would have said.

He didn’t know why he wanted her back, honestly. She was such a heinous bother.

Draco yawned and rearranged himself in the chair, slinging his legs over one of the armrests. His head rested against the side of her bed, cushioned by a stolen pillow. Madam Pomfrey clucked disapprovingly at him for robbing the bedding of the infirm, but in his defense, it served the very important medical purpose of preventing a crick in his neck. Besides, Hermione would hardly miss it.

It was early enough in the morning that none of the Gryffindors had come in for their daily visits, yet. If he remembered the schedule — and he’d memorized the schedule, at this point — it was Dean’s turn, which meant he and Seamus would be there about twenty minutes late, probably holding some leftovers from breakfast for Draco and whatever homework Hermione needed from the day before. Then, once they left, Draco would quietly copy his own answers onto her paper, slip it into a folder, and sneak it beneath the flowers on her bedside table.

She’d be spitting mad at him when she woke up and found them. She’d give him a howling earful about earning her own grades, and breaking academic rules, all of Hogwarts’ downright medieval punishments for plagiarism. He couldn’t wait.

The sun sent a querulous finger of light down from the clerestory windows, and as it poked her face, she gave a riotous snort. Her eyes slid open, wide and summery brown.

“Hermione,” he said slowly. It felt odd on his tongue.

She blinked rapidly, in the fashion of someone still clearing the last figments of dreams from their eyes. “Draco?” she mumbled. Her voice was almost gone from lack of use. He sat up and snatched the empty glass by her bedside.

“Aguamenti. Water?”

“Mm-hm.”

She drank in deep, greedy swallows. He watched her with greedier eyes: the simple movement of her throat, the way her eyes flit instinctively around the room, noting the surroundings, lingering on doors and windows. There was something surreal about watching her move after having lain still for weeks — like watching the Winged Victory of Samothrace beat her wings.

After a moment, she turned her head. “Draco,” she repeated.

“Yes.”

“What happened?”

“Right. So, you remember how I never liked Professor Podmore? Well, listen to this—”

“To my bed?”

“Oh. That.”

Hermione’s bedside bloomed with marigolds. They fountained from a dozen vases on her table, tumbled from a flotilla of mason jars and copper pots around the bed skirts, and heaped high at the foot of the quilt in unpotted mounds, spilling a waterfall of cherry gold petals onto the floor. Red and gold and ribbons of green lifted and danced with each cool breath of the vents, drifted into her hair, littered the snowy tangles of her bedsheets. She twitched her hand, and found one slipped neatly between her thumb and forefinger.

“What,” she repeated, staring at him. “What am I supposed to do with these, Draco.”

“Well.” He shrugged, drawing his knees up to his chest. “If you’d been quicker about getting well, we wouldn’t be in this situation. The first day, I only came with a dozen.”

“...And the second day?”

“Another dozen,” he said. “Obviously. You can’t bring day-old flowers, that’s rude.”

“And then…”

“You’ve got to think about this from my perspective,” he drawled, gazing at the ceiling. “I mean, you could have woken up any day. And what was I going to do? Be caught without fresh flowers? What am I, a Weasley?”

“So you… Draco, you can’t possibly think…”

“That’s a joke, by the way, he didn’t neglect you. Dear Ronald brought some daisies and a pack of Chocolate Frogs. They’re in one of these pots. Now, I would have gone for Cauldron Cakes, because I know you prefer them, but I didn’t want to get anything that would go stale.”

“I don’t… this is absurd,” she said faintly. “And — and—” She sat up, her jaw forming a hard corner of determination. “And I’m still not speaking to you.”

“Fine, we can skip to that part. Hold on,” he said, rifling through his pockets. He withdrew a battered scrap of parchment and unrolled it, clearing his throat. “I, Draco Malfoy, being of sound mind and body —”

“Is that your will?”

“This will go faster if you let me finish. Being of sound mind and body, hereby apologize to Hermione Granger, to whom I have done a very wrongful thing; and for whose forgiveness, if forthcoming, I would be very grateful.”

“That’s not a proper apology,” she said tiredly. “That’s a template for an apology. You can’t show up with a shop full of flowers and a prewritten script and possibly expect everything to be alright again.”

“Wasn’t it a good script, though?”

“Draco!”

“All right. How about this: I was a ponce,” he said, “and I shouldn’t have called you — that word. I’m used to saying it—”

“Oh, are you, now—”

“—and if you’d listen I’d tell you that’s not an excuse, but it’s the reason I used it, not because I wanted to be cruel to you. Which I didn’t. Want to. Though I was. Obviously.” He folded the parchment in half, then folded it again. “Speaking personally was a terrible experience,” he said, “and I don’t intend to do it ever again.”

She frowned, twirling the flower between her fingers. “Okay,” she said. “But it’s not just me. You have to… I don’t want to think you’re not saying it because you want to make me happy. Even though you believe all of it, otherwise.”

“I don’t believe—” He hesitated. “All of it.”

Her brows knit together.

“Okay. I don’t believe the rot about muggle-borns. You and Creevey, you’re just witches and wizards. Annoying witches and wizards, but you’re Gryffindors, so there’s a selection effect.” He added, “Also, it’s making it doubly embarrassing that you’re beating me in Transfiguration, so this rah-rah equality business is incidentally in my interest."

"And muggles?"

He threw his arms around his knees, scowling. "I don't — can't you see when a man is trying? Muggle-borns are one thing, because I know you, but if you're going to start talking about muggles and wizards being the same or any of that radical stuff, I just don't know —"

"That's all right," she said, surprising him. "We don't have to… not right now. But you really do mean it? You're actually sorry? Not just for the name-calling."

"Yes," he said, nervously.

She slumped back on the bed. "Oh, thank goodness," she sighed. "I was so sick of being mad at you."

He grinned. Dropping his knees, he hopped onto the mattress, bouncing some of her pillows into the air. She squawked and shuffled over so he could lean against the wall. "Makes bloody two of us," he said. "Let's never do that again, it was awful."

"Although… I don't know. You are much nicer when you're sorry for something."

"If you want flowers, Granger, all you have to do is ask."

"Speaking of," she said, laughing, "what on earth am I going to do with all these? Actually." She lifted a handful of blossoms and tossed them haplessly on the bedspread. "I can't take all these back to the Tower."

"Why not? I'll help you."

"Because I'll get stares! And Lavender might try to shank me."

“Brown owes me one,” he said, shrugging. “And I can get some for her, too, if she wants.”

“Don’t do that, she’ll fall in love with you,” Hermione said distastefully.

“And what’s so wrong with that?”

“Nothing, but you don’t want Lavender in love with you. When she had a crush on Harrison Ford, she wrote him a bunch of sonnets and tried to send them by owl.”

“I still don’t see what’s wrong with that. ‘If music be the food of love,’ you know...”

“Harrison Ford is a muggle,” she said patiently, “and they were bad sonnets. Did you say there was candy? I’m starving.”

“Good woman for trying, though, Brown,” he said absently. His fingers drummed on the side of the bed. “Say — Granger.”

“Yes?”

“Can I have that?” He pointed at her wrist, where she wore a crumpled silk hair tie with an elastic band. Parvati had once called it a “crunchy” or something like that.

“You want a hair tie?” Her glance at his hair was deeply skeptical. She took it off, anyway.

“Yes. I want you to watch this.” He cleared his throat. “Dobby, come here.”

A crack echoed in the infirmary, and Dobby appeared at the foot of her bed. Hermione yelped.

“Master Draco,” he said cheerfully. “Miss Grain Jar! You is awake.” He looked around. “You is very much liking marigolds,” he observed frankly.

“Yes, she is, it’s marvelous. Dobby, can you tell Granger what you talked to Dumbledore about?”

Hermione eyed Draco warily, but she spoke to Dobby in a kind voice. “Yes,” she said. “If you’d like to, Dobby, you can tell me. Only if you want to.”

“Oh,” said Dobby anxiously. “Dobby certainly can! Dumbledore told Dobby that if his masters ever found they no longer required his services — or if he found himself without employ — he would be free to come and work for the kitchens at Hogwarts, as a free elf.” He straightened his pillowcase. “He said also,” he said proudly, “that Dobby was the finest and bravest house-elf he had ever known, and that he would be proud to pay Dobby — real money, a wizard’s wage!”

“That’s wonderful, Dobby,” said Hermione sadly. She handed him a marigold, which he took, cooing in delight. “I hope it happens, one day.”

“Yeah,” said Draco casually. “Me, too. Catch.”

And he tossed the crunchy at Dobby, who caught it.

“Master has given clothes,” said Dobby wondrously. “Master has given Dobby a—” He looked up at Draco, spellbound. “What is it?”

“A crunchy,” Draco informed him.

“Um,” said Hermione.

“Master has given Dobby a crunchy,” said Dobby in disbelief. He broke into a beam. “Dobby has a crunchy, and Dobby is free!”

“Scrunchy,” said Hermione insistently, “it’s a scrunchy, Dobby, it’s for your hair—”

“See, here’s the thing,” said Draco. “Dumbledore won’t let me bring you to school. Something about slavery being a bad example for other students, I don’t know. So I thought, if you came to work in the kitchens during the year, then you could come back to the Manor during the summers, and we’d — well, I don’t know what he’s paying you, but I’ll bet we can pay you more.”

Dobby had slid it up his arm like a gold bracer, and was hopping around Hermione’s bed like a child on Christmas morning. He spun, and leapt into Draco’s arms, who gave a quiet oof.

He could feel the heat of her smile like a physical emittance, a ray of sunlight, a tongue of fire.

“Don’t look at me like that.” He stroked the back of Dobby’s trembling head with as much dignity as he was capable. “I hope you don’t think this means anything vis-a-vis our ideological debate.”

“Which one?” she said, beaming. “I’m winning all of them.”

“You’re winning one of them, and that’s because I happened to put my foot in it so badly I had to reevaluate my whole life philosophy to get back in your good books. You won’t catch me making that mistake again, Granger, I warn you.”

“No,” she said, waving a marigold delicately under her nose. Her eyes sparkled. “I don’t think you will.”

The fool witch insisted on going to the Closing Feast, against his better judgment and Madam Pomfrey’s. They hammered out a compromise wherein she came, but in one of Pomfrey’s wheely-chairs, and Draco got to push her around. He took great joy in this important duty, particularly the bits wherein he got to shout at people to get out of his way, he was moving an invalid, please and thank you. Harry and Ron loved the chair, too, but mostly because once Hermione abandoned it, they got to use it to go scootering up and down the aisles of the Great Hall, cackling madly, until Percy accidentally stepped into their path without looking, which put paid to it in spectacular fashion. McGonagall howled herself hoarse at all three of them. Hermione ate Draco's serving of cake. It was an unusually excellent night.

The next day, the sun blazed on a caravan of students trundling down the path to the Hogwarts train station. Draco ended up wedged into a compartment with Hermione, Harry, Ron, Ginny, and the twins, who roped them into a game of Exploding Snap — Draco tied with Fred for the win, because they both cheated — and set off the last of the Weasleys' Filibuster fireworks from the window, watching the explosions pop and crackle over the emerald hills. Hermione huffed in disapproval, but she didn't run to get Percy, and Draco was proud of her.

"...six one zero four," Harry was saying to Ron, "and it's called a telephone, you put in some muggle money and they let you talk to whoever you want…"

"Felly-tone, got it. Remind me why can't I just Floo?"

"We've been over this, you can't stick your head through my aunt's fireplace, she'll have a heart attack." Harry paused. "Never mind. Strike everything I've said, here's what you need to do—"

"...that Ravenclaw prefect, Penelope Clearwater," said Ginny. "That's who he was writing to all last summer. He's been meeting her all over the school in secret. I walked in on them kissing in an empty classroom one day…"

"You're lying," said Fred breathlessly.

"Ginny," said George, overwhelmed with emotion, "you're my favorite. You are."

"I thought I was your favorite."

"Only for your face, Freddie."

"Right back at you, Georgie."

And in the corner, wedged between Draco and the wall, Hermione was showing him how a cassette worked. She had his New Order album open on her lap, and with her finger, she traced how the rolls of tape spun around each little wheel. “It’s coated with a magnetic film,” she said, “which reacts when it comes close to a magnetic field.”

“Magnetic field? That’s magic, then.”

“No, it’s muggle science. So then the electromagnetic head on the cassette reacts to the coating, and it moves, which makes the sound waves…”

“‘Electromagnetic.’ That’s magic, surely.”

“No. That’s still muggle science. And you hear the sound waves because the headphones have a little speaker…”

“With an Amplification Charm.”

“No.”

She showed him how the reel could move forward and backward, and change the direction of the song, and at that point he declared it had to be magic, whether or not she would admit it. Then he insisted she take it apart and explain it again.

Meanwhile, the window glowed with the first heatstroke of summer. The compartment smelled of stale candy and Fred’s noxious cheap cologne. He was going home, where his mother waited for him, likely expecting an explanation as to just what her son had done with their house-elf. At his side, Hermione was babbling about something irrelevant and complicated with such verve one would think she intended to earn a degree in the subject.

Draco felt certain that thirteen was going to be his year.

Welcome to the end of Year Two! Thanks for sticking with it!

Same deal as the first time, I'll be taking a hiatus to finish Year Three. Year Three is a bit longer than the others, and it'll be the end of Volume One. It's longer than Years One and Two, so it's taking a minute to finish. Once it's done, it'll go up in much the same fashion that these first two have – regular update schedule, you know the drill.

I've been motivated throughout by the generosity of your comments, which are a treat to read. Thank you, thank you!

Happy October, and I hope you have a wonderful Halloween (or Samhain.)

Love,

The Leaky Cauldron

Chapter 17: The Leaky Cauldron

And I wonder when I sing along with you

If everything could ever be this real forever

If anything could ever be this good again

—Foo Fighters, “Everlong”

In a secret fold of the French Riviera, nestled between Marseilles and the Italian border, a rose-colored building rose from a skirt of dancing palms. At its foot sat a white slipper of beach, and though it was a beautiful spot, the neighbors often found themselves looking over it, or around it, and were incapable of holding the place in their minds for long. A few white cupolas of abandoned villas dotted the verdant hills, but aside from these, the enclave had remained untouched by human hand ever since the last brick had been laid at the nearby Cannes.

Untouched, that is, except for the two shadows that darted over the buttery smile of the sands, freewheeling like birds. High above the surf, their twins zipped through the air in gyroscopic formations, their silhouettes cut in shadow against the purple spine of the distant Alps. Their cries, more jeering than birds, echoed over the empty bowl of the sea.

“Faster! Duck! Get a move on, Malfoy, I almost took your ear off!”

“You wish! A skrewt could have dodged that. Put your back into it!”

A hard black ball soared out in a U-curve, its reflection fleeing over the glassy sea. Then it doubled back, speeding for the distant crags of the Maures, only to be diverted in its escape by a hard CRACK of a beater's bat. It zagged out at an angle, speeding for the second boy, who cut a sharp turn to avoid losing a rib.

The sun sat high in the sky like a jewel in its cushion, and placed shallow, pitch-black shadows under each palm. Sweat glazed the bare back of each boy on broomstick. Half-buried in sand lay an enchanted speaker, which, after several hours of joint work by two third year wizards, had spitefully relented to connect to a muggle music player. A singer whose name only one of the wizards knew exhorted them to hang the deejay.

The bludger wheeled back for another run. The slighter boy drew up on his broomstick, and slicked some sweat-damp hair from his face. It had grown long that summer, and hung in flaxen coils around his neck.

"One more go?"

"If you can take it," called Theo, flipping his bat casually in his hand.

Draco grinned. "Wouldn't want to strain your shoulder," he called back.

"Only thing you're straining is my patience. Watch your six."

Draco free-fell a few feet and caught himself, as the bludger soared over his head, rustling his hair.

"Try this one," shouted Theo, and he gave the ball a shuddering backhand that sounded like gunfire over the open sea. The bludger veered out in a j-shaped curve, twisted by a wicked topspin, and Draco dove into a smooth arc that plunged him close to the face of the sea. The surf raced up at him like a falling brick.

With feet left in his descent, he wrenched himself out of the dive, leveling with the sand, and the bludger plunged into the surf with an explosion of sand and foam.

“Showoff!”

Draco skimmed to a halt, and then hopped off, landing with a splash in the shallows. The water encased his ankles in a welcome chill. “It’s called a Wronski Feint, Nott, and I’ve offered to show you how to do it,” he called smugly.

Theo landed with his own minor detonation of sand. “And I’ve told you, I refuse such skylarking on principle,” he called back haughtily. “It’s a seeker’s move, anyway. All show, no strategy.”

“No strategy? Isn’t your job to sit there and whack the ball at people?”

“Yours is to flit around like a priss for half the game and make one tricky catch,” said Theo, slinging a towel over his shoulder. “You’re an upjumped spectator. Don’t lecture me about tactics, some of us have to play the whole time.”

Draco went to cuff him with the end of his Nimbus, and Theo blocked him with his Starbomber, and they had a brief but passionate swordfight up the beaches, into the drawing-room of the house.

The French doors sat open, and let in a lazy tongue of hot wind. The tongue slid through the white curtains, through a menagerie of linen furniture, and snuck up the white seersucker skirts of the two women balanced delicately on the sofa, whose dark heads and twin glances of undiluted snobbery could have marked them, at a distance, for twins. But one was far older than the other, and when the boys came in, she stood up, and her smile broke through her sneer (while the other’s sneer could have served as the firmament for skyscrapers).

“Don’t you two look wonderful! Would you like some lemonade, darling? It’s so dreadfully hot, and you should drink something, after all that work. No? How about you, Theodore?”

His smile could charm a raging boarhound. “I’d love some, Mrs. Malfoy.”

Draco rolled his eyes. He hopped onto the kitchen counter and snagged a slice of peach from the charcuterie platter the cook had left; Dobby was on vacation in Fiji with some of the other Hogwarts house-elves, so they'd had to borrow Pansy's cook.

"At least make them put on shirts," sighed Pansy, leaning over the sofa. "It's too hot. I can't stand to sit here and broil while they flounce around naked."

"Don't complain, you know I'm fit," said Theo, stealing another slice. "Anyway, no one's stopping you."

Pansy arched an eyebrow of supreme un-impressment. "Yes, and I'm sure you'd say nothing at all."

He grinned at her. "Well, I didn't say that."

"Draco, Theo, try not to spoil your dinner," Narcissa called. She carried a tray of highball glasses filled with pale gold, studded with crystals of ice. "We're having artichokes, and I've sent Briselda to get some fresh apricots."

"You needn't worry, Mrs. Malfoy," Pansy assured her. "I've seen Theo eat a whole roast chicken—"

"That was a moment of weakness, you absolute little rodent—"

"—and still take second helpings at dinner."

Theo's hand darted over the sofa and yanked one pigtail. "Some of us are growing boys," he leered. "When you hit your growth spurt, sometime in the twenty-first century, you'll understand."

"Hey!" She reared up and smacked him on the hip. "That's mean! I'm small-boned!"

"No squabbling," trilled Narcissa, squeezing Draco's shoulder as she sidled past. "Theo, Pansy is the perfect size for her age. Pansy, Theo can eat as much as he likes, and we shan't make fun of him for it. A teenage boy needs all the food he can get his hands on.” She pinched Theo’s cheek, and he grinned widely. Draco blew a raspberry at him behind his mother’s back.

“Will you make them shower, at least?” begged Pansy. She made a production of holding her nose. “They reek of quidditch.”

“That’s the scent of boys becoming men, Pans,” announced Theo. He planted himself in front of her, arms wide. “We’re going to put Draco on the damn team if it kills us. I want everyone at Hogwarts to watch me thrash him.”

“Sod off, Nott!”

“Draco!” Narcissa pinched him, too. “Language! In front of guests!”

“Ow! Sorry, Mother.”

“Boys or men or whatever you are, it stinks,” said Pansy, poking Theo’s stomach.

“Oh, does it?” His grin grew dangerously wide.

“Yes, I — no! Stop!”

Theo collapsed on top of Pansy, who shrieked in horror and thrashed them both off the couch. They went to the floor in a tangle of arms and limbs as Theo attempted to shove Pansy’s face into his armpit while preventing her from biting him.

“Children, please!” tinkled Narcissa. “None of that! Locomotor Theodore.”

With a fluid stroke of her wand, she lifted Theo off of Pansy, and deposited him gently on the settee. “And I really must insist you do shower,” she said, mostly to Draco. “We’ll not stand on occasion at dinner, but there is a lady present, and I simply can’t conscience dining shirtless with a guest.”

“Whatever you like, Mother.” He kissed her cheek, and stealing a last slice of peach, he slung his broom over his shoulder to take upstairs.

“Do you hear that?” said Pansy loudly, sitting up. She pointed at Theo. “There’s a lady present.”

“Merlin, really?” He draped his knee over the armrest, yawning. “I thought it was just the three of us.”

Draco climbed the stairs to his bedroom. The villa had six rooms, so they each had their own, though Pansy and Theo spent so much time in his they could probably claim squatter’s rights. Pansy’s sand-encrusted bathing suit dangled, drying, from his doorknob, and Theo’s broom kit lay open near the dresser, beside Draco’s overflowing trunk and set of quidditch balls.

His mother had asked him if he hadn’t any friends he’d like to invite with them on vacation. He’d thought it was a rather more abstract idea at the time, and suggested them absently, as people of whom she might approve; if he’d known she was serious, he might have invited Harry, Ron, and Hermione, too, but he wasn’t sure how to go about pitching them to his mother. Theo and Pansy were easier to explain. Anyway, Harry was with the Dursleys, Ron was in Egypt, Hermione’s parents didn’t let her travel alone.

Nevertheless, it had been unexpectedly pleasant to have the others around. It had been a much more social summer than he was used to, and he didn’t think the old Black vacation house had seen this much company in years. And his mother clearly adored having multiple children in the house. He had begun to worry about her writing them into the will.

For some reason, she took particular delight in Pansy. There was something about having a girl around the house, he supposed, that created a feeling of instinctive allegiance and understanding between them, and she had delighted in taking Pansy shopping at the local markets. They gossiped and drank coffee (that Pansy wasn’t supposed to have) and chatted about whatever the hell women did in pairs, and Narcissa spent unholy quantities of Draco's inheritance on fine silks and trinkets and bottles of wine for Pansy's parents, with whom she had exchanged almost a dozen letters before Pansy was allowed to come.

On the other hand, Sibelius Nott hadn't so much as replied to her owl. Theo had simply turned up on the doorstep of Malfoy Manor three days later, unannounced carrying two trunks and a broomstick and asking where to hang his hat.

On his desk, Ulysses had deposited a fresh batch of post. Draco fed him the last bit of peach, and unfolded the first letter. The address read:

Draco Malfoy

The Summer House (sic)

'Somewhere in France'

(???)

He smiled.

Dear Draco,

Okay, I think I got all the songs you requested on this one. It's a bit hard to get to the library to burn them, so this might be the last one before school starts. In return, could you check if you have "The Decline of Pagan Magic," by Bathilda Bagshot? It's obscure, but it's the last volume of her work and I can't find it.

What did you put down for classes this year? It was an absolute nightmare to choose. I wanted to take Arithmancy and Divination but they happen at the same time & McGonagall says they're basically the same subject anyway, one's just more technical than the other. I chose the technical one, naturally, but perhaps they'll let us sit for O.W.L.s in both even if we didn't take the class? What do you think? Also I couldn't decide whether to take Muggle Studies or not, because even though I don't suppose I'd learn anything new, I'm fascinated to know what they teach. So many adult wizards are awfully ignorant about so much of the muggle world, I'm almost afraid that it's misinformation!

Anyway, I ended up with Arithmancy, Ancient Runes, and Care of Magical Creatures. Harry and Ron are taking COMC, because Hagrid's teaching it this year, and Divination, because Percy says it's an easy O. I badgered them to take Runes (please say you're taking it!) but they won't do it. You know how they are.

I hope it's lovely down there in France. Don't forget the History of Magic essay! See you in a week!

Love,

Hermione

P.S. Percy made Head Boy. I'm not surprised. Ron doesn't seem too happy about it, though.

The letter came with a cassette, its tracklist scrawled in Hermione's looping hand. He pocketed it and went to shower, making a mental note to ask his mother if they still had that first-edition of the Complete Works of Bathilda Bagshot.

When he came downstairs, the sun hovered low on the sea, and the French doors pointed arrow-like to a rosy-colored porch, where the table held a minor fleet of bowls and glasses, and the flickering standards of four candles rose high over the rims. Theo and Pansy sat with Narcissa — Theo had conceded to put on a linen shirt — talking in unobtrusive murmurs that were lost under the rush of the waves.

He sat down and dropped his napkin into his lap. “You’ll have to pardon me. I fell asleep.”

Narcissa tucked a wet strand of hair above his ear, absently. “You need a haircut, turtledove,” she murmured. “Before you go back, perhaps? If we can coax Dobby to do it, that is.”

Her tone was rueful and slightly teasing; she had relinquished the family servant with grace, but he got the distinct feeling she could not really understand why he had done it, and still saw it as a gesture of youthful rebellion, rather than the right thing to do.

“Did you see the Prophet?” demanded Pansy, never one to mince words.

He reached for the decanter of pumpkin juice. “Not this morning. Ulysses was busy.”

“You really ought to see the Prophet.”

He lifted his eyebrow. She opened her mouth, but fell silent, blushing.

“Is there something you want to tell me, Parkinson?”

“No, I — well, not personally, no—”

“Sirius Black broke out of Azkaban,” said Theo casually, spearing a head of artichoke.

There was a clatter and an intake of breath. Narcissa had dropped her knife.

“Don’t mind me, darlings, I’m just clumsy,” she cooed, waving away their stares. “Keep talking. I’ll go get another.” Tossing her napkin on the table, she rose and set off for the kitchens in one fluid movement, her skirts swishing like a peacock’s tail.

Draco watched her go, worrying his lip.

He hadn’t heard his uncle’s name more than twice in his lifetime. There were some things that they didn’t say to each other. That included certain histories and certain names.

Nevertheless, there were stories. Supposedly he’d been a Gryffindor. Supposedly, he’d run away from home at fifteen, and in the course of his escape hexed Uncle Regulus so badly he couldn’t walk for a month. Supposedly, to hear Narcissa tell it, he’d broken Great-Aunt Walburga’s heart clean in two.

Draco didn’t understand someone like that. What a selfish sod he must have been, to reject a family so large and glorious. What an ungrateful wretch, to have the good luck to grow up with a father, and spit on the name he gave him. Draco quelled a sudden urge to hit something.

“Real classy, Teddy,” sneered Pansy.

“What was I supposed to say? You brought it up.” Theo ripped a leaf from his artichoke with a vehemence that suggested guilt. “He’s a mass murderer, and a family disgrace. I didn’t think there would be any warm feelings still involved.”

“He’s her cousin!”

“Yeah? Daph’s mine, but if she bagged a dozen muggles and denounced her family name, I’d — actually, never mind, I’d probably propose.”

Pansy held up her hand, as if she could not bear to look at him. “I only brought it up,” she said to Draco, “because I know Potter is an associate of yours, and I imagined he would be concerned.” She sniffed. “Naturally I don’t care, but everyone knows Black was involved in the Potter murders, so I’d be quite nervous, if I were him.”

“Surely you don’t think he’d go after Potter.”

“I don’t know what he’d do. But I wouldn’t rule anything out,” she said idly. She stole a sip of Narcissa’s wine glass. “If he could betray his family and his friends, I don’t see why he’d have any scruples about going after children. He’s clearly got no moral code whatsoever.”

“I’m sure Draco is grateful for your comfort, in this stressful time,” said Theo flatly.

“Well? It’s the truth!” She turned to Draco. “You should tell Potter to be on his guard. It’s no use to pretend that everything’s safe and hunky-dory. That’ll get him killed.”

“He’s Harry Potter, Pans. He’ll be fine.” He gestured at Draco with his glass. “Besides, doesn’t Dumbledore keep an eye on him?”

“Maybe. He lives with muggles,” said Draco, frowning. “I don’t know if he even gets the Prophet.”

Theo gave a discreet, delicate shudder. “I think I’d prefer Azkaban,” he said. “Truly. But at least Black won’t find him. Who would go looking for Harry Potter in some hovel of muggles?”

Draco narrowed his eyes. “They live in houses, Nott.”

Narcissa returned with a new knife and a bowl of apricots. “I brought dessert,” she said brightly. “I thought we could take these down to the beach, and have an evening swim before we turn in. I’ve been longing to get in that water all evening.” Seeing their expressions, she looked around expectantly. “I’m sorry. Have I interrupted something?”

“No,” said Draco brusquely. He flashed a glance at Pansy, who got the message and nodded. “A swim sounds perfect, Mother.”

Narcissa hadn’t had an episode since they came to the summer house. Draco had been taking pains to keep her in a good temper, and so far, he had reason to feel hopeful. He had tossed around the idea of floating a Healer again, once the summer was over — but she hadn't taken well to it before, and he worried about setting her off.

A few minutes later, dinner ended, and the dishware floated itself dutifully back into the house. They wandered down to the surf, and spent the last hour of daylight bathing in the warm tides, and Narcissa used her wand to create horses made of seawater that jumped and galloped around them, peppering them with splash. The moon bloomed full and fat over the villa, like the white bulb of a lily.

Though he didn't remember walking back to the house, when Draco woke up, he was tucked securely in his bed, and under his window, the dawn tide was rushing in to erase four tracks of footprints on the beach.

Dear Potter,

I hope this finds you well. Please find attached a copy of yesterday's Daily Prophet. Acquaint yourself with its contents, if you haven't already. I don't know if they deliver subscriptions to muggle households, but redundancy is a lesser sin than oversight. Watch out for yourself — I shall be most put out if you get yourself killed.

Granger has decided we are taking Ancient Runes. I wish I had some say in the matter but the fact is you and Weasley have abandoned her in this, knowing fully well that if she does not have a class partner we will never hear the end of it. I hope you appreciate the sacrifices I am making here for group cohesion. I am, contrary to certain past assertions, a selfless team player.

Write back soon. Nolite te mugglandes carborundorum.

Sincerely,

Draco Malfoy

Dear Malfoy,

Thanks for the Prophet, but I've already seen it. Were you worried about me? That's awfully sweet of you.

F.Y.I., I'm not with the Dursleys any more. I accidentally blew up my aunt using magic (long story). I took the Knight Bus out of Surrey and now I'm staying at the Leaky Cauldron. I didn't mean to use underage magic, but she was talking about my parents and… anyway, Hermione's already chewed me out for it, but the Minister of Magic wants to see me tomorrow, and I know it's not going to be good.

I hope I'm not expelled, but if I am, tell Hagrid I'm sorry.

Iyay on'tday eakspay atinlay.

Love,

Harry

Dear Potter,

What do you mean, you "blew up" your aunt? Is she dead? Why is the Minister of Magic coming to see you personally? Are you looking at a murder charge? Never mind, don't answer that in writing.

I'm coming, and I'm bringing a solicitor. Don't say a word to anyone from the Ministry until I get there.

Sincerely,

Draco Malfoy

Mummy,

Gone to Diagon Alley for the day to get school supplies &c. Will return by sundown if not earlier.

All my love,

Draco

Draco stepped out of the fireplace in the Leaky Cauldron armed with a nice suit, a wand he couldn't use, and the scariest-looking solicitor he could find in his father's rolodex.

(The solicitor wore a magenta suit under a lemon-yellow robe, and smiled like a man who had just made a killing selling subprime mortgages on his own soul. He had four gold teeth and as many hairs. His name was Gatz.)

"Potter, we've come to rescue you," Draco announced.

Harry, who was sitting on his bed in an outsize U2 t-shirt and muggle jeans, blinked and said, "Um. Hello."

They'd put him in a cheery single overlooking the Alley, with a plush twin bed and a set of shiny caramel oak furniture. Hedwig hooted in greeting from a cage atop the wardrobe. Harry's single trunk sat lonely and half-unpacked in the corner.

Draco said, "This is Gatz. Gatz, this is Harry Potter."

"Hello," said Gatz.

He smiled.

Harry shuddered.

“Hello,” he said politely, because Harry never met something ugly he couldn’t be nice to.

“We’re here to mount your defense,” Draco informed him. “What are the charges?”

“Underage use of magic,” said Harry, “and running away from home, I think? It’s not exactly clear. Also, hullo, Draco. Good summer?”

Draco nodded. “Quite. We went to Mummy’s house on the Riviera.”

“That’s nice. Ron’s just got back from Egypt. Did you hear about the money?”

“No. Did they find a galleon between the couch cushions?”

“Nah. Better than,” said Harry eagerly. “His dad won the lotto. Seven thousand galleons!”

“Oh,” said Draco.

He cleared his throat. Gatz inspected the room, whistling through his teeth.

“Which is a lot of money,” said Harry.

“Ah,” said Draco. “Yes, of course. How wonderful. May they use it in good health.”

He traded a discerning grimace with Gatz.

Harry snickered. “You’re ruddy posh,” he accused. “How much does your family even have, anyway? Could you just… I don’t know, buy the Ministry, and get me out of this stuff?”

“That’s one idea.” He ran a few sums in his head, squinting. “I suppose… no, it’d be a terrible investment. The thing bleeds money, it’d be a nightmare to privatize.”

“I was joking,” said Harry, staring. “Are you not… are you not joking? I can’t tell if you’re joking.”

A banging came at the door. Without waiting for an answer, it shot open, and Hermione flew in, her face tanned and freckled from the summer sun, clothes disheveled from haste.

“Harry, don’t you dare say a word without a lawyer present, it’s highly illegal to even question y— oh, hello, Draco!”

“Well, come here, then,” she ordered, and bustled over, hauling him into a bone-splitting hug.

He buried his smile in her hair. By the time she let go, he had mastered himself again.

“And you, too,” she added to Harry, hugging him. “But quickly, because we’ve got work to do. I bought a book on criminal law at Flourish and Blott’s, and I don’t know if they have public defenders in the wizarding world, but if not, you still have a clear right—”

Gatz cleared his throat. She rounded on him, and then startled, as if seeing him for the first time.

“Who are you?”

“Hieronymous Gatz,” he purred. “Attorney at law.”

He smiled.

Hermione’s eyes went very wide.

“Right,” she said belatedly. She turned to Draco. “He’s yours?”

“Technically, Potter’s.”

“Oh, lovely,” she said. She paused. “And he’s good?”

“Some have said so,” purred Gatz. She cleared her throat.

“Well, then,” she said, as the air went out of her like a punctured zeppelin. “I suppose you don’t really need me for anything, do you?”

“Yeah, you’re sort of useless,” said Harry good-naturedly. “I mean, you’re only my best friend. What would I want you around for?”

“Oh, stop it.” She pinked, but she was pleased, Draco could tell. “I mean you’re well taken care of, and everything.”

“Seems like it. I’m sort of nervous,” he added, picking at the blanket, “since I didn’t mean to do it, but the Ministry didn’t seem too understanding about it in the letter I got—”

Draco snorted. “That’s all posturing,” he assured him. “Pure rot. Don’t worry, Gatz will take care of that.”

“Do you have the letter?” Gatz inquired, with a lizard-like wetting of his lips.

Harry handed it over, and the solicitor scuttled into the corner, running over the text with his monocle.

Hermione leaned over to speak in Draco’s ear. “I don’t know where to find wizarding attorneys,” she whispered. “Where did you get him?”

Draco shrugged. “He came recommended,” he said, “from certain people who ought to know.”

“Eugh.”

“That’s the idea, yes.”

The fireplace gave an auspicious crackle, and the flames leapt up, fading from red to green. All four of them stood at attention as a figure emerged from the grate, brushing ashes from his cloak.

It was Sibelius Nott.

“You’re not the Minister of Magic,” said Draco.

Nott’s lip curled like a shorn sliver of wood.

“Well observed, young Malfoy,” he sneered. “And you are not Harry Potter.”

“Nope,” called Harry. He raised his hand. “That’s me.”

Nott glowered down his nose. He did not bear much resemblance to his son, in Draco’s opinion; his hair was thin and snowy where Theo’s was lush brown, his jowls loose where Theo’s were knife-sharp, his shoulders narrow beside Theo’s broad beater’s back. He walked with a hunch in his spine that age and poor posture had conspired to inflict, and it shrank his already not-indomitable height to well below that of most men in his station. He wore a gray pinstripe suit, and a badge on his cloak proclaimed him a member of the Wizengamot.

“Lord Runcorn sends his regrets,” he said silkily. “Business prevents him from joining you for this most important matter, though he hopes to demonstrate his respect for its severity by sending a treasured lieutenant in his place.”

“Was that your word, ‘treasured,’ or his?” said Harry cheerfully.

Nott made a sound like a hydraulic pump going out.

“Your levity is laudable, Mister Potter,” he said crisply. “It will serve you well. Needless to say, you have caused quite a deal of concern at the Ministry. Because of your… exceptional circumstances, we have postponed expulsion proceedings, as would normally take place—”

“Hang on,” cried Hermione. “You can’t expel him without a hearing, that’s rubbish—”

Draco gripped her elbow and pinned her to the spot, partly to stop her from leaping at Nott, and partly to beg for silence.

“Rubbish, indeed,” agreed Gatz. He emerged from the shadows of the room. Nott jumped.

“Lord,” he said, eyes roving over the yellow cloak. “I suppose you’re his solicitor?”

“Quite. Are we to take this as a formal recitation of charges,” inquired Gatz in gravelly tones, “or are you merely informing my client of the proceeding steps? I, for one, have yet to hear a formal claim against him.”

Nott sniffed, pursing his lips dourly. “Harry Potter has been charged with underage magic,” he said. “An announcement of charges was delivered—”

Gatz ripped the letter in half. Harry made a surprised noise, but not a disapproving one.

“This?” he said. “Codswallop. Bollocks. Dreck.”

“That — that is a formal charge of criminal activity! It carries the full force of Ministry—”

“Delivered without context to an underage wizard,” purred Gatz, “without his legal guardian present. Or did you also serve notice to the boy’s custodian?”

“His custodian is a muggle.”

“Oh, yes? So not only has Mister Potter not been served lawful notice,” murmured Gatz, ripping the letter into quarters, “but the Ministry stands in violation of the Custodial Rights Act of 1968, Section Four, subsection C—”

“Harry Potter is not a muggle-born!”

“Subsection C of which,” Gatz continued, blithely, “states that all muggle-born wizards, or underage wizards in the custody of muggles, may expect criminal charges levied against them to be delivered by hand by a Board-approved executor of justice, see footnote, who will explain said charges to the muggle custodian, and answer any questions—”

“He is a criminal,” said Nott coldly.

Draco decided he did not like Theo’s father.

“In point of fact,” drawled Gatz, “at this moment, the only criminal in the room is the Ministry, having attempted to initiate proceedings against my client without due process. Now, as an extremely litigious man, my client’s first instinct is naturally to file suit—”

Harry nodded somberly.

“But, with certain assurances, I might persuade him to turn the other cheek.”

Gatz smiled. Nott stepped back.

Draco elbowed Hermione, and nodded, as if to say: You see?

“As I was going to say,” Nott said, in the tones of someone wishing dearly to do the murder act on the nearest human being, “the Ministry has elected not to press charges against Mister Potter. I come on behalf of the Minister’s office, not the Department of Magical Law Enforcement. As suggested,” he added, nastily, “by the fact that you are talking to me, and not an Auror.”

“My client is very glad to hear it.”

“Yeah, he is,” Harry put in. “But, er — sorry — what, exactly, are you doing here? If not tell me I’m expelled?” He paused, and added, “I mean — if they just wanted to tell me I’m not kicked out — not to be rude or anything, but this could have been an owl.”

Nott drew out the chair, twitched up his trousers, and sat at Harry's desk. "Well put," he said crisply. "To wit: you have been recently aware, of course, of the escape of the scurrilous convict, Sirius Black."

Harry pressed his lips together. Draco knew and feared that expression. It usually meant Gryffindor was about to lose House points.

"I am. I am also," said Harry, "recently aware of the term scurrilous."

"Mister Potter, you must be aware that the Ministry will soon apprehend this criminal. And when it does, Lord Runcorn intends to bring him to justice using the fullest extent of the law."

Harry looked at Gatz. Gatz shrugged.

"Uh," said Harry. "Sure."

"Prior administrations," said Nott haughtily, "have languished on their laurels, while convicts, thieves, and scum run rampant in the wizarding world. Lord Runcorn will not tolerate this. It is a new day at the Ministry. Quite a new day, indeed. And to show that we are all prepared to put old political battles behind us, Lord Runcorn has personally seen fit to offer you a full Auror guard, until such a time as Black is returned to captivity," he hesitated, "or dispatched."

Draco startled. "A full Auror guard?" he repeated. "Do you even know that Black is coming for Potter?"

Nott ignored him. He watched Harry with a distant, almost pleasant expression on his face. "This is in addition to the new security imposed at Hogwarts, of course," he added. "Unlike Cornelius Fudge, Lord Runcorn will not stand by while children's lives are threatened. The crises of the past two years are long gone. He has sworn to lay waste to any man, woman, or beast that would lay a finger on Britain's most precious resource."

“What security?” said Hermione sharply.

“Dementors,” said Nott, without looking at her.

Draco’s breath caught. Harry and Hermione simply stared at Nott, uncomprehending.

“Wizarding security creatures, Mister Potter,” he elaborated. “Quite rigorous, I assure you. None have ever eluded them permanently. Nevertheless, Lord Runcorn would be more than glad to staff you with additional protection.”

“That… doesn’t seem necessary,” said Harry uneasily. He glanced at Draco, who shook his head.

Nott rose from his seat. “As you wish,” he said delicately. “Lord Runcorn’s offer stands, should you ever feel… less secure.”

Abruptly, he smiled. It was a small, oily expression. “But then again, we expect Black’s capture to be swift.” He extended his hand.

Harry frowned. He didn’t shake it. There was a long, awkward pause.

Draco blurted, “Did Professor Dumbledore consent to dementors on Hogwarts grounds?”

Nott smiled wider. “Professor Dumbledore has been informed of the Minister’s decision.”

“So, no,” said Hermione shrewdly.

“Professor Dumbledore understands the prerogative of the Minister to make important decisions regarding the wellbeing of children,” said Nott tonelessly. Hermione bristled again, and Draco tightened his grip on her elbow.

Nott made to leave, but paused. His hand flexed on the doorknob.

Without turning, he said: “How is my son?”

Draco realized, belatedly, that this was addressed to him.

“He is… well.” He tried to think of what Theo would want him to say. “He seems to be enjoying France.”

“Good.” A beat passed. “I expect that he will remain with you until the beginning of term.”

It wasn’t clear whether this was a statement, an order, or a question.

“I suppose so,” said Draco slowly, answering all three.

Nott nodded. “Give my regards to your mother,” he said softly. He left.

In the lull after the door closed, Harry flopped back onto the bed. He blew out a long, relieved breath.

“I don’t like that man at all,” announced Hermione. “I’m not sure I like the idea of him working for the Minister. ‘Treasured’ or otherwise.”

The solicitor folded his hands and planted himself, politely but obtrusively, in Draco’s line of sight.

“Thank you, Gatz,” Draco said crisply, handing him a folded check. “Give that to my accountant, he’ll see to everything.”

He bobbed a dramatic bow. “Many thanks, Lord Malfoy,” he croaked. “Always a pleasure to serve.”

“Yes, indeed. Do me a favor — the next time Potter calls for you, just do whatever needs to be done, and I’ll settle it with you after, all right?”

“Of course, Lord Malfoy. Mister Potter.” He gave another deep bow to Harry, and then one to Hermione — from pure politeness, it seemed — and scuttled out the door.

Harry pried his head up from the bed. “I’d say thanks,” he said, “but I’m going to check out what my nightmares look like tonight, first, and get back to you. Merlin.”

Hermione said, “Dementors,” and frowned. “I know that word. I’ve read it somewhere. They’re Dark creatures, aren’t they?”

Draco grimaced. “They’re horrible,” he said. “They guard Azkaban. They’re… I can’t describe them, but if you saw a picture, you’d get the idea. They… eat souls.”

Hermione and Harry stared at him.

“Not really, though,” she said, after a moment.

“Yes, really. I’m not using a metaphor, that’s what they do.”

“But there’s no such thing as a soul,” said Hermione, with all the confidence of someone who had conferenced with God and achieved mutual agreement on this fact. “That’s unproven. It’s spiritual dogma, not scientific fact.”

“I don’t know what to tell you. Maybe you’re right, but that’s what they do. They call it the Dementor’s Kiss. Leaves you all… empty. Like a lobotomy.” He swallowed, thinking of faceless shrouds creeping around the quidditch pitch, and shut his mind against the image.

Harry rolled upright, tousling his hair. “Have you seen it?” he said curiously.

“Merlin, no. Do I look like the type who’s in and out of Azkaban?”

He shrugged — which was fair, since Harry barely knew what Azkaban was. “I only asked because you seemed to know.”

Draco shifted his stance. “You learn about these things,” he said shortly, “when your father does time.”

“Your father…?”

“Until I was five. After he got out, he had… stories.” He sniffed amusedly. “Not ones I was supposed to overhear, I imagine, but there you are.”

“So you didn’t have hardly any time with him at all,” Hermione said softly. “I mean, you’d have been… five to eight, that’s what, three years?”

He looked at the ceiling.

“Three and a half,” he said stiffly. “Now, if you two inquisitors wouldn’t mind, I’d like to change the subject. Potter, you’re an orphan. Why don’t we talk about your dead mum?”

Hermione made a scandalized noise, but Harry cracked a grin. “Can’t, I don’t know anything about her,” he said. “Except that nobody’ll shut up about her sodding eyes. If you want to hear a million synonyms for ‘green,’ I’m your man, though.”

“Absolutely not. I’d much rather get out of this dismal room and go shopping,” said Draco. He actually thought the room was rather cozy, but to maintain appearances he made a habit of calling any room ‘dismal’ that didn’t have a footman in it. “That solicitor only cleared out about half my summer allowance, and while Diagon Alley’s no Savile Row, I’m sure you two cash-poor rabble can find a way to part me with my hard-earned galleons before the day is out.”

“Hard-earned?” said Hermione indignantly.

“Cash-poor?” Harry laughed. “My parents left me a fortune, mate. I’m rich, probably.”

Draco smirked.

“Granger,” he said, “Look out that window and choose a shop.”

“Why?” she said suspiciously.

“Do it, would you?”

She went to the window. “Quality Quidditch Supplies,” she read doubtfully. “That’s the first one I saw.”

“Right. Good. Potter, get your shoes. We’re getting you a birthday present. Granger, thank you for your cooperation, you’re a dream to work with, as always.”

“What, new quidditch supplies?” said Harry excitedly. He scrambled out of bed. “That’s corking — thanks, Malfoy!”

“I have concerns about this,” fretted Hermione. “Tell me you’re not about to do something dramatic, like buy out the store.”

“That’s ridiculous,” he said. “I’d have to buy all the cheap things, too and that would be a horrendous waste.”

“Are you trying to make some sort of point?” she asked, exasperated.

“Naturally. The point, Granger,” he drawled, examining his fingernails, “is that someone needs to teach you both the difference between ‘rich, probably’ and ‘rich, definitely.’”

Dark Creatures

Chapter 18: Dark Creatures

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

Platform 9 ¾ roared with noise when Draco and his mother stepped out of the Floo booth. The old scarlet steam engine belched smoke over a bustling crowd. The scent of oil and metal hung so strongly in the air he could almost taste them. He waited for the pang of sorrow and anticipatory homesickness to register in his chest, and it did, but it was weaker than he expected, and it warred with an unanticipated swell of eagerness to be on the train and riding away to Hogwarts.

Theo and Pansy emerged from the booth next. Theo waddled out somewhat awkwardly, being saddled with both their trunks. Pansy floated out like prima donna emerging from her dressing rooms, brushed ash from her blouse, and yawned.

They had spent their last night on the Riviera around a bonfire on the beach, making cheese toasties and chatting about all the things they were going to do when they came back to school. After Draco's mother went up, they had stayed awake long past midnight and gone to sleep only when Pansy passed out on Theo's shoulder. Draco's hair still smelled faintly like bonfire smoke.

As they stood blinking in the light of the platform, Pansy's parents hurried forward from the crowd. Their loving daughter greeted them with a heartfelt: "Oh, balls."

"Language," said Narcissa sweetly, and with a sweep of her wand, she smoothed a stray hair into one of Pansy's pigtails. With two taps, she planted an orchid on each hair tie, and kissed Pansy on the head. "Run along to them, darling. They look anxious."

"But I don't want to see them."

“Hurry up and face the music,” Theo muttered to her. “Sooner you do, sooner we’ll be gone.”

Theo’s own father had not made an appearance on the platform. Theo had no discernible reaction to this fact. Instead, he turned and said, in a careless sort of way, “Oh look, there’s Daph. Suppose I’ll go say hello.”

Daphne was pinned between Orpheus and Dido Greengrass and clearly hating every second of it. She had got her looks from her parents: Orpheus was a tall, svelte, steel-eyed man of Scandinavian features, while his wife Dido could have played an emaciated Marilyn Monroe. She leaned heavily on a foxhead ivory cane, and deep bags clung to her eyes. Daphne’s younger sister, Astoria, was with them, but she was sitting in a wheely-chair, and carried a corpulent black longhair cat on her lap.

As they watched, Daphne extracted herself, with difficulty, from her father’s embrace, and limped across the platform to Draco’s group. Her right leg trembled perilously whenever it took her weight, and her irritation with this was clear in how she refused to favor it.

“Hello, you brutes,” she said brightly. “How was your glorious vacation without me?”

“Would’ve been better if you accepted the goddam invitation,” Theo said genially, reaching for her, and she smacked a hard kiss ‘hello’ on his cheek. “Invalids don’t get to pout. Narcissa would’ve rented the Royal Ambulance to get you out there.”

“I told them that. And I almost had them convinced, too, but then Tori,” she spat the word sourly, “had to go and take a spill down the staircase, and that was curtains for both of us. It’s been nothing but the baby treatment all summer. They wanted me to come to Hogwarts on crutches — fat chance!”

“So what if Astoria fell?” said Draco, frowning. “What’s that to do with you?”

But Daphne's parents had descended on them, and she was steered away without another word. Meanwhile, the other Slytherin girl was fighting for her life to buck her mother's grip.

"Pansy!" Her mother was a diminutive, dark-haired woman whose sneer erased whatever beauty her features might have offered. "What are you wearing? Is that to code? Where's your badge?"

"It's Hogwarts, Mummy, they let us wear pants," sighed Pansy, shrugging off her mother's arm. "Also, hello. It's ever so good to see you, et cetera."

"Merlin's sake, let her be," snapped her father, a man shorter than Draco, whose daughter had inherited his nose. "We get all of ten minutes with her this summer, and you're picking fights? Come aside, Poppet, I've a gift for you…"

Narcissa watched them go with a fretful expression. "I hope they don't make her change," she murmured to Draco. "I took her to get them tailored. They're quite presentable, I thought, and we checked the handbook to make sure…"

"Nah, not to worry. She'll just put them on again once we're on the train," said Theo cheerfully. He shrugged Pansy's trunk over his shoulder. "Couldn't stop that girl with an army. Daph, need help with your trunk?"

"No," Daphne said dourly. "My dad insisted on taking it up. On the bright side, I've got a compartment now, so."

Deciding it was time to make goodbyes, Draco embraced his mother. It was startlingly easy, now; he didn't have to stand on tiptoe at all, and he only had to lift his chin a little to kiss her cheek. She gave him a quick frenzy of kisses over the forehead before turning, unexpectedly, to Theo.

"Now, young man," she said sternly, "you mustn't let my son get you into any sort of trouble."

Draco had a sudden fit of coughing which may or may not have contained one or two unpleasant words.

Narcissa patted his shoulder without looking. “You must try your very best to behave,” she continued, “and make good grades in everything, and earn lots of House points. And you must write to me often to tell me what you’ve been doing. Every week, you understand? I won’t accept anything less, or I should be most disappointed in you.”

Theo puffed his chest out a bit. “I’ll do my best,” he said seriously.

“Good.” She kissed Theo on top of the head, and he appeared to glow. “Now, run along, and help Pansy with her trunks.”

Theo — to Draco’s abject shock — gave Narcissa a sincere and dutiful salute. Then he marched off to regroup with Pansy, head high, hardly swaggering at all.

“I don’t know what that’s about,” Draco muttered, eyeing him. “Highly suspect, if you ask me.”

“In fact it’s rather simple,” said Narcissa, opaquely enough. “Anyway, don’t be jealous, my dove. You’re still my darling boy.”

“Lies and slander. I’ve never been jealous in my life.”

“Oh, never mind, then, dear. Perish the thought.”

“Oi! Draco!”

Harry and Ron wrestled their way through the crowd, staggering with their trunks. Harry had a long, conspicuous wooden box strapped to his back, and staggered under the weight of it, but he was beaming. “I just showed Ron the Firebolt,” he said. “We took it for a run before we left the Burrow. You’ve got to try it. It’s incredible!”

“Careful, Potter, or I’ll hold you to it,” said Draco, enjoying himself. “Hello, Weasley.”

“Malfoy,” said Ron. He wasn’t smiling; in fact, he looked a little sour. “Good gift, mate.”

“Thank you. I did think so.”

Narcissa cleared her throat politely. “Draco,” she said, “these are your schoolfriends?”

Draco twitched. “Oh,” he said, and his eyes darted for the train, calculating how quickly he could cross the distance to it. It would be easier than explaining to his mother that his “schoolfriends” were the two most famous blood traitors she was ever likely to meet.

But there was no use; Harry and Ron had put them all in an inescapable situation, and there was nothing for it but truth or lies. Gryffindors. “Yes. This is… erm. Well, for starters, this is Ronald Weasley.”

Ron — who had probably never in his life been introduced before Harry Potter — gave Draco a glance that was surprised, and perhaps even slightly grateful.

“Weasley, this is Narcissa Malfoy. My mother.”

“A pleasure,” she said, shaking Ron’s hand. Draco watched her reactions closely: her smile was a touch brittle, perhaps, but nothing discourteous. “You’d be the Ronald who sent him that lovely pair of spectacles for Christmas?”

Ron pinked. “Yeah, that’s me,” he said. “Er. We meant to get him something nicer, but they don’t let second years go to Hogsmeade, so…”

“It was a perfectly wonderful gift. I’m so glad we’ve been introduced. Please give my regards to your mother — Molly, wasn’t it? Molly Prewett, and her husband…” Narcissa wet her lips, hesitating.

“Arthur,” muttered Draco.

“Arthur! Yes. Your father, Arthur Weasley.” She smiled, with teeth.

Ron, looking faintly floored, said, “Yeah. That’s him.”

She turned to Harry. “And you,” she said, tapping her forehead wryly, “are Harry Potter.”

Draco jumped.

Harry shrugged, and nodded, having presumably learned to accept these sorts of introductions without awkwardness. “Yup. That’s me. Hullo.”

“Did I tell you, Mother,” Draco said quickly, “that Weasley’s mum is the last living Prewett? After the war, I mean. Which technically makes Ronald here a scion of the House of Prewett, as well as Weasley. Seven children, too, and only one girl — I don’t suppose you remember Aunt Cedrella—”

Narcissa put her hand on Harry’s shoulder. “The Wizarding World owes you a priceless debt,” she said, and Draco’s mouth froze in the shape of his stifled next word.

Harry shifted uncomfortably. “Oh. Well, that’s awfully nice of you, but —”

“To say nothing,” she added, “of the debt I owe you for freeing my husband from the Dark Lord’s clutches.”

Draco and Harry exchanged wild-eyed looks.

“Yeah, don’t mention it,” said Harry stiffly. “I’m glad I could, er… help him.”

“Do not think I do not understand the sacrifices it required,” said Narcissa. “I see them. I hope that in another time, if you ever have a need, we shall have the opportunity to repay you for those sacrifices.”

“Thanks. I… sort of hope not, actually?” Harry shrugged his Firebolt higher on his back, and glanced at the train, which obligingly screeched and belched smoke. “Well, we’d better get going. Er, Draco? You ready?”

“Yes,” said Draco, and snatched up his things. “Let’s go — have to run — bye, Mother! Don't forget to write!”

Together, they scrambled onto the train.

Steam billowed from the engine, and it heaved away from the station just as Ron’s foot left the ground. Harry pulled him up, and they slammed the door shut as King’s Cross shrank into the horizon.

“No offense, but your mum’s weird,” Harry told him, as they bustled down the aisle, searching for compartments. “What did she mean, ‘free’ your dad?”

“Yeah, she makes it sound like he was some double agent or something,” said Ron humorously. “Was he a secret Order member all along?”

Draco had no idea. He understood less and less about his mother the older he got, and today had been a profound regression on almost every score. “I don’t know,” he said. “I’m as surprised as either of you are; I thought she’d hate both of you, to be perfectly frank.”

“Cheers,” said Ron, elbowing him. “I thought the feeling would be mutual. Turns out, you’re the sore thumb in the family. Should’ve expected.”

“Makes two of us, Weaselbee. My congratulations to Percival, by the way, on Head Boy. Least one member of your family’s not a perennial disappointment.”

Ron’s expression darkened. “Don’t bring that up around him,” he warned. “You’ll never hear the end of it. We’ve only just pawned him off on Penelope, and the twins have been riling him up all day. They charmed his badge to say ‘Bighead Boy.’ Wonder when he’ll notice.”

They set off down the corridor, seeking an empty compartment.

Near the very end of the train, they ran into Hermione. She had yet to change from her muggle clothes, and wore some fitted muggle pants of a rough-hewn fabric, with a voluminous turtleneck jumper in gray and red stripes. It was a perfectly ridiculous outfit, but she looked enviably cozy and warm.

She also carried a cat. It was bright orange, the size of a tiger cub, and half as amicable.

“Oh, good, you made it,” she said brightly. “Boys, this is Crookshanks.”

The four of them ogled each other. It was hard to say whether the animal or the wizards were less happy about it.

“Hermione,” Ron said, in pained tones, “Scabbers is a rat.”

“Yes! So what?” The defensive edge in her tone suggested that Hermione did indeed know exactly ‘what.’ “He won’t be a problem! He’s perfectly well behaved.”

As if perturbed by the sound of lies, Crookshanks gave a beastly yowl and tried to claw his way out of his arms. She wrapped her arms around his chest and hoisted him firmly into place. “Anyway,” she said firmly, “the people at the emporium said no one else would take him. He deserved a second chance.”

“At what?” said Draco, veering out of reach of the claws. “Manslaughter?”

“You’ll all come around,” she said firmly. She hauled open the door to the last compartment, refusing to look at them. “He’ll grow on you.”

“Like gangrene,” muttered Ron. Draco coughed in discreet agreement.

The last compartment was already occupied, as it turned out — but not by a student. A man slumped against the window, clothed in a rumpled herringbone jacket with more patches than buttons, and a shabby, browned-out traveling cloak that he’d wrapped around himself like a blanket. His hair was too gray for his face, a silty brown like autumn earth.

His face was scarred indiscriminately, like someone had taken a fork to it. Draco balked a little at the sight of it.

“Didn’t think adults took the Express,” mused Ron.

“He’s a professor,” said Hermione. “R.J. Lupin.”

As Draco turned to her in amazement, ready to inquire whether she’d dabbled in Legilimency over the summer, Ron spared him the embarrassment by asking: “Blimey, how’d you know?”

She pointed. “It’s on his luggage.”

“Oh,” said Ron. Draco tittered, as if he, too, had made that deduction, although privately he was relieved Ron had beat him to the punch.

“Defense Against the Dark Arts, if I had to guess,” she added, “since there’s a vacancy again.”

Draco sat down opposite the professor, kicking his feet up on the seat. “Think we should just beat the piss out of him up-front, and save ourselves the trouble later on?” he asked, yawning. “Or at least check if he’s a Death Eater or You-Know-Who in disguise? Since Dumbledore’s obviously not heard of vetting.”

“Quirrell was arcanely possessed,” Hermione said primly, sweeping his feet out of the way with a swish of her wand, and settling on the cushion. “It was Dark magic. And Podmore was under Imperius. Neither of those things reveal themselves with a background check.”

“No, but they might with a taste of Veritaserum.”

“Incredibly invasive,” she said severely, “and inappropriate, as far as school policy goes. You can’t go poking around in people’s heads just in case they might be Death Eaters — then you’ll really have trouble filling the job.”

“Anyway, he’s got to be desperate, Dumbledore,” said Ron. “The job’s jinxed. How many qualified wizards do you think are lining up to take a job where the last two blokes got knocked off inside of a year? You burn through enough good professors, and suddenly, the weirdos start looking pretty good.”

Harry sat down gingerly next to the sleeping Lupin. Ron squeezed in with Hermione. All three of the boys had shot up a few inches over the summer, and the same compartment that had seemed cavernous as first years now only tenuously admitted the five of them.

A faint, tinselly whine pierced the air. Harry winced, and dug from his satchel what appeared to be a quaffle-sized lump of socks. Peeling them away, he revealed a Pocket Sneakoscope, which glowed and spun even faster when it touched Harry’s palm.

“Is that a Sneakoscope, Potter?”

“Yeah. I think it’s broken,” he said apologetically. “It’s been going off ever since I left this morning.”

“It’s not broken, it’s merely junk,” Draco snorted. “Pocket Sneakoscopes are a scam. They’ll spin and squeal whenever you bring them near loud noises, or bright lights. Trash that thing first chance you get, and buy a proper Sneakoscope from a reputable vendor, if you want one.”

Harry glanced away guiltily. “It was Ron’s birthday present,” he said. “He brought it back from Egypt for me.”

Draco blinked. “Oh,” he said. Hermione was glaring at him. Wonderful. “Well. Then its… sentimental value is, naturally… inimitable.” He looked at her. She rolled her hand in a go-on motion. “Forget what I said. I… apologize… for any offense.”

Ron, who had been staring at his shoes ever since Draco started talking, shrugged. “Nah, mate,” he said crisply. “S’fine. Doesn’t work anyway, you might as well.” He wiped his nose on his sleeve. “I mean, it’s no Firebolt, so.”

“Ron, c’mon,” said Harry pleadingly, but the professor gave a snort, and they all fell still, like rabbits in the presence of a sleeping fox.

In the awkwardness that followed, Draco, Harry, and Hermione played a silent game of ‘who’s going to speak.’ Draco drew a finger across his own throat, shaking his head. Harry and Hermione turned to each other and did some sort of strange game of hand gestures that involved smacking their palms and making different shapes with their fingers. Finally, Hermione smacked her hand over Harry’s fist, and pointed at him. Harry sighed.

“Oh, Ron, you’ll think this is funny,” he said. “Your dad thinks I’m going to go looking for Sirius Black.”

All three of them looked at him seriously.

“Are you?” said Draco.

Harry blinked. “Of course not,” he said, irritated. “Last I checked, people were more worried about him coming after me.”

“Oh, Harry,” Hermione said, knitting her fingers together. “You don’t think… you have to be careful.”

“I am careful! I don’t want to get killed, do I?”

Ron chuckled, “Mione, he’s not about to go running after a murderer. He’s thick, but he’s not that thick.”

“Thank you,” said Harry, “and piss off, respectively.”

“You must admit that it sounds like something you’d do,” she said to Harry. “I mean, first Quirrell… then Yaxley…”

“I was eleven, that first time,” said Harry firmly. “And the second time, it was Nott who started it. Just because some loony’s got it in for me doesn’t mean I’m going to go all… Batman.”

“Well, that’s good to hear, but you must understand why I’d worry.”

“What’s a Batman?” said Ron, mystified.

“I don’t know,” said Draco honestly. “If someone who betrayed my parents broke out of Azkaban, I would consider it.”

There was silence in the compartment.

“What do you mean, he betrayed my parents?” said Harry tonelessly.

Draco turned from one face to another, seeking recognition. “Well,” he said helplessly, “I mean — didn’t anyone tell you? The story of the Potter murders? I wouldn’t have… Merlin, Potter, I wouldn’t have mentioned it, but I thought you knew.”

“What’s he got to do with them?” demanded Harry.

“...Black knew your father. Before he turned coat on the Order.” He paused. “He was the Potters’ Secret-Keeper, in Godric’s Hollow. The night after they died, he went after Peter Pettigrew.”

Harry stared. Draco said weakly, “Nobody’s ever told you?”

“Harry, I’m so sorry,” said Hermione tenderly. “It’s in Modern Magical History. I didn’t think.”

Harry blinked. He wet his lips, and Draco wished suddenly that they could all Disapparate from the room, to give him a modicum of privacy. It wasn't dignified to catch a man with his trousers down like this.

"It's okay," Harry said bleakly, after a moment. "I've sort of gotten used to everyone knowing more about my life than I do."

"Oh, Harry," said Hermione, and with a flurry of movement she had crossed the carriage to wrap him in a fierce hug. In her haste she displaced Crookshanks, who leapt into Draco's arms with a fearsome yowl, and Draco hissed as the claws dug into his legs.

The things he tolerated for these people.

The Hogwarts Express pressed north through darkening swells of wilderness. The sky knitted over with clouds and dimmed to the color of coal, while lightning flickered in the distance, small knives of light dancing on the horizon. People raced back and forth past the door of their compartment, their laughter echoing queerly in the long train.

At one o'clock, the trolley woman arrived, and Harry bought them all Cauldron Cakes, which put Ron in better spirits, since it freed him from the tyranny of Molly Weasley's premade sandwiches. Hermione took out her History of Magic essay and insisted on peer revision, which was fine by Draco, since he'd wanted to edit his essay anyway, but led to much groaning from Harry and Ron.

Mid-afternoon, rain rolled down in a battery across the hills, accompanied by a gun-salute of thunder, and lashed the windows. The train rattled and the wind roared, and still, Professor Lupin remained unmoving. Hermione took some of Draco's Cauldron Cakes, and they had a brief, highly litigious argument over whose property rights were at stake, until Harry threatened to just go buy more, which they both begged him not to do, as it would moot the point of contention. Then he gave the cakes to her anyway. He didn't like sweets that much.

“Blimey, it’s black as pitch out there,” said Ron, squinting at the black mirror of the window. “We must be nearly there.”

As if on cue, the train started to slow down.

“Speak of the boggart,” Ron said cheerfully. “Bang-on. I’m starving.”

“We can’t be there yet,” said Hermione, checking her muggle watch. It had a pink strap with roses on it. Hermione, Draco noticed, owned rather a lot of accessories in pink.

“So why’re we stopping?”

The robust pumping of the pistons faded to a faint tsh-tsh-tsh, and then vanished under the pounding of the rain. Harry poked his head into the corridor. “Everybody thinks we’re getting out,” he said. He lifted his voice: “Oi! Neville! D’you know why we’re stopping?”

Someone said something warbly and muffled, and Harry shook his head. Draco stood up, intending to join Harry’s investigation in the corridor, but as he did so, the train slammed to a halt. A jolt rocked the carriage, and he tumbled down on top of Hermione — and, by extent, Crookshanks, who gave a tortured yowl and sprang away. A small thunder and racket of cries from throughout the train told them that luggage had been knocked from its berth.

“Ow!”

“Sorry,” he muttered, prying himself apart. He’d fallen hard on her lap, and Hermione’s knees were none too hospitable on one’s rear, but he couldn’t rightly blame her for that. He pulled out his wand and gave her a once-over to ensure he hadn’t banged her up. “Not hurt, are you?”

“No,” she said, rubbing her head where it had knocked against his. “I’m alright. But what on earth happened to the train—?”

At the same moment, the lights went out.

“What’s going on?” said Ron’s voice from behind Harry.

“Ouch! Ron, my foot!”

“D’you think we’ve broken down?”

“We must have done,” said Hermione, though she didn’t sound certain. “The Express doesn’t make stops.”

Something squeaked, and a figure moved to the window, scrubbing away a patch of fog. A flicker of lightning filled the compartment, and Draco could see that it was Ron, peering out the window.

“I’m going to go and ask the driver what’s going on,” said Hermione, businesslike. “I’m sure there’s an explanation.”

Draco grabbed her wrist as she rose to leave. “Don’t,” he said suddenly.

“What? Why not?”

He couldn’t explain it — maybe it was the dark — but a cold hand of foreboding trailed its nails down his spine. “It’s like you said. This train doesn’t make stops,” he said. “Ever. We have no idea what’s happening up there.”

“Yeah?” he said. He could feel her pulse against his thumb, and it was fast. “How sure are you?”

The compartment door slid open. Everyone startled, but a girl’s voice cut through the dark: “Who’s there?”

“Ginny?” said Ron, moving away from the window. “That you?”

“Ron? Harry?”

“Yes, Ginny, it’s us!”

“Oh, hullo, Hermione! I was looking for Ron.” Ginny fumbled into the compartment. The door squealed closed behind her. “Mad, isn’t it? I overheard someone saying we hit something.”

“That’s impossible. The train is warded with Repulsion Charms, so animals don’t come near the tracks. I read it in—”

“Oh, shut up, we all know where you read it,” Ginny said good-naturedly. “Can I invite Neville? He got scared and went looking for a prefect.”

“Quiet!” said a hoarse voice suddenly.

A small, shivering light bloomed in the compartment, perched on the tip of Professor Lupin’s wand. The cool glow drew deep lines in his face.

He stood up in a single, rigid movement, like that of a soldier. None of them spoke.

“Stay where you are,” he rasped. He crossed to the door and reached for the handle. With a rattle, it slid open before he touched it.

At first, Draco mistook it for wandless magic. Then he saw something locked around the door: a slender hand, black as ink, thin as a raven’s claw. His heart skipped.

Then, as it slid open, the rest of the creature came into view.

It spanned ceiling to floor, a floating shroud of black coils like smoke, under the dusty cowl of a long cloak. In the place where its face should have been sat a pit, shrouded in fathomless dark, and from the tattered hem of its sleeve protruded a gray, glistening, skeletal hand, its skin scored and peeling like dead flesh.

It drew in a deep, rattling breath, and it sounded like an echo of wind over a distant moor.

The temperature in the compartment plummeted. Frost iced over the windows, and a shiver wracked Draco's spine. His breath turned silver in the darkness. He could feel Hermione's skin turn cool under his fingers, gooseflesh pebbling her arm, but the sole throb of warmth from her pulse point distracted him from the chill. He squeezed, tighter, and felt warmth sprout around the place where his fingers banded her wrist — he clung to it like it was the last living flame on the planet, the last warm thing he could find, and as if from a distance, he heard her hiss of discomfort. He tore his eyes away from the Dementor to look at her, and she had drawn as far as she could into the seat, her knuckles white around her wand, her eyes enormous.

Harry dropped to his knees with a thud, and collapsed. Ron dove to catch him before he hit his head.

The Dementor made to enter the compartment, but it made it no further than the threshold. Lupin had stepped calmly over Harry's body and pointed his wand at the creature.

Draco, who was still clinging to Hermione's wrist in the effort of remaining upright, considered this an inconceivable display of recklessness and supremely impressive nerve.

"None of us is hiding Sirius Black under our cloaks," he said. "Go."

The Dementor gave a rattling howl. Ginny cried out and clapped her hands over his ears, and Draco winced.

Lupin narrowed his eyes. "Expecto Patronum. "

A silver beast erupted from the tip of his wand, four-legged, with a long snout and a short, wagging tail. Snarling, it leapt at the Dementor, leaving a glowing trail of white mist. The Dementor gave another shriek and soundlessly swept out of the compartment.

Lupin hauled the compartment door closed in its wake, locked it with a muttered and trembling, “Colloportus. ”

In a moment, the lights flickered back on, and the train shuddered into motion. Lupin dropped to his knees — Draco opened his mouth, an embarrassing flood of thanks on the tip of his tongue — and dealt Harry the meanest, fiercest slap Draco had ever seen.

Draco winced.

“Oi,” roared Ron, shoving him away. “What’s the big idea?”

“Wake him up,” panted Lupin, pointing at Harry. “Wake him up! Is he all right?”

But they needn’t have worried: Harry groaned, stirring. He hauled himself up on his elbows and fumbled for his glasses on the floor. “What happened?” he mumbled.

“Harry! Oh, thank goodness — here!”

Hermione snatched up his glasses and pressed them into his hand, shaking quite badly herself. Draco smoothed both hands over his hair and tried to settle his own nerves, which were badly frayed. He still felt cold, too; a coat of frost lingered on the windowpane.

“Who screamed?” said Harry, looking around. His eyes lingered on Ginny, and she scowled at him.

“No one,” she said. “Lupin cast a Patronus, and the Dementor left.” She had gone tremendously pale, and there was a suspicious redness to her eyes, which she scrubbed at angrily.

“Cast a what?” said Hermione.

“That’s a Dementor?” gasped Harry.

“Powerful anti-Dark magic charm,” Draco said to Hermione. He furtively drew his cloak tighter around his shoulders. The piercing cold had abated, but a chill lingered in the compartment, and the hairs on the back of his neck had yet to lie flat. “Heinously difficult to do, as I hear it. I didn’t know they worked against Dementors.”

“Common misperception. They’re only as difficult as you think they are, young man,” said Lupin bracingly, and something snapped. He broke a large chocolate bar into several pieces, and passed them around. “Eat up. It’ll help.”

Draco eyed the piece in his palm. “Is this enchanted?”

“No, it’s Cadbury.” Lupin pocketed the empty wrapper and hauled open the compartment door. “Alright, Harry?” he said.

It was not a strange question, but it became strange by virtue of his tone: he asked it casually, almost familiarly, as if they’d known each other their whole lives. Harry, who obviously was just as unnerved by this as Draco, frowned and mumbled, “Fine, professor.”

“Good,” said Lupin. “Very good. We’ll be at Hogwarts in ten minutes, I think. If any of you don’t start to feel better, have some more chocolate… I’m going to have a word with the conductor.”

And with that cryptic announcement, he hurried out of the compartment.

Harry pushed himself up on the seat, looking discombobulated and rumpled, at least more so than usual. “What about the rest of you?” he asked, earnestly. “Are you alright? Ron? Draco?”

“M’fine, mate.”

“Quite well, thank you, Potter.”

“Ginny?” He held his hand to help her off the floor. A tinge of color topped her cheeks, but she accepted it, and sprang to her feet.

“I’m fine,” she said briskly. “That Lupin’s got to be something to write home about, if he can produce a full corporeal. I’ve only ever seen one of those."

"Yeah, that's right, isn't it?" said Ron. "Dad conjured one that time he thought someone was breaking into the Burrow… turns out Bill just forgot his key, and the nutter thought it'd be fun to try and crack the house wards…"

"Bill's a riot," Ginny said wistfully. "Wish he were here. Anyway, I've got to change, we'll be there in a mo. Hermione, come with?"

"Yes, I'd better change, too," said Hermione, springing up to fetch her trunk. "I've never cut it this close, but I got distracted — oh, Crookshanks, no!"

Crookshanks, master of strategy, had taken advantage of the hullabaloo to make a mad lunge for Ron's pocket. There, Scabbers had sequestered himself, squeaking frightfully. Ron shouted and whisked his pet out of the animal's reach.

"Hermione! Get — that — thing — away — from — Scabbers!"

"Fine! Crookshanks, come here," she said and wrestled him into her arms. She turned to Draco, and her expression turned sly and coaxing. "Draco, would you do me a wonderful favor—"

"No."

"Just for a bit! He'll behave!"

"Your nose twitches when you're lying. That, or you need a hanky."

"Oh, fine," she huffed, and went out to change with Ginny.

"Given the choice between a Dementor and that animal," Ron said darkly, "I'd take the Dementor."

Draco shuddered. "Bite your tongue, Weasley. Fortune has big ears."

“Not joking, mate. At least Dementors respond to a patronus. I could cast a full corporeal, and that cat wouldn’t give a damn.”

At the opening feast, Draco listened intently to Dumbledore’s usual remarks about house unity and cooperation. The headmaster warned the first years away from the Forbidden Forest and introduced Professor Lupin, who, as Hermione had predicted, would fill the D.A.D.A. slot. Not a word was said about Runcorn, the Ministry, or why Dark creatures were now permitted to stalk the castle grounds.

“I suppose he doesn’t want to frighten people,” suggested Hermione the next morning. They were marching down to Care of Magical Creatures, their scarves wrapped tight against the nippy air. In the distance, faceless shrouds floated in a foreboding perimeter over the hillsides, staining the overcast sky like ink on gray velvet.

“Sure,” snorted Draco, “because there’s nothing frightening about those things, certainly.”

“Well, he’s addressing first years, too, remember. They don’t know it’s not normal. And he wouldn’t want to cause alarm.”

Draco sneered. “Ignorance is cause for alarm. Or at least, it should be.”

“Oh, for Pete’s sake, and what did you want him to say? ‘Sorry for the nightmares, children, but nothing to be done, nobody’s in control, and we think a murderer might come for you at any moment’? Honestly.”

“I’d give him points for honesty, at least,” he muttered, as they marched into the shelter of the trees.

Hagrid hosted Care of Magical Creatures in a paddock just a few meters into the Forbidden Forest, where the trees were still thin enough that you could clearly see the castle. The grass was springy and wet beneath their feet, almost breathable, as if the rain had pounded life into the earth.

Their textbooks that year were horrible things, actually, literally monstrous, and it took Hermione's and Draco's combined efforts to pry one open: he gripped the spine and held it still while she pried it apart, and then she stuffed a stone in between its jaws, to keep the page open. Hagrid urged them to "Jus' stroke the spine, all ye need ter do," but though this worked for Harry, who rarely met a creature he couldn't charm, Hermione and Draco's touch failed to soothe the agitated volumes.

"See, this is interesting," said Hermione valiantly. "He's — he's incorporating the textbook into the teaching method. It's a fully integrated kind of learning."

"The thing tried to 'fully integrate' my hand into its gullet," Draco said darkly. "Remind me again why Kettleburn retired?"

He had spoken too loudly; Harry threw a sour look at him. "Thanks, Hagrid," he said clearly. "This is really cool."

"Thanks, Harry!" Hagrid piped up, beaming. If he was bothered by the whispers and sour looks of other students who, like Draco, had little love for their textbooks, he did not show it. "Now, if yeh all got yer books — looks like yeh do, well done, you lot — I'll go fetch the firs' of the creatures. Picked out a real treat fer yeh today, firs' day of classes, didn' wan' to disappoint ye…"

He strode out of the paddock. When he was gone, Draco turned to Hermione.

"I take back what I said about Muggle Studies," he muttered. "All of it. It's the nine o'clock slot, isn't it? If we go now, we can make the first half—"

"Just give him a chance," Hermione said, but she didn't sound altogether convinced. "It's his first time teaching. He's probably nervous."

"He's nervous? Did that sound comforting in your head?"

Hagrid came back holding a weathered and suspiciously frail-looking leather leash. Lavender Brown gave a cry of delight, because she was a twit who didn't recognize when a creature had the capacity to stomp you to death.

The animal on Hagrid's lead looked like a horse, if horses were designed by someone with murder in their heart. It had the head and wings of an eagle, the talons of the same, and the back of an equine, which altogether doubled, if not tripled, its capacity for bloodshed. Its yellow, beady eyes swept with haughty bloodlust over the assembled children, clearly seeking a subject upon which to enact the terrible violences for which it was wrought. Draco saw it and despised it at once.

"This is Buckbeak!" said Hagrid, slapping the thing's back. It looked at him as though it was too surprised to maul him for it. "He's a hippogriff! Lovely creature, inne? Who wan's to pet 'im first?"

Nobody raised their hand. Draco leaned into Hermione's ear.

"You know, I've heard the loveliest things about Charity Burbage—"

"Stop it!" she whispered, but her eyes were darting back to the castle. "We're here now, aren't we?"

Harry squared his shoulders and stepped up. "I will, Hagrid," he said loyally, and Draco, with a sigh, set about drafting a quick eulogy. Dear friends, we are gathered here today to celebrate the life of Harry James Potter, big of heart and none of brain, who nobly laid down his life for the cause of Sodding Zilch and No Reason At All…

"To think I could be safe and sound in a classroom right now," he said gloomily, "learning what a fellytone is."

“Selly- phone,” said Ron wisely. Hermione huffed a short laugh.

Harry gave a deep bow to the hippogriff, which, to Draco’s surprise, permitted Harry to pet its flank. A few moments later, at Hagrid’s exhortation, Harry was scrambling atop its back, and it vaulted into the sky. Harry gave a long, gusty holler of exhilaration. Hermione gasped, and clapped her hands over her mouth.

“Oh, my God!”

“There yeh go, Harry!” Hagrid roared, pumping his fist. “Perfect! He likes yeh!”

“He’s so daring,” sighed Lavender. She had grown up a bit over the summer, and now wore a number of beaded charms in her hair, along with feathered earrings that brushed her shoulders. The quantity of silver jewelry on her hands and fingers, none too slim to begin with, had quintupled since June. She and Parvati had both doubled down on their eyeliner, and their nails shone a dark, inky purple.

When Harry landed again, he was met with a raucous cheer. He slipped off the hippogriff’s back, grinning widely, his hair standing electrically on end from the wind of his flight. “That was fantastic,” he said. “Draco, you’d love it. It’s like flying, only rougher.”

Draco said politely, “Thank you, I would rather die.”

“Don’t be a priss! Hermione, what about — okay, you wouldn’t like it. Ron, though, seriously…”

But nobody else could be coaxed onto the hippogriff’s back, and Hagrid spent the rest of the lesson lecturing. It was unclear what they were supposed to be gathering from his lecture, which mostly consisted of him saying: “Watch this! Isn’t he marvelous?” whenever Buckbeak did something of trifling note. At the end of the lesson, he added as an obvious afterthought: “Er — homework! Read the textbook introduction, and, er… choose yer favorite creature from the book, an' come to class ready ter share it an' say why. Alrigh'! Off ter the castle, there yeh go!"

Word of the new Care of Magical Creatures' professor's pedagogical approach spread quickly through the castle. Later that week, Theo flagged Draco on the way into Potions to ask if it were true.

"Is what true?"

"That Hagrid's got a Class Four monster on a leash down there," said Theo incredulously. "And he's showing it to third years."

"Class Four?"

"It's a Ministry classification indicating a creature's danger to wizards," Hermione said, appearing from the crowd, as some radar in her brain detected all academic questions in a five-mile radius. "It's in the reading he assigned for Wednesday. I did it during lunch. Actually it's quite problematic, because it's biased in all sorts of ways! For one thing, a lot of the ratings are outdated, totally in conflict with the latest research. House-elves are Class One, but considering how strong their magic is, they really ought to be Class Three or Four! And of course, it's totally wizard-centric…"

"Wouldn't want that, would you, in a book meant for wizards," said Theo. "Hello, Granger. Good summer?"

"Quite," she said stiffly. Hermione loathed to be interrupted, and Draco almost would have found it funny, except he knew magical creatures could be a touchy subject.

"Good. I still mean to kill you, by the way."

Her lips twitched. "Still stuck at third rank in Transfiguration?"

"Veritably ensconced in it, my dear. I am comfortable and at home in this rank. I soon intend to purchase building permits, and erect a great country house for my descendants, of whom there will be many."

"Mazel tov," said Hermione dryly.

Snape barely uttered a word as they filed in. He flicked his wand at the board, and the instructions scrawled themselves in chalk. Draco tried to catch his godfather's eye, but the man was scribbling furiously on a book of his own at his desk.

The first potion of the year typically constituted a pre-test, a sort of evaluation to see how far they had slipped over the summer. It wasn't hard, but from the sweat-beaded faces and frantic muttering that filled the dungeon, the slippage had indeed been vast. Ron was still making careful, deliberate cuts on his daisy roots, wielding his knife like an ax, and Harry had barely stripped the first layer of skin off his shrivelfig.

Draco made a quick job of both pieces of knife work and passed the cutting boards over to Hermione, who was murmuring an incantation over the pot, stirring while she carefully adding six, seven, eight drops of tigerbee honey. Their potion ripened from yellow to a healthy acid green. He grinned at it, and sat back in his chair.

A squeak came from the next desk over. "Orange, Longbottom," drawled Snape. "Orange. Tell me, based on your understanding of a Shrinking Solution, when in the process of brewing should it turn orange?"

Neville flushed and looked down at his cauldron. "N-never."

"Never. And what color is your potion now?"

"O-o-orange."

"And what has caused your potion to turn this color?"

Draco cringed. Neville was hunched over his cauldron, his cheek pillowed miserably on his fist. Snape folded his arms, glowering with unmerciful disappointment.

Slowly, Draco inched one of the shrivelfigs into his grasp, and tapped it thrice on the desk. Neville glanced at the noise, but just as quickly turned away. “I d-d-d-d—” He started, swallowed, and tried again. “Sir. I really d-d-don’t—”

Draco rapped the shrivelfig hard on the desk. Snape and Neville both turned.

“Sorry, sir,” he said brightly to Snape. “Thought I saw a spider.” As he spoke, he held the shrivelfig under his desk, out of Snape’s view, and shook it violently at Neville.

“Oh,” exclaimed Neville. “Oh! Sh-sh-shrivelfigs!”

Snape paused, mouth slightly open, and narrowed his eyes. “What about shrivelfigs?”

Neville scrambled for his book. “I didn’t add them,” he said hurriedly. “Or, no, I added them too late. So the cauldron was too hot, and they burned.”

“That,” said Snape, and paused for an interminable silence, “is correct.”

“It is?” said Neville wildly.

He and Snape stared at each other. Snape appeared to be attempting to cast laser beams out of his eyes and through Neville’s woefully thick skull.

“Start over. There will be no third chances,” snarled Snape, and he swept away.

Draco slumped into his chair, relieved. He daubed a bit of sweat from his temple and glowered at Neville. “What,” he said, once Snape was well and truly out of earshot, “did we say about prep work, Longbottom?”

“Do it first, so you aren’t rushing later,” he said happily, “but who cares — Merlin, I’ve never got an answer right in Potions before!” And he wiggled gleefully in his seat.

“Right, you didn’t, I did, so let’s calm down,” muttered Draco. But he had to admit that it was an unprecedented coup for Neville, who last year would have called it an accomplishment to string three words together in front of Snape without throwing up.

Hermione was smiling at him in a small, sweet, profoundly unnerving way, quite different from her normal know-it-all smirk. It made his cheeks feel hot.

“What?” he demanded.

“That was nice of you,” she said quietly.

“What was?” He pretended not to hear her. He reached for their ladle. “Are those clumps? Did you forget to stir it? I turn my back for thirty seconds, and you let the brew turn to bilgewater. Pass me the funnel, I want a viscosity test.”

After the lesson ended, Neville joined Draco, Hermione, Harry, and Ron on their way to Defense Against the Dark Arts. “Granny says I don’t have to do more than O.W.L. in Potions,” he said cheerfully, trotting up the long staircase to the third floor. “After that, I can d-d-drop it for Advanced Phytomedicine, and Sprout says I can audit that once I’ve taken Herbology IV. But we’re already doing such cool stuff this year, I mean, she let me work with the new monkshood b-b-bulbs yesterday, and she’s letting me TA the first years…”

“Neville,” Ron said, patiently, after some time of this. “Not to be insulting or anything, mate. But could you — respectfully speaking — shut the hell up, a little?”

Neville, still riding on a cloud of his own borrowed glory, was unfazed. “Hey, Harry,” he added. “Have you heard about B-B-Black? The Prophet says there was a sighting this morning, in Scotland. A muggle spotted him not f-f-far from here.”

“What?” said Harry sharply.

“Yeah. On the m-m-move, it looks like.”

Harry paled. Draco felt bad for him; he thought Neville would do well to, in Ron’s words, ‘shut the hell up, a little.’ But Hermione said waspishly, “And this was a single sighting, was it? Uncorroborated, unverified?”

“Well, yeah,” said Neville awkwardly. “But I mean, it is scary, isn’t it? Seeing as everyone’s s-s-saying he’s going after Harry…”

“Yeah, everyone’s saying it,” said Harry, brusquely, shouldering open the door. “Everyone’s really excited about this scary bloke who wants to kill me. It’s excellent. Keep me posted if he turns up under your bed, would you?”

They filed into their seats. At five past the hour, Professor Lupin ambled out of his office, hauling a chest of drawers behind him. He looked better than he had on the train: though he wore the same shabby herringbone jacket, he had a fresh, unrumpled shirt, and was clean-shaven, which alone restored a decade of youth. He walked with stiff grace, as if each motion were a sentence unto itself, ending with a full-stop of stillness.

“Good afternoon,” he said pleasantly. His voice still went thin when he lifted it, and so he spoke at a conversational murmur that made all the students lean forward to hear. “I’d like to start the term with a bit of a project.”

The chest rattled and banged itself against the wall. Several students jumped and gave a shout.

“Never fear,” said Lupin. He looked down at the floor, smiled slightly, and then looked up again. “This is a boggart. It’s been rattling around a chest of drawers in the staffroom for some time, after a few, ah… young miscreants… trapped it in there, many years ago.” He cleared his throat. “So today, you’re all going to set their wrongs to rights, and deal with this little beastie for us.”

The chest’s topmost drawer rattled ominously. Seamus Finnigan, looking quite eager, said, “So we get to destroy a piece of furniture?”

Lupin covered his mouth with his hand, but his eyes were smiling. “Not quite, Seamus,” he said. “Can anyone tell our incendiary friend why that wouldn’t work?”

Hermione’s hand almost smacked Draco on the way up. (By now, he was well-used to dodging, and had leaned away as soon as he heard the question.)

“It’s a shapeshifter,” she said crisply. “It takes the shape of whatever it thinks will frighten us most. If you destroy its home, it’ll just move on to the nearest dark, enclosed space.”

“Quite right, too,” agreed Lupin, to Hermione’s delight. “These things are born of the darkness, and they thrive anywhere you have concentrated fear and misery. So we’re going to chase it away. Scare it so badly that it shan’t even think of coming to Hogwarts again. Wands out, please.”

The class rustled and drew their wands. Neville shook so badly he dropped his, and went scrambling after it on hand and knee.

“Accio, ” said Lupin calmly, and caught Neville’s wand in the air. He flipped it around and held it out, handle-first, to Neville, who slumped shamefacedly to the front of the classroom to collect it. “Why so blue, friend?” he said gently.

“I’m n-n-n-not very g-g-good with spells.”

Lupin frowned. “And who told you that?” he asked seriously, as if he desired to have a word with them.

“W-w-w-well, I, I thought that the b-b-b-boggart…” Neville swallowed. “If it’s the th-th-thing you f-f-f-fear m-m-m-m-mmm-mmm—” He choked himself off.

Lupin nibbled his lip. “Hmm,” he said. “Do you like music, Neville?”

“W-what?”

“Music? Muggle music, wizard’s music, any kind?”

“My g-g-g-gran likes Celestina W-Warbeck,” he ventured.

Lupin made a face. “And you?”

Neville swallowed again. “I like w-what Seamus plays.”

Seamus sat up proudly. “Good man, Longbottom.”

Lupin smiled slyly, a twitch on the corner of his lip. “Ah,” he said. “Let me have a guess, then, at what Seamus plays.”

He pointed his wand at the back of the room. From beneath a pile of trinkets on an old shelf, a dusty victrola stirred to life, and a thunder of drums roared from the old speaker.

Last night a little dancer, she came dancing to my door…

Last night, that little angel, she came pumping on my floor…

Lupin’s foot tapped a soft drumbeat on the ground. “Seamus,” he called, somewhat hoarsely, over the music. “Something like this?”

“Yes, sir!”

“Thank you, Seamus. Now, Neville, when that boggart comes out,” he continued, pointing at the chest with his wand, “I want you to humiliate it."

"What, sir?" Neville said, terrified.

"I mean, make a mockery of it. Doesn't matter if it's the silliest, stupidest, low-brow joke you can think of. Nothing's too blue, or too raunchy. I'm giving you a free pass, you understand? Just whatever makes you laugh."

Neville, whom Draco doubted had ever had a raunchy thought in his life, gulped. The musician's guitar snarled and leapt into a chorus. Seamus shook his head back and forth to the music. Harry was beaming. "Okay, sir."

"And when you do that, I want you to yell Riddikulus. Big silly spell for a big silly beast. Can you do that for me?"

"I'll t-t-t-t-try, sir."

"Okay. Thank you, Neville. You're being very brave, going first," said Lupin seriously. "The rest of you: once Neville successfully dispatches his boggart, it's going to move around the room. All of you should be prepared to take the same advice I just gave him. Think of something that scares you, and embarrass the living daylights out of it. You understand?" He grinned, and it was a threadbare, ferocious expression. "Make a mockery of evil."

The singer howled, WITH A REBEL YELL—

Lupin flung open the drawer.

A dark shape exploded from the chest of drawers, swirling furiously in the air. It landed in front of Neville, thrashing, and resolved into a tall, pinched-faced woman with steel-gray hair, wielding a cherry red handbag.

"Disappointment!" she shrieked. She flew at Neville, wheeling her handbag like a flail. "Disappointment! Squib! Feckless, worthless, unmagical lump!”

Neville staggered back, mouthing wordlessly.

“Embarrassment! Humiliation! Dishonor! Worthless child!”

“Riddikulus, Neville, come on,” shouted Lupin. “I think she needs new shoes, don’t you? Nice big red ones?”

“R-r-riddikulus!” squeaked Neville.

A crack filled the room. The woman stumbled, and her green blazer sprouted into a flowery clown suit, complete with lace frills. Her shoes sprouted into enormous red trainers, and a red bulb appeared on the end of her nose. Laughter exploded from the classroom, more from relief than anything else: she had stopped shouting at Neville, and everyone was glad.

The boggart paused, confused, and Lupin shouted, “Parvati! Up!”

Parvati sprang up, wand gripped tightly, and the boggart swirled into a bloodstained mummy, trailing bandages. But with the music playing so loudly, it was hard to be scared, and with a victorious jab of her wand, she collapsed it into a pile of toilet paper, laughing all the while. Then came Dean, who turned a giant squid into a plate of calamari, and Ron, who dealt with a giant spider — Draco shuddered — by planting a roller skate on each of its stubbly legs. The music changed, and an older song came on; this wasn’t Seamus’s music, but clearly Lupin’s, who smiled when the track clicked. Ooh, a storm is threatening… My very life today…

“Hermione, up!” shouted Lupin, and Hermione sprang up from her desk.

“Got this, Hermione!” hollered Ron. Electrified by his own success, he was in high spirits. “Go get him!”

“Yeah, get on!” shouted Harry. “Beat him up, Mione!”

Draco kicked her ankle, which was his own way of showing support.

She hurried forward. The boggart went swirled into a tall, white-haired wizard in a periwinkle robe, with horn-rimmed glasses and a kindly smile.

Draco startled. It was Professor Dumbledore. But Hermione couldn't be afraid of Dumbledore; she practically worshiped him.

"Miss Granger," he said softly, "I am afraid there has been a mistake."

Hermione gasped.

"The owl that delivered your Hogwarts letter was intended for someone else. It came to you in error."

"No. No, no. No, you can't. Please."

"In consequence, I must revoke your acceptance to Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry. You must pack your trunk and return your wand to Ollivander's, where it will be given to a true witch."

"No, no, no, please, please, you can't, don't send me away, please!"

Hermione broke into tears. She gripped her wand like the last torch on a dark planet.

"I apologize most dearly for this mistake," said Dumbledore, ever gentle. "To minimize emotional distress, your memory of the past two years will be modified—"

"NO!"

"Riddikulus!" shouted Lupin, frantic. "Hermione, riddikulus! Come on! Think of something funny!"

But it was clear this was the last thing Hermione could do. Instead, she lunged forward, slashed her wand, and snarled, "Reducto!"

The chest exploded, shattering splinters everywhere. Lupin dove behind his desk for cover. Shouts erupted from the other students, some of whom threw up weak Shield Charms.

Hermione lifted her wand for another go, her tearstained face contorted in fear and ferocity.

He was only half aware of his own actions: his head was full of heartbeat and worry. Draco shoved back his chair and shouldered in front of her.

"Riddikulus," he spat, and with a hard crack, Dumbledore appeared again, bare-chested, and mounted on the back of a unicorn. The class gasped, and then broke into a titter of nervous, irreverent laughter. He looked like he could have cantered off the cover of a harlequin novel.

Dumbledore looked down at himself in surprise. "Goodness," he sighed. He tossed his mane of luscious white curls. "Would it were so."

Then he disappeared, and the boggart broke into a dark swirl again, whirling on the hardwood.

Hermione clapped her hands over her mouth, mortified.

Lupin reemerged from his desk. "Very good, Draco," he panted. "It is — of course, when possible — always better to face a boggart in groups — helps confuse it, keeps it from making an impression…"

But now the boggart had started to take form again. It resolved into a tall, slender finger of stone, an obelisk of fresh marble, with a thin skirt of earth. At the bottom, three names appeared in succession.

HERE LIES: LUCIUS ABRAXAS MALFOY…

With the acid of dread pooling in his stomach, Draco watched the second appear under it: HIS LOVING WIFE, NARCISSA BLACK

MALFOY…

He quickly squeezed his eyes shut. But he knew the final line without having to read it, and it blazed on the back of his eyelids anyway: HIS SON, DRACO LUCIUS MALFOY.

“Once more,” encouraged Lupin. “Something funny, Draco… anything funny…”

But was funny about a gravestone? What could ever be funny about this?

“Riddikulus,” whispered Hermione. Her wand sparked feebly. “R-riddikulus.”

It trembled. Hermione made an irritated sound — and because no fear was stronger than Hermione Granger’s anger at failing to perform a spell perfectly, she brushed past Draco, advancing on the boggart like she meant to strangle it with her hands next. Stabbing her wand at it, she shouted, “Riddikulus!”

The writing vanished from the stone’s face, replaced by a new inscription.

HERE LIES DRACO LUCIUS MALFOY’S

HUMONGOUS EGO

1980-1993

From the fourth row, Ron laughed. It was a pity laugh, but it broke Draco out of his trance. Weakly, he managed: “Real classy, Granger, thanks.”

Her shoulders heaved. She gave a weak smile.

“Well done, Hermione!” Lupin stepped between them and the boggart, ushering them back to their desks. The boggart swirled into a large, round, luminous shape, hovering high in the classroom; Lupin glanced up, casually flicked his wand, and it popped like a balloon. The chorus of giggles that followed sent the boggart spinning, frantically, until it at last collapsed into smoke.

“Congratulations to all of you. You should be very proud of yourselves — grown wizards often struggle to defeat a boggart. Five points to everyone who dealt with the boggart, and an additional five for Draco, whose quick thinking may have spared us several pieces of furniture.”

Hermione blushed. Dean raised his hand and said, “Sir, but Harry hasn’t had a turn.”

“Did he not?” Lupin paused. His eyes flickered at Harry. “I’m sorry, Harry, that’s my mistake. If you would drop by before class on Thursday, I would be more than happy to give you a chance.”

Harry, who seemed disappointed but not upset, agreed.

“Right. Excellent. Homework! Kindly read the chapter on boggarts and summarize it for me… to be handed in next Monday. That will be all.”

On the way to the Great Hall, the Gryffindors fumed with exhilaration about their new professor. To have a Defense Against the Dark Arts teacher who was not only competent but enjoyable was an unprecedented windfall for everyone, and something to be celebrated indeed.

“Can you believe he listens to muggle music?”

“Did you see me with that eyeball? Did you see it, Seamus?”

“I saw it! I saw it!”

“With a rebel yell…”

“I wonder why Lupin’s fear is crystal balls,” said Lavender thoughtfully. “Maybe it means he’s afraid of the future…”

Hermione snorted. Lavender turned, and her eyebrow soared to a haughty altitude at the sight of Hermione. “Do you have something to say?” she said, politely.

“I didn’t mean to interrupt your conversation with Parvati.”

Lavender said, “Okay, but like, you did. You did do that? Actually? So. What is it?”

Hermione pressed her lips together, fighting a smirk. “Nothing, it’s just… It wasn’t a ball, Lavender.”

“How would you know?” she said stiffly. Lavender and Hermione had never lost much love between them, and Draco theorized it was because they both enjoyed picking on each other too much to relinquish that pleasure and be friends. “I suppose he told you, did he?”

“No,” said Hermione, on the verge of laughter. “I’ve just got eyes. It was round and white and in the sky! It was obviously the moon.”

“Right, because that makes so much more sense, Hermione,” snipped Lavender. “What kind of nutter is afraid of the moon?”

Hogsmeade, or: The Loyal Opposition

Chapter 19: Hogsmeade, or: The Loyal Opposition

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

It took less than a month for Gryffindor Tower to fall helplessly in love with Remus Lupin. Rarely had Defense Against the Dark Arts ever been this good: aside from the bountiful scores of brownie points he earned by playing music in the classroom, he continued to bring in live creatures for them to vanquish, which instilled everyone with the feeling of heroism and productivity that, they agreed, ought to have been part of D.A.D.A. curriculum all along. He also liked field trips, which endeared him terminally to those students who struggled to focus in classroom environments, like Seamus and Neville. By late September, when he took them out to study a dead kappa on the shore of the lake, he had acquired a gaggle of admirers who stuck close to his side, headed proudly by Lavender Brown and Romilda Vane.

Harry and Ron had developed a remarkable interest in schoolwork. Hermione barely had to remind them to do their homework for Lupin's class. Hermione, however, joined the lessons with less than her usual breathless thrill, and rarely raised her hand unless someone else had tried first.

She was still embarrassed about the boggart.

"You can't possibly still be sore over that, Granger."

The third years picked their way across the pebble beach, carrying baskets of sardines. Lupin had instructed them on the ways to bait grindylows from their hiding spots in the shallows. Every so often there would be a splash, and a student would yell, and Lupin would come hurrying over to verify if a grindylow had appeared.

It was a cold, cloudy morning in October. Dark arrows of geese passed overhead, baying forlornly. Hermione wore an enormous red scarf and a muggle knit cap that covered half her skull, making her hair poof out at the ears.

“It was horribly embarrassing,” she said tightly. “And you needn’t try to comfort me, I know I did terribly.”

“Terribly?” He wrinkled his whole face. “You successfully cast the spell. Full marks. What fresh hell of perfectionism is this?”

“The third time! After blowing up a piece of furniture!”

“Yeah, and it was awesome,” Ron said firmly, slinging his arm around her shoulder. “Are you kidding me? Seamus wants to marry you.”

“All right,” said Draco sharply.

“Truly, Hermione,” said Harry kindly. He flipped a sardine into the water, and it landed with a plunk. “Nobody cares if you didn’t get it right the first time. All that matters is you tried.”

Draco winced. Hermione, to whom there were as many kinds of failure as there were synonyms for ‘try,’ did not wince so much as dissolve what little stiff upper lip she had been weakly achieving. She flopped a piece of fish desolately into the water.

None of them brought up what her fear had been. Draco had been too horrified to possibly comment. The idea of a Hogwarts letter being revoked had never occurred to him in his wildest nightmares. It would be like someone showing up on your doorstep to announce you no longer got to use your legs.

He considered trying to reassure her, or at least comfort her with pictures of the gargantuan lawsuit they would bring down upon the castle if they tried, but it never seemed like the right time, and anyway, he didn’t want to start a conversation about their boggarts; it was too likely to lead to questions about his.

Meanwhile, in contrast, Care of Magical Creatures became exceedingly dull. Someone had complained to their parents about the hippogriff lesson, and their parents had complained to someone who complained to Dumbledore, and they now began each week's lessons with an hour of diligent study on flobberworm care. Draco still had no idea what they were supposed to be learning.

"I do think I'll drop it next year," Hermione admitted to him, in a low voice, as she ran over his Charms essay. He'd finished hers, and now lounged with one leg sprawled indolently over the arm of his armchair, reading a muggle novel he'd filched from her collection. So far it seemed to be mostly people sitting in chairs talking about murder, but it was slow going, because every few pages he had to stop and get her to explain a word. "I like Hagrid, and he'll be a good professor someday, but…"

"But you don't feel like waiting a few centuries for him to get there?" he drawled, flipping a page. "Or would you just rather do something more important, like watch paint dry?"

"But I don't feel love for the subject," she said defensively. "It's not his fault, I'm just not… the ideal student for his class."

"Of course you're not, you have more than two brain cells to breed together."

She sighed. "Perhaps Kettleburn might have been a better fit," she admitted. He sniffed, and nodded with such vehemence it jostled its head. They were alike in this way, he and Hermione, in that they both learned perfectly well from a book. Why people like Harry and Hagrid seemed to believe that you could only learn to deal with danger by swan-diving right into the bloody thick of it, naked, wandless, and screaming, was a question for people with more time than Draco, and definitely less sense.

Rain started against the windowpanes, soft and inquisitive. The fire crackled cheerfully, and as the clock struck four, a tea set shimmered into place on the coffee table, accompanied with a plate of scones and roast beef sandwiches. Yawning, Draco swept his wand lazily at the tray and said, “Locomotor sandwich. ”

It drifted off the tray and settled into his hand. He bit off a corner, idly, while turning the next page. Hermione watched, one eyebrow cocked in amusement.

“What?”

“You use magic for the silliest things,” she said. “You could just get up and grab it.”

“Why?” he said, mystified. “I’m a wizard.”

“A legless wizard?”

“I’m sorry, are you new? This is a wand. It does magic when I point it at things. I bought it, fair and square, and use it in my own right. It is therefore my fundamental prerogative that I should never have to get up for a sandwich, if I don’t want to.”

“You’d die in the muggle world,” she laughed. He twisted his neck around so severely that something popped.

“I would not!”

“You’d take one look at a washing machine and faint away. I’d like to see you try to catch the Tube at rush hour.” Her eyes twinkled.

“What’s that, some kind of a disease?” he said warily.

A soft mrow introduced a third voice to their argument, and Hermione cooed, descending into the depths of soppy pet-motherhood without a second thought. She opened her arms as Crookshanks slunk up and crawled into her lap. “Hullo, precious,” she murmured. “Where have you been?”

“Does he often answer you, when you ask those questions?” He eyed Crookshanks with distaste, which only intensified when the cat began sniffing his sandwich. “Or do you share some kind of familiar telepathic communique?”

“Ooh, Draco’s quite testy today. Isn’t he, Crooks? Is it because his Charms essay’s rather sloppy? Is it? I think so, too.”

Crookshanks made an ambitious leap for Draco’s sandwich, narrowly missing, but very nearly clawing him in the ear. Draco made an irritated noise and, deciding that it wasn’t worth a game of keep-away, dropped it on the carpet. The cat pounced on the fallen morsel with a triumphant mew.

It was a mark of Hermione’s mind-addling devotion that she did not even object to the obvious mess. “He’s precious,” she sighed.

“I weep,” he said, “for your children. He that spareth the rod, Granger.”

She rolled her eyes. “Yes,” she said, “and how often did your mother chasteneth you, exactly?”

“I resent that implication.”

“HERMIONE!” Footsteps thundered down the stairs. Ron burst out of the stairwell, his face dangerously close to the color of his hair.

“Ron,” said Hermione in alarm, putting down her quill. “Is everything alright?”

“I can’t find Scabbers!” he shouted.

She blinked. “Oh,” she said. She looked at Draco, who shrugged, and went back to reading his book. “Would you like me to help look for him?” she asked politely. “I can try a Summoning Charm—”

Ron leveled a prosecutorial finger at Crookshanks. Draco half expected his next words to be J’accuse. “He’s been sneaking around the Tower all day!”

“Oh.” Hermione huffed a laugh under her breath, which won her no points for tact, but several for cheek, in Draco’s book. “You’re being silly. Crookshanks wouldn’t eat Scabbers, he would never do that. He’s never even caught a mouse before.”

“I don’t care!” Ron was flying through shades of red at a breakneck pace. He would soon hit the purples, and beyond that, they were in uncharted territory. “Scabbers never went missing before! For two years, he’s lived in that dorm and never left his cage, and then that thing comes along—”

“For goodness’ sake!” Hermione laughed shrilly, with a tinge of venom. “Listen to yourself! Scabbers lives in a cage. Does Crookshanks sprout opposable thumbs when my back is turned?”

Draco snickered. Ron registered the noise through his anger, and merged Draco into his target without a second thought.

“Yeah, bet it’s real funny for you, Malfoy!” he shouted, swiveling his finger between the three so-called guilty parties. “If that cat had gone after your owl, you could just swan off and buy a new one! Hell, you could buy the whole Emporium! Isn’t that what you told Harry?”

Draco slipped his leg off the armchair, rankled. “Peace, Weasley,” he said curtly. “I’ve done you no wrong, here. If you want a new rat, what’s more, you can just ask—”

“I don’t WANT a new rat! I want SCABBERS!”

This was more affection than Ron had ever shown for Scabbers before, and it bewildered Draco, who thought — based on comments that Ron himself had made — that Ron merely tolerated the animal because his family had foisted the responsibility for its keeping onto his shoulders. But he saw that both he and Hermione had badly misjudged the depths of water over which they tread, and he fell silent, surrendering. Hermione did not do the same.

“Fine,” she said shortly. She snapped her books shut and dumped them on the table. “Let’s check, shall we? Let’s go have a good, long look for Scabbers, and I’ll bet you anything that we’ll find him holed up in your laundry or something. He could nest there for weeks, and you wouldn’t notice.”

“Go on, then!” Ron folded his arms with a satisfied air. He had before never so closely resembled his mother. “Have a look!”

Hermione flashed Draco an apologetic look, and handed back his Charms essay. She and Ron stomped upstairs with the same deliberately heavy steps; it was almost amusing. But when they came down an hour later, Hermione wore a slightly abashed expression, and Ron was stone-faced, silent, and sullen in his triumph. They had not found him.

“I’m sure he just holed up somewhere in the walls,” she blustered. “I can’t Summon him from another room, not without smashing him through a wall, and it wouldn’t be safe to try. But that doesn’t mean he’s gone, honestly — this happens, Ron, pets do run away—”

“After thirteen years, do they?” demanded Ron. “And why would that be? Not like there’s anything for him to be scared of around here, according to you!”

Draco squinted. “Thirteen years?” he repeated, though nobody was paying attention to him. “Where did you find this Methuselah of rats?”

While Hermione and Ron continued their highly productive and imminently reasonable discussion of the facts, the portrait-door swung open, and the quidditch team stomped in from practice. Rain darkened their red robes to crimson, and they all wore varying degrees of mud in their hair. Draco sighed in profound relief at the diversion.

“Oh, cracking, we’ve got sammiches,” crowed Angelina Johnson, descending on the platter. She stuffed two in her mouth and washed them down with a glug of tea. “M’starfink,” she explained to Katie, who pulled a face at her. Fred and George dramatically hauled their bodies through the portrait-hole as if returning from war, and flung themselves spread-eagle on the rug.

“When I die,” warbled Fred.

“Which will be soon, if Oliver gets his way,” groaned George.

“—tell the scientists they can have every organ in my body except my ass,” said Fred, “so that Oliver Wood can have the pleasure of beating it, one last time.”

Harry brought up the rear of the squad with Oliver. He still had to hop up over the portrait-door: though he’d grown since first year, he still lingered on the smaller side for his age, with a birdlike frame and inelegant, gangling limbs laced with ropey muscle.

“... think we ought to go over that last play again,” he was saying earnestly to Oliver, “because they could get it, really, with a few more goes. I know Angelina’s got the speed for it, and Katie could pitch the quaffle all the way to Ravenclaw Tower if she needed to, so it’s all down to timing…”

Draco closed his book and decided to read upstairs. He wasn’t jealous. He just didn’t much fancy watching the quidditch team loll around the commons, making such a ruckus that nobody else could hear themselves think, and generally fulfilling their reputation as the most annoying delegation of the most annoying House.

“Well done, squad,” barked Oliver. He carded his fingers through his hair, parting the wet strands. A table of girls in the corner gave a collective sigh. “Good performance. Eat a full dinner, and hit the bed early. We’re doing a double practice tomorrow. Malfoy, are you busy?”

Draco sniffed. “I might be. What’s it to you, Wood?”

“Need a word,” said the captain briskly. Draco sighed. He twitched his head in a way signifying assent, and they stepped into an alcove by the stairs.

“Right,” said Oliver briskly. “You wanted on the team last year, didn’t you?”

“Correct,” drawled Draco, polishing his fingernails.

“For both slots? Seeker and chaser?”

Draco’s lip curled. “If you want me to attend practices as the bloody Reserve Seeker, I’ll tell you something else—”

“No, no, that’s not it.” Oliver shook his head. “Although you should come to practice, really, you’ve left us in a terrible position if Harry ever — anyway. I know you ranked seeker first, but how’d you feel about playing chaser?”

His jaw dropped. He went scrambling for words like someone raking through drawers in search of a quill. “What? Yes,” he said immediately. “I mean, sure. Completely. I’m an excellent chaser. I fly like an eagle and throw like a cannon. Yes.” He took a breath, and said: “What happened to Alicia?”

“Nothing, but she’s on exchange at Beauxbatons,” said Oliver, in the somber tones of someone disclosing the death of a close personal friend. “Our Reserve Chaser graduated last year, and it’s policy to offer open slots to the reserves before we hold tryouts. Of course, this would mean that you’d have to come to practice — all of them. And you’d be Third Chaser, so you wouldn’t get to do any of that flashy pyrotechnic stuff you like, you understand? I run plays simple, and I run them clean. I don’t want to see my chasers acting like they’re trying out for the Globetrotters.”

“What’s a Globetrotter?” said Draco ecstatically. “Never mind, I don’t care. Yes, I can play Third Chaser. Obviously. No flash. Sure. I understand.”

“Good man.” Oliver slapped him on the shoulder, probably leaving a bruise. “Practice is four times a week, six to eight in the morning. That means you’re in the air at six, not out of bed at six, remember. I’ll have Harry loan you some robes until we get the next shipment, and if you need a broom—er—”

“I don’t.”

“Well, that’s one less thing to worry about. Oh, but no practice next Saturday, since that’s Hogsmeade,” he added dourly, expression darkening. “They don’t let us book the pitch on Hogsmeade trips. Says it’s bad for ‘student life.’”

“Fascists,” said Draco absently.

“Exactly!” Oliver slapped him on the other shoulder, which meant they would match, at least. “Tell you what, a team like ours could do with a little institutional support. Garrett Goyle is out there buying a platoon of Nimbus Two Thousands for the Slytherins, and I had to pitch a row with McGonagall for permission to practice on holidays… least Flint acts like they want to win, even if they don’t play like it…”

He wandered off, muttering mutinously about faculty rules. Draco remained where he was, shell-shocked.

Harry came over, eating a roast beef sandwich. “Ma’foy,” he said cheerfully, with a mouth full of meat and bread. “Talk to Woob?”

“Hmm?”

He swallowed. “Talk to Wood?” said the dark-haired heathen, grinning. “Did he pop the question?”

In his absentmindedness, he didn’t even think to chide Harry for talking with his mouth full, though it was a disgusting habit and he deserved friends who would tell him so. Draco worked his palm reflectively along his jaw.

“Potter,” he said thoughtfully, “how much could it cost to stock the Gryffindor team with Firebolts?”

It was one of those bright, silver-skied October mornings when everything was brown and golden. A trail of students in cloaks, hats, and scarves wound down the long wooded trail to Hogsmeade, and emerged onto a cheerful cobblestone street walled with Tudor-style buildings and market stalls full of pumpkins and squashes and apples bright as jewels, ruby and emerald. Most of Gryffindor had come, including all of the third years, for whom it was the first trip and therefore especially exciting. Dean and Seamus had brought a twelve-inch list and a shopping cart, which rattled industriously over dirt and cobble on their way through the village gate. Lavender, Parvati, and Romilda, who had formed a proper Pack in the time-honored tradition of teenage girls, dressed up in muggle clothes: tank tops, small pastel cardigans, and checked skirts that would never have passed muster with McGonagall. They seemed to be having fun. Notably absent from the merry crowd was Harry, who despite applications of hook and crook alike had failed to secure a permission form from his ghastly muggles.

McGonagall, the old gargoyle, had been intransigent in this. Draco and Ron had lobbied on their friend’s behalf with several well-argued pleas, but she received them all with equivalent indifference. “Parent or guardian,” she told Harry firmly. “Of whom I am neither. I am sorry, Potter.”

(“‘Sorry’ doesn’t polish my wand,” Draco muttered, on their way out of the office. “As my father would say. Potter, listen, give me two hours and a book on Forging Spells, this can all go away.”

“No use,” said Harry miserably. “She’ll know it isn’t real.”)

Ron had suggested the Invisibility Cloak, but Hermione shot that down with aim no less hateful for being faultless.

“Ron, no,” she said seriously. “Dementors can see through Invisibility Cloaks, and anyway, Harry, you ought to be careful of Sirius B—”

“Don’t say it,” groaned Harry, rubbing his forehead. “If one more person tells me to be careful of Sirius Bloody Black, I’m going to scream.”

Hermione sawed off a triangle of roast chicken, delicately but ruthlessly. “Careful of certain wanted persons, then,” she said primly, and popped the triangle in her mouth, ignoring how Ron was glaring at her.

Relations between the Weasley and Granger delegations of their friend group had not improved since Scabbers’ disappearance. With heroic effort, and herculean levels of diplomacy from Draco in particular, they had worked themselves up from ‘arctic’ to ‘amicable,’ but there was a hard ceiling imposed by the limited patience of everyone involved. The problem was (in Draco’s scholarly opinion) as follows: that Hermione, though brilliant and wry and witty and sweet, could not for love nor money admit to the mortifying state of being in error; and that Ronald, though funny and loyal and kindly and clever, could not for love nor money ever bear to forgive someone who had not first apologized to him.

Harry took it harder than Draco did. It was probably the Slytherin in him, but Draco had never found it difficult to pick favorites. Ron, as the sixth of seven children, seemed to intuitively understand this, and spared most of his wrath for the Cause, treating Draco instead with the gruff dignity of twin soldiers on opposite sides of a war.

So Ron, though he accompanied Draco and Hermione down to Hogsmeade, spent most of the walk in silence, kicking a stone in front of him, clearly wishing that Harry was there. Ron and Harry could keep each other entertained in a locked room until the heat-death of the universe, but Draco and Hermione, who liked to talk about things like novels and magical history and next week’s homework, could together hold his attention for an average of ten minutes before he wished to change the subject.

“Percy made a list of things worth doing,” said Hermione, searching her pockets, “and it’s extensive. The sweetshop, of course, I wouldn’t dream of missing it, but also the post office, and he mentioned somewhere called the Shrieking Shack…?”

“You asked Percy for recommendations?” said Ron tiredly.

“He is Head Boy. It's part of his job to answer questions.”

It was a testament to how war had abraded him that Ron had nothing sarcastic to say. He merely sighed and said, “We’ve got to remember to bring candy back for Harry. Lots. You hear me, Moneybags?”

“I am going to pretend that question was not addressed to me,” said Draco, “for tact. I would like it observed, for the record, that I am choosing to be tactful.”

“It is so observed,” said Hermione.

“Thank you.”

Ron rolled his eyes.

Honeydukes looked like someone had set paper in front of a very hungry child and asked them to draw their ideal sweet shop. Barrels of candy ran from floor to ceiling on every wall, while boxes of sweets stacked high and overflowed, erupting a pyroclastic flow of candy in all the colors of a rainbow, crossbred with a tornado. Giant creatures made of jelly sat on shelves behind the checkout counter, flanked by chocolate bunnies the size of first years, and at the far back of the room, a giant brick oven blazed the October chill clear out of the room. It smelled of baked cookies and pure, raw sugar, in the almost unpleasant way that good sweetshops do. Draco pocketed a handful of chocolate sea-salt caramels with enchanted molten centers, and picked out a few bits of saltwater taffy. Ron went around with a bag, sweeping great armfuls of everything he could reach, but especially the things Harry liked.

Hermione found a shelf of heart-shaped strawberry lollies the size of her head, and after watching her admire them covetously across the room for altogether too long, Draco rolled his eyes and said, “Oh, get one, why don’t you, your teeth are done for as it is.”

He never claimed to be a good influence on his friends’ lives, Draco thought, as they left Honeydukes. (Hermione was smiling broadly in between each lick of her platter-sized sucker, and Ron’s happy-go-lucky attitude had reappeared when Draco dropped his coin purse in front of the cashier and said, boredly, “Give him everything he wants and whatever the rest of this will buy, I can’t be bothered with change.”) But he did occasionally make them more enjoyable.

After that, Ron wanted to go to Zonko’s (“Fred and George swear by it, they say the owner buys them drinks!”) but Hermione wanted to see Scrivenshaft’s, so they arranged a rendezvous at the Three Broomsticks and parted amicably. Hermione ended up buying a new eagle-feather quill, and Draco good-naturedly allowed the clerk to upsell him a probably fraudulent bottle of spell-checking ink. They left as the sun was painting long shadows under the eaves, and autumn leaves rustled around their ankles in dancing anklets of scarlet and gold. Gryffindor colors, Draco thought fondly, before reeling aghast at his own sentimentality and stabbing the emotion stone dead.

On the way to the Three Broomsticks, they passed a side-street that tapered off into a narrow hike through the woods. “Fancy a trip to the Shrieking Shack?” he suggested, nodding to it.

“Hm.” She eyed the severe uphill climb, and he suppressed a grin: Hermione dodged all tasks requiring athleticism with a dexterity her physical body lacked. “What is it, exactly? Percy didn’t say.”

“Most haunted place in Britain,” he said offhandedly. “Creepy as they come. Dead people by the armful. Simply redolent of ghost.”

“More so than Hogwarts?”

“Hogwarts isn’t that haunted, it’s only got twenty or thirty ghosts.”

“Only thirty!”

“Yes, and that’s piddling, for a castle old as Hogwarts. Even the Manor would have more than that, if we didn’t have pest control in.”

“Hmm,” said Hermione thoughtfully. “How do you take care of a ghost? Is it an exorcism, a casting-out procedure? Or is the spirit truly destroyed in the process?”

“See, that’s an interesting question,” he mused. “Naturally the magical energy would have to go some where, that’s Merlin’s First Law—”

“Newton’s, but carry on.”

“Call him what you like. Ghosts are palimpsests, they retain an image of a magical body, but without the body itself as a source of power... that’s why they draw their energy from a magical location, they can’t generate it on their own…”

“Theoretically you could create a stasis chamber for a ghost anywhere, couldn’t you? Say, a portable one?”

“Certainly, but the trick would be finding the power — it takes volumes of energy to sustain a Being, even a palimpsest of one, which is why ghosts tether to historical locations, where the magic is old and deep and self-replenishing.”

“Logistically, sure, but I’m right on the theory? You could tether a spirit to a material object, then.”

“Possibly,” said Draco, doubtful. “I’m not a necromancer. You’d have to ask my grandfather. But tethering is separate from possession, let’s be clear. Possession is when the spirit occupies a physical form. The spirit gets its energy from somewhere else.”

“That’s so interesting! I wonder when we’ll start learning about it in class?”

He snorted. “Never.”

“Never?” She was crestfallen. “Why?”

“Because it’s Dark Arts,” he said, enjoying how her jaw slackened. “Hogwarts doesn’t teach necromancy. Or spirit magics of any kind. Only Durmstrang does.”

“But that’s… I mean, that’s just excluding a whole category of…” She frowned, folding her arms. “Well, obviously they shouldn’t teach Dark magic, but a theoretical course of study, purely for academic purposes… if people are going to do it anyway, they might as well teach it responsibly…”

“Lucius would have agreed,” he said, and her scandalized look was its own reward.

They passed a vendor stall of steaming hot caramel apples. The vendor, a wizened dwarf with lime green hair, had fallen asleep on his stool, and Draco plucked one of the apples for himself. Whistling, he strolled away, ignoring Hermione’s clucks of her tongue.

But as they turned the corner, it flew out of his hand, and danced away down the street, bobbing mischievously. Draco exclaimed in disgruntlement.

Then the air rippled, and Harry’s grinning head emerged, bodiless.

Hermione gasped. “Harry, you didn’t!”

“Did,” he said apologetically, and took a big, gloating bite of the apple. “Sorry.”

“Oi!” said Draco indignantly. “That’s mine!”

“No, it’s not,” said Harry cheekily. He shrugged out of the Cloak and draped it over one arm. “You stole it, and then I stole it, fair and square.” He offered the bitten apple back to him. “Want it now?”

“This isn’t safe,” fretted Hermione. She glanced over her shoulder, as if Sirius Black might come hurtling out of the sky. “And how did you get past the dementors?”

“Secret passage into Honeydukes. Fred and George helped me out.”

“Of course they did,” she fumed. “On their head be it, if you get hurt. That’s all I’ll say.”

“Bet it isn’t,” muttered Harry, and then shot her an apologetic smile. “Sorry. If I get murdered, you can have the first ‘I told you so.’”

“What a comfort!”

Inside the Three Broomsticks, it was dim and cozy and smelled like bread and ale. They found a booth in the corner, and bundled themselves into the cozy nook, while a shower of golden leaves and sunlight trickled past the window pane. Draco sipped from a tankard of butterbeer, which tasted like warm spiced butterscotch, with a thick crust of creamy foam on top. Ron bought a basket of something fried and curly, dubiously titled “pork scratchings,” which Draco refused abjectly to eat after discovering a piece of hair on one of them.

Then Harry showed them just what Fred and George had given him. It was a piece of paper which, when tapped, revealed a working, complete map of Hogwarts Castle. Hermione gasped and snatched it up immediately, trying to study it. Ron gave a crow of delight and ruffled Harry’s hair.

Draco could do no more than put his head in his arms and moan in anger at the infuriating good luck of Harry James Potter, God’s Favorite Child.

“Bloody hell,” said Ron. “So you could see anyone hooking up? Or out of bed?”

“Ron!”

“I’m just saying! You could!”

“It’s an outrageous invasion of privacy. And here’s another thing, Harry. I don’t trust the intentions of anyone who would try to track the whole student population like that.” She drilled the map with her finger. “I mean, what did they use it for? These… Marauders?”

“Probably just sneaking out,” said Harry reasonably. “You’d want to know where Filch was, and the teachers, and the prefects on patrol…”

“Easier to do the enchantment on the whole castle,” Draco mumbled into his arms. “And less invasive to track everybody than to track only a handful. Nobody’s singled out.”

“Yeah. Hey, you alright, mate?”

“No,” he said. “I hate you desperately. I want you to die.”

“Take a number,” said Harry cheerfully. “Refill?”

“Yes, thank you.”

Hermione sipped her butterbeer, leaving a mustache of froth on her lip. Draco tugged out his handkerchief and dangled it, smirking, on one crooked finger. She pinked and snatched it, scrubbing at her mouth. “Well,” she said, “I will say this. I’ll be a lot less worried about Sirius Black, now we have a way to monitor the castle perimeter.”

“Comrade Granger,” muttered Draco, and snickered when she hit him.

“Moony, Wormtail, Padfoot, and Prongs,” read Ron doubtfully. “Odd names. Must be nicknames, right?”

Draco grunted. “Or purebloods, more likely,” he said. “Dodgy names come with the territory. I’ve probably got a cousin named ‘Wormtail’ somewhere.”

“Oh, here’s an idea,” said Hermione brightly. “Let’s check for Scabbers!”

Draco tensed. Though he kept the party line (being that Crookshanks was a maligned innocent under persecution from prejudiced authorities), he secretly found it probable that the facts of the matter laid on Ron’s side, and that poor Scabbers, after several weeks missing, had exited this mortal vale of tears. That is: he doubted, very much, that Hermione would find him.

“Does it show pets?” asked Harry hesitantly. “I suppose it does, for Mrs. Norris… oh, and there’s Crookshanks, in the girls’ dorm…”

But none of them saw Scabbers on the map.

“Wow,” said Ron frostily. “Look at that! He’s not there.”

“Let’s — look somewhere else, then,” said Hermione, paging through the flaps. “He’s certainly here.”

“Nah, it’s fine,” said Ron bitterly. “It doesn’t show any of the other ghosts, so.”

“Oh, please! Stop being so dramatic.”

“Dramatic, am I? How about I drop that beast from the Tower window, and then we’ll see how ‘dramatic’ you are?”

Hermione recoiled, turning pale, and abruptly wriggled out of the booth. “I’m using the loo,” she said shortly. “And if you can’t be civil, Ron, I — well, I don’t suppose I’ll bother coming back.”

Draco sighed. “Granger, don’t be—”

“Don’t be what?” she snapped. Then, seeing his expression, she softened. “Never mind,” she said. “I’ll just… go powder my nose.”

She disappeared into the sea of cloaks, leaving Draco with Ron.

Ron stared out the window sullenly, cold October light paving his face and leaching the color from his ruddy hair. Draco spun his signet ring around his finger, absently, while he debated whether or not to say something.

“Weasley,” he said, after a moment.

“What?”

He caught his signet ring and covered it with his palm. “Have you heard the one about the wizard in the bottomless pit?”

Ron looked up. Draco shrugged.

Sitting back, he cast his eyes over the Three Broomsticks, giving Ron space to compose himself. He noticed a dark-haired wizard and a blonde witch perched side by side at the bar, both of them stock straight, as if someone had surgically welded some iron to their spines at birth. As he watched, the wizard disembarked from his stool, and it was Theo, dressed out of uniform in a charcoal overcoat and sage green scarf.

He murmured something into Daphne’s ear, and ducked out of the bar, sounding his exit with a jingle of the bell. Draco turned and watched through the window as he crossed the street and ducked into the shelter of an alley, where he disappeared.

Draco frowned.

“Did Potter leave his Invisibility Cloak?”

“Think so,” said Ron. “S’here. Why?”

“Let me borrow it for a moment.”

Draco threw it about his shoulders and flipped up the hood. Moving carefully, he slipped out of the Three Broomsticks and crossed the street — ignoring the occasional cry of surprise when he bumped into someone who hadn't seen him coming. He steered clear of puddles, and gripped the Cloak tighter when the cool wind threatened to rip it from his head.

In the alleyway, Theo had joined a pair of wizards in hooded cloaks. Draco didn't recognize them, but they all had their cowls up, so all he could make out was the foremost tip of their profile. They huddled together in the alcove under the eave, shielding from the windchill of dusk.

"...word of Black's whereabouts, as if it isn't obvious…"

"Obvious, is it, Jugson? Please do enlighten the rest of us."

"Going back to his family, isn't he? His traitorous bitch of a cousin's got her own mansion, and the Ministry won't touch it with a— ow!"

The other wizard had backhanded him.

"Speak of Narcissa that way again, and I will make her a gift of your thankless tongue," he said coldly. "She is a great lady. She is not to blame for the sins of her husband."

"What sins?" said Theo boredly. It was the first time he'd spoken; he leaned against the wall, arms folded, staring at the ground. "Crying Imperius? Isn't that what you did?"

The other two balked at his audacity; Draco was nearly impressed. The first wizard, Jugson, snarled, "I was in Azkaban while you mewled in nappies, boy—"

"And I weep for you, I truly do," said Theo, examining his fingernails. "We all missed you at the christening."

The second wizard cuffed Theo on the ear. He yelped and staggered away, clutching his head.

“Ow!”

“Mind yourself, Theodore.”

Jugson, pleased by Theo’s misfortune, returned to his original point. “If not his cousin, then the house,” he insisted. “Grimmauld Place, or Witherfell, even.”

“Witherfell has sat empty since the death of Regulus. It is cursed beyond habitation. If he returns there, he shall surely die, and he knows it.”

“But it is his by rights,” Jugson insisted. “Cursed or not, its walls and stones are his to break and bend.”

“Bellatrix’s,” said the second wizard sharply. “Not his. Never his. Walburga ensured it.”

“Bellatrix Lestrange, who’s in Azkaban?” Theo said, sounding amused. “Master of a house she’ll never see again?”

“The Laws of Blood are old and strange, Theodore,” said the second man coldly, ignoring this. “It is hers until death… unless, of course, Regulus named another heir.”

Jugson threw his hands skyward. “Not this, Sibby.”

“Regulus Black did not write a bloody secret will, and if he did, he wouldn’t name you, a man he never even met—”

“I never claimed to be the Secret Heir,” said the second wizard indignantly. “But for a man in his position, without issue, at frequent risk of life and limb, it would have been exceptionally strange—”

“He had two lawful cousins! Both married! One pregnant!”

“In the female line,” sniffed the wizard.

“You old chauvinist,” said Jugson amusedly. “If I had a galleon for every conspiracy theory I’ve heard about Regulus Bloody Black....”

“Are there many?” inquired Theo.

“Course there are,” snorted Jugson. “He disappeared, didn’t he? Walked out one day and never came back. No body, no will, evidence. Broke his mum’s sweet old heart.”

A slot opened in the wall behind them, and a pair of beady eyes peered out.

“Password?”

“Morsmordre,” intoned the second wizard. The slot closed, and part of the brick wall swung open, revealing a secret door.

The two wizards and Theo filed inside, and the door swung hurriedly closed behind them.

Draco let out a long breath he’d been holding.

A gaggle of Hufflepuffs passed by, chattering boisterously. The sun inched closer to the rooftops, carving half the street into a canyon of shadow, and storefronts blazed with the last rays of afternoon. The taste of butterbeer had gone sour in his mouth, and he laved his tongue over his teeth, wishing he could brush them.

He wished more that he could speak to his mother. He wondered if Snape would take a letter that evening, if he begged him.

Why didn’t you tell me Regulus was a Death Eater? Why didn’t you say he disappeared?

A trio of familiar heads bobbed out of the Three Broomsticks, one red, one black, one bushy.

“...don’t know where he went,” said Ron, fastening his cloak. “Took the Cloak and scrammed. Maybe he forgot something up at the castle.”

“Wouldn’t explain why he needed the Cloak,” said Hermione, worrying her lip. She peered up and down the street. “Did he seem worried? Was he all right?”

The concern in her tone would have warmed the cockles of his heart, if he cared about such things, which obviously he didn’t.

“He seemed fine. Bit mysterious, but that’s Malfoy, for you. Sooner gnaw his own arm off than answer a personal question, I swear.”

Draco waited for one of his loyal and generous friends to defend him against these scurrilous allegations, but each soundly disappointed him. Backstabbers, the lot of them. Deserving of punishment.

“Try the map?” Hermione suggested tentatively. “See if he’s gone up to the castle? Or at least check if he’s on the grounds— oh!”

Her hat leapt from her head. She squealed, spinning around, and made a grab for it, but he danced it out of her range, laughing.

“I — oh, Draco Malfoy, I can’t believe I was worried about you!” He let her snatch it back. Hermione scowled. The wind and the surprise had turned her cheeks the color of honeycrisps, and her hat-hair had reached heretofore uncharted measures of volume. It was sort of like getting glowered at by a winsome hedgehog. “Is that the big idea? A dumb prank?”

“Good one, mate,” Harry laughed, holding out his hand for the Cloak. “Got to give it to you, I didn’t expect it.”

Ron was snickering, too. Draco thought about telling them what he'd seen, but he didn't even know himself what to make of it. He needed to put his thoughts in order. And Harry had said outright that he wasn't interested in any more gossip about Sirius Black.

They waded back up to the castle through a striped corridor of sunlight, shadow, and fallen leaves. Ron and Harry jabbered merrily about their haul of sweets and the various ways the Marauder's Map would make their life easier — "No more Percy!" Ron said happily, "no more Filch!" — and Hermione, embroiled in the fight of her life between curiosity and disapproval, was struggling not to join in.

As they cut through the last stretch of trail, Draco noticed a dark shape flitting through the trees. It was a stray dog, sprinting through the underbrush, tongue lolling joyfully from its mouth. At first, he thought it was Fang, but it was the wrong breed — it was a black German Shepherd, its tattered ears shaped like mountain peaks, its body thin and skeletal from underfeeding. But it ran with a breathless, breakneck speed, as if it were a mere puppy, and it let out little yips of excitement and joy as it careened through the sun-streaked forest.

"Did you see that?" he said, but the others did not; and when he blinked, it vanished into the coppery underbrush, leaving him to question whether it had been his imagination after all.

Chapter 20: Wronski Faints

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

With a few days until the first quidditch match of the year, the Scotland climate remembered that it was, in fact, Scottish, and erupted with an ocean’s worth of storms.

But Oliver Wood, who was also, in fact, Scottish, refused to take this slap from his ancestral grounds, and with the ancient furore of the clans, he shepherded his vassals onto the pitch through swells of thunder and rain alike, emptying bellyfuls of Shakespearean curses at the heavens, often shouting himself voiceless in the course of a single lesson.

Draco Malfoy, who was English, would have just as soon stayed inside.

“They’re going to cancel it, aren’t they?” he begged Harry (of origin indeterminate, but tolerance respectable). “They must. They can’t expect us to play in this.”

“You’d better hope they do,” said Harry darkly, peeling the gray leech of his sock from his foot. He twisted it, and emptied almost a gallon of water onto the floor. “Can you imagine what Wood will do if they don’t?”

Chilled to the bone, Draco shook his head. Oliver had become nearly unbearable as the match approached. He was temperamental and irritable, prone to snapping at all of them, especially Fred and George, who admittedly took joy in provoking him. At the last practice before the match, they had pretended to miss every bludger that came their way, which drove Oliver into such fits of apoplexy and fear that afterwards they had to talk him down from a panic attack in the shower.

“We’re sorry about that one,” George admitted to Draco, as they shrugged on their school robes. “Didn’t think he’d take it that seriously, to be honest. It’s kind of a tradition — we always fake him out before the first game of the year, pretend to lose our edge. He must’ve forgotten.”

“Not like he didn’t get us back, either,” Fred said glumly, casting a Waterproofing Charm on his cloak. “Last year, he made us fly practices in cheerleader uniforms for a month… I miss the old Oliver.”

“Joke’s on him, we looked fantastic,” said George. “I have shapely thighs.”

“Course you do, Georgie. Best in the family.”

A gust of wind shuddered violently through the bleachers above them, which groaned under the strain. Water gushed from the eaves.

“The visibility is zero,” Draco protested. “It’s asking for a crash. Hell, I’m worried for me, let alone Potter, and he’s out there in glasses.”

“Thanks,” said Harry, with what Draco thought was rather a lot of sass, for someone who had flown into the goalhoops earlier that day.

George shrugged. “It’ll probably clear up,” he suggested. “Chin-up, kiddies. Maybe Flint will fly into a tornado, and we’ll kill two birds with one stone.”

But it did not clear up, because Draco did not have the kind of life where such things were allowed to happen to him ever. Instead, the day of the match dawned every bit as wet, cold, and angry as the one before. He listlessly consumed four mouthfuls of porridge and a cup of tea, and then one slice of the bacon trencher Hermione kept nervously pushing at him, and sort of held a bit of toast in his mouth for a while until it felt easy to swallow. Harry fiddled with the athletic strap on his glasses, which had developed a worrying habit of coming undone during practices.

“I can’t believe they’re going to let you fly in this,” Hermione muttered darkly, poking at her (also untouched) plate of eggs. “Quidditch is incredibly dangerous to begin with, but this is beyond the pale. One of you is going to run into somebody, or fly into the stands, or fall off, or—”

“Thanks, Hermione,” Harry said. He swallowed forcefully.

Sensing her defeat with Harry, she turned to Draco. “Harry’s done this before,” she whispered. “You haven’t. Are you sure you want to —”

“Granger, stop.”

“Nobody would blame you! Oliver can’t possibly expect you to play in this!”

“He can,” said Draco, “and he should. I’m his chaser. He’s depending on me.” He sat up straighter, talking as much to himself as to Hermione. “Anyway, faint heart never won fair match. In 1987, Ireland and Estonia played the finals of the World Cup right through a sandstorm. They didn’t find the snitch for three days.”

“I don’t think that’s how the saying goes,” said Hermione worriedly. She pushed another trencher of bacon at him. “Eat more, then, if you must. Your body temperature drops faster when you haven’t enough calories. I read about it in — never mind where I read it, but you should eat.”

He looked at her in interest. “You read a book about sports?”

“In a misguided attempt to reassure myself you weren’t both going to get yourselves killed,” she huffed, “which was unsuccessful, incidentally, and by the way, if you ever want to get really scared out of your skin, just ask me to show you some statistics about quidditch injuries. You'll never look at flying the same way."

"No, yeah," said Ron, through a mouthful of egg, "I'm sure you're right and all, but could you do us a favor, Mione — wait until after the match to scare our players into retirement?"

He had dared to hope that the weather would scare some people away from the match, but the lure of an old-fashioned faceoff between Gryffindor and Slytherin triumphed over the weather, proving once and for all the indomitable nature of human pettiness. A caravan of umbrellas ran down the lawns to the pitch, heads bowed against the concussive rain, losing umbrellas and scarves left and right to the thieving fingers of the storm. As they hurried into the locker room, Draco saw Lee Jordan escorting a gaggle of first years up the stairs under the shield of a Water-Repelling Charm. McGonagall had banned him from wearing his 'GRYFFINDOR RULES' windbreaker while commentating, so he had stitched the letters '& ETC' underneath it.

Oliver had no words of encouragement for them in the locker room. He sat with his elbows on his knees, head drooping from his shoulders like a fig. It was not impossible that he had entered a prayer state.

"Team," said Fred gruffly, doing a very bad 'Oliver Wood.' He threw his knee up on the bench and leaned on it. "Listen. You're terrible players. Each of you. Couldn't hope for worse. Katie? You got noodle arms. Harry? Couldn't find a snitch if it snuck up your bum. Angelina? Maybe try modeling, because flying ain't for you."

"Stop it," complained Oliver miserably, amidst giggles from the team. "S'not true. You're wonderful players. Fantastic… best I've ever had…"

"O captain, my captain!" George fell to his knees, hands aloft in supplication. "Is that you? My God! It's like I can still hear his voice…” Meanwhile, Fred clasped his hands and began humming the tune to ‘Amazing Grace.’

The wind blasted them as they walked onto the field. Harry, the smallest of them, nearly floated off his feet, and George hastily hauled him back to earth. “Easy, tiger,” he shouted. “You get on the broomstick first, remember?”

The Slytherins approached from the other side of the field, their emerald robes blending into the grass. Flint and Oliver briefly tried to shatter each other’s knuckles; neither succeeded, and they took up starting positions. Draco caught the eye of a rain-soaked Theo, who seemed at least half as miserable as he was, but who offered a grim smile and called: “About time, Malfoy.”

Draco smirked and jerked his chin at him. Beside him loomed the lockjawed giant of Gregory Goyle, who had apparently spent the summer growing into a handsome young mountain troll. A sweatband hauled his square fringe out of his eyes, and his uniform yawned at the seams.

“Greg,” shouted Draco. “Good to see you. Your mum would be proud.”

He wasn’t being sarcastic; it really was nice, especially since no one who knew a young Goyle would have expected him to participate in a team sport— at least any that didn’t involve crunching bugs with rocks. But Goyle scowled at him, apparently under the impression that he was making fun.

“Go piss in a cauldron, Malfoy,” he said. “I’m gonna knock your skull down through your pelvis.”

Which, if he hadn’t been about to piss himself in fright, would have impressed Draco, too: he felt Greg deserved a hearty slap on the back for correctly using the term ‘pelvis.’ Perhaps Slytherin had been good for him, after all.

“Right,” he said faintly. “Very good. Carry on, then.”

Fred elbowed him. “C’mon, mate,” he muttered, “you’re embarrassing us here.” Lifting his voice, he shouted, “Not if I punch a tunnel through your proboscis first, you putrid, pustule-brained pack of meat on a stick!”

“WEASLEY!” shouted Madam Hooch, with a tart blast of the whistle. “No trash talk! I want a good, clean game!”

“Sorry, ma’am, but it’s too late, Slytherin’s playing no matter what,” shouted George.

She gave him a quelling look. “Mount your brooms!”

With much squelching and squishing in the mud, they did so. The Nimbus thrummed to life under Draco’s hands, and he gripped its slick handle with all his might, turning his fingertips numb.

A shrill blast pierced the air. The crowd roared. Draco kicked off hard from the pitch, and plunged into the rain.

The wind shoved him sideways, twisting all his flight lines into curves. He adjusted for it as best he could while the rain and sleet drove him downward. The keepers split off for the goalposts, and Harry plummeted into the gray oblivion, but the chasers swirled into a formation at centerfield. Katie won the initial tossup and ducked through a two-chaser guard, missing Flint’s greedy claw, and with a start, Draco remembered that he ought to be flanking her; he shot forward, pulling up aside and below her, so she could drop it instead of throwing against the wind.

“Katie!” he cried.

She saw him, and pitched it without a second thought. He let go of his broomstick — dizzied, momentarily, by the wobble it created, and the wind that tried to rip him from the seat — and fumbled a messy catch, clutching the quaffle to his chest. For a moment, he was delighted at having caught it at all; and then Marcus Flint descended on him like the ugliest angel in God's creation, and he remembered that he was supposed to be flying. He shouted a word he was glad his mother couldn't hear and shot off for the goalposts, clinging to the broomstick like a life preserver.

A dark shape whizzed past his ear. He yelped and spun out of its reach, whirling end over end in midair, only to right himself once he'd pulled way off his line and moved out of reach of a good shot. He searched wildly for its source, and saw Theo floating nearby, spinning his beater's club casually around one finger.

"Training for the ballet, Malfoy?" he called pleasantly.

"Nott!" he shouted, furious. "What the hell was that?"

Theo quirked an eyebrow. "A bludger," he said. "I'm sorry, were you under the impression I was on your team?"

His smirk was interrupted when the same bludger came hurtling for his knees. Theo twisted and dove, but it caught the straw end of his broomstick, and sent him wheeling wildly through the air, scrabbling to regain control of his broom. The stands roared with laughter; only the Slytherins booed. Draco felt a quick pulse of strange, complex gratitude — it appeared that most of the school was on his side.

Fred whizzed by, shaking out his club-arm. "That'll fix him," he shouted. "And oi, Draco, that thing goes in the goalhoop, ta!"

"Got it," he gritted out, and flew on.

The spectators' faces were lost under a sea of cloaks and umbrellas. Some Gryffindors had painted the shields of their umbrellas to spell W-O-O-D, but in the gloom it was hard to see them unless you flew directly overhead. Lee Jordan's commentary was lost to the storm. Bludgers shot in and out of the mist like birds of prey. Draco weaved in formation with Katie and Angelina, clinging to his broomstick, growing lost in the lulling rhythm of catch, pass, shoot. The cold seeped into his skin and he lost track of time. Occasionally, he caught sight of Harry drifting somewhere above the pitch, clearly lost.

Lightning flickered in the distance. Hooch's whistle blasted, and they splashed down in the muck. Under a small tent on the edge of the field, they huddled up and wiped the rain from their faces. Harry was polishing his glasses furiously.

"What's the score?"

"We're fifty points up," said Oliver, to Draco's pleasant surprise. He'd long since lost track of the score, since he couldn't hear Jordan. "But we're fading fast. Have you put eyes on the snitch?"

"No. And these things aren't helping," said Harry tightly, scrubbing at his glasses.

The tent flap burst open, and they all turned. A witch in Gryffindor robes hurried in, using her cloak as a makeshift umbrella, her face splattered with threads of mud and rain. Draco startled, and then felt queerly warm: it was Hermione. He'd never seen her dirty before.

"Harry, your glasses! They're no use!" she gasped. "You can barely see!"

"No, really?" said Harry savagely.

"Yes! But I have an idea. Give them here."

"You're not allowed to be in here," Oliver said weakly, but Draco waved him off.

She tapped the glasses with her wand and said, “Impervius. There — they’ll repel water.” Handing them back, she said, beaming: “Now you won’t die horribly!”

Oliver was having a transcendental experience.

“Now you can see the snitch!” he shouted.

Hermione blinked at him. “Yes,” she said. “I suppose that’s true… also…”

Draco leaned over her. “You’d better get out of here, or he’ll try to kiss you,” he murmured. “Of course, maybe that’s your game. I know it’d be Lavender’s.”

She snorted. “And for you,” she said, turning to him, “you ought to be more careful of Goyle. He’s sending half his bludgers at you, but he always misses to the left, because he overcompensates on the swing, so they go for whoever’s behind you — maybe you can use that, somehow, I don’t know.”

He realized she must have been watching the match quite closely, and grinned. “You clever thing, Granger, who says you don’t like quidditch?”

Hermione’s eyes did the baby-deer thing. It was excellent.

“I don’t,” she said passionately. “I don’t at all. This isn’t an approval, or endorsement, of any kind!”

The whistle blasted. “Got to go,” he told her. “Thanks for the tipoff. Keep watching out for me, would you?”

“I’m not watching you!” she shouted after him. “I’m just observing the match! It’s raining bullets, there’s nothing else to do!”

The team filed out. Harry was flying far better than he had before. Draco, Katie, and Angelina braided a complex play across the field and scored twice, but Slytherin recaptured and got three shots on goal. Draco flew in a tight line with Pucey, trying to tempt Goyle into taking a shot; he wanted to get him to tag Pucey's broom on accident… Katie passed to Draco passed to Angelina back to Draco again, and he shot dodged Pucey, ducked Flint, outpaced Warrington…

A clap of thunder rattled the posts. "Harry!" shouted Oliver, pointing.

Draco spun around. Harry had flung himself flat on the broomstick and was racing across the pitch, in the opposite direction of Higgs, chasing a glint of gold at the far end of the stands. Draco let out a bark of delight: he'd spotted it, the sharp little git.

Another clap of thunder followed — and died. Silence swept over the stadium. Draco touched his ear, fretting he'd gone deaf, but he could hear his own breath, and the scrape of his gloves against his temple. Only the rain had gone quiet, and the roar of the crowds, and the howl of the wind. It was the kind of silence that left you alone with your body, the kind that bred fear and alarm.

Cold descended from above, not windchill, but bone-deep, arctic cold, the cold of being without warmth for so long one forgot its feeling. Draco gasped and clutched the quaffle with stiff fingers, resisting the urge to curl into a fetal ball.

Black shapes poured over the sides of the stands. The tide of darkness converged on the field, knitting a black sea over the green pitch, and then rose in a swirling spire, their dead fingers protruding in hungry open claws, talons reaching for the players who drifted above them like shipwrecked sailors on their brooms…

He could hear the stands screaming, but distantly, as through water. Highest above them all, Harry floated, his head swaying; Draco watched with his heart in his throat and a shout on his lips as the boy swayed, lazy fingers fumbling for his broom handle — missed — slipped free of it—

Harry Potter became a falling star.

The screams broke through the water. A pulse of fear sharper than any cold seized Draco’s limbs, and he breathed sharply.

Harry fell. And fell. And fell.

Draco hocked the quaffle at Marcus Flint, who caught it with a surprised grunt. Then he threw his weight forward and dropped like a stone.

And fell, and fell, and fell.

Draco flew and flew and flew.

Wind shredded his hair and his face and his hands. Rain stung his skin. The ground came roaring hungrily at both of them, close and hard and deadly. Harry’s body lolled in freefall, strangely limp, almost like he was floating.

Somewhere below them, a white shape exploded onto the field, vast and glowing, and the dementors cleaved like the Red Sea. They peeled away from the pitch.

And still, Harry was falling, but now Draco was close enough — and the ground was so very close — that he could reach his hand — and so very hard — tug him onto the broomstick — and so very deadly — and pull UP.

The whiplash almost snapped his neck.

The ground almost snapped his spine.

The force almost snapped his broomstick.

But they skidded out of the fall, hurtling a few bare feet from the ground and parallel to the earth. Draco had just enough time for a bellow of pure victory before Harry’s weight finally spilled sideways, and they both went tumbling together into the mud.

Draco landed on his elbow, and there was an insidious CRACK, and a flower of pain exploded in his arm. He slid twenty feet from his broomstick and rolled to a halt, his face half-buried in mud.

Someone was screaming. A lot of people, actually. That was gratifying. Unless he'd killed Harry after all, in which case: less gratifying; also, very bad.

"Potter! Potter, are you—? Good — where is Malfoy — Malfoy! Malfoy!"

Footsteps splashed towards him. The roar was deafening. Several people were shouting his name at once, and it was confusing. He was in a lot of pain.

"Malfoy!" The shrill brogue sounded beside herself. A splotch came in the mud beside him, and then hands bullied him onto his back, smacking his cheeks, patting his chest. "Are you living? Say something, boy!"

"Something, boy," he groaned, prying his eyes open.

McGonagall's lined face peered down into his, alight with commingled fear and exasperation.

"Sorry, professor," he said. "You left it wide open."

"Thank Merlin," she breathed. "Thank Christ — thank whomever — that was an exceptionally stupid thing to do, Malfoy!"

He spat a mouthful of mud onto the pitch, delicately. He shrugged. "Hat was right," he mumbled.

She looked away and covered her mouth with her hand, eyes suspiciously bright.

"Fifty points to Gryffindor," she said abruptly. "No, seventy points to Gryffindor. A hundred points to Gryffindor, for — for saving the life of another student, and — and for selfless activity at the risk of great personal injury, and — and—”

“And the finest Wronski Feint to grace this pitch since James Potter,” roared Hooch, striding up behind her. “Notwithstanding it was completely against the rules. Malfoy! Are you hurt?”

“Yes,” he said candidly, rolling onto his unhurt arm. The other flopped inappropriately. “I don’t think my arm is supposed to move like that. Or feel like that. Ow.”

Both women eyed his elbow in clear agreement. “Hospital Wing,” said McGonagall crisply. “Now. Get a stretcher.”

“A stretcher?” he said delightedly. That would be a great hullabaloo.

“DRACO!”

Harry came sprinting out of the rain. A bruise the size of an eggplant ran across his cheek, and there was a bloody spot on his nose where his glasses must’ve bitten him during the landing, but he was nevertheless very much alive, which had been the general idea.

“DRACO! ARE YOU ALRIGHT?”

“Oh, good,” said Draco, flopping back in the grass. “You can join me in my convalescence. Bad news, Potter: they think I’m going to die —”

Harry dropped to his knees, hard, and wrenched Draco into a rib-crushing hug.

“Oof, ow. My bones.”

“You shit,” said Harry giddily. “You looked dead. You weren’t moving. I thought…”

“Me? I’m not the twit who dropped his broomstick at eighty feet. And by the way, for the record, I have dibs on the hot water for the rest of time immemorial, thank you, so get comfortable with that idea."

Harry only hugged him tighter, so maybe he hadn't understood. Draco decided to clarify later.

Now more people dropped onto the field, first the rest of the team, and then the Slytherins, who descended reluctantly after Flint made a half-hearted shot on goal. "That was sodding amazing," hollered Fred, shaking his broomstick over his head. "Almost makes you not care that we lost!"

"Lost?" Harry cried. "What? What, 'lost'?"

"Higgs caught the snitch just before Harry fell," said Angelina breathlessly, landing with a thump. "Sneaky bastard. Saw the dementors coming and gunned it. He wouldn't have even known where it was without Harry… then Dumbledore came running onto the pitch, and he cast a spell, and the dementors ran away… it's all right though, Harry," she added, at Harry's crestfallen expression. "It's not over. There's lots of games left in the season, and… I mean, talk about unfair conditions…"

"You're still the best seeker we've ever had," Fred reassured him, but Harry remained quiet.

"Why's everyone consoling him?" Draco complained. "There's an invalid over here. Perishing of his wounds. On death's doorstep."

"Yeah, you're fine," said Fred, cracking a grin. "Play it up when Hooch comes back, though, she might card Higgs for it. We can say Flint pushed you or something. Oi," he said sharply, as Theo landed a mere handbreadth from Fred, splattering mud everywhere.

"You alright, Draco?" he said breathlessly.

Draco gestured lazily to his bad arm. "You see," he said, " this is what a successful beater's work looks like, Nott. I thought you might need someone to show you."

Theo stared at him, and then, belatedly, a bewildered smile twitched his mouth open. “Ha,” he said. “Really funny. You know if you died for Harry Potter, Narcissa would never forgive you, right?”

“Certainly not,” Draco said grimly, as McGonagall and Hooch collectively shimmied him onto a stretcher. It lifted him into the air. “Which is why I have no intention of dying for him or anyone else. Besides, I can’t risk her writing you into the will.”

Another pair of voices joined the clamor on the field, and Draco turned in time to see Hermione hurtling at top speed across the pitch, cloak abandoned. Ron loped behind her, his cheeks painted with the words GO + POTTER. The sight of long-legged Ron struggling to keep up with Hermione was so funny that Draco almost didn’t notice that she wasn’t slowing down.

She sprang up and threw herself at the stretcher, with a short, tight shriek that was a little relieved, but mostly angry.

“I told you so!”

“Thanks,” he said, patting her shoulders. “Your bedside manner is heinous. What, no flowers?”

“Oh, don’t. Please, just — don’t.”

Her eyes were bloodshot, and it was hard to tell how much of her face was wet from rain. He felt bad.

“Easy, Granger,” he said uncomfortably.

She put her head in his shoulder and squeezed him so tightly he feared for his remaining bones.

“I listened to you,” he said lightly, patting her back. “Tried to fly close to Pucey. Thought I could get Goyle to clobber him for me.”

“If you had listened to me, you wouldn’t be on a stretcher.”

“And you’d be short a Potter,” he reminded her, knocking her gently atop the skull. She shuddered. “Seems an awful waste.”

She shuddered powerfully, again. “I hate,” she said, quivering, “watching quidditch.”

Then she squeezed tighter, and he said, urgently, “Bones,” and she said, “Oh! Sorry! Sorry!” and unsqueezed him.

Harry and Ron huddled around the stretcher, ignoring Madam Hooch’s attempts to shoo them away. “Draco,” said Ron admiringly, “I think that was the dumbest thing you’ve ever done. We’re confused, but we’re proud.”

“The Slytherin delegation will draw it at ‘confused,’” drawled Theo. “Out of respect for your reputation, we elect to chalk it up to possession by the spirit of Godric Gryffindor. Pansy is preparing an exorcism.”

Draco caught Harry’s shy, owlish stare, and he sighed. Another thing that wouldn’t have happened in Slytherin: all this exit interview nonsense. If he’d saved Theo’s life, they would have shaken hands and walked away, and maybe insulted each other’s pocket squares, if they were feeling especially tender.

“Let me be clear. Most of the time,” he said to Harry, “I would personally drive a bowie knife into your heart to prevent myself from suffering so much as a hangnail. However. Occasionally…” He cleared his throat. “Occasionally, a man gets locked in a girls’ bathroom with a mountain troll.”

(“What,” said Theo.)

But Harry smiled.

“You didn’t need to.”

“I know you think that,” he sighed. “It’s part of why you’re so detestable.”

Then McGonagall came to scold them all away, and Draco had the extraordinary pleasure of being carried up to the castle by a crowd of quidditch fans. There was so much chatter and cheering that he was sorry he hadn’t broken his arm years ago.

They kept both Harry and Draco in the Hospital Wing until nightfall, Draco for his arm, and Harry for several cosmetic injuries that Pomfrey fussed over probably longer than needed. A stream of visitors came throughout the afternoon, including Hagrid, who brought them each fat bouquets of gorse and wild heather, and Ginny with a get-well card for Harry, which sang a very sweet and obviously self-composed tune that made Draco laugh so hard it brought him to tears. (Harry, red from humiliation, stuffed it under his fruit bowl.) Oliver came, accompanied by Angelina (who appeared to be part of a suicide watch), and told Harry solemnly that it hadn’t been his fault. Ron and Hermione stayed until nightfall, and left after bringing them both plates of food from the Great Hall.

Pomfrey gave Draco a foul potion to take with dinner, and he struggled to sleep. He could feel the bones of his arm shifting and rearranging, plastering over the places where they’d cracked. It was a horrible feeling, like a host of worms traveling under his skin. Around midnight, he gave up and tossed back the covers, staying mindful of his arm in a sling, and padded out of bed to the window.

The moon was the shape of a lemon, edged with a smile of black, and spilled pale light over the courtyard below. Draco sat on the windowsill, gazing over the grounds, wishing he’d asked Hermione to bring his walkman. When he couldn’t sleep at home, he usually played something quiet, like that muggle band R.E.M., and lit a candle. Here, he could do neither, and so he killed time by counting the cobblestones, one at a time, until his eyelids grew heavy.

Sometime around one o’clock, a pair of shadows crossed the courtyard. Draco was so drowsy he almost missed them. He blinked awake and knuckled one eye, rubbing sleep out of it, as the figures crossed into the moonlight.

It was Professor Lupin; the silhouette was unmistakable, from his shabby traveling cloak and fluffy hair. Beside him padded a large black dog, tail wagging so strongly it was like to fall off, which kept pausing to bump and nose at Lupin’s knees with quiet little yips. Lupin stumbled, laughing, and shoved its nose away. He tried to say something stern, and it jumped up on him, almost knocking him into the fountain.

Lupin sat down hard on the fountain ledge, and the dog hopped up, licking his face wildly. He threw his head back, and gave the loudest, clearest, happiest laugh Draco had ever heard from him.

Draco shrank back from the window, a little, suddenly worried that Lupin would see him. Presently, both man and dog continued out of the courtyard, heading out of the castle and across the grounds.

He frowned. He hadn’t known that Lupin had a pet. Dogs weren’t on the list for acceptable familiars at Hogwarts; however, he supposed a professor could do as he liked.

He crossed to Harry’s bedside, and flicked him on the forehead.

“Oi. Potter.”

“Hnngmrhg,” said Harry.

“Potter. Don’t wake up all the way, I just need a favor. Can I use the map?”

“Hnngrhgnrnnmgmngnng,” said Harry. “Sure.”

“Class. Thanks.” He crouched and dug through Harry’s satchel, tossing out books at random until he found the Marauder’s Map at the very bottom. He carried it back to his bed, where he drew the curtains closed, sat cross-legged, and unfolded it on the mattress.

“I solemnly swear that I am up to no good,” he yawned.

The world of Hogwarts unfolded before him in parchment and ink. Gryffindor Tower etched itself, full of a dark cluster of names in the dormitories; a few prefects scattered across the hallways, and Filch he found lurking near the second-floor dungeons. Dumbledore, he discovered, lived in a suite near the headmaster’s office, where, for some reason, he was having a conference with Professor Snape.

Turning his eyes south, he moved across the grounds, until he found a pair of names drifting somewhere between the south courtyard and the Whomping Willow. One was Remus Lupin. The other—

He blinked, and scrubbed his eyes again. The other was still Sirius Black.

He flipped the map over, breathing hard. He looked around. The infirmary was as still as the grave, except for Harry’s snoring.

Draco turned the map over again. Both names had disappeared.

“No,” he said out loud. He ran his thumb over the place they’d been, searching the area nearby, but they were gone. Not only that, Lupin was nowhere in the castle. He had completely vanished from the premises.

Harry woke up more fully when the map hit him in the face.

“HMMMNRG.”

“Potter,” hissed Draco. “Look at that for me, and tell me if you can find Lupin anywhere.”

“Wot?” said Harry blearily, lifting his head.

Draco repeated himself. With some complaint, Harry obliged, but he couldn't find Lupin, either.

"Alright. You've got me. Lupin's out for a night with the lads. Is that your point?" he said tiredly, replacing the map in his satchel. "Teachers are allowed to leave the school after hours. Being adults, and all."

"I know." Draco sat on Harry's bed, ignoring the soft sound of protest, and massaged his temples. "Alright. I might be going insane."

"Also my first thought," said Harry, the brat.

"But I swear I'm not lying, and I know what I saw. Potter, I saw Remus Lupin on that map," he whispered hoarsely. "And he was with Sirius Black."

"Sirius Black?" said Hermione, in tones incredulous, as if there were any other Sirius he could be talking about.

"Hush!" He shoved his finger to his lips — his left one, since the right still laid in a sling. "Lower your voice."

"Oh, because the dementors will hear you from the Tower, will they?"

"I don't want anyone poking around until I'm sure!"

Harry said, for the umpteenth time: "Are you sure it was Lupin, though?"

Draco threaded his fingers through his hair. "Quite certain," he said thinly. "I saw his face, and I saw his name on the map."

Hermione worried her lip. "You do know what you're accusing Lupin of, if you're right? Failing to surrender a wanted man? You're essentially calling him a criminal, himself."

Ron, who was working on a chess problem from the day's Prophet, moved his knight and raised his voice. "I don't know," he said thoughtfully. "It'd be sort of fitting, wouldn't it? We were all getting a little too comfortable in Defense Against the Dark Arts."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean, on a scale from 'one' to 'having You Know Who in the back of your head,' harboring a murderer is barely worth a call to the headmaster. Lupin hasn't even done anything to us." He yawned. "If he hasn't tried to murder me, or Harry…"

"Yet!" hissed Draco.

"Yeah, but if he wanted to kill Harry, he'd have done it, right?" said Ron reasonably. "He's had loads of chances. He had Harry in after class that one time, for the boggart—" Harry shifted, embarrassed— "and he could have held us back for detention whenever he wanted."

"You think he's innocent because he hasn't successfully killed you yet?" demanded Draco. "That's your best argument?"

"Maybe he was Imperiused," said Harry stubbornly. "Maybe Black has him under control, like Podmore and Yaxley."

"That's even worse," Draco said, scandalized. "That means Black has a way into Hogwarts. He could come inside the castle at leisure."

"All right. But he's not," said Hermione patiently, putting her foot down on what she clearly considered a frivolous tangent. "We have the Map. It's been a week, and we've checked it every night, and Black's nowhere to be found. Meanwhile, Lupin is perfectly fine, and he's been in his bed every night since! At this point, I think we should consider the more likely possibility that you had a very long day, and had taken a very strong dose of medicine, and — Draco, you admit this! — were very tired, to begin with, when you looked out that window."

“It wasn’t a dream. Ask Harry. I woke him up to get the map, didn’t I?”

“Yes,” said Hermione doubtfully, “Certainly you were awake, then… but there are lots of medicines whose side effects include powerfully vivid dreams, unlike the ones you’re used to, and…”

“And Skele-Gro isn’t one of them,” snapped Draco. “If you don’t believe me, that’s fine, but I still think we ought to tell a teacher—”

“And tell them what?” breathed Hermione, in tones of amusement that rankled him sore. “That you thought you saw Sirius Black? On a magical map of the castle that tracks all of its residents at all times, in violation of at least three school rules? And that you saw Lupin with a dog? Through a window? At a distance? What, exactly, do you think McGonagall is going to say?”

He glared at her and sank further on the sofa, folding his arms. She would say exactly what Hermione had, of course; Hermione had an uncanny ability to evoke a teacher.

“Yeah, Hermione’s right, though,” said Ron suddenly, startling Draco and Harry both — Ron was still upset with Hermione, and more so whenever Crookshanks was around. “You don’t want to go telling a teacher about the Map, Draco. They’ll confiscate it.”

“Which they probably should,” muttered Hermione, but at Ron’s raised eyebrow, she fell quiet.

“It’s a gift for Harry,” said Ron firmly. “Fred and George used it for years, and it didn’t curse them, or anybody else. It’s not Dark magic. And it belongs to Harry.”

“It won’t for long, if he gets offed by Sirius Black,” said Draco sourly.

“Again, I’m not saying you’re wrong,” said Ron, with a fair measure of sympathy. “But look at it from someone else’s perspective. I’m your mate. You could come in here yelling that you saw a unicorn cross-bred with a pygmy puff, and I'd go, fair enough, let's have a look. A professor's not gonna give you that sort of credit."

"I mean," said Harry in a small voice, "we could try asking Lupin."

After a pause, when everyone looked at him, he shrugged uncomfortably. "He seems reasonable," he said. "And he might have an explanation for it — maybe, I don't know, he named his dog after Sirius Black—"

"Harry," sighed Hermione, while Ron covered a laugh.

"I mean — really, though! We could at least try — even Draco admits that he doesn't know exactly how the dog fits in—"

"I'm not going to ask Lupin," said Draco haughtily. He stood up. "I don't fancy getting you killed, Potter, even when you make remarks as insipid as that one." He held out his hand. "Give me the Map."

Harry held it out of reach, quick with wariness. "Why?"

"Because I'm going to check it. Starting tonight, every night, I'm going to make sure that Lupin stays where he should be. And if he's not — or if I see so much as a trace of the words 'Sirius Black' on that parchment — you're going to hear about it," he said grimly. "And so will the rest of this bloody castle."

it appears that even in an alternate universe, draco cannot get through third year without injuring his arm. at least this time it's real, and not a feigned injury by an unjustly persecuted hippogriff... lest you think I've forgotten buckbeak, though, fear not! he is to return later.

The Last Marauder

Chapter 21: The Last Marauder

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

“Draco, you look terrible,” said Hermione, proving once again that she never let sympathy interfere with the important business of telling everyone things they already knew.

She was not wrong, however. He’d awoken late the night before, as he had each day for the past two weeks, and made a nightly pilgrimage to the Marauder’s Map, where he pored over the castle and grounds until he was satisfied that Black was nowhere to be found.

Which he wasn’t. He was totally absent, which didn’t help Draco’s argument for not being in the preliminary stages of madness. At this point, he was starting to hope that the murderer would come after Harry sometime soon, if only to justify the amount of effort Draco had dedicated to preventing it.

When he woke up, it was almost noon on the last Saturday in November, and the common room was completely empty except for Ron, who was busily disemboweling a Peppermint Toad, and Hermione, who had colonized the better part of three tables for her homework. Harry was gone.

“Cheers,” he said groggily. “Make a man feel welcome. Where is everyone?”

“Hogsmeade! It’s the last trip before the holidays,” said Ron. “Harry went down to shop for bubotubers with Hagrid.”

“Is he getting a new broomstick?” he said, stealing a bit of Hermione’s hazelnut scone. She made a cross noise like a poked cat. “He should at least buy a stopgap broom, we’re getting murdered on the school’s old Comets.”

“He’s still in mourning,” said Ron wisely. “Best not to rush him. A man grieves in his own way.”

“We’ll all be grieving if Wood kills him,” said Draco, stealing some of Hermione’s tea to wash down her scone with. Too exasperated to defend her terrain, she simply pushed the mug at him and let him have it, which was precisely the outcome he intended, and he rewarded her with a pat on the shoulder. “Which he might do, if Harry doesn’t show up for practice soon. Between that and my arm, he’s down two of seven. Anyway, he can afford a new one.”

In a Gryffindor tragedy of historic proportions, Harry’s Firebolt had drifted into the Whomping Willow during his fateful crash, and it had returned to him in a bag of splinters. Since then, Harry had refused to let anyone throw them away, choosing instead to keep them in a pouch near his bedside, which had at first seemed solemn and respectful and now verged increasingly on unhinged levels of grief.

Both he and Draco had returned to classes after a weekend in the Hospital Wing. The late days of the term were good ones, and not just because Draco’s arm meant everyone else had to carry his supplies around for him. Lupin had moved into the more dangerous and interesting amphibious creatures, and Neville had ceased to ask Draco questions like “where’s the burner again?” and “what’s a pipette?” in Potions. His success with answering Snape’s question, albeit through Draco’s coaching, had conferred on him a degree of confidence that appeared to be producing material — if not terribly impressive — results.

After lazing about the common room for a while with Hermione and Ron, Draco decided to make a pilgrimage down to the dungeons and visit Snape; he wanted to pass a letter on to his mother. He hoped to broach the subject of staying at Hogwarts for Christmas: the twins were going around with a sign-up sheet for something called a White Elephant, and it seemed the general consensus in Gryffindor Tower was that there was going to be a rather lively party, which he thought it might be a shame to miss.

The castle dropped precipitously in temperature during the winter months, so he dressed in a pale cashmere jumper, with a burgundy scarf that Dobby had knit for him years ago. Thus attired, he found the Potions Master in his study, brewing something over his personal cauldron near the fire. The gutter of firelight paved the study in cozy, warm tones, which clashed with the cool colors of the various bottles and beakers decorating the walls. He tapped on the door, and Snape, after a preliminary suspicious glance, bid him come in.

“Afternoon, professor. Brewing something interesting?” He nudged the door shut with his ankle and hung up his cloak on the coat rack.

“Come and see,” said Snape, which, for him, was downright friendly. Perhaps the Christmas spirit was infectious.

Draco peered into the cauldron’s depths, but all it held was a clear, bubbling liquid, indistinguishable from water. He sniffed, but the scent was either nonexistent, or so faint that the general dank of the dungeons obscured it.

“I can’t get anything.”

“No, indeed. What does that tell you?”

He sucked his teeth. “...That I should get a hint?”

“In the real world, you will not have the luxury of asking what lies hidden in your goblet,” said Snape curtly, crushing a line of beetle shells with the flat of his blade. “You must rely on your five senses and your wits. Come, think. You know it is not water.”

“Right,” he said doubtfully, “that’s one thing off the list.” He took a stirring spoon and agitated the potion, testing for viscosity; he managed a few strokes before Snape, noticing, slapped his hand away and repossessed the stirrer. “It’s not very viscous, and there’s no residue on the cauldron, either… It's remarkably featureless, actually. There can't be that many potions that are totally clear and scentless, are there?"

"No. In fact, there are few." Snape's tone was flat, which was a good sign; he always rewarded competence with indifference.

"Plus, you're brewing it, so it's probably something difficult," he said, "because if it was easy to do right, you wouldn't bother. Your time's too valuable for that."

Snape tipped his head to the right, a tacit assent. "A logical assertion," he said, "though not one that requires knowledge of potioneering."

"No, but it's true," said Draco, pleased. "So based on your ingredients, then, I'd say… what's that, monkshood?" He frowned. "Fresh monkshood. Which is inedible, actually. A poison? Okay, I'm lost again."

"What is monkshood, Draco?"

"A plant?"

He gave him a scathing look. "Recall your Herbology lessons. I told you once that you should pay ample attention to them. I will be dismayed if you did not listen."

Draco, scowling, leaned against the table and folded his arms. He remembered Neville chattering about something in the greenhouses last week — it'd been about taxonomy conventions, how some plants had more than one name. There had been something that prompted that conversation, too — a plant in the greenhouse itself, something Neville was growing with Sprout…

"Aconite," he said suddenly, snapping his fingers. "Monkshood is another word for aconite, which is also called…"

He broke off, and stared at Snape. “Why are you making a Wolfsbane Potion?”

If Snape was pleased, he did them both the favor of hiding it well. “It took you enough time,” he said coldly. “Outside the classroom, you will have seconds to make those kinds of deductions, not minutes.”

“Great, sir, I’ll work on that. Why are you making a Wolfsbane Potion?”

“Because it is a tremendously difficult brew, and it requires an expert hand.”

“I’m sure, but that’s not a reason,” he said brazenly. Snape’s cheek twitched at his insolence. “You haven’t answered the question. It’s not regulation-approved, so you can’t sell it. And the ingredients are too expensive for it to be a lark. Did someone commission it?”

“If they did, I would be strictly bound by terms of non-disclosure, as you surely understand,” said the Potions Master. He sprinkled the crushed beetle shells into the cauldron, gave it a brisk stir, and left it boiling. Examining the brew, he frowned, and then made a note in the textbook to his right. Draco noticed that the pages were covered in scrawl so thick it covered the printed text.

He huffed, and plucked a stray beetle shell from his jumper. “Fine. Keep your secrets,” he said sourly. “Wouldn’t be the first time. Speaking of which, are you visiting the Manor anytime soon? I have a note for my mother.”

“I am not your owl. As I have often told you.”

“Oh, I know, sir. Only if you’re going anyway. I know my mother wanted to have you over for dinner sometime between now and the holidays, and I just know you could make her terribly happy if you happened to bring a letter from her son. Something to brighten her day, perhaps? With Dobby gone, it’s frightfully lonely, at the Manor.”

Snape set down the knife, glowering. He stuck out his hand in bad grace. “Give it to me, and cease these frightfully inept manipulations.”

“Thank you, sir,” Draco said cheerfully, handing over the letter, and it disappeared into the folds of Snape’s robe. He flopped into an armchair by the fire, and watched as Snape fretted and fussed over the cauldron, giving it the odd counterstir now and then while it bubbled to completion.

“Do you require something,” said Snape, presently, peeved.

“Such as, sir?”

“I do not know. You have inflicted yourself on me, heedless of my time or priorities, so I should think I would be forgiven for presuming you had a purpose of some urgency. Perhaps a Healing Solution for your arm.”

“Oh, that’s quite fine, sir, thank you. Although I will say,” he added severely, “that Skel-Gro is some nasty stuff. And Granger’s got me nervous about it, now, too — she says that when muggles break their bones, their Healers sometimes have to cut them open and rearrange their bones in the right order, so they don’t heal in the wrong way. Have you heard about this? Obviously, that’s barbaric and horrible and wrong-headed, but it got me thinking that I don’t actually know whether Skel-Gro makes sure your bones are in the right order before it starts working. And I admit, it’s no great reassurance when you ask Madam Pomfrey that question, and she looks at you and goes, ‘Darling, I’m not a muggle Healer.’”

“Draco.”

“Yes, sir.”

“Before you speak,” said Snape, “I implore you to give serious and extenuated consideration as to whether or not I am likely to care.”

Draco rolled his eyes, kicking his feet up on the ottoman. “All right, here’s one you might care about,” he said. “Do you think Sirius Black is coming to kill Potter?”

There was a clatter from the desk, and he craned his neck. A stirring spoon had fallen.

“Alright, sir?”

“Fine,” gritted Snape. He Summoned it into his hand, and dropped it in a bath of sterilizing agent with the other used tools. “Is this what consumes your idle hours? Thoughts of muggle Healers, and concern for Harry Potter?”

“Tsk.”

Snape put the cap on the cauldron and swept over to the fireplace, removing a bubbling pot from its midst. “It is hardly Potter who has to fear Black’s return.”

“What do you mean?” Draco slid his feet from the ottoman and sat up, intrigued. “Why not him? He went after Potter’s parents, anyway, didn’t he?”

Snape knelt to stir the coals, leaving his back to Draco and his face to the fire. The flames glazed his silhouette in gold. “Sirius Black would not have lifted a finger against James Potter with a knife at his throat,” he said.

Draco shivered.

“But he sold him out,” he said. “To the Dark Lord. And he killed—”

“Oh, murder, yes,” said Snape easily. “Of murder, he was capable. He was a cruel and selfish bully in his youth, and he remained one all his life. I could believe that he killed thirteen muggles; I could believe even that he killed Pettigrew. Peter was always a shadow beside them, a hulking, servile creature. Him, Black could have killed. But Potter, Lupin — no."

"Lupin?" he repeated sharply. "What's Lupin got to do with it?"

"Don't you know?" said Snape, in soft, sly tones. "Remus Lupin was the fourth piece of their little set. A marauding band of wastrels, flouncing about the castle, smashing up things and people wherever they went… but popular, of course. Rabidly, fanatically popular. The handsome, swaggering quidditch star… the prodigal son of a falling dynasty… the wounded prince of Gryffindor Tower…"

"...Sir?"

"I suspect Lupin still feels stricken," he said, mostly to himself, with no small degree of satisfaction. "To err so grievously in judgment, and for so many years, must do terrible things to a man's confidence. I expect that is why he has never confessed his history to you, or to the other students, even when he — supposedly — has nothing to atone for. Two dead, and the third imprisoned, wanted for murder… the Marauders are no longer the sort of group to which one might eagerly profess his membership."

Snape straightened, still holding the poker, which glowed red at the tip. "Do not speak of this with Lupin," he ordered. "He will know I told you, and there is no telling how angry he will become. For your safety, you should endeavor not to irritate him."

"Endeavor not… sir, you don't think he's dangerous?"

Snape traced the blade of the poker with one finger, lost in thought. "Consider this," he said, at length. "The day Sirius Black was apprehended by the Ministry, Remus Lupin went into hiding. He has not resurfaced since. He has never taken up new acquaintances, or found a new place for himself in the world. This professorship, to all evidence, is the first steady job he has held since the Order disbanded, thirteen years ago. Does that sound like a man you would gladly trifle with? A well-adjusted man, suited to the trials of teaching, who has no secrets in need of protecting?”

Draco, who thought Snape was perhaps not one to talk about being secretive or well-adjusted, wisely kept silent. He said only, “I don’t think Dumbledore would hire him if he were dangerous.”

“Dumbledore hired Sturgis Podmore while the man was in the grips of the Imperius Curse,” said Snape grimly. “It does not serve you to think him omniscient. It does not even serve you to think him always wise. It serves you to protect yourself, first, last, and always, against all those who have not walked through fire to earn your trust.”

Unwittingly, and a touch ironically, Draco thought of the line of fire in the Vault, back from first year. How did that seem so long ago? It had only been a year and a half. He felt ages older than he’d been then.

Perhaps sensing Draco’s hesitation, Snape added, “And that, if you would care to know, is wisdom from the mouth of Lucius Malfoy.”

Draco bent his head and nodded, dutifully committing it to memory.

“Professor?”

“Yes.”

“Did you know Regulus Black?”

Snape paused. Draco fretted at first that he’d provoked him to anger, but the Potion Master’s expression was not irate, merely perplexed. “Yes,” he said. “He was two years behind me. A clever boy, but quiet. He lived in his brother’s shadow.” He paused again. “Why do you ask?”

“I just heard someone mention him the other day. Mother never said much about him, even though he’s part of the family. I thought you might have known him.”

“I could speak, within reason, of his actions; I could not speak to his character. This hedging tires me. Ask your real question.”

“Did he have a will, or something?”

Snape clucked his tongue. “A conspiracy theory,” he said briskly. “Drummed up by daydreamers and pilgrims of a lost cause, dreaming of a pureblood resurgence. No. Regulus Black died without issue, and there was never any question as to whom Witherfell belonged.”

“Which is me, right?” said Draco pointedly. “I mean, my mum. But me, eventually.”

“Have you forgotten your Blood Laws? Did Narcissa fill your brain with porridge, those long eleven years? Your line of succession should be prayer and scripture to you, by now. Upon her death, the rights to Witherfell reverted from the line of Orion and Walburga, who disinherited one son and lost the other, to the next superior direct descendant of Phineas Nigellus—”

“A line running from Cygnus Black, Senior, to Pollux to Alphard, disinherited, whoops, for the crime of being bad at embezzlement,” said Draco impatiently, “passing thereon to his brother, Cygnus Minor, but whoops again, dead, therefore: his firstborn, Bellatrix Lestrange, neé Black, who will die in prison long before the true and final heir of the Black estate: his secondborn, my mother.”

Snape said, “Save for neglecting Lucretia—”

“Oh, come on, you sound like Mummy. You have to go three generations back for her to even have a claim, besides which, she never had children, and, oh, also, she’s dead, so she couldn’t make a claim even if she had one.”

“Nevertheless, save for her, you are correct. You will hold Witherfell, eventually, provided you survive your aunt and mother. Is that the root of your familial inquisition?” Snape’s mouth twitched. “Do you fear a secret bastard of Regulus coming to contest your claim? An Edgar to your Edmund?”

“No,” said Draco. “I’m perfectly happy with my father’s inheritance, thank you, sir. I was merely wondering.”

A crystal instrument on the desk gave a shrill whistle, and Snape cracked the lid, releasing a bath of foul-smelling steam from the cauldron. Draco wrinkled his nose and discreetly pressed the back of his hand over his mouth. “It is done,” said Snape in satisfaction. “What you smell is the accelerated fermentation of the wolfsbane; it produces a rather unpleasant odor.”

“Delightful,” he said. “The wonders of potioneering.”

Snape clamped the lid back onto the cauldron, and with a swish of his wand, he siphoned away some of the steam. “If you intend on dining with your friends, you should make your way upstairs,” he said. “It is nearly six o’clock.”

Draco rose quickly, checking his watch, and found that more time had passed than he thought. “I should. Thanks, sir.”

“This is not a courtesy. It was a polite recommendation for you to leave the room.”

“Naturally, sir. Will you be eating upstairs, or shall I bring you some food from the Great Hall?”

“I will dine after the brew is done,” said Snape, with grim resolve. “Several hours’ work remains in this, before it goes to ferment for next month. I must continue.”

Draco blinked. “Alright,” he said. It seemed to him that a potion could stand to wait the time it took to wolf down a sandwich, but perhaps he’d been spending too much time with Ron. “Well, good luck with it, sir. Thanks again, about the letter.”

Snape grunted, absorbed in the process of measuring something slimy and green. Draco let himself out.

His godfather was something of an odd duck, he reflected. A good man, but an odd duck, no two ways about it.

He encountered Ron and Hermione coming up the Grand Staircase, while they were coming down. “Ah, you made it,” said Hermione, who was wearing a corduroy coat in velvety, autumnal brown. She had put up her hair, and cradled Crookshanks in the crook of one elbow; she looked vaguely like she was going to work on a farm. In these and other ways, she and Draco would never be alike. “I wanted to let Crookshanks out for a walk before it gets dark. Would you like to come?”

“That’s what I said,” said Ron emphatically.

“Living things need fresh air and enrichment,” she declared. “Hagrid says that nothing ever felt worse after running around in the grass.”

“You asked Hagrid for advice on cat parenting? Hagrid, who keeps an illegal monster in his backyard? Hagrid, who makes buddies with giant spiders?”

“Lower your voice,” said Ron darkly, as if, like demons, the Acromantulae materialized when invoked.

“Hippogriffs aren’t illegal, they’re merely proscribed without a Special Creature Handling License,” said Hermione, primly, but uneasily.

“You think he’s got a license, do you?” said Draco, sternly. “You think he sat down and filled out the paperwork? In triplicate?”

“Truly, a hippogriff is a Class Four only by taxonomical accident,” said a mild, hoarse voice, descending from above. Lupin rounded the banister of the Grand Staircase and limped his way down the stairs, leaning heavily on the railing. “The rating system classifies both of its parent creatures, the griffin and the pegasus, as Class Four, so the rules of categorization insist that its rating follow suit. Most magizoologists, however, consider it functionally a Class Three, for which one requires only a General Creature Handling License, which Hagrid has.” He stopped on the step below them and smiled, adding, “Good evening, you three. Did you get out to Hogsmeade today?”

Draco, miffed at being corrected, felt the need to point out: “Being ‘functionally’ Class Three doesn’t change the licensing problem. The law is the law.”

“Indeed it is,” agreed Lupin. “Though for myself, if I could choose between Hagrid or a paper license to stand beside me in the face of a rampaging hippogriff, I would much prefer Hagrid. What does that say? Maybe nothing. I don’t know. All I know are the facts, which I find generally have very little bearing on matters of the law… excuse me, if you would, Mr. Malfoy, I must go. We must let these questions percolate for another time. Have a marvelous evening.”

Cryptically, and peacefully, he limped out of the Entrance Hall and through the oak double doors, disappearing into the twilight beyond.

Ron scratched his head. “You think he took something?” he muttered.

“Ron!”

“I’m just saying! It’s his day off, he could have! I wouldn’t blame him.”

Still frowning at the double doors, Draco slowly drew the Marauder’s Map out of his satchel. Harry had loaned it to him to keep him from waking up the whole dorm whenever he wanted to check it at night.

“Not again,” said Hermione immediately.

“Hold on, I want to check something. ‘I solemnly swear…’”

“I know! I know what you want to check! It’s an obsession! I really almost think I should confiscate it, just to cure you of the predilection —”

Balancing the map on his forearm, he flipped to the section containing the grounds, and ran his finger across the whorls of ink until he found the dot marked ‘LUPIN.’ It was moving quickly across the lawns, headed in a straight line for the Whomping Willow. It was alone.

Before he could feel disappointment, however, he noticed another pair of dots moving together in a nearby quadrant. The first was marked ‘HARRY POTTER,’ and it was coming up the pathway from Hogsmeade. The second — which was approaching the first from within the dark scrawl of the Forbidden Forest — read ‘SIRIUS BLACK.’

Draco almost dropped the map.

“Look! Granger! Weasley! Look, right now!”

“What is it? You can’t really exp… oh, my God.”

Hermione took one glance and thrust it violently aside in Ron’s direction. He peered at it, and lost what little color he had to his name. “Bugger,” he said loudly. “That’s — that’s him, isn’t it? The guy?” He looked gravely from one face to another. “That’s Black.”

“Yes! And he’s coming for Harry — oh, God!” Hermione squeezed Crookshanks, who gave a yowl of indignation, and was obligingly dropped. “That idiot! I told him not to go out! I told him it wasn’t safe!”

“You believe me, then?” Draco demanded eagerly. “You believe that I saw him? I wasn’t making it up? That’s real?”

“Yes, yes, of course, but who cares? That’s utterly beside the point now, we’ve got to figure out what to do!”

“We’ve got to go get him,” said Ron suddenly. He folded the map, businesslike, and stuck it in his back pocket. He sniffed. “Nothing for it. Gotta go fetch him. No time for anything else.”

“Yes,” said Draco, grateful that Ron’s mulish resistance to overthinking — or, more generally, thinking per se — had intervened on their behalf. “We can… we can get Lupin, on our way out. He’s the closest professor.”

“I thought you said you didn’t trust Lupin,” said Hermione shrilly. “Didn’t you see him with Black?”

“Yes, but in an emergency—”

“He might be a contact! He might have let Black into the school!”

“Who cares?” said Ron pointedly, brushing through both of them, and striding past the entrance to the Great Hall. “Harry’s out there, and he’s alone, and there’s a murderous loony headed straight for him. Either Lupin helps or not, but if he doesn’t, I’m still going to go shove my wand so far up Sirius Black’s arse that he’ll still be sneezing magic when they bury him.”

He shoved through the double doors, giving Draco and Hermione no choice but to follow.

They raced down the lawns — Draco swallowed a short, potent swell of deja vu — and along the rock path. The last lighted minutes of twilight slipped through their fingers, and the sky seemed to flush a darker color every time they lifted their heads, plunging precipitously from indigo to black. Their shoes crunched over a slippery plate of frost, and Draco could barely see past the silver cloud of his breath hanging in front of his face.

For what it was worth, he scanned the lawns skirting the Whomping Willow, but Lupin was nowhere to be found.

The inky colonnades of trees rose like an iron grill from the edge of the lawn, and Ron plunged between them without hesitation, his wand blazing white to carve a path out of the darkness. After a moment's hesitation, Hermione followed, whispering "Lumos maxima," and under the pale umbrella of her wand, the three of them hurried down the path to Hogsmeade.

It was eerily quiet. Most of the students had returned already, in observance of the sunset curfew. Draco wished fervently that Harry hadn't taken the Cloak, so that the three of them might not be quite so conspicuous through the trees, but at the same time, he was glad that Harry had it, since perhaps he would have the good sense to make use of it now that darkness had fallen. The pathway seemed longer at night than it did in daylight, though rationally he knew it was the same length. He kept expecting to see the gates of Hogsmeade rise from behind each bend in the path, only to encounter another forested stretch of dirt, another wall of foreboding trees. Every rustle in the darkness made him jump, wand at the ready, with a curse cocked on the tip of his tongue.

The knowledge of just what kind of creatures did lurk in that darkness did nothing to allay his fears.

The three of them didn't speak. The only sound was their breath, which came faster the longer they hurried, and the crackle-snap of twigs and leaves and animal bones underfoot.

So complete was their focus that they failed to notice the small figure scurrying up the path towards them, until Ron plowed straight into it, and the two of them went down with a great shout in a tangle of limbs.

"Ron!" cried Hermione, and her Lumos vanished, plunging them all into darkness. "Flipen—"

“No! No! S’fine! Fine!” Ron threw up a hand, just barely visible through the dim. “It’s him! It’s Harry!”

He staggered to his feet, hauling the smaller boy up by the collar, and shucked the Invisibility Cloak from his shoulders. Harry’s face emerged from nothing, visibly rumpled, but unhurt.

“Blimey, you lot,” said Harry. “What are you all doing down here?”

“Looking for you!” Hermione exclaimed, weak with relief. “We saw Sirius Black on the Marauder’s Map, and he was headed for you, so we tried to get Lupin but he was gone so we ran straight here just in case—”

“Sirius Black?” he gasped. “Are you joking?”

“No, she’s not, because what do you know, I was right, surprise, surprise, kiss my royal, et cetera, I will accept apologies in the form of cash or check, and would someone please put a light back on, it’s pitch out here.”

“That’s you, isn’t it, Draco?” said Harry, squinting. “I can’t see.”

“Nae, ye dumb pillock, it’s Professor McGonagall.”

“Lumos maxima,” said Ron, and light poured from his wand-tip, a beam only somewhat smaller than Hermione’s. He lifted it high, like a torch. “Think we ought to get back, shouldn’t we? Seeing as the baddie’s probably still out here?”

“Yes,” said Hermione fervently, shivering. Something rustled in the trees closeby, and Draco stepped closer to her, putting his back to the circle of the four. “I think we should hurry. And Ron, maybe you oughtn’t hold that light so high — it’s quite visible, especially now that it’s so dark.”

“I hear you, but problem is, it’s easier to kill us if we can’t see anything,” said Ron, not unreasonably. “So we’re in a Catcher 22.”

“A Catch-22, yes.”

“What did I say?”

They crept up the path, moving more slowly now. Harry offered them use of the Cloak, but between Ron and Draco’s growth spurts, the four of them could no longer fit under its reach, even with their ankles showing, so they let Harry and Hermione share it between them. With the sun down, the temperature sunk almost to freezing, and Draco kept flexing his fingers to keep them from growing stiff around his wand.

“Is it just me,” whispered Hermione, “or is it very cold?”

“Yeah, no kidding, I’m losing toes over here,” said Ron. “Let’s pick up the pace, I didn’t bring my cloak.”

“No,” she said, drawing up short. “No. I mean very cold.”

Harry said, in a small voice: “Do any of you hear that?”

“What?” said Draco, his heart thudding.

“The screaming,” he said.

They all looked at him.

“No,” said Ron. “Do you?”

Hermione took a sharp breath. Draco couldn’t see her through the Cloak, but he could imagine the way her face had gone tight, electrified with realization, because he could feel his doing the same. The hairs on the back of his neck pricked up, one by one, like gazelles lifting their heads at the scent of a lion.

“I think—”

“We need to run,” he finished for her, and started walking backward, quickly, away from the castle. “Run fast.”

“Where?”

“Anywhere. Hogsmeade’s closer, we can go there —”

A hoarse, shrill rattle pierced the air directly over their heads. Hermione screamed. Ron thrust his wand into the air, and it illuminated the fluttering black mass of a dementor, floating mere feet above them in the trees.

Its gaping mouth yawned wide, and another deafening rattle scraped out of its throat. At the sound of Hermione’s scream, it swept down on them, descending like a vulture, with talons outstretched. Draco made a sound that was part shriek, part war cry, and part exhortation, and then he ran like hell.

More rattles chorused from the trees, a whole cacophony of shuddering cries, like a flock of ghostly birds. Black cloaks poured from the branches above in a swarm and frenzied in the canopy above them, blotting out the few starry patches of moonlight. The four of them thundered down the path back to Hogsmeade, feet fumbling over the slippery dirt. Harry moved the fastest, easily overtaking Hermione, and slipped free of the Invisibility Cloak, passing Draco. “Hogsmeade!” he shouted, above the riotous shrieks of the dementors. Draco nodded, gasping for breath, and fumbled his wand into his left hand, ignoring the pangs of pain that rocketed through his injured elbow with every step.

Hermione, lagging between Draco and Ron, thrust her wand into the sky. “Verdimillious!” she cried, and a shower of red sparks flew up through the trees, piercing the veil of dementors and crowning the canopy.

“What’s that do?” shouted Ron. “Does it kill them?”

“No,” she cried. She leapt over a fallen log and stumbled through the landing, barely catching herself. “It’s a flare — Lupin’s still out there, he might see us!”

Draco found himself battered by a wave of affection so strong it numbed the sharp edge of terror. It was so wonderfully competent. They didn't have any spells that could deal with the dementors on their own, so she'd just — of course. He was irritated he hadn't thought of it himself.

"Verdimillious," he shouted, and sent a coruscating lance of green sparks through the trees.

"Verdimillious!"

"Verdimillious!"

They rounded the final bend, and Ron bellowed in dismay: the gates of Hogsmeade were closed and padlocked. Curfew had passed.

"Around the side!" cried Hermione, after only a moment's pause. She banked left and plunged through the trees, scrambling over a stump the size of a boulder. "Up through the trees!"

"Guys," gasped Harry, "I'm sorry... I, I can't…"

Draco finally paused to look at him. The boy was absolutely drenched in sweat, and listed against one of the tree trunks, trembling like a leaf in a storm. Whatever strange power the dementors wielded over him, it was taking its toll.

He swore. "Granger! Wait! It's Potter, he can't—"

"N-no — d-don't — just go, go on without m-me—"

Draco was duly considering a full-blown panic attack when, without breaking stride, Ron crouched and hoisted Harry over his shoulder like a sack of potatoes. Harry made a small noise of protest, swatting feebly at Ron's back, but then his head flopped down, and he went limp.

"Good man, Weasley," cried Draco, faintly awestruck, but Ron ignored him, breaking into a dead run after Hermione. The speed that he achieved with a full person slung over his back was incredible. Draco wanted to give him some sort of medal.

They ran.

The chill made it hurt to breathe. A swarm of dementors profused from the forest behind them, oozing from every clump of foliage, their cool breath laying a crust of frost over each naked finger of every bush and tree, settling a bone-deep ache of cold into Draco's limbs. Every time he glanced over his shoulder, his heart skipped again at the horrible sight of a black morass — a billowing fog bank of tattered cloaks and horrible, decaying hands, faceless, except for the horde of yawning mouths — racing up the path after him, clawing its way out of the endless dark, like a living, hungry nightmare. The sound was like a steel rod drawn across the surface of a lake, piercing and horrible.

Hermione led them on a strange and winnowing path through the skirts of the Forest, keeping close to the Hogsmeade fence. "Granger!" Draco shouted. "Where are we going?"

"The most haunted place in Britain!" she replied, and dove through a narrow gap in the trees. Draco had to slot himself sideways and leap through, landing clumsily in the foliage beyond.

They broke at last onto a worn footpath, and scrambled up a steep hill. At the top of the hill sat a dilapidated shell of a house, its pitched roof protruding into the sky like an accusation, its shabby walls and windows paved with filth. The hill around it was shaved ugly and clean of foliage, save for clumps of frost-matted heather that shattered under their feet as they climbed to the door.

A new, deafening howl burst from ahead of them, and a dementor swept down from the open sky, its wide arms outstretched, cloak flapping. In the rich bath of moonlight, it looked almost gray, ghostly, like another phantom of the Shrieking Shack.

Hermione screamed, backpedaling. She ran into Draco, who had been a footstep behind her, and they collided, hard. She turned, starting to run away, but he gripped her and held her still, for they couldn't go back — the swarm was still surging up the hill behind them, like a tide of smoke.

Ron roared a word that Draco had never encountered outside of a book before.

"What do we do," said Draco tightly, as Hermione shook violently in his arms. "What do we do, Granger, tell us, what do we do—"

"I don't know! There's nothing about dementors in our textbooks! Cover to cover, they don't mention dementors once!"

"Then think, you're the smartest one here, if you can't think us out of this—"

The dementor sank down over them, its howl so piercing it blotted out the sound of his own voice. He could count the individual flakes of decaying skin on its weathered hands. It blotted out the sky above. It swallowed the blanket of stars. Draco made up his mind, shoved Hermione behind him, and closed his eyes, wondering what his soul would look like, if he had one, when he lost it.

"EXPECTO PATRONUM!"

White light blazed against the backs of his eyelids. He pried them open and saw a white shape fly over his head, tackling the dementor, which shrieked and swept away from them. It clawed fervently at the silvery creature — which was bipedal, but unmistakable animalistic, with stifle-jointed legs, long, unnatural arms like an ape, and a fanged snout. It would have been terrifying, had it not been in the process of saving Draco's life.

The dementor shook itself free of the silver beast and tore off into the night sky, its cloak fluttering behind it. One enemy vanquished, the beast whirled, trailing gusts of mist, and galloped head-on for the swarm of dementors, moving alternately on an eerie combination of two and four legs. The dementors peeled back as it approached, repelled by the exuberant shine coming off its skin, and fled in the wake of it. It chased them down the hill, back into the Forbidden Forest, with a speed that was both fearsome and deeply relieving, considering that it was driving them away from Draco's general direction.

"What was that?" Hermione whispered, pressed against Draco's back.

"A Patronus," said a gravelly, barrel-deep baritone.

Standing beneath them on the path to the Shack was a skeleton in a man's clothing. He was so thin that his skull pressed through the wax-paper skin of his face, and the hollows of his eyes were all but lightless, save for the faint sparkle of dark brown eyes lodged faintly in their depths. A tattered skein of muddy, matted hair hung to his elbows, and his clothes were gray rags, shapeless, like blankets hastily transfigured into robes.

He lifted his lips in a weak smile, and his teeth gleamed yellow.

It was Sirius Black.

"Hello," he rasped. "That's Harry Potter, isn't it?"

He pointed with his wand to Harry's body, still draped over Ron's back. Now that the dementors were gone, Harry was starting to stir, his hands twitching.

"If you want to kill Harry, you'll have to kill us, too," said Ron, lifting his wand.

"Kill him?" Black's jaw went slack, his expression almost crestfallen. "Why?"

When none of them answered, the criminal stepped forward tentatively, wetting his lips. “You’re his friends?” he rasped out. “Yes? Harry’s friends?”

“Stay back,” warned Draco, waving his wand. “You might be dangerous, but there’s four of us, and only one of you.”

“I have no intention of being a danger to any of you,” said Black, vaguely indignant.

“What do you want, then?” said Ron warily.

“What do I… what do I want — so many things. But if you must know… most immediately… at this juncture, I want to get inside that house.” He pointed at the Shrieking Shack.

“The Shack?” said Hermione, after a pause. “Why?”

“My, ah… my friend is in there, right now, at the moment,” said Black, full of a nervous energy that sent his eyes darting back and forth from Hermione’s face to the door. “And he needs me. So I hope you forgive me for the very rude thing I’m about to do.”

“What are you about to d—”

“Stupefy.”

The red spell caught Hermione in the chest. She crumpled to the ground soundlessly, her eyes fluttering closed.

Draco’s heart rate kicked somewhere into his throat. He dropped to his knees and snatched up her wrist, where to his relief, her pulse thrummed, hale and healthy, against his fingers.

“Hermione!”

Ron had no such assurances. He threw out his wand-hand at Black and roared, “Reducto,” but Black deflected the spell with a twitch of his wand and fired another Stupefy at Ron’s heart. It landed squarely, and Ron keeled over, sending both him and Harry tumbling into the gorse.

Draco scrambled back, wand outstretched. “Stop,” he begged, his voice thin with panic. “You’re — you’re my uncle. We’re family. You shouldn’t kill me. I’m your nephew. Well — once removed.”

Black did actually pause at that, his wand listing ever so slightly off-course. “You’re Cissa’s boy?” he said, in tones of wonder. “Cissa Black?”

“Yes! Yes, I’m her son. Narcissa’s. Narcissa’s son.” Draco was awash in relief. “Your nephew. I’m sorry we didn’t — we never got to meet.”

“You’d be her son with Lucius, then,” said Black, his eyes flitting over Draco’s person with the air of one taking inventory.

“Y-Yes. He was my father.”

“That explains the hair,” he said. “Was? Isn’t he still?”

“He was. He is. He’s — dead.”

“That’s a shame.”

“Really?” said Draco, surprised.

“No,” said Black. “Your dad was a thin squirt of blond shit. Ruined your mum’s personality while I knew her. Glad he’s dead, to be honest.” He lifted his wand. “But if you ended up friends with James’s boy, I guess she made a recovery. So I am sorry about this one. Truly.”

“No — no, no, no, don’t—”

The last thing he saw was a flash of red.

A strange, rhythmic creaking interrupted his sleep.

Draco lifted his head, blinking stars out of his eyes, and shoved back a hank of his hair. Above him, a shattered chandelier listed drunkenly from one of its supports, twirling on its axis. The brass arms creaked with each slow rotation of the ornament.

He was sprawled across the floor of what very well may have been the filthiest room he'd ever occupied in his life. The wallpaper peeled in gouged stripes, shaved through by cavernous claw-marks, and the furniture lay in cratered remains around a floor twice paved in detritus. Glass bejeweled the floor beneath shattered windows, through which a cool wind drifted, and between slats of nailed-up boards, the dark of a pitch-black sky lay thick behind the panes.

Beside him lay Harry, Ron, and Hermione, all of whom were stirring to life alongside him. They had been laid out together on a relatively unlittered patch of floor, away from the sharper rubbish. As if in consolation for their less than comfortable lodgings, a pillow had been tucked beneath each of their heads.

Draco sat up and braced himself on his elbows. Sirius Black sat on a chair in the corner, holding one wand in his right hand, and four in his left. In the corner lay a magnificent four-poster bed with dust-encoated hangings, and on that bed lay something large and furry, its chest undulating in the slow rhythm of sleep.

"What is that," Draco said, quietly, so as not to wake it.

Black, deep in thought, took a moment to respond. "Hm? Oh, he's no threat," he said. "I mean. Well. Technically he is, but he won't be. By the time he wakes up, he'll be alright again."

"That's a werewolf," said Hermione, in a very small voice. She had sat up, too, and drawn as far away from Sirius Black as she could without phasing through the wall of the Shack.

Black frowned. “Bit pejorative, when you put it that way,” he said. “He’s a person.”

“Be that as it may, on any other day of the month,” said Hermione, slowly, “right now, he’s a Class Five magical creature.”

“No, he’s napping,” said Black pointedly. “And I told you, you don’t have to worry about him. He’s taken his medicine.”

“I’d still like my wand, please,” she said, with laudable steadiness.

“Yes. No, that’s understandable. Unfortunately, I can’t give it to you just yet,” he said. “It’s nothing personal, I just don’t have very much confidence you won’t try to kill me.”

“Why?” said Harry. Draco hadn’t known the boy was awake, and turned, in surprise, to see him sitting upright against the leg of a sofa. His face was schooled in a plain serenity that only ever touched Harry when he was on the verge of apoplectic rage. “Why would I try to kill you?”

“It’s what I’d do, if I were you,” admitted Black.

“That’s fair,” said Ron, mostly to Harry.

Harry stood up. Black followed the movement with his wand.

“Are you going to kill me?” said Harry calmly. “My mum and dad weren’t enough, so you came here? Finish the job?”

Black did something strange, then: he convulsed, as if physically struck.

“No,” he said hoarsely. “I didn’t, Harry, and I won’t. Wouldn’t. You’ll never…” He closed his eyes, shook his head once, powerfully — like a dog, Draco thought — and opened them again. “I would let you kill me first, before that happened, Harry. Do you understand? I would let anyone kill me first. And I would want them to.”

Harry tilted his head, not understanding.

Black stood up, dropped the wands — all five of them, including his own, which clattered to the floor along with the others and rolled away from his feet. With trembling hands, he pointed to his own chest. “Harry, you haven’t seen me in a long time, so I understand if you don’t remember,” he said, “but I’m Sirius. Your godfather. I — I was your father’s friend, and I—”

“Don’t,” spat Harry.

“I was,” said Black, louder, “it’s the truth, I swear it on his grave, his and Lily’s both. I was his friend. No, hang that, I was his brother. I loved him, do you understand? I loved James Potter more than I have ever loved any — almost anything, certainly myself—”

“DON’T LIE!” shouted Harry. “Don’t lie to me — you KILLED him—”

“Peter Pettigrew killed your father!” Black roared, and rushed forward, his hands outstretched — to do what, to embrace Harry, to shake him, to claw at his shirt, Draco couldn’t tell, and never found out, for Ron read the act as some intolerable combination of the three, and leapt in front of Harry, arm coiled, just in time to haul his fist brutally into Black’s nose.

The force snapped Black’s head back on his neck and sent him reeling backwards, bellowing in shock. Blood splattered on the floorboards, joining a diverse menagerie of preexisting stains, and Black staggered to the wall, clutching his face. Hermione seized the opportunity, and scrambled forward on her hands and knees to snatch up three of the closest wands within reach.

Keeping her own, she held one each to Ron and Draco, who snatched his and trained it on Black.

The wanted man groaned, fingering his nose, but failed to respond in kind, either by magic or force. Instead, he croaked, “That's a cracking good arm, boy. Chaser or beater?"

Ron blinked. “What?”

“Well, I merely assumed,” he said, mopping the blood off his chin with a filthy sleeve. “Didn’t see you at the match, but that’s not to say you can’t play. Harry, you’re the best seeker we’ve had in years, James would have been in spasms… sorry about the dementors, by the way, I had no idea they’d swarm…”

“Sorry about the dementors?” said Harry, strangely, at the same time as Hermione exclaimed: “Oh, they came for you!”

“Course they came for me,” said Black grimly, shooting a scurrilous look out the window. “They did just now, too, in the Forest. They always swarm when I leave the Shack. This place is warded with enough Concealment Charms that they can’t get a whiff of me, that’s thanks to Dumbledore… he made sure it was good and hidden, for Moony… but that’s the trick of it, I can’t leave. I made it just by the skin of my teeth when I first arrived.”

“Then why did you come?” demanded Hermione. “You were free. Why come to the one place with the most security in the Wizarding World?”

Black gave a small, tremulous smile. “You sound like Moony,” he said fondly. “Did he ever read me the riot act, when I turned up here. But I couldn’t help it, I told him. You spend thirteen years dreaming of something, you can’t just let it go.”

“Dreaming of what?” said Hermione.

Black turned his smile at the floor, and put it away, like he was boarding up a house. “When James and Lily went into hiding,” he said, instead of answering, “I volunteered as Secret-Keeper. I wanted to do it. Who better, I said. Who do you trust more than me? But James said no, it would be too predictable. He said that anyone who knew him would assume it was me, and if I ever got captured, he didn’t want to make me lie.” He smiled a new smile, stiff, starched, deeply bitter. “As if I would have broken,” he said. “As if all the Cruciatuses in the world — anyway. They chose Peter, instead." He spoke now directly to Harry, who was staring at him.

"Peter Pettigrew," said Harry. "The man you killed?"

This, too, Black ignored. "Do you know how many minutes it took for Peter Pettigrew to break?" he whispered. "How many minutes of torture it took, to give up the life of his oldest friend? Guess how many minutes. I know the answer. I know it very well. I shared a cell with Antonin Dolohov." He repeated, louder, "How many minutes, Harry?"

"I don't know," said Harry, faint.

"Nine."

It was loud enough to make the chandelier rattle. The beast on the bed snarled, still dozing. Draco edged away from it.

"Nine minutes," said Black, glassy-eyed with rage. "Didn't even hold out into double-digits. Not even for James, he couldn't. James! His childhood friend. His only friend, sometimes. The man who defended him, and trusted him, and gave him a home, when no one else would've looked twice at him — the man he should've loved more than anyone, by rights — he gave him up after NINE MINUTES!"

Draco twitched up his wand, a Knockback Jinx on the tip of his tongue. But Black wasn't aggressive, at least not towards Harry; he turned, and paced the floor, full of a restless, animalistic energy.

"So I went after him," he said ruthlessly. "You say I killed him? I wish I had. And I would've whistled my merry way to Azkaban for it, too, if I'd only done the job right. But he got away from me, you see. And they found me, with blood on my hands, laughing at the sick joke of it all — that you were an orphan, little baby Harry, the spit of your father even then, and I couldn't even do you the honor of avenging them."

“But he’s dead,” said Harry woodenly. “Isn’t he? Peter Pettigrew, he’s —”

“Very much alive,” spat Black. “Trust me, I would have known, otherwise. Slimy little lump of pus, Wormtail, he always did know how to save his own skin. He got away from me, then. Not now, though. Now we’re together again, me and Moony, we have a deal — we’re going to find him—”

“Hang on,” said Ron, lifting a quelling finger. Black obeyed. “Sorry. Cool monologue. Problem: who’s Moony?”

“Who’s Moony?” repeated Black. “Why — it’s him.”

He gestured at the bed. “My friend,” he added, a little proudly.

“The werewolf?”

“No, a person,” Black retorted.

“You’re friends with him?” squeaked Ron. “How do you know he’s not going to — I don’t know, eat you—”

“It’s Lupin, isn’t it?” said Draco suddenly.

All turned to stare at him.

“The werewolf,” he added, jerking his chin at the bed. “It’s Remus Lupin. Your ‘friend.’”

To Harry, he added, “They were all friends at Hogwarts. James Potter, Sirius Black, Peter Pettigrew, and Remus Lupin. And Lupin leaves the castle on full moons.”

“I’m not even going to ask how you know that,” said Black softly. “I suppose any number of people could have told you, your mother being only one. But yes. Remus was the fourth Marauder.”

“Marauder?” exclaimed Harry. “Like the Map?”

Black broke into a brilliant grin. “Found it, have you?” he said. “Thank God. I dreamed a hundred terrible dreams where it wasted away in Filch’s closet, never to be misused again.”

“My dad made that map?”

“More like Remus did, actually,” said Black, tipping his head at the sleeping werewolf on the bed. “He came up with most of the spellwork. We merely mapped out the castle. Then he did the rest. He was always the cleverest of all of us.”

“Wait,” said Ron. “You called your friend — the werewolf — Moony?”

The grin reappeared, with an attitude that could only be described as ‘hangdog.’ “Padfoot,” he said, placing a hand on his own chest. “Nice to meet you.”

“Wormtail, for Peter,” said Hermione, reciting from memory. “And then—”

“Prongs, for James,” said Black, nodding. “It was, ah… something of an inside joke.”

“Okay,” said Ron, rubbing his temples. “Okay. Give me a second, would you? Moony. Merlin’s tits.”

“How do we know you’re telling the truth?” interrupted Hermione, though Harry was already staring at Black with an expression akin to reverence. “It’s a terribly convenient story you’ve got. Blame the whole thing on a dead man, and convince us you’re here to avenge someone who’ll never turn up to defend himself.”

Black sneered at her. “Could start with the fact that you’re alive. That was none too convenient to pull off, let me tell you.”

“Answer the question,” snapped Draco. Black flicked up his fingers, surrendering.

“It’s the truth, all right?” he said, still speaking mostly to Harry. “You can ask Moony when he wakes up. He believes me. He and I share too much history, for him to not… give me some Veritaserum, I’ll tell you the same. It was Peter Pettigrew, mark me. That’s the man who deserves to die. Not me.”

A pitiful whine came from the bed. Black hurried over to the four poster and snapped shut the hangings, hiding the creature from view. “He’s transforming,” he said quickly. “You lot should clear out, for a minute, if you don’t want to hear — it’s not always the prettiest thing—”

Groans and whimpers escaped from the bed, combined with a horrible crackling sound, like bones being shattered and ground into each other. A high, animal howl pierced the air. The sound grew thinner and reedier the longer it went on, and strains of a human yell emerged underneath it, segueing gradually into a full-throated scream of tremendous pain.

Black hurriedly cast off his outer cloak of withered gray, and leapt forward. Draco at first thought he was going to flop down on his face, but instead, the criminal transformed in midair into a large black German Shepherd, its fur matted thickly over its flanks. The dog leapt onto the mattress, and disappeared behind the hangings.

“What,” said Ron. “What. What!”

“Oh!” exclaimed Hermione. “Now, that makes sense!”

“What does?” said Harry, echoing Draco’s sentiments.

“He’s an Animagus,” she explained excitedly. “That’s how he traveled without being seen, and it’s probably how he snuck past the dementors. I wonder how long he’s been…? Because if that’s how he got close to Lupin while they were in school, that’s tremendously interesting. I suppose perhaps the werewolf doesn’t attack him in animal form, because it doesn’t read him as a threat? Or it perceives certain other animals as kin? I don't know, I'll have to ask him about it. Padfoot, oh, ha, ha, very funny…"

The horrible noise from within the bed was receding, replaced by the wet, raspy breathing of a very exhausted human being, combined with the whining and sniffling of a very large dog. Soon, Black reappeared from behind the hangings, swung his shaggy head around the room, and delicately picked up his discarded cloak between his teeth. He carried it daintily over to the bed and disappeared again.

"Thank you, Padfoot," said a calm, ragged voice.

The hangings drew back, and Remus Lupin peered out at them, blinking away the faint light of the chandelier. He was swaddled in Black's shabby traveling cloak, which draped about his bare shoulders and covered most of his scrawny, scarred body.

"Ah," he said. "Well. I suppose I have a lot of explaining to do."

"Not as much as you'd think," said Harry, unexpectedly kind. He put a hand on Ron's wrist and lowered his wand. "Professor, you're a werewolf."

Lupin looked down at himself. "Yes," he said. "It appears so."

"Does Dumbledore know?" said Hermione, minutely.

Lupin smiled. "Yes, he does," he said. "He's known ever since I was a student. He built this place for me, years ago, so that I would have somewhere to transform that wouldn't risk the other students… that was before we had a Potions Master quite so talented as our Professor Snape, and before I had access to the Wolfsbane Potion."

"Still can't believe Snivellus is a professor," muttered Black, who had transformed back to human form, and now reclined, nigh-luxuriant, on the pillows. "Of all the people. Did the corpse of Gellert Grindelwald turn him down? The Giant Squid?"

“Severus Snape is a genius,” said Draco, coldly. Black eyed him without affection.

“You think so? He told you that, did he?”

“I know it. And he’s the reason Lupin isn’t rampaging through the castle grounds right now, so—”

“Oi, watch it,” snapped Black, as soon as the word rampaging escaped his mouth. “Moony isn’t a danger to anybody, and it’s not as though Snape’s doing it from the kindness of his heart, is he? Dumbledore’s had to lean on him pretty hard to get him not to run and blab to the Ministry.”

“Yes, what a terrible person, wanting to tell the Ministry there’s a werewolf at a school for children,” said Draco coolly. “Certainly he’s got no one’s interests at heart but his own.”

“Remus,” said Black lowly, “is a threat to no one.”

Lupin tipped his head one way and then the other. “Well, I hope that’s not true,” he said mildly, shrugging the cloak higher about his shoulders. He poked around the bedding, presumably searching for his clothes. “I should like to think I’m something of a threat to my enemies, if not a terribly impressive one. And to your point, Draco, yes, Severus Snape is a remarkable Potions Master. Far better than Slughorn, who at his best could never have approximated the quality of Wolfsbane Potion that Snape produces for me monthly, and for which I am duly grateful. Nevertheless,” he added, “he remains, as he has always been, a hopeless and colossal knob. Sirius, where’s my wand?”

Harry guffawed in delight. Draco scowled.

“Right here, Moony.”

“Thank you.” He Summoned his clothes, and discreetly donned his shirt, which increased Draco’s comfort level by a non-inconsiderable amount. “Now. At this point, there are several avenues open to us.”

“Is this the part where you kill us?” said Ron fearfully. “I’d really like for this to not be the part where you kill us.”

“Play your cards right, we’ll try to work something out,” said Black easily. Ron gulped.

Lupin scoffed, flapping a hand chidingly in Black’s direction. “Nonsense. Ron, we’re not going to kill you,” he said kindly. “We’re not going to hurt you at all. For one thing, I’m still your professor, and I have a duty of care, which I take very seriously. So seriously, in fact, that Padfoot and I are going to have very cross words later about the inappropriateness of bringing you here during one of my transformations.”

Black folded his arms, frontloading a pout for this conversation in advance. “What was I supposed to do? Leave them out there as carrion for the dementors?”

“I believe that the terms we discussed involved you not leaving the Shack at all,” said Lupin, in a faux pleasantness that dripped with warning. “Seeing as doing that tends to bring down swarms of dementors, the likes of which gave cause for you to rescue, and subsequently Stun, the children in the first place, and Sirius, when I said we were going to have words later, I did mean all words synonymous with ‘later,’ and not ‘now.’”

Black clucked his tongue, mulish, and fell silent. Lupin turned back to the four of them, smiling calmly.

“No,” he said, “I really meant there are several avenues open to you. You know my secret now, obviously. Once I acquire a pair of trousers, I will escort you back to the castle, and you may do one of several things. You may find your way immediately to the headmaster’s office, where you will report that I am harboring a dangerous criminal in my custody on school grounds, in violation of Wizarding laws and Hogwarts bylaws alike. I will be prosecuted, probably imprisoned, and Sirius will be taken back into Ministry custody."

"Some of those things will happen," Black clarified, in sour tones. "Not all. Let's not get carried away." He said pointedly to Lupin, "Neither of us are going to Azkaban while I'm still breathing."

"Be that as it may," Lupin said, acknowledging it, "that is one option available to you four. Here is another: you may find your way instead to the Owlery, where you will write to the Department for the Control and Regulation of Magical Creatures, and report an unregistered werewolf in residence on Hogwarts grounds. The aurors will come for me, attempt to take me into custody, and Sirius will do… whatever he intends to do to prevent it. Best case, we flee, and end up in hiding somewhere damp and unpleasant. Worst case, we die."

"In a blaze of glory," said Black.

"In a blaze of glory, yes, thank you. Yet a third option," continued Lupin patiently, "very similar to the second, is that instead of the Ministry, you address your letter to the Board of Directors. They will react with shock and horror to the suggestion that a werewolf has been lurking amongst their children, ready to strike at any moment, but out of concern for the reputation of their school, they will probably insist that Dumbledore sack me quietly, to prevent the scandal from getting out. No aurors; no dementors; no dying blaze of glory." He smiled sadly, and spread his hands. "There you have it. You will note I have ranked these options in descending order of unpleasantness for me."

"But you haven't mentioned the other one," said Hermione, after a pause.

Lupin inclined his head at her, his expression very like he was calling on a student. "Which is?"

"We keep your secret," she said, as if it were obvious. "We don't tell anyone."

Draco made a noise of protest. “Hold on,” he said. “Let’s not make hasty promises—”

“I like this one,” said Black immediately. “What’s your name, again, girl?”

“Hermione,” she said. “Hermione Granger. But Professor, it’s the obvious answer, isn’t it? You haven’t hurt anyone. You have it under control. You’re not responsible for it, I mean, you can’t possibly help it. It’s a medical condition, if anything.”

Draco groaned. They were doomed: Hermione’s laser-focused Gryffindor Instincts had identified a Person Slash Group In Need, and there would be no preventing her from offering help. One could only climb aboard the Charity Express or get swept into the undertow.

Black was nodding heavily with every word. “Listen to her,” he said, pointing. “Exactly right. Medical condition, Moony, you hear that? Totally not responsible — entirely blameless—”

“And it wouldn’t be fair to dismiss you, or punish you,” she said passionately, “when you’ve been the best professor we’ve ever had, and worked so hard for us all year, only for us to turn around and reward you by — by betraying you. It wouldn’t be right.”

“I agree,” said Ron unexpectedly, speaking up for the first time in a while. He had apparently ruminated on the many nickname-related wrongdoings committed by the Marauders, and deemed them insufficient to merit prison. “You’re a decent bloke. Didn’t kill us. Barely hurt us, if you count a knock on the head. Saved our skins from dementors, that was class.” He nodded stiffly to Black. “Stands to reason. Shouldn’t turn you in.”

“As much as I appreciate that, you two,” said Lupin, with great tenderness, “you have quite kindly skirted around the part where I harbored a wanted man on Hogwarts grounds. To lie about that — to merely do nothing, even, to elect not to report me — would make you complicit in my crimes, and I do not know that I can accept infecting you all with my guilt."

"Infecting them all with your — oh, listen to yourself!" said Black irritably. "Would you stop trying to fall on every sword that sticks its nose out of the dirt? For five minutes? It's putting me right off."

"They deserve to make an informed judgment. I could not accept their sacrifice without knowing that they undertook it willingly."

"All right, so we'll undertake it willingly," said Hermione boldly. "I know what the law says, about reporting. I also know that we're students, and if you get discovered, it's not like they're going to come after a bunch of thirteen-year-olds for failing to… to turn in their favorite teacher. We can just say we didn't know the law."

"We're all moving pretty quickly past the part where we decide they're not guilty," Draco said pointedly. He looked around at the others. "Have we actually resolved that? We believe they're telling the truth? Full, complete, and entire? No reservations about this, none?"

"I respect your skepticism, Draco," Lupin said. "If you have any questions that would make you feel more comfortable, if answered, I would be pleased to do so."

"It's not — alright, it's not that you don't have the right answers," he said begrudgingly. "It's the principle of the thing. I don't exactly fancy getting someone tossed to the dementors, I just feel as though we should have a bit more of an inquest first, before we all throw in."

"A proceduralist," said Lupin, smiling. "Like your father before you."

"Well, yes!"

"I believe you," said Harry suddenly, interrupting them all. Lupin and Black both pivoted towards him with an almost amusing attentiveness, a hunger for his attention that Draco had often seen, but not recognized, in Lupin's gaze. "Both of you. I believe your story, and I believe you about Pettigrew. I don't… I don't want you to get captured. Or to die." He swallowed. "You're my godfather, you said?"

"Yes, I am," said Black, hungrily. He moved forward on the bed, with an animal grace. "He asked me the night you were born… I was first," he added, with a glance at Lupin. "By mutual agreement. The second — they always planned to have a second — would have been Remus's…"

"A second," said Harry, thick with emotion. "So there would have been a sibling. For me."

"Or two," agreed Black. "James was an only child, and he loathed it. He wanted a nice big family, he said, lots of boys and girls, plenty of people to play with. He joked about having a quidditch team, but Lily drew the line at three, so they probably would've landed around four or five, if you average it."

"It would have been three," said Lupin, in tones of amusement. Black shrugged, relenting.

"What else can you tell me about them?" said Harry, and there was hunger in his voice, too. "My parents?"

"Oh," said Black, looking at Lupin. "Oh. Harry — everything."

The answer lit Harry from inside, like a flame catching a wick. He glowed. "Everything?"

"Yes. No one knew James like me," he said proudly, puffing out his chest. "Not his own mother what changed his diapers. Ask me any question. I'll tell you whatever you want to know."

"Really?"

“Yes. But not tonight,” said Lupin firmly, standing up. He had acquired and discreetly vested himself with some pants, and hitched them up with a bit of string for a belt. “The sun will rise in a few minutes, and you all should be back in Gryffindor Tower when it does. If you do intend to keep my secret, then it will be easiest for you if you do not have to explain to Filch why you are starting your morning on the wrong side of the castle doors.”

“Great,” said Ron loudly. “I’m knackered. Let’s go—”

“Will I see you again, though?” Harry said to Black, worried. “You’re not leaving, are you? You’ll still be here?”

“’Course I will. ’Course. Can hardly leave, can I? I’m here whenever you need me.” Black crept all the way forward, until he perched on the end of the bed, like a filthy bird of paradise. “Come back to the Shrieking Shack, sometime, and we can talk about it,” he said, full of terrible bruised hope. “I’ll tell you everything. Whatever you want.”

“Okay.”

“Yeah? You’d like that?”

“I would,” said Harry, and Draco could barely look at him, so bright did that candle shine.

They gathered their wands, and Lupin healed a few minor scrapes and bruises they had picked up on their flight from the dementors. Harry received what must have been the millionth repair for his broken glasses, and Hermione fussed at a bump on her head where she’d hit the ground after being Stunned. Then Lupin took them down to the basement of the Shrieking Shack, where a hidden passage led them all the way under the Forest and up through the Whomping Willow.

Sirius Black accompanied them all the way to the very mouth of the passage. There, hunched in the earthy antechamber of the tunnel, he visibly dithered over how to bid them goodbye, and settled on pumping Harry's hand in a firm, energetic handshake that made them both eminently uncomfortable.

"Goodbye," he said. "For now. Come to the Shack. Really. Any old time. I'll — spruce it up a little, I know it's not the prettiest—"

"Well, it's not like you've got an interior decorator," said Ron generously, sticking out his palm, and after a moment's hesitation, Black clasped it.

"Good arm."

"Good aim," said Ron. "Teach me that spell, would you? The Stupefier?"

"What, a Stunner? It's simple. I imagine Moony could show you, too, but — of course, I'd be happy to. Not that you need it, with that right hook." He gave Ron's hand another respectful shake, and turned, halting, to Hermione.

"We don't have to shake hands," said Hermione, eyeing the crusts of fungus and miscellaneous brown matter under his fingernails.

Black cracked a grin. "You," he said, "remind me very much of a girl I used to know quite well as a boy. She was wise and terrible, and said all the right things at all the wrong times."

"That's nice," said Hermione. "I'd just as happily not remind you of anyone, though. I'm myself, and that's quite enough."

"Seems like it," said Black sagely, and tapped his forehead in a salute. She shuffled her feet, awkwardly, and did the same. Draco snickered.

Which brought Black's attention, finally, to him. "You and I," he said, "are long overdue for a conversation."

"We've known each other for about nine hours," said Draco. "I was unconscious for eight of them."

“I know. I’ve been carrying most of our conversations on my back, boy.” Black croaked a laugh, and slapped him on the shoulder. If his arm had held a scrap of muscle on it, instead of skin and raw sinew and bone, Draco might have been shaken. “Really. I mean it. You and me, the full ten rounds. Everything you never wanted to know about the Black family, and everything that’s happened since. You understand?”

“Not at all,” said Draco honestly. “You’re nothing like my mother. I’m not sure I currently believe the two of you were related.”

“No? You didn’t know your mother at Hogwarts. I did. You’d understand it more, if you had… but you’ve got to go,” he said, catching Lupin’s eye. “So I’ll make you the same offer I made Harry. Come back. Anytime.”

He had resigned himself long ago to the necessity of shaking Black’s hand, and now, having thus girded himself, managed to execute the gesture with minimal skulking or flinching. He wiped his hand surreptitiously on his pants when it was done.

They emerged from the tunnel under the Whomping Willow as the first pink fingers of dawn split the sky. Lupin hung behind, saying whatever his own goodbyes were to Black, and emerged belatedly from the tunnel-entrance to hurry after them, his matted hair ruffling in the morning breeze.

“What do you think the deal is, with them?” said Ron quietly, before Lupin came within earshot. The lake glowed with the burgeoning sunrise, and the air tasted crisp and cold, like fresh mint in cool water, the flavor of a bright winter morning.

“What do you mean?” said Hermione.

“Black and Lupin,” said Ron, nodding at the approaching professor. “There’s something up there, right? That’s not exactly a friendship, is it?”

“God,” said Draco immediately and soulfully, “please, don’t let’s talk about this. I have had a rough enough night without you deciding we should all let’s talk about this.”

Heedless of his prayers, Hermione said thoughtfully, “I assumed they just had a close bond. Sirius did say James was his brother, you know — perhaps it’s the same for them.”

“Yeah?” said Ron. “You got any brothers?”

“Admittedly, no.”

“Well, I do,” he said. “Five of them. And there’s not one of them — not one, not even Fred or George — who acts that way with each other.”

Harry, wandering up ahead of them, had no comment on the matter. He was apparently lost in thought. For that silence, Draco loved him, deeply and earnestly.

“Hm,” she said doubtfully. “I suppose it’s a very… intimate thing, when you get down to it. Enduring all those transformations, side by side, for years. You’d probably end up acting a bit odd around each other no matter what. It’s an intense physical experience.”

“Granger,” said Draco, with religious intensity, “I will pay you so much money to never say the words ‘intense physical experience,’ with respect to a teacher, ever again.”

“I was using the words literally! I didn’t mean anything salacious!”

“I could see it,” mused Ron. Lupin was now close enough that they were sailing close to dangerous waters, talking about this, and if he gave any sign of having overheard them, Draco resolved to walk straight into the lake. “Not that I love thinking about it, mind, he’s still my professor. But I want to get out ahead of this, in case the opportunity comes up to say ‘I told you so,’ later on: I could see it. For the record.”

“It is inescapably so noted,” said Draco. “Now, can we talk about something else, please? For instance: I’m thinking of greens and blacks, for my funeral. Closed-casket, obviously; death by humiliation is bad for the skin.”

They trekked up the grassy knoll to the castle, tousled by the morning wind, and the last leaves of November fluttered down around them in a ballet of brass and gold. In daylight, the grounds no longer seemed so ominous, nor half so full of terrors, as they had the night before; indeed, there was a warmth to them that had not existed yesterday, as they had met the terrors full in the face, unearthed the monster under the bed, and known it by daylight for a friend.

miscellaneous notes:

-shoutout to the person in the comments who was like "oh are we going to see Peter?" in response to the sneak peek last chapter. the answer is: sort of! for my self indulgence is limitless and my patience is not.

-in retrospect that is on me for using "Marauder," singular, though I thought it was a fun play on words. the gag is that lupin is supposedly the "last" Marauder, according to Snape, but the twist of the chapter is of course... that he's not!

-shoutout also to severus "never not bitter" snape, who eats spite for breakfast lunch and dinner. sir please put down that poker. you're scaring your godson. go eat a snickers

-sneak peak for next chapter: just in time for the holiday season, it's a christmas episode! writing ch22 was the most fun I've had writing any chapter yet, and that's saying something, because writing this thing only gets more and more fun with time.

CH22 is slated to drop tuesday or wednesday of next week; I'm traveling this weekend, and workslammed to hell, but since the fic is pre-written up to like CH30, I'll be sure to have something out on schedule. cheers!

A Hairy Little Christmas

Chapter 22: A Hairy Little Christmas

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

As the term ended, the sky blanched a white so clear it was almost iridescent, and a gilt of glittering snow erased the muddy grounds. Strains of Christmas music floated through the halls, and the Charms classroom hung with enchanted illusions of real fairies. Thoughts turned toward vacation plans, and on the last day of term, the faculty elected to dismiss classes at noon, rather than struggle through the illusion that anyone was still paying attention.

The last weeks of Defense Against the Dark Arts were strange. Watching Lupin lead a class exercise, calm and dignified in his professor’s robes, Draco could simply not imagine it was the same man he had seen emerge naked from the tattered bed in the Shrieking Shack. He wondered, a bit wildly, whether the gaggle of girls who trailed him at speed through the hallways would react the same way if they knew his secret — and then he wondered who else knew. Snape was brewing his Wolfsbane Potion, at Dumbledore’s behest, so there were at least two on the faculty. But did McGonagall know? Sprout? Hagrid? Surely not Hagrid; the giant couldn’t keep a secret to save his mother’s life.

Harry, meanwhile, started to hang back after class in D.A.D.A. These chats with Lupin would only last for fifteen or twenty minutes, and he would come hurrying in late to lunch, making excuses for the delay, as if they didn’t know exactly what had kept him. Draco would have begrudged him nothing except the flimsiness of the excuse, but he did wonder what all the two were doing, once everyone else left. There couldn’t possibly be that much to say about one’s parents, could there?

But when Hermione — whose curiosity could be relied on to conquer her tact — finally plucked up the courage to ask him, Harry surprised them all.

“He’s helping me with dementors,” he said. He examined the architecture of a towering BLT, deemed it wanting, and added another floor of bacon. “I asked him to help me stop, er…”

“Swooning like a girl?” suggested Ron helpfully. A sprinkle of enchanted snow from the Great Hall ceiling piled on his shoulder, and he flicked it off.

“Passing out, yeah, thanks.”

“Is there a way to stop them?” said Draco curiously. “I thought they couldn’t be killed.”

“Can’t kill them. There is a spell you can do to ward them off, a bit,” said Harry, mortaring mustard. “It’s complicated, though. Sirius did it, when he rescued us, and Lupin can do it, too, but it’s hard to pull off.” He gave them a rough account of the Patronus Charm.

“A happy memory?” said Hermione, intrigued. “That’s all? Why, that’s easy.”

“You think?” said Harry, a bit tartly. “Try pulling one when you’re staring down seven feet of misery in a cloak, and get back to me.”

“Oh, could I?” she said, missing the point spectacularly. “Would he mind? I wouldn’t want to intrude. But if he’s already teaching you…”

“Merlin,” said Ron. “Term’s only just finished, and you want more homework already?”

“Actually, no,” she said. Draco choked on a bit of potato. “I’m worried — clear your throat. Do you need a napkin? — I’m worried about the amount that we’ve already got. I started on some of it this morning, and I don’t think we’ll have time to do that and the Charms essay and the practice potion Snape's assigned unless we pull a double-shift on Boxing Day…"

"That's it," said Ron, standing up. "We're going to see Hagrid."

"Why?"

"Because you need to be removed as far from any all books as possible, and I want to talk him out of giving us homework."

Meanwhile, the rest of the castle waxed festive near Christmas. Coronets of holly and mistletoe wreathed each window, and the Great Hall sprouted twelve stout Christmas trees, bedazzled with rhinestones and popcorn garlands. A group of students had lit a twelve-foot menorah at the foot of the faculty table earlier in December, and it was left there, decked with red bows, even though Hanukkah had passed. In the Great Hall, seven candles the size of Douglas firs rested on a dais near the entrance, three red, three green, one black. The smell of roast goose and baking bread filled the castle at all hours as the kitchens threw themselves into preparing the feast. Draco watched it all with the curiosity of a first year. He had never stayed at Hogwarts over the holidays before. Now and then he thought about the Manor at Christmastime, and how the snow piled on the gables, and the enchanted topiaries bounded around like deer in the fresh snow, and felt homesick for it. But these thoughts were increasingly few and far between, especially because he had so little time by himself in which to think them. It was astonishing how often there was something happening in Gryffindor Tower, now the term was done: either Fred and George were making a pilgrimage to the kitchens, or Seamus was offering to trade cassettes; Hermione wanted to review their Charms homework, or Angelina and Harry wanted to squeeze in an extra quidditch practice, or Ginny wanted them to teach her to fly chaser. Altogether, he spent more hours on his feet during the holidays than he did during term.

On Christmas morning, Draco woke first, sleepily, to the sound of doves cooing in the eaves, and several moments later, fully, to a pillow in the face.

“Presents!” roared Ron, scrambling back to his bed before Draco could reply in kind. “Geddup! Geddup, Harry! Presents!”

The Boy Who Lived was fumbling with his glasses. At the foot of their beds sat heaps of parcels in wrapping paper and twine. Draco found, to his satisfaction and slight embarrassment, that his pile was the largest and most numerous of any in the room.

A tap came at the door. “Are you decent?” Hermione called, muffled, and Ron bounded over to open the door.

“Close enough! Come in.”

“Merry, merry.” She wore a fluffy pink bathrobe and fuzzy slippers, and her hair was pinned up. She carried an armful of presents, and bustled around the dorm, handing out. “Ron, that’s for you. And Harry… Draco, there you go…”

It was just as he’d hoped: three new cassettes of muggle music, with little notes in her neat scrawl explaining who they were. He tucked them carefully away beside his Walkman, which he kept in a velvet purse in his bedside table, positively swaddled in anti-theft enchantments.

“Cheers, Granger,” said Draco happily. He ducked under his bed, and retrieved her present from its dusty, top-secret confines behind the skirt. “Merry Christmas.”

“You didn’t have to,” she said, but he could tell she was pleased.

“Go on, open it, then.”

She did, peeling away the leaves of tissue paper, and shook out a long tyrian peacoat, with shiny gold buttons and lining of black silk. She gasped.

“But this must have been expensive!”

“Hardly, it’s not even custom,” he said. “Now you needn’t wear those ridiculous muggle clothes when it’s cold out. Check the box.”

A set of Swiss caramels hid under the last layer of wrapping. She gave a coo of delight, and sat down on his bed to tear them open at once.

Ron had demolished half of his pile already. “Sweater, from Mum,” he said carelessly, tossing something hideous and maroon onto the bed behind him. “Bet you’ve got one, too, Harry.”

Harry had. So, to his surprise, had Draco, who unearthed a shaggy woolen sweater in sea-green, with a white lion stitched into the back.

“Oh, she used the good yarn, for you,” said Ron enviously. “The twins and I always get stuck with the colors she can’t get rid of, after she’s done Bill and Charlie and Dad.”

“That wasn’t necessary,” said Draco, surprised. He shook it out, found it more or less fitted to his measurements, and shrugged it on. The wool was pilly, and somewhat loose around the shoulders, but it was perfectly warm. “I like it,” he decided. “Weasley, what’s your address? I’ll send a thank-you note.”

“Don’t you dare,” hissed Ron. Draco smirked and hocked a pack of nut brittle at him.

They dawdled so long over presents that by the time they made it down from the dorms, it was almost midday. The Gryffindor table piled high with a mountain ridge of griddlecakes, crowned by peaks of syrup and powdered sugar. Ron and Hermione competed to see who could construct the most horrifying monument to tooth decay, and then annihilated them with similar grace, giggling when they got powdered sugar on their noses and in their hair. Fresh snow lay in a blanket over the lawns, spotted by looping chains of footprints and several snowmen of various elaborateness, including a full-scale, architecturally sound reconstruction of the Tower of Pisa undertaken by a club of Ravenclaw seventh years. After breakfast, the four of them went on a tour of the snow menagerie, and a small argument broke out over the tower's construction: Hermione remarked that it was listing several degrees too far, and Draco asserted that it was not, merely settled on a hill, and they got into an argument about whether or not one measured the radial angle from sea-level or the foundation, and ultimately agreed that they could not settle the question without building their own to find out.

While the two of them bickered and sniped at each other over blueprints, Harry and Ron built a lumpy, hunch-backed snowman of their own. The miserable creature wore a threadbare wig of willow leaves, and had a pair of V-shaped twigs for eyebrows. Ron called it "Snowpe."

Flushed and wet from snow, they tramped back up to the common room when the sun started going down, and dressed for the party.

Fred and George had promised a shindig, and Gryffindor parties never failed to deliver. Out of respect for inter-house unity, and fear of Percy's legendary scoldings about messes in the Common Room, they held it in the Astronomy Tower. To prevent it being shut down, twins had negotiated a cautious ceasefire with the faculty on condition that only third years and up would be in attendance, so they were met at the entrance by Lee Jordan in a beefeater hat and a long fake beard.

"PASSWORD," he bellowed, flinging his arms over the door. Music thumped from behind him, and laughter.

"Oh c'mon, Lee, it's us," said Ron.

"WRONG!"

"You know us! I've been sleeping two doors down from you for three years!"

"Also WRONG," boomed Lee. "Here is a HINT! It rhymes with 'WHEEZE'!"

“Please?” said Hermione, politely.

The door swung open abruptly, and Fred poked his head out. Glitter dusted his hair, and he wore a pair of antlers on a headband. “God bless,” he said fondly. “It’s ‘feces.’” He handed Lee a red plastic cup of punch. “Go on and let ’em in, anyway, Jordan. Except for that redhead, I don’t like the look of him.”

“I’m your brother!”

“No wonder, then.”

“CORRECT,” intoned Lee, and stepped aside.

He opened the door into a sea of bodies and twinkling lights. The Astronomy Tower had decked out in fairy lights and chiffon streamers, and filled with loud muggle Christmas music; at least, Draco assumed it was muggle (some breathy-voiced man was whining about ‘last Christmas’ to a profusion of synths). Every student left in the castle had attempted to cram themselves into the Tower. Lavender Brown and the Patil twins were perched on a table, sipping cups of punch, wearing short little skirts with white fluffy trim. Oliver Wood and Roger Davies, tied neck and neck for the ugliest sweater in attendance, were having a profound, philosophical, and indelibly drunken debate in the corner. And dancing happily on a tabletop, swaddled in enough knitwear to warm a legion, was — Draco startled in pleasant surprise — Dobby the house-elf, holding a fingerbowl of butterbeer.

“Merry Christmas, Mister Draco!” he squeaked. He was obviously a bit tipsy. He threw his arms around Draco’s neck, and then whisked up his sleeves, showing off a row of elaborate hair ties and bows running from wrist to elbow. “It is so good to be seeing you! You are growing more handsome every year! Dobby is sorry he is not visiting, but he is having many adventures with his new friends, and is always working hard on kitchen duty. Spratt is having him guard the pantry, since this year there is always someone sticky-fingered trying to sneak around — but look! Dobby has found more crunchies!”

Hermione giggled. “That’s nice, Dobby,” she said. She pulled a blue one from her wrist, and offered it to him. “Would you like one more? Merry Christmas.”

“Grain Jar!” cried Dobby. “Thank you, thank you! Merry Christmas!”

He gifted them both aluminum tins full of ice cream — “Dobby has made it himself! Haggis flavor, you are not finding it nowhere else!” — and bobbed off to dance with some of the other kitchen elves. Hermione cracked hers, sniffed it, and turned a verdant shade of green.

A bowl of something bright blue and sparkling sat on a table with some Christmas cookies and snacks. Draco could have clocked it as alcoholic at fifty yards, merely by its context, but when they got close enough to smell it, his suspicions were pungently confirmed.

“Eugh, jungle juice,” said Ron, sniffing his cup. “You could clean bedpans with this stuff.”

“But that’s illegal,” said Hermione, scandalized. “We’re all underage!”

“In traces,” Hermione sniffed. “This smells like moonshine. Look! That person is drinking vodka!”

“What, neat?”

“Is this normal?” she hissed at him, whaling on his sleeve. “Is underage drinking part of Wizarding culture? I didn’t read about that, anywhere!”

“Yes,” he said gravely. “I’m afraid you’re witnessing the practice of a time-honored tradition, sacred to our culture. It’s been venerated by our people since the beginning of time.”

“Purebloods?”

“Teenagers,” he said.

They took sparkling ciders and struggled their way over to a table. The music changed to a jazzy, syncopated standard about a sleighbound vagrant called Zanna Claws, and people took the slower song as a break for drinks. A fourth year in a short red dress pressed out of the crowd and tapped Harry on the shoulder. “Hi,” she shouted. “D’you want to dance?”

Harry spit juice back into his goblet. “Oh,” he said, fumbling it back to the table. “Um, I don’t know how. Sorry.”

“Well, that’s okay,” she said, twisting her fingers nervously. “I don’t either, really.”

“You don’t?” said Harry, baffled. “Why’d you ask, then?”

Draco and Ron both seized with twin spasms of grief. Hermione, hand sealed over her mouth, heaved with silent laughter.

The poor girl faltered. “Oh,” she said. “Sorry. If you don’t want to—”

“No, no,” said Ron firmly, kicking Harry to his feet, “he does. Ignore him, he keeps his brain in the quidditch locker—”

“Oy!”

“—but he’d love to dance, honest. Just take the lead, he’ll get the picture. Go on, Harry,” he added, as Harry, wild-eyed, stumbled to his feet. “Make a friend, eh?”

Smiling shyly, the girl took his hand and led him to the dance floor. Harry stared at Ron over his shoulder, begging wordlessly for help.

“Poor Harry,” laughed Hermione. “You steamrolled him.”

“Nah. It’ll be good for him. About time he threw one of those girls a bone.”

“One of them?” said Draco suddenly. “You don’t mean to tell me there are girls, plural, afflicted with some incomprehensible measure of — feelings, for Potter?”

“Oh, yes,” said Hermione serenely, and her lack of surprise disturbed him even more. “He’s quite popular in the girls’ dorm. Parvati had a mean crush on him, in first year; and of course, there’s Ginny.”

“Who we think’s in recovery,” advised Ron. “Still claims he’s fit, though. Blech.”

“But — but—” Something toothy in the back of Draco’s head pricked up its ears. “But he’s scrawny. And doesn’t dress. And he never brushes his hair.”

“So?” said Hermione, amused. “You’ve seen pictures of muggle rockstars, haven’t you? It’s in style.”

On instinct, he touched his own carefully gelled coif of hair. “Maybe for muggles, it is,” he said dourly.

This opened up a world of possibilities both daunting and novel. Did Ron have a crush, too? Hermione? Did she stay up at night, dreaming of boys with shaggy hair and too many rings? That felt dreadfully out-of-character, and somehow disappointing. He gave her a skeptical once-over — she sipped her pumpkin juice, placid in her ignorance — and reassured himself that he would have heard about it. Hermione couldn’t hide her feelings to save her life. Draco hadn’t any crushes; maybe that put him behind the curve. The whole business felt horridly premature.

“Granger,” he said suddenly, shaken to the core by the most wretched idea of all.

“Hm?”

“You don’t have a crush on Potter, do you?”

He glared at her suspiciously. She stared back, jaw agape, and then burst into laughter.

“No!” she exclaimed. “He’s — why, I don’t — Harry? Me? He’s like my brother!”

“That’s what they always say,” said Ron sagely, rendering Draco aghast.

“You can’t,” he told her severely. “Granger, I mean it. You’re forbidden from having a crush on Potter. I won’t allow it.”

“You won’t allow it,” she repeated, amused. “Okay. Well, if I detect any touchy-feely sensations, I’ll be sure to file a permit application with your office.”

“Seriously. For your own good.”

“Oh, and I do appreciate it, really. What about Ron? Is he out of bounds too?”

“Mione, I’m flattered, but it would never work out between us,” said Ron, putting a hand to his breast. “It’s me or the cat, and I know where I stand.”

“Shut up,” she laughed, and went to get another cookie, putting welcome end to an altogether vexing conversation.

Harry staggered back to the table after two songs, sweaty and too discombobulated to give a thorough report. “She was sort of, like — handsy,” he said at length, upon a full press from Draco and Ron. “She kept trying to, er… put her head on my shoulder.”

“What was her name?” inquired Hermione.

He blinked at her, stone-faced. “You know,” he said, “I didn’t find out.”

“Harry!”

“Oy, Draco!” called George. He was standing by the door, one foot out, one foot in. “These three weirdos out here claiming you invited them.”

“What?”

George stuck his head out the door, conferred briefly, and reappeared. “Do you know anyone called Theodore Snot?” he said loudly. “Or Dagny Green Ass?”

“Let them in, they’re with me,” he said hurriedly, springing up. George reluctantly opened the door.

“You’re killing me, Blondie,” he added, as the three new guests trailed in. “Slytherins? Really?”

“They won’t cause trouble.”

“Trouble is fine,” said George severely. “Trouble is good.” He gave Theodore — looking thoroughly out of place in a black suit and tie — a stern glance. “Bullies get hoisted upside-down by their panties from the Tower rafters.”

Draco went tense, anticipating friction. But the bait was left untouched.

“Noted,” said Theo calmly. “Let me know if you find any, that sounds fun.”

George stared at him. Then he turned to Draco, pained.

“And don’t let him near me,” he ordered, pointing at Theodore. “If I start to like him, I’ll be so mad, you’ve got no idea.”

He disappeared into the crowd, presumably to go deal with another group demanding entrance.

“Really feeling the Gryffindor hospitality,” remarked Theo, sliding his hands into his pockets. “You lot do know how to throw a party, though it’s not quite the atmosphere I’d have chosen.”

“It’s splendid,” said Daphne, who had dressed to absolute murder in a silver evening gown and heavy bangles. Her hair swept into a chic chignon at the base of her neck, and she compensated for the lack of crutches by leaning on the arm of their third member — who was not, Draco realized with a start, their usual counterpart. It was a short, willowy Slytherin with a close-shaven head like a small brown egg, and voluminous hazel eyes, ringed in gold eyeliner.

“Blaise Zabini,” he said smoothly, extending his hand. “It’s nice to meet you. My mother is Tatiana Ortelagn neé Zabini. Neé Septimus. Neé Mountbatten—”

“Quick, Draco, introduce yourself, or we’ll die here,” drawled Theo. Blaise smiled at him sweetly, and lifted his middle finger.

“Draco Malfoy. Obviously.” He shook hands. “At the risk of being rude,” he added, “not that it’s not nice to meet you, Zabini—”

“Pansy’s home for the holidays,” explained Daphne. “She sends her regrets, though. She’d really rather be here.”

“And the thing is, she’s not even lying,” said Theo. “Muggle music and all. Poor thing. We’ll have to kidnap her, one of these days, I need the other half of my brain back… anyway, I hope you don't mind we've sprung Blaise on you, but he was simply rabid to meet Harry Potter."

"Liar," purred Blaise. "I was conscripted. You told me Daph needed a date."

Daphne's face did a strange thing, and she swept her fringe quickly behind her ear. It was a movement so uncharacteristically awkward that Draco frowned at her, but no one else seemed to notice, least of all Theo, who shrugged. "I like an entourage," he said. "It makes me feel important. Let's say hello, anyway, and be polite. I shouldn't like to end up in the rafters."

He brought them back to the table of Gryffindors. Harry stood up, ever courteous; Ron, after a long, long pause, did the same. Hermione said awkwardly, "There's not — we need a chair—" and darted off to get one.

There was a lot of inelegant scuffling around as they arranged themselves, trying to avoid stepping on each other's toes, and nobody quite seemed to know what to say to each other.

"Hello, again," said Ron to Theo, surprisingly civil. "Nott. Good to see you. And Greengrass, isn't it? I like your bracelets."

Daphne beamed. "Thank you, Ronald," she said. "You're a darling."

"If we're on first names, you'd better call me Ron," he said. "My mum's the only one who calls me Ronald."

Draco was briefly glad of Ron's random and incandescent strokes of good form, which always seemed to fall when you least expected them.

"Introductions," Draco barked, finally finding his voice. "Blaise, you don't know anybody yet. This is Harry Potter. Boy Who Lives, mostly for lack of trying, second best player on the Gryffindor team. To the left: Ronald Weasley, of the Devon Weasleys, who if he weren't a champion pighead of a Cannons fan might not be an entirely deplorable man to talk to about quidditch. Next—"

"I can introduce myself, Draco, really—"

"—Hermione 'Eat My Dust' Granger, so-called for the invisible annotation in the class ranks, probably the only reason McGonagall hasn't offed herself yet. Ask about her favorite book, if you've got a few years to kill." He turned to the table. "Did I miss anything?"

"Hullo," said Harry.

"Cheers," said Ron.

Hermione said primly, "It's nice to meet you."

Theodore nodded, listening, and then held out an arm to his companions, presenting them. "Daphne Greengrass," he said. "A.K.A. 'The Face,' eldest scion of the Wiltshire Greengrasses, loather of school, lover of cats. The smirk that launched a thousand ships." He moved his hand. "Blaise Zabini, A.K.A. 'The Egg,' everyone's favorite accident, stands to inherit about six different castles, if any of you are in the business of gold digging. He likes strawberries and long walks on the beach."

"Six?" said Ron faintly.

Blaise wiggled his hand. "Last one's more of a villa."

Ron set down his goblet, hard.

"Like to go out some time?"

Blaise grinned at him.

"Do you have any cats?" said Hermione to Daphne, leaning over the table.

“Two. Duchess and Princess, four and six. Colourpoint Persian and Sphynx purebreds, respectively.”

“Very nice,” said Hermione politely. “I have a red one. His name’s Crookshanks.”

“Marvelous,” said Daphne appreciatively. “Is he fat?”

“A bit plump, maybe.”

“Excellent.”

“Draco,” murmured Theo, leaning into his ear, “I regret to inform you that the cross-cultural exchange is going alarmingly well. We must reintroduce house tensions posthaste. Quick, say something stupid and melodramatic.”

“I’m Theodore Nott. I like an entourage, it makes me feel important.”

“Pratt,” exclaimed Theo, though Draco refused to apologize for taking the obvious shot. “Now I can’t say something clever and subtly bigoted in rejoinder. We’ve missed our chance.”

Draco held his tongue between his teeth. He thought about asking Theo what he’d been doing in Hogsmeade, with the two wizards outside the pub — nefarious or not, all the slinking-around made him want to be wary of Theo on principle — but he couldn’t think to explain how he knew about it, and frankly, his chances of getting a straight answer were slim, anyway. At any rate, Theo kept his own business. If he had certain shady connections, well, he couldn’t help his father’s politics. It didn’t mean there had to be anything insidious about it.

A triple harmony of laughter broke out from Harry’s side of the table, where he held Blaise and Ron spellbound, trying to explain his uncle’s occupation. “No, it’s real,” Harry was saying, struggling not to laugh, “it’s a thing you hold in your fist, and then you turn it on, and the bit drills into — into whatever you're trying to bore through — Ron, stop, I'm trying to — to explain—"

"Drills in, does it?" said Blaise delightedly, twirling his index finger. "This long, pointy appendage? Penetrates things?"

"Right. So it spins, and you push it in—"

"You push it in?" hooted Ron. He and Blaise elbowed each other excitedly. "You push it in!"

"Quickly, or slowly?" demanded Blaise, rapt.

"It — I don't know, I've never used one—"

"No?" said Ron thickly, knuckling his mouth. "Makes one of us — I use mine all the time—"

"Gross," Harry said, grinning, while Blaise shrieked and threw his head onto Ron's shoulder. "Actually gross. What are you, nine?"

Meanwhile, Daphne and Hermione had burrowed into the arcane science of cat pedigrees. Hermione was listening intently as Daphne conducted an energetic tour of the European breeding genealogies, with enough detail to fill a dissertation. In a stroke of extraordinary luck, Draco thought, she had found perhaps the one person in the castle, nigh Britain, who would remember every word.

For the next hour, Draco played little part in the conversation. The combined forces of the other six churned the conversation into a rip current, which swept back and forth depending on the vivacity and energy of a given party. Theo and Ron traded relays of barbed remarks across the table, an elegant dance up to the very knife-edge of rudeness without crossing it, though undercut by the distracting cross-current of Blaise and Hermione's attempt to have a perfectly genial conversation about Middlemarch. Daphne performed a brief, abortive attempt at seduction on Harry that failed emphatically on every cylinder, and served to amuse everyone at the table, which was obviously the point. Draco watched the strange social ecosystem thrum to life, pleased and a little amazed, for though none of them seemed to quite trust each other — and though more than a few jabs crossed the line from poking to piercing — the animal families of snakes and weasels suffered a great deal of metaphorical abuse — the bonds of courtesy held fast. They strained, and whined, and sometimes splintered, but they never broke, and so the fourteen-legged creature at the table staggered forward in their arms, miraculously alive.

He liked Blaise, though after watching him, he decided he was too much like Theo. He had a native fluency in tact that made him an unflappable conversation partner, and yet was somehow still capable of enormous earnestness, a combination that only ever came from remarkable self-confidence, as if he had seen the rotten depths of himself and had not been unsettled in the least. He reminded Draco a little of Narcissa.

Theo, too, was in rare polite form, going so far as to compliment Hermione's sweater (it was not good) and tell her he was glad to hear she had made a full recovery from last year.

"It was the strangest thing," he said, "I'd spent all those months waiting for top ranks in Transfiguration, and once I got there, I found it didn't suit me at all. There was all this pressure to do everything perfectly, instead of simply do well — just ghastly. Never don't be the best again, Granger, I insist on it."

"Thanks," she said. "I won't. And I'm sorry Draco threw you into the wall."

"Under false pretenses," Draco objected.

"You did do that, didn't you?" said Theo, revelatory. "Hm. Well, I've made up for it by bewitching his mum. Speaking of which, how is Narcissa? Not home by herself, is she?"

"No, she's off in the Maldives with Briselda."

“She writes to me, you know. We have a lovely correspondence.”

“You’re about to have a lovely correspondence with my hand, if you take that tone.”

As the evening went on, they had more drinks, ate slices of a towering Yule Log that Fred had to cut with some kind of scimitar, and Seamus tried to launch a firecracker from the Tower window, the aftermath of which saw Dean Thomas sprinting through the crowd with a bucket of water. Daphne begged a dance off every boy at the table, starting with Harry, and working clockwise through Draco, Blaise, Ron, and Theo — or would have done, had Theo not excused himself. Blaise chivalrously offered a second round, but Daphne, with all the bravado of a queen, said: “No, let’s be modern. Hermione, fancy a quadrille?”

“I suppose so, if you show me how,” said Hermione gamely, and they departed together just as Theo returned to the table.

“Is Daphne a traditionalist, much?” Draco asked Theo, watching the pair of girls twirl in stumbling giggles across the floor.

“Hm?” He followed his eyes. “No. Not really. She’s not politically-minded enough for it.”

“So she doesn’t care that Granger is…”

“Well, even if she did,” Theo said reasonably, “it’s a party, and Daph’s your guest, and Granger’s your friend. There are rules to be observed.”

“That being said.”

“That being said,” he agreed, “Daph doesn’t care. Not when it comes to this stuff, anyway. She’s not going to breed with a mud— muggle-born, now. But if it’s someone like Granger, and they’re polite, and sentient, and everything—”

“What about you?” Draco interrupted.

Theo sighed and sprawled into his chair, one arm draped over the back. “Who knows,” he said. “I’m percolating on it.”

“Finish percolating.”

He rolled his eyes. “I respect Granger. All right? Is that the issue? Considering her circumstances, she’s done something rather remarkable, getting as far as she has, and I can see why you’re fond of her. I grant you, she’s very close to our level.”

“How do you mean, ‘close’? She trounces all of Slytherin in the class ranks, and you know it.”

“Pardon me. That’s not what I meant, and I confess I didn’t expect to be misunderstood, considering that I’m speaking to a Malfoy. What’s this about?” said Theo suspiciously. “I thought this was about Granger. It sounds like you want to talk politics.”

“It’s not politics,” he said irritably. “I’m not making some radical statement, I just haven’t a clue what you’re trying to say. Or if you mean blood purity, then come out and say that, but then you can’t say it’s ‘close’; she’s not less muggle-born just because her grades are good—”

“Draco, I don’t know what you want me to say,” said Theo incredulously. “It was a euphemism. I was trying to be polite. She’s your friend? Fine. I’m friends with some half-bloods on the gobstones team. It’s like your mum would say: you’ve got people, and then you’ve got politics. I’m not going to go after Granger, but I’m not going to pretend we don’t both know full well what I’m talking about.”

Draco pressed his lips together.

Abruptly, he said, “Is something wrong with you and Greengrass?”

Theo blanched. “What?” he said. “No. Did she say something to you?”

“I have it reliably,” he said, “that it’s rude for a wizard to refuse a dance to a witch.”

The boy deflated. “For one, that’s a Samhain tradition,” he muttered. “For two: nothing’s wrong between us. Things in the dungeons are just — confused, right now.”

“Has she insulted you?”

“No. Nothing like that. She wouldn’t, she…” Theo watched Daphne spin Hermione under her arm, with surprising dexterity, for a girl supposedly not used to leading. “Daph’s perfect,” he said.

“So you’re the problem,” said Draco.

“The soul of tact, you are, Draco Malfoy. Yes, you got it. I’m the problem. Hold your applause.”

“Well, fix it, then.”

“Good idea. And while I’m at it, shall I just order some nice weather for tomorrow, too? A spot of sunshine, an easterly breeze? Since I’ve got the catalog open?”

“You know what I mean. Go in and do something,” he said. “It’s pathetic to mince about. Whosever feelings you’re trying to spare, stop sparing them. Get it over with.”

Theo lifted his goblet. “Thanks, Coach.”

“You’re welcome,” said Draco impatiently. “And dance with her, for Merlin’s sake, you’re coming off as downright boorish.”

Theo blinked. “You know,” he said, “sometimes you sound uncannily like your mother.”

He stood up and straightened his coat. “Granger!” he called, cutting through the crowd. “Just what is that lovely creature on your arm? I believe she’s in my debt, and I’ve come to collect.”

Between the dancing, the drinking, and the physical impossibility of ending a Gryffindor party before three A.M., the celebrations raged well into the morning of the 26th. Draco started losing memories the longer after midnight the party went; later, he would recall leaving the party in a blurry vignette, drunk as he was not on alcohol but on exhaustion, braced against Harry and Ron at either shoulder so that all could keep upright. As they stumbled down the torchlit hallway, Daphne, half folded over Blaise’s arm, had pointed at something in the ceiling, and cooed, “Theo, look,” and Theo had said “That’s nice, Daph,” and then he fell back to talk to Hermione. And Blaise had murmured something in Daphne’s ear, and kissed her cheek, and she said — “Oh, you’re a darling, really,” but in tones of no happiness whatsoever; and in the next vignette, the Slytherins were gone, and he was tumbling into bed.

The days between Christmas and New Year’s vanished in the same idle fog they always did, and on New Year’s Eve, they woke up to find themselves on the verge of their vacation’s end. Hermione flung herself into her (already completed) homework, and successfully guilted Harry into following her example; Ron and Draco, immune to such tricks, played a game of wizard’s blitz chess on their side of the table. They worked thus in quiet for a few hours, silent save for the scratch of quills — Hermione’s much faster than Harry’s — and the rhythmic click-click of the chess timer. As Draco found himself marveling, for the fourth or fifth time, at the ruthless speed of his own downfall, Ron took pity and suggested they go to lunch.

Leftover pudding and Christmas crackers piled up on the tables, being removed from the kitchens in preparation of the night’s New Year's Feast. Dumbledore, seated up at the high table, took up one of the crackers with an exclamation of delight, and offered the other end to Snape, who murderously complied. The cracker gave a startling BANG and revealed a plush beaver skin hat, which Dumbledore swapped for his own at once.

“Dig in!” he exclaimed, beaming.

As Draco helped himself to stewed onions, the doors of the Great Hall opened, and Professor Trelawney swept through, wearing a green sequined dress and a feathered hat. He’d heard complaints about the loony Divinations Professor from Harry and Ron, though they admitted that she was rather likable on account of being wholly easy to fool — their Divination homework was a joke. Hermione scorned her, but then, so did all Arithmancists to Divinators; it was something of an academic rift.

“Sibyl!” cried Dumbledore, rising to his feet. “This is a pleasant surprise! You have decided to join us…?”

Trelawney rarely appeared during school feasts. Draco thought she might have a touch of agoraphobia: her gaze flitted around the hall with trepidation, anxiously kneading her own arms.

“I dare not,” she said. “If I join the table, we shall be thirteen. When thirteen dine together, the first to rise will be the first to die…”

“Ha!” said Hermione, her voice low with scorn. “This is too much. There’s not twelve at that table — she can’t even count.”

Draco scanned the table. There were ten professors there, including Dumbledore, plus Filch, so it seemed Hermione was correct.

McGonagall, who quickly made the same deduction, said thinly: “What a happy accident, then, Sibyll, that we number eleven.”

Professor Trelawney did a double-take, her fingers digging tight in the flesh of her arms. “No?” she said, bewildered. “But where is dear Professor Lupin?”

“I’m afraid the poor fellow is ill again,” said Dumbledore, loading some turkey onto McGonagall’s plate. “Most unfortunate that it should happen on Christmas Day.”

Harry cleared his throat discreetly, and traded a look with Draco. The full moon came several days ago.

“But surely you already knew that, Sibyll?” said McGonagall, in delicate tones, sawing at her turkey.

Trelawney shuddered, lifting her nose imperiously away from McGonagall.

“Certainly, Minerva,” she tinkled. “But one does not abuse the All-Knowing Eye for such inferior matters… I should not like to frighten those around me by appearing to possess knowledge outside their ken…”

“Never worry,” said McGonagall crisply. “I can assure you, I fear that not at all.”

Professor Trelawney’s voice suddenly became a good deal less misty. “If you must know, Minerva, I have seen that poor Professor Lupin will not be with us for very long. He seems aware, himself, that his time is short. He positively fled when I offered to crystal gaze for him—”

“Astonishing,” said McGonagall, every syllable like a different deadbolt sliding home. Her inflection had even Snape looking minutely impressed.

“I doubt,” said Dumbledore, in a cheerful but firm voice, “that Professor Lupin is in any immediate danger. Severus, can you reassure us as much?”

“...Yes, Headmaster.”

“Good,” said Dumbledore. “Then he should be with us again by New Year’s. Now, would you convey unto me that scrumptious-looking platter of chipolatas?”

After lunch ended, Harry was quiet on the way out of the hall. By and by, he said, “D’you think he was alone on Christmas?”

“Who?” said Draco, still distracted with Trelawney.

“Si—” Harry caught himself. “Padfoot. It must have been pretty miserable, out there in the Shack. Without hot food or anything.”

Draco waited. He suspected Harry was working up to something.

“Sometimes,” he added, “during Christmas dinner, the Dursleys would have me stay in my room, so that they could eat as a family first. Then they’d have Dudley bring me whatever was left, afterwards. So I’d sit in my cupboard, and sort of… wait there, hungry. Not to complain or anything, I got food eventually, most of the time. But it was pretty rubbish, when it felt like, er… everybody was having a party without me.” He shoved his hands in his pockets.

“Oh,” said Hermione softly. “Oh, Harry. Of course it did.”

“So, erm,” he said, stopping at the foot of the Grand Staircase. “I actually — you lot don’t have to come with me, I don’t expect you to. But I’m going to go bring some food to Padfoot, and see if he’d like company. Since it’s New Year’s.”

Hermione made a noise of sympathy. Ron nodded, scratching his neck.

“But you’ll miss the party,” protested Draco. “The twins are planning fireworks—”

“I know,” said Harry, apologetic. “It sounds fun. Have a good time, really. But I can’t, if he’s…” He shrugged. “Sorry.”

“I’ll come with you, mate,” said Ron. He nudged Harry’s elbow. “Can carry more food with two than one.”

“Yes, I’ll go, too,” said Hermione mistily.

“Thanks,” said Harry gratefully. “You really didn’t have to.”

They looked at Draco, expectantly.

“What if I want to go to the party?” he said, almost whining.

“Then go,” said Ron easily. “No one’s making you.”

“No, but you’re going to look at me differently, and you’ll all think — oh, stop it. This isn’t fair. Fine, I’ll go, you harridans.”

“Seriously,” said Harry, “it’ll be fine if you don’t—”

“Like I trust any of you to have an adventure without me,” said Draco, darkly. “You’ll end up dead in a ditch by sundown. Let’s just go, shall we? Apparently my cousin’s wasting away as we speak.”

They visited the kitchens to load up on goose and roast potatoes and big tureens of pumpkin soup, and hiding these beneath their cloaks, they plowed through the snow down to Hogsmeade. Draco suggested it would be faster to take the tunnel under the Whomping Willow, but none of them could figure out how to approach without getting — as Ron put it — Whomped.

It took almost a minute of knocking before Sirius came to the door. He wore a slightly fresher shirt, and had combed about ten to fifteen percent of his hair, the rest of which remained matted. Nevertheless, the effect was appreciable. “What?” he demanded, at the sight of them, sans greeting. His eyes skittered over the array of faces. “What’s happened? Is somebody hurt?”

Draco, who caught a splinter in his finger on the way down, opened his mouth. Hermione stepped on his foot.

“Er, no,” said Harry awkwardly. He lifted a foil-wrapped platter. “We thought you might be hungry.”

Sirius stared at him. He had the drawn, tense expression of someone who had been handed a baby dormouse and told he had to sit in a nest of hungry snakes.

“I am hungry,” he said, in the softest possible voice.

“Right, yeah, that’s what this is for,” said Harry.

Draco wanted to fling himself to the ground at the whirling nexus of Stupid rapidly emerging on the doorstep. Gryffindors, he thought hopelessly.

“Can we come in?” he said, narrowly resisting the temptation to stomp his foot. “It’s cold as Merlin’s armpit out here.”

“Oh. Oh! Yes, yes, of course,” babbled Sirius, hurrying out of the way, and swept them into the Shack with the grandeur of a receiving king.

Efforts at refurbishment had been made since they last saw the house, and it was very nearly habitable. The worst of the detritus had been swept away, and the tears in the furniture were stitched over with clumsy patches. The chandelier remained dark, but a bevy of candles blazed from almost every flat surface, filling the room with a buttery and shivering light. Someone had even cut down a fir sapling and put it up in the corner, where it bent under the weight of a single ornament made from pinecone.

“Sorry about the chill,” said Sirius, hastily clearing some books off the sofa. “We can’t light the fire, people will see the smoke… would you like a blanket? We’ve got several—”

He fussed around, retrieving blankets of dinginess various, and pressed them into their arms. “Here, I’ll take that into the kitchen. Remus,” he called excitedly. “Harry’s here!”

“He is?” Lupin poked his head out of the kitchen. There were fresh dark circles under his eyes, and a new scar on his cheek, but he seemed in good spirits. He was wearing a cable-knit cardigan and a pair of thick-soled leather boots, with muggle jeans, and he held some kind of strange black pitcher with a cord dangling from it. “Oh, hello, you four. This is a pleasant surprise.”

“And he’s brought food!” Sirius jubilated. “Can we get one of the burners going, to warm it up? I know you said we had to be careful about too much lektrisitty—”

“Electricity,” said Lupin and Hermione at the same time.

“—but surely, a little more couldn’t hurt? For a New Year’s feast?” He held up the soup tureen, hopefully.

Lupin tipped his head this way and that. “Alright,” he said. “But we really have to start being careful about using the lights. I’ve jury-rigged some power from the muggle village down the way, but they’ll notice if the power bills really go up,” he added, mostly to Hermione. He waved his right hand, which was bandaged. “Burned the hell out of my fingers trying to do the wiring, too.”

Draco startled a little at hearing a teacher swear. He didn’t know why it surprised him, but it felt simply wrong somehow, like it ought to have been against the rules. From Hermione’s wide-eyed expression, she felt the same.

“It’s made a world of difference,” called Sirius gratefully, carrying the food into the kitchen. “Mostly I use it for hot showers — Aguamenti gets the job done, and everything, but when it’s been about thirteen years since your last warm bath, my God! I’m living in heaven.”

It was eerie to hear Sirius talk about the austere conditions of the Shack like it was some kind of luxury. But of course, after Azkaban, it must have been.

“So you’ve been camping out here together?” said Ron conversationally, leaning over the sofa back. “When Professor Lupin’s not at school?”

“I stay at the castle during the week,” replied Lupin, plugging the pitcher into a socket in the wall. He flicked a switch, and a bulb on the bottom glowed orange. “It raises fewer questions. Usually I come down on weekends. And, obviously, during full moons.”

“Been staying more during the hols, now you lot are off classes,” Sirius added. “We’ve been remodeling. You should see the bedroom upstairs; Moony worked wonders on it. Like new, I daresay.”

“As you can see,” said Lupin, gesturing amusedly at the fir sapling, “there have been heartfelt, if modest, efforts at holiday decorating—”

“But since I’m the only one who can leave the Shack, our resources are somewhat limited,” he finished. The pitcher trembled, bubbling, and began to whistle. Lupin flipped the switch and took it back into the kitchen. “Tea?”

He served them Earl Grey in chipped ceramic mugs that smelled faintly of lye, and laid out a package of muggle biscuits that Hermione fell on at once with a cry of, “Jammy dodgers! I’ve missed these,” and when the food was warm, they laid it out on the coffee table and ate sitting down on the rug (the dining table having undergone a recent double-amputation, the circumstances of which Sirius loyally refused to report, but had Lupin blushing and muttering to himself).

Later, after watching Sirius single-handedly annihilate a legion’s rations of roast goose and potatoes, they sat around the coffee table among the gallery of used crockery, bathed in candlelight, lounging on pillows and swaddled in blankets. Sirius launched into story after story of Hogwarts hijinks from years past, including several that made Draco quite pointedly cover his ears, and Lupin brought out a bottle of firewhiskey that had probably been ancient already when his grandfather's eyes started twinkling, of which he and Sirius both splashed ample shots into their tea when they thought the children weren't looking. Ron begged a taste off Sirius, who with a furtive sleight-of-hand slipped it to him when Lupin stepped out for another blanket.

They looked like a band of bohemian peasants, Draco thought despairingly, but between Lupin's more-than-occasional laughter and Harry's brilliant, unyielding smile, he found himself unable to rue the shame of it. Happy peasants, perhaps. If there indeed was such a thing.

"Alright," said Lupin, once the firewhiskey had been substantially reduced, and everyone was in a giggly, sedentary mood. "Padfoot, our guests have graciously brought us dinner. I think it falls to us to provide the show."

"Hm?" Sirius was sprawled in contrapposto across Lupin's lap, like a Greek etching. He hauled his head up. "Always game for a show, Moony. What have you got in mind?"

"If I recall correctly," said Lupin, "I think Mary left her violin somewhere in here."

Sirius rocketed upright. "That's right," he breathed. "Winter of '77, wasn't it? We hid it all in the storage closet—"

"—with the Ogden's and Peter's leftover stash—"

"Yes, I'll go look," he gasped, and darted out. When he returned, he carried a dust-ridden fiddle of weathered wood over his head, like a knight brandishing a sword.

"Aha!" said Lupin grandly. "Good woman, Mary!"

Sirius blew across the strings, lifting a cloud of dust, and wiped the bow on his pants. "Give me a tune, Harry," he said jovially. "Chef chooses the music. Only fair."

Harry, leaned forward eagerly on his haunches, said, "I don't know — what can you play?"

"What can I play?" He scoffed. "Walburga Black didn't piss a thousand galleons into music lessons so you could sit there and insult her soiled name. As I said: give me a tune."

"Do 'Farewell and Adieu, Spanish Veela,' or 'Blow the Troll Down,'" suggested Ron. "Or 'The Lusty Hufflepuff.'"

"Do 'The Unspeakable's Kiss,'" said Draco, enjoying himself. "In C-flat minor."

By now they were all snickering, but Sirius tossed his hair and prepared his bow with a flourish. "All ye of little faith," he said slyly. In his smirk, there was nothing of the Azkaban escapee, the wanted criminal, the hungry refugee: merely a man, partly drunk, faintly handsome, with a shabby overcoat and a trick or two up his sleeve, piping out the first shrill trio of notes. The strings squeaked; Draco smirked, and Hermione giggled. Then Sirius took a breath, and all laughter snuffed out.

Draco thought he would be amusingly bad. To both his relief and his dismay, it was rather the opposite. When out of his mouth poured a silken baritone that shuddered pleasurably in his throat, booming, "My eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord," Draco's jaw came unhinged. So did Hermione's, who grabbed his shoulder in excitement, and Harry's beam split his face open. Lupin, lounging against the sofa, merely smirked.

Sirius finished "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" with a bellowing refrain of "glory, glory, hallelujah," followed by "Love Grows (Where My Amortentia Goes)," a heavily ironic "If I Were a Rich Man," and then shredded his way through a "Devil Went Down to Georgia" that had all five of them on their feet, shouting.

He pleaded out of ‘Modern Major General’ for another drink, and flopped down on the sofa, flushed and sweat-shiny, to passionate applause.

“Your turn,” he gasped to Lupin. “You sing something.”

“Me? You know I couldn’t keep a tune on a maraca.”

“Sure,” said Lupin, setting down his mug. “Happy to. Harry, have you ever heard ‘Henery the Eighth, I Am’?”

In fact, Harry had, and together, man and boy revealed in cheerful fashion that neither of them could carry a melody to save their lives. Harry listed against Lupin’s shoulder, his face bright from shouting, and when Lupin ruffled his hair, he looked like a boy who’d caught a falling star.

Hermione, half-swaddled in a blanket, murmured: “To think we thought they were going to kill us.”

“Shows you the importance of grooming,” he said. “Get him a hairbrush, it might have been a different conversation, off the bat.”

She hummed and snuggled deeper into the blanket. A spray of curls had come out of her bun, and she wrapped her hands around her mug, leeching warmth from its sides. The firelight turned her whole face yellow and shiny like the sun.

She had very small hands, Hermione. He could probably fit both of them in one of his own, and he wasn’t so much bigger than she was, really.

He frowned and stood up to go get some air. He was being odd. Heat-addled, probably, or some such nonsense.

On the porch of the Shack, he could watch the snow fall in a gray powder through the pitch-black night. He took a bracing breath of cold air and felt it wash all the nonsense out of him. He wondered where his mother was and what she was doing on a night like tonight. It was the first Christmas they'd spent apart in thirteen years. And without Dobby to take care of her — would Briselda be enough? She was only a housemaid. Perhaps he should have gone home, after all. If she had an episode, who would take care of her?

But he thought about the warmth inside, and the sound of Sirius' violin, and Hermione's happy shrill of laughter, and a wave of exhaustion swept over him. He was so tired — and he felt guilty for thinking it, but he couldn't help himself — he was tired of having to worry about his mother. Why couldn't he run away sometimes, and spend the holidays with his friends? What was wrong with it? Daphne and Blaise could. It wasn't as though their mothers would fall apart without them.

He was a bad person for thinking these things, and he loathed the thoughts as soon as he had them. He loved his mother, and he took care of her gladly. He was her son. It was his duty as the last Malfoy. Freedom of choice was a poor man's luxury.

The door creaked behind him. Sirius stepped onto the porch and said, "Oh. Hey, kid."

Speak of the boggart, Draco thought.

"Hello."

Sirius stepped out to the rail and lit a cigarette with his wand in the cup of his hands, muttering "Inciendo." Smoke blossomed, and he took a drag with a cool sigh.

"If there's one thing they don't warn you about," he said, "it's how much you're going to miss cigarettes. Food, hot water, human kindness — yeah, they warn you about those. But man, they don't tell you how bad you're going to want a cigarette."

Draco made a noncommittal noise and turned to watch the snow fall. He wasn't sure how he was supposed to respond to that, so he didn't.

"Sorry," said Sirius after a moment. He tapped out some ash, and it fell like black glitter on the snow. "Guess you probably don't want to hear about all that."

"I don't mind," said Draco. And he didn't. He had gathered that it bothered Harry, from the way he reacted whenever Sirius mentioned it. But Draco was vaguely curious about it. He'd never been to Azkaban, and what he'd heard from his father had left more to the imagination than it told.

Sirius caught him watching and mistook his interest in the cigarette. "You want a drag?" he said affably, extending it between third and fourth fingers.

Draco considered. "Should you be offering?"

Sirius had the decency to cringe. "Right, sorry," he said, abashed. He withdrew his hand. "Forget how young you lot are, sometimes."

"I didn't say no. Give it here."

Sirius snickered and passed it over. Draco pinched it delicately between his lips and inhaled. The smoke scalded his throat and he broke into a messy cough.

"Classic," said Sirius. "Not bad, for your first time. Here. You want to try a smaller drag, though. Just get used to the burn. It's like drinking. If you've ever done that, which, er, you definitely shouldn't."

"Thanks," he said, still coughing and watery-eyed. "Some role model you are."

He laughed. "Don't think you're the first to notice. I've been corrupting the youths since I was a youth myself. Think your grandma still blames me for what happened to Andy."

Draco took a more careful drag. It didn't burn so much the second time, or the third, and by the time Sirius said, "Alright, don't be a hog," he had grown used to the sting in his throat. It was sort of like the feeling of being about to cry — pleasantly so, the good ache that said catharsis was about to follow. He didn't fancy the taste, though. It left his mouth savoring of tar. He ran his tongue around his teeth and grimaced.

"In my year there was a whole trade of these going around the Tower," said Sirius reflectively, tapping it out again. "A couple of seventh-year muggle-borns would load up from drugstores over the hols and sell them at a markup for anyone who'd buy. Minerva drove herself nutters trying to bust us, but what could she do? With something like that, it's going to get into the castle anyhow. Plus, it was good for inter-house relations. The Slytherins couldn't be too much of arseholes to us, because they needed us to get their fix."

"The Slytherins bought from you?"

"Well, yes. Not like their rich daddies would fix them up with dirty muggle smokes, would they? At least back then, it wasn't fashionable to smoke cigarettes. Thought it was a 'muggle thing.' Course, they still did it, they just called them something different — smokesticks, or cigarinos, something pretentious like that. I remember Cissa once cornered me in a broom closet and threatened to jinx my hair short unless I told her where I got my stash—"

Draco was startled. "My mother?"

"Oh, yeah," crowed Sirius. "Wild, that one. More than anyone gave her credit for. She was head girl in her year, which was a bloody coup, since I can count on one hand the number of students who snuck out more often than she did — fair play to her, too, just wish it'd been for a better bloke than Lucius — oh, er. Sorry."

“What is your problem with my father?” said Draco tightly. “Since you have one, obviously.”

“My problem with him is that he was a Death Eater,” said Sirius casually, examining the cigarette saddled between his knuckles. “Not that I would’ve liked him too much if he wasn’t, I’d still think he was one of the meanest, coldest bastards that ever walked those dungeons. Respectfully. But frankly, that’s nothing compared to the in-laws he got stuck with when he married in.” He took another drag and blew out. It occurred to Draco that Sirius was slightly tipsy; he was slurring his words a little, and Draco had never heard him talk this much about their family before. “To be fair — to be really, utterly fair — I did tell her she should marry him. Actually I told her, listen, you can’t do much worse than me or Reg, so you might as well hunker down with the first warm body that’ll take your skinny arse and hope for the best—”

“You?” Draco said incredulously. “You and my mother? What — together?”

“Yeah, that’s what I thought, too,” said Sirius, snickering. “But Mum always wanted a dynasty. I mean, she had two sons, Cyg had three daughters, I’m sure she thought it was perfect. One time she got sloshed and went on about this barmy dream of a double marriage, two-by-two, me and Cissa, Andy and Reg… can you even imagine? I know you’ve only grown up knowing your mother, but trust me, that would’ve been…” He shuddered. “I don’t know what Mum was thinking, really. She could barely stand me on a good day, and Cissa and I fought like hyenas whenever we had to spend a holiday together. That marriage would’ve killed one of us, and it probably would’ve been me.”

Draco couldn’t imagine his mother married to Sirius. He struggled to think of two people who would make each other more miserable.

Suddenly suspicious, Sirius angled a finger at Draco. “You don’t have any cousins on your father’s side, do you?”

“My father was an only child.”

“Good,” he said passionately. “Saves you the trouble. Course, I didn’t think Cissa would be the type to force a match, after the fiasco with me and her… Lucius might have done, though. That’s a bullet dodged.”

“I don’t know what a bullet is,” said Draco icily, “but I’m sure I would rather take it, or whatever you’re using it to represent, and have a father in the bargain.”

Sirius blanched. “Course you would,” he said, after a moment. “Course you would. Right. Sorry, lad, that was — that was out of line, for me. I always… you know, I made this mistake with Moony, all the time, when we were growing up? I’d make these remarks about — you know, being lucky that his parents didn’t care, or that they weren’t too involved in his problems… because I always thought, what a lucky bugger, I wish my parents would keel over and leave me alone. But that doesn’t mean it’s alright, does it.”

“No,” said Draco coldly. Then, after a moment, he said, “It’s fine. I don’t really care.”

“Nah, don’t cover for me. It was unsporting, as James would’ve said,” said Sirius casually. He held out the cigarette, and Draco shook his head. “He would’ve said… ha. Well, he would’ve said that it doesn’t matter if Lucius was a toerag or not, because I was a toerag all the time, and he’d still kick the piss out of anyone who wished I was dead.”

“How do you know?” said Draco dully.

“Because he was my best friend, and I knew him,” said Sirius, a touch defensively. Then, relenting: “And because he did say it. More than once. Said it a couple of times about Snape, come to think of it, after he started dating Lily. Boy, did the bird ever clean him up.”

“Potter’s mum?”

“Yeah. Lily Evans.” Sirius closed his eyes. “He was in love with her since the minute she set foot on that stinking train. Didn’t admit it for a year or two, but you could still tell. He once said—” He laughed, a humorless sound. “He was thirteen, and I said — I said, mate, why don’t you cool off a bit, see some other people, maybe she’s not the one, hey? Lots of birds in the world. And he looks at me like I’m the idiot, and he goes: ‘There’s not going to be other people.’ Like he already knew that was it, he was done for. Like he was doomed to it.”

“That’s silly,” said Draco, who considered all such romantic falderal to be the province of ninnies and girls.

Sirius snorted. “Rich,” he said. “Your dad bought your mum a rock the size of the Ritz and she wore it to Transfiguration all seventh year. Transfiguration! Waving it around like she wanted to put someone’s eye out. Silliest thing you ever saw.”

“My mother’s ring is tasteful, thank you very much.”

“It’s a rich man’s knuckleduster, is what it is,” said Sirius, enjoying himself. “As well as a formal license to shag. Which she very well knew. She had herself a twenty-four karat billboard that said ‘I LET LUCIUS MALFOY GET A LEG OVER,’ and she wore it with pride every day of her life. Don’t look at me like that, it’s true, isn’t it?”

“Aye, and that just proves my point, doesn’t it?”

Draco spun on his heel, deciding that the conversation was over. Sirius Black was, true to his reputation, a thorough scoundrel, and Draco had not the slightest interest in listening to his gossipy prattle malign the reputation of better wizards and witches than him.

“No, I’m sorry,” laughed Sirius, as Draco made to leave. “I’m only ribbing you. Tell me you didn’t get your dad’s sense of humor — Narcissa would have laughed at that.”

“I very much doubt that.”

“No, she would have,” he repeated, strangely certain. “Maybe not in front of you, or in front of Lucius, but she would have. Bella would’ve thought that was hilarious.”

Draco paused, his hand midway to the doorknob. “Would she?”

“Oh, yeah,” said Sirius, softly. “Bella was the bawdiest thing you ever saw. She drove her mother just about insane with it, but you couldn’t stop her with an army. She’d rock up to a party with your mum in tow, and they’d start riots.”

Draco closed his hand. His nails bit gently against his palm. “You don’t know what happened, I suppose.”

“I do, actually.” Sirius put out the cigarette on the railing. It issued a stream of smoke. “Word in Azkaban gets around.”

He waited for Sirius to say he was sorry, or make some such facetious gesture at sympathy. Sirius flicked the butt of the cigarette out into the snow, and did no such thing.

“I’ll say this,” said Sirius, when it became clear that Draco would not be the first one to breach the silence. “Based on an admittedly small sample, I think you’re very much a Malfoy. And that’s not… I mean, I’ll not pretend to stand here and say I’m thrilled to have another Lucius running around, but if you had to be one or the other, I think it’s probably better to have another Malfoy than another Black.”

“You’re a Black,” Draco reminded him.

“Not technically,” said Sirius, and grinned, flashing a row of yellow teeth. His canines were slightly elongated, like fangs, and Draco wondered if that had been the case before he became an Animagus, or if it was a residual effect. “The old woman burned me off years ago. I’m free.”

Free, thought Draco. What an odd way to say alone.

Something occurred to him. “Regulus,” he said suddenly, startling Sirius. “He was your brother.”

“Yeah. Prissy little git. Hogged the bathroom like you wouldn’t believe. Used every drop of hot water in the house, on what I don’t know, took ages to do his stupid hair—”

“He was the heir, wasn’t he?” said Draco. “After you were disinherited?”

Sirius paused. “Obviously, yes,” he said.

“And after he died, it passed to Bellatrix? Through Cygnus?”

Sirius shrugged. “S’pose.”

“Is there a chance he would’ve bequeathed it to somebody else?” asked Draco, thinking of Jugson in the Hogsmeade alley.

“What do you mean, somebody else? He died without kids.” Sirius leaned against the railing and exhaled steam into the night air. “You know the laws. Bet your mum drilled you on ’em soon as you could write.”

“But you’re certain Witherfell went to Bellatrix, that is. He didn’t have a… a will, or something like that.”

“Frankly, if he did, I’d be the last person you’d want to ask,” said Sirius indulgently. “Disinherited means disinherited, kiddie. Andy’s the only Black I’ve spoken to since I was sixteen years old.” He paused. “Except for you, come to think of it.”

“I see,” said Draco, frowning. “But do you think he would’ve — knowing him, would he have wanted Witherfell to pass to his cousins? Did he… like Bellatrix, much?”

“I don’t know if he liked anybody all the time he was alive,” said Sirius, amused. “He was a cold little bastard. Once offered me a quarter of a million galleons to abdicate my title and let him inherit. Said the best I could hope to do for myself was take the money and run. Of course, he was right, but that’s a cold comfort to a thirteen-year-old…”

The door opened, and Lupin poked his head out, wrinkling his nose against the cold. “What are you two doing out here?” he said. He lifted his nose and sniffed. Sirius shifted to cover the cigarette butt with his heel. “You’re not smoking, are you?”

“No,” said Draco and Sirius at once.

Lupin raised an eyebrow. “Right,” he said. “Anyway, Padfoot, you’d better get inside. Someone could see you.”

“For Merlin’s sake, it’s dark as pitch and snowing besides. Nobody’s spying at this time of night.”

“Then come in anyway, because we’ve got a present for you,” said Hermione, appearing under Lupin’s arm. She was bright-eyed and bright-cheeked from the combination of firelight and windchill, and it turned her whole affect pleasantly pink. She was wearing the coat that Draco had given her, and it suited her. “I told Harry he should be the one to give it to you. It was his idea.”

“Well, if Harry wants,” Sirius agreed immediately, and he followed Lupin inside.

When they came in, Harry presented them awkwardly with a folded white square of paper. Ron stood off to the side, arms folded, looking distinctly grumpy. “So, er, I did some thinking,” said Harry, “and I think you should have this. Ron and I talked it over, and I know he and I disagree, but I thought — well, it’s not really mine, is it? I got it from Fred and George, and they only got it by nicking it from Filch. So really, by rights, it already belongs to you.” He held it out, and

Lupin accepted it with belated wonder, staring at it as though it were a lost treasure, paved in gold. “It’s, er, your map.”

Lupin and Sirius exchanged an unreadable look.

“Harry,” began Lupin, “this is really — you shouldn’t feel the need to give it to us, just because—”

“Moony,” said Sirius excitedly, “look at it. Look. The handwriting—”

“What?”

They bent their heads over it. As the curlicues of script unfurled, their faces opened up with identical glows of childish glee.

“It’s him! That’s his handwriting, innit, Moony? The tosser did his sevens with the little thing on them—”

“Did I really sign my name like that? Whatever for?”

“Oh, look how we did the passage between the dungeons, with that little asterisk there? Do you remember the argument we had about that? James insisted it was real, even though none of us could find it a second time…”

Harry grinned. He stepped to the side and nudged Draco. “We should give them some space,” he murmured. “I think they’d appreciate it if they got some time alone with… you know.”

“I still can’t believe you did that,” moaned Ron, as they absconded to the kitchen. “All the possibilities… the safety, the security… Harry, the blackmail we could’ve had…”

“It was the right thing to do,” Hermione said firmly, hoisting herself onto a kitchen stool, and Draco wondered whether it had been Harry’s idea or hers. She had wanted to get rid of it anyway, and he didn’t doubt that she would have jumped on the idea of returning it to its original owners. It didn’t irritate him nearly as much as he thought it would, even though he thought Ron was right, and it was a terrible waste.

“They’re professors!” said Ron, which was still a good point. “They can go anywhere they like! What do they even need it for?”

“It’s got my dad’s handwriting in it,” Harry said softly, glancing over his shoulder. Now and then a highly unprofessional giggle would float back to them from the living room, and Draco felt a twinge of embarrassment as well as curiosity. He couldn’t imagine what it could be like to hear your friend’s voice after thirteen years. He’d only been alive for thirteen years. To live in deprivation for that long, without anyone — not his mother, not his friends — he didn’t want to even think about it.

“Well, I hope they enjoy it,” Ron said firmly. “Because I’m never letting you live it down.”

“I’m quite content to let them have it,” said Hermione. “Professor Lupin won’t let it be used for anything scurrilous, like spying. And honestly, don’t you think it was the teensiest bit unethical — getting to see who goes in and out of the girls’ dorms, for example?”

“It wasn’t unethical, it was bloody cool,” said Ron, but before they could belabor the point any further, Lupin reappeared in the kitchen, his face glowing with laughter.

“Hello, you three,” he said, in such a deliriously happy tone that Draco thought someone might have dosed him with something. “Thank you. Thank you so — so very much, from both of us, for — for the most wonderful Christmas we’ve had in so very long.”

Harry blushed; Hermione turned bright pink with pleasure, and Ron sheepishly ducked his head. Draco lifted his eyes to the ceiling. This was all terribly middle-class.

“I told Remus you ought to stay over,” added Sirius, “but he won’t hear of it—”

“They’ve got to get back to the castle before tomorrow, or their prefects will notice they’re gone.”

Ron snorted. “Percy?” he said. “He hasn’t the time. That would require him dragging his nose out of Penelope Clearwater’s—” “Ron!” hissed Hermione.

“Of course, you’re free to stay a while longer,” said Lupin, with an amused glance at Ron, “but I merely meant to offer that whenever you feel like going back, I’ll see you back to the castle.”

Draco opened his mouth to ask why, and then he remembered the dementors. It had been oddly easy to forget them. He was so used to being able to roam freely about the Hogwarts grounds, with only Filch to fear and worry about, that his memory had slipped over the nearby presence of a genuinely dangerous Dark creature. It just didn’t feel like something that could be true of Hogwarts. It was a fiction, a made-up thing. So long as he was in this warm living room, full of firelight and firewhiskey and laughter, it didn’t feel possible that a creature like a Dementor could be anywhere nearby.

They stayed a while longer, helping to clean up their plates, and set out when the snow started falling in earnest. Harry hung back for a quiet conversation with Sirius that ended with a deep, tight embrace, and perhaps a few tears, which Draco was man enough to turn away before witnessing. Then Lupin led them up the long tunnel beneath the Whomping Willow and cleared up the snow at the tunnel entrance with a sweep of his wand, escorting them out through the small passageway in the roots.

Aboveground, the snow had grown so thick that Draco could no longer see the castle through the flurry. Lupin carved a path in the snowbanks to the door with his wand, and Hermione lit hers with Lumos, and following the little pinprick of light, they hiked the hill up to the castle. As they passed the hippogriff paddock, Draco made out the vast dark bulk of Hagrid, swaddled in a fur coat the size of a small circus tent, leading the hippogriffs into a sheltered part of the enclosure. The trees shook and groaned under the volumes of snow descending on their limbs.

When they came at last into the light outside the Great Hall, Lupin deposited them and cast a quick Warming Charm, which dislodged most of the snow and frost that had gathered on their hair and faces.

“Thank you for coming,” he said, looking each of them in the eye in turn. His voice was hoarse with gratitude. “Really. You were under no obligation to do any of that, and it was… frankly, I think Sirius needed that, and so did I.”

“It was nothing,” said Harry. “Seriously. Don’t mention it.”

“You could mention it a little,” said Draco modestly. When Harry glared at him, he raised his hands. “What? I’m just saying, if my D.A.D.A. essay comes back next week and it’s not an O—”

“You prat,” Harry said fondly. He turned back to Lupin. “Don’t mind him, he’s joking.”

“Says you, Potter.”

“I’m afraid that I’m more exacting with my favorites, not less,” said Lupin, with a twinkle in his eye. “So I suppose I’ll let Draco wonder where that leaves him. The rest of you — all of you, really — get back to bed safely. If you run into any trouble, you just say you were doing some after-hours work for me. I’ll back you up.”

“Gosh, Professor,” said Ron, grinning. “Lying to Filch is against the rules.”

Lupin laughed freely. “Good,” he said. “Tonight, I’m a Marauder, not a professor. And it’s not Christmas unless we’ve had a little fun… Ron, Hermione, good night. Draco, good night. Harry: thank you, again, so very much. Merry Christmas to you all.”

And with a beam and a wave, he turned back, and disappeared into the blizzard, heading back in the direction of the Whomping Willow.

“He’s the best professor we’ve ever had,” said Ron faintly, almost wondrous. “I don’t care if he’s a werewolf. I think Dumbledore should hire him to teach everything.”

“You know, with the wolfsbane potion, the werewolf bit almost doesn’t matter,” Hermione added, as they filed back into the castle. Harry had draped the Cloak over their shoulders for good measure, and as they crept up the stairs, Draco almost felt like it was first year all over again — creeping back to the common room after hours, lurking in shadows, wary of Filch, fearing nothing scarier than a detention. “I mean, I’ve been doing some research, and there are some people who think that lycanthropy will be cured within the decade. Or, if it’s not cured, it’ll become one of those old diseases like smallpox, where it’s not nearly so serious as it used to be.”

“Oh, sure,” she agreed, “but don’t you think it’s promising? I mean, the idea that someday — eventually — he won’t have to hide anything?”

“You’re an optimist,” he said, carefully, instead of what he really thought: which was that, considering the company Remus Lupin liked to keep, it was very unlikely that he would ever have the kind of life where he would not have to hide.

But then again, he thought, as they trundled through the portrait hole and into the warmth of the Gryffindor common room, who could say? It was Christmas, after all; the snow was coming down like the pitter-patter of little cat feet on the rooftop, and the smell of roast chestnuts and chocolate chip cookies wafted promisingly from the fireplace, and a warm, soft bed was waiting for him at the top of Gryffindor Tower. Nobody was dead, nobody was missing, and for once, they didn’t have to worry about Death Eaters chasing them around the school. It was their first good year at Hogwarts, their first peaceful year. He allowed himself to indulge in a healthy measure of optimism. Why couldn’t it be possible? On a night like that, even men like Sirius Black and Remus Lupin could look to the future, and dream of a world where they did not have to hide.

items for consideration:

-this is one of the longest chapters so far, i know, I KNOW, it is actually shamefully long. it looked so short in the outline. I am trying to release more chapters of a reasonable length so I am not putting out actual novellas as updates by the time we get into the longer books, which is a significant worry of mine.

-welcome, blaise zabini! man, writing blaise is a throwback. I remember a time when you could NOT read draco/hermione fanfiction without running into this dude. he was everywhere. nowadays theodore has come much more into vogue (I tend to blame The Cursed Child for that, although it's kind of hilarious, because like... theodore nott has NOTHING in the original books. nothing. TCC comes along and is like "he was draco's best friend" and it's like, EXCUSE ME he was WHAT now)

-"draco malfoy had a secret best friend who hung out with him all the time it just wasn't relevant to harry's (who literally watched draco like a hawk for 6 years and spent one year following him around everywhere) story" ok. surejan.gif

-makes me feel very confident about shipping non-canon pairings, though, because it's like yeah, to be honest, draco and hermione COULD have been having the Greatest Love Story of All Time behind harry's back, it's not like he noticed ANY OF THE OTHER insane stuff that was apparently all happening off-page

-but blaise! he was THE pick for draco's best friend/narrative foil/Good Slytherin role. there was a whole subculture shipping him with ginny (also, anyone out there remember THAT? the two-by-two gryffindor girls and slytherin boys thing? it wasn't my cuppa but now I'm remembering it I'm realizing how many fanfiction trends have come and gone since I started reading. [cue blade runner "like tears in rain" monologue])

-much like its chapter, this A/N has gone on far long enough. Will be back on Monday or Tuesday, if not before; I'd really like to get an update out on Christmas. And boys, this one has it all: quidditch! politics! more fred and george! the Ministry of Magic! and an introduction to my very favorite Ravenclaw.

Gryffindor vs. Ravenclaw

Chapter 23: Gryffindor vs. Ravenclaw

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

Classes started again, and the weather did not improve. In Care of Magical Creatures, Hagrid gave them bonfires full of salamanders to keep them warm, and while this pleased Harry and Ron, who never seemed to have much trouble dealing with creatures, Draco and Hermione spent the lesson hiking back their robes and hastily batting rogue salamanders away from each others' ankles, where a mere sneeze from the creature could set their wool clothing up in flames.

"It's a nice idea to keep warm," tried Hermione, valiantly.

Draco was in no mood to be charitable. He sent a sneer at Hagrid — hunched and red-cheeked from the cold, chains of frost in his great beard, cheerfully showing Lavender how to feed more kindling into the fire — and then crushed one of the tiny white creatures under his heel before it could latch onto his shoe. It was impossible to get scorch marks out of good leather.

"A nice idea to keep warm," he mimicked her. "And the Great Fire of London was a nice toasty afternoon."

"It's only until the end of the year," she said. "Anyway, it doesn't do any good to complain about it now. He's trying, isn't he?"

Hagrid had indeed made leaps and bounds. They had descended from hippogriffs to a suite of only moderately dangerous creatures after a certain number of students — mostly Slytherins — spread word to their parents over the holidays, many of whom sat the Board of Directors.

"Trying won't help him," he said darkly. "Hippogriffs … salamanders... I heard the fourth years were out digging holes for dugbogs… If my father was alive…”

“You won’t report Hagrid, would you?” said Hermione worriedly. “He’s been so kind to us. Just because you don’t enjoy a class—”

“He’s been nice to you,” said Draco, though he privately acknowledged the point. It wasn’t particularly clever or ambitious to go around prosecuting people who did you favors and showed you kindness; the whole point of doing favors was to stop people from going after you later. Anyway, he didn’t really want Hagrid fired. Certainly it would make Draco’s life easier, but that could just as well be accomplished by transferring into Muggle Studies, and without the collateral damage, to say nothing of all the whinging and tears from his friends.

In Potions, Neville completed quite the coup by brewing a grade-appropriate potion for the first time in three years. True, he hadn’t done int in class, where it would count towards his grade, but in one of their tutoring sessions, wherein Draco had sat with his boots on the table and read Granger’s dog-eared copy of Emma until Neville gave him a quivering call to come look. He’d been positively electrified by the success, though he had hidden it with a thin: “That’s sufficient, Longbottom. Now bottle it without spilling, and then I’ll be impressed.”

“But what’s wrong with it?” said Neville, almost alarmed.

“Nothing.”

“What do you mean, nothing?”

“Believe me, I’m just as surprised as you are.” When he was met with silence, he glanced up from his book. “Problem, Longbottom?”

The dark-haired boy was staring into his cauldron, transfixed. “I’ve never done nothing wrong before,” said Neville, mystified. “I — I don’t know how to feel about it.”

“Me neither,” said Draco. “In fact, if it were anyone else, I’d suspect you’d dosed me with something, but I suppose that would still require you to brew something right. Clean it up, now, before one or both of us passes out.”

But he was pleased, and in good spirits about it. When they got back to the common room, he didn’t even scare off the first year sitting in his armchair. It was a season of generosity, after all.

Ravenclaw played Slytherin a week after the start of term. Slytherin won narrowly, which was good news for Gryffindor, since they only needed to beat Ravenclaw to take second place in the Cup. Wood, sensing this opportunity, ramped up the number of practices and pushed them onto the field an hour earlier every morning. Within a week, Draco regretted having his cast taken off. It had been a lovely time when he could show up late to practices with a cup of cider and watch the others fly suicides across the field.

He had never had to learn how to fly in sleet before. In this, for once, he did not envy Harry, who now had to do everything Draco did on a rental Cleansweep Four. Not that he heard Harry complaining of it much, or indeed, heard of Harry much at all; between classes, quidditch practices, and homework, the Boy Who Lived had also begun staying in after Defense Against the Dark Arts class, and sneaking out to the Whomping Willow on weekends for dinners with Lupin and Sirius at the Shrieking Shack. Sometimes he extended these invitations to his friends, but it was clear that this was a move from politeness, and it never felt appropriate to accept.

Draco didn’t care. He didn’t understand Harry’s attachment to their professor and Black, but then again, Draco had never been particularly close to any of his family except his mother. He supposed that if one grew up without parents, it would be an unanticipated windfall to get two godfather-types in one inning, but thinking about that sort of thing depressed him, so he didn’t dwell on it.

Hermione didn’t even notice he was gone. As the new term progressed, her workload appeared to balloon. Every night, he found her in a corner of the common room, poring over a miserable spread of Arithmancy charts, runic dictionaries, and dozens of pages of handwritten notes. When she found a rhythm it was bad form to disturb her, and so he would often finish his own homework in a nearby armchair and read until she was prepared to be sociable and normal again. In this way, he and Crookshanks made a sort of praetorial guard. Ron, who under normal circumstances would withdraw from their company to spend time with Harry, found himself bereft and miserable under the combined weight of his friends’ preoccupation.

Indeed, the great Christmas thaw of relations between Ron and Hermione had plummeted back into a cold war. Crookshanks had caught and killed one of the mice they were supposed to be practicing Transfiguration on over the break, which Ron had taken as yet another outrageous reminder of Crookshanks’ guilt. Hermione had denied it up to the very hilt, produced a number of creative revisionist accounts of how the blood and fur could have ended up in Ron’s dorm, and refused to apologize. They had another row about it and did not speak directly to each other through the end of February, which was hard, because their usual translator — Harry — was largely absent, and Draco had no inclination to fulfill the role.

“He’s being an absolute boor,” Hermione complained, dotting an i with such force it speared the table beneath the parchment. Draco eyed their tea set warily; Hermione, like all young witches and wizards, had a touch of rogue magic about her, so in fits of anger nearby beverages were prone to boiling over or erupting in volcanic style. “He doesn’t like Crookshanks, he never has, and that’s why he’s decided to blame it on him. I do understand that he’s a cat, and cats are carnivores, honestly I do, but it’s not like he’s the only cat in the castle — I mean, Ron hasn’t said a word about Mrs. Norris! Poor Crookshanks has taken all the blame… and honestly, and don’t tell him I said this—”

“The danger of that,” said Draco, turning a page in his book, “was zero.”

“—but frankly, the animal was thirteen years old, and if he weren’t already cross with me, I’d be asking why nobody’s talking about the possibility of—”

“Natural causes?”

Her teacup trembled. “Yes! For Merlin’s sake, it’s a rat, Draco. I don’t mean to be cruel, but its average lifespan is two years, so— Occam’s Razor— isn’t it obvious that the poor thing just crawled off and died somewhere with nobody to notice?”

“You’re a sensitive soul, Granger,” he said, squinting at the small lettering. “How old is this Knightley fellow, again?”

Other residents of Gryffindor Tower, namely Fred and George, took no stake in the conflict except that it was very funny.

“Ron, you nitwit, you hated Scabbers more than any of us,” said Fred good-naturedly. “A scrawny little lump of hair and teeth, you called him. Honestly, you should be grateful if Crooks put him out of his misery. Better that than finding him dead in your bedsheets one day.”

“Fred!” cried Ginny. She smacked his arm.

“’Sides, now you can get a real pet,” said George. “One you actually like. When’s the last time you took him out to play with, anyway?”

“That’s besides the point!” said Ron furiously. “He was my rat! It’s easy for you to say when Mum and Dad will buy you two new things, but I’ve got to make do…”

Draco considered offering once more to replace Scabbers, if only to purchase a modicum of peace and quiet for the Common Room — he would consider it a sound investment — but something about the set of Ron’s jaw told him that the gift would not be accepted. Ron was odd about money in ways that Draco could not understand and frankly did not wish to.

In a vain attempt to cheer up Ron, Harry took him down to the quidditch pitch to try out his Cleansweep Four. So it was that Draco and Hermione went down to dinner alone one Saturday in early February. At the end of an unimpressive meal — Hermione worked through it, her eyes glued to the History of Magic textbook, shoveling the occasional spoonful of potatoes into her mouth when reminded — Dumbledore surprised them all by standing and clinking a spoon against his glass. The sound, amplified by magic, echoed powerfully through the hall, and conversation stilled as the four tables turned to listen.

“Your attention, please!” he called. He was wearing his habitual elderly smile, though perhaps Draco was overly suspicious, but he judged it a bit thin. “I must announce that classes will end early on Friday afternoon.” A hesitant order of cheers sprang up, mostly from the Gryffindor table; Hermione gave a small wail of horror. “Hogwarts will be hosting the Minister of Magic.”

Now there were more cheers, but not from the Gryffindor table. Draco frowned at Hermione, who shook her head in equal confusion: what was the Minister of Magic coming to Hogwarts for? And why would Dumbledore announce his visit?

“The Minister will be joining us for an annual meeting of the Board,” said Dumbledore, ignoring the announcement’s lukewarm reception. “We entreat you, as ever, to be on your best behavior — a duty,” he added, with a twinkling glance at the Gryffindor table, “which we do not doubt you will perform. Classes will resume as usual on Monday morning. Please do not be alarmed; this is a routine visit by the new Minister to acquaint himself with Hogwarts, and not an evaluation, or production, of any kind.”

But no matter what Dumbledore had said, it was clear to Draco that the old man was lying.

“For one thing, it’s not routine, and he knows it,” he said under his breath to Hermione, as they packed their things amidst an uproar of chatter. Nobody could believe that the Minister was coming, and Fred and George were already in ecstasies trying to plan what mischief they would visit on the Board. “The Minister doesn’t just pop in every term to say hello. He only came last year when something was wrong.”

“It is a new Minister,” she said doubtfully. “I suppose it’s a bit of pageantry, isn’t it? To show how important he is?”

“To whom? Children? Two dozen wizards on the faculty?” Draco shook his head. “If you want my opinion, it’s something between him and Dumbledore.”

“That wouldn’t explain why they’ve canceled classes.”

“Yes, and I know you’re in a mourning period, but please pretend to be happy for the rest of us. You’re spoiling the mood.”

For the mood as they left the Great Hall was indeed jovial. For one thing, not many students knew who Runcorn was, and so his visit letting them out of classes set off the acquaintance on a very good foot. For another, among those who knew who he was, it was cause for celebration and not dismay — in particular, Draco had rarely seen the Slytherins in such animated good cheer. Theo and Blaise lingered in the Great Hall, having a boisterous chat with a group of Slytherin fourth years, and Theo called out to Draco as he passed by.

“Oi! Malfoy! Good show, isn’t it?” He cracked a grin. “Fancy a friendly? Gryffindor and Slytherin, Friday afternoon? Schedule just opened up.”

It occurred to Draco that Theo might have insight into what was going on. “You go ahead,” he told Hermione, though she hardly needed the invitation; she muttered a bleary goodbye, lost in her notes for Transfiguration. He joined Theo in his circle of friends. “Did you know something about this, Nott?”

“In a manner of speaking,” Theo said modestly, examining his fingernails. “I can’t claim all the credit — obviously the Minister had to be involved somewhere—”

Draco folded his arms and made an expression that Ron had once called ‘death by eyebrow.’

Theo sighed. “You’re no fun. My Dad told me he was coming a week ago. He asked if there was a class I oughtn’t skip, and I told him to take Friday afternoons. Nobody’s paying attention anyway, and that’s when I’ve got the bloody brute.”

“We’ve this one to thank for saving our skins,” said Blaise coolly, leaning on Theo’s shoulder. “Another afternoon with those salamanders and I would’ve been short a toe.”

“You mean Hagrid?” said Draco, slightly queasy.

“Who else?” said Theo archly. “It’s bad enough having to tromp around in the mud with those animals for an O.W.L. — it adds insult to injury, being taught by one. Anyway, why did you care? Our Potions block is in the morning, so you’ve nothing to complain about.”

Draco cleared his throat and made his voice as cool and scathing as he could. “Don’t tell me your father’s staging the visit to get you out of Care of Magical Creatures,” he drawled.

Theo smirked. “No. That’s a convenient byproduct. Dad’s bringing him because he wants to speak to some people here, and the Board’s due for an inspection of the grounds — years over due, in fact. After I told him what happened last year, with Yaxley, he couldn’t believe it — asked how nobody noticed him slinking around the Forest, and I told him, if you think that’s bad, let me just tell you what else Dumbledore’s been cooking up while the Ministry was sitting on its thumbs: have you ever heard of a little thing called ‘Muggle Studies’?”

“That’s been around for decades,” said Draco boredly, hearing Hermione’s voice in his ear. “It would’ve existed when he was at Hogwarts.”

“Well, even so, he agreed with me,” added Theo, blithely, “and we both agreed the school’s security was in tatters. The dementors are a good step forward, and supposedly Runcorn is thinking of putting an Auror guard on the castle grounds, but before they do anything else a preliminary inspection is in order. I’m thrilled, personally, I think it’s about time the Ministry gets involved at Hogwarts.”

“You would,” said Draco. He felt subtly ill at ease. The other Slytherins were smiling and nodding as though Theo was the very voice of reason, and he realized they probably didn’t care one way or another what Theo was actually saying; his father was a prize deputy to the Minister of Magic. “I suppose Lord Runcorn will be signing a law naming you Head Boy, next.”

“I wish,” said Theo, amused. “No such luck, chum. Dad says that Runcorn’s very interested in new grading policies — real merit-based standards, all about performance and objective criteria, none of this wishy-washy House points stuff. If we want to stop falling behind Durmstrang and Beauxbatons, we’ve got to actually set our students to work. It’s students like me, like you — like Granger, even! — who will do best under reformed standards. It’s quite modern and fair.”

Draco snorted. “Bully for him. You think Dumbledore’s going to go for that, do you?”

“But it doesn’t matter, does it?” interrupted Blaise. “It’s the Board who decides, ultimately, and the Board isn’t made of faculty. Dumbledore can’t menace them into doing what he wants.”

This made Draco pause. He wanted to ask Blaise who he thought Dumbledore was ‘menacing’ now, but Theo interrupted him before he could. “Ah, that reminds me,” he said, snapping his fingers. “Runcorn is hosting a little reception for students on Friday night. Eight o’clock in the fourth floor lecture hall, near the east wing. Select invitations, you know, just for certain people and their families, but I thought I’d invite you. Spare you another evening in that dismal tower.”

“How kind. Is it only for the board?”

Theo shrugged. “Something like that.” He clapped Draco on the shoulder. “Got to run. Our next period is Charms, and Flitwick’s going to jinx my nose into a pocket watch if I’m late again, he really will.”

“Sure. Say — suppose I’d like to bring someone to your little party,” said Draco, keeping his tone light. “Fair game?”

Theo paused. “Well,” he said, trading a look with Blaise. “Certainly you can. I don’t suppose anyone would stop you.”

Draco smiled without teeth. “Only someone suitable, of course.”

“Oh, then sure,” said Theo, flapping his hand vaguely, as if the question didn’t even bear asking. “Course you can. You know how these things work, Malfoy. Anyway, I’m off. See you at the match; do try and give Ravenclaw a thrashing, by the way. I’ll not root for Gryffindor against a wet sack of murtlap dung, but if we let those sanctimonious swots get close to the Cup, we’ll have failed as gentlemen. Ta.”

With that, the gaggle of Slytherins drifted away into the crowd, disappearing in a melange of dark robes and sneers. Draco lingered in the Great Hall, frowning, as the crowd streamed around him like a river around a rock, gripped by the rising suspicion that something important and invisible was happening about ten inches over his head.

The Gryffindor match against Ravenclaw took place on a drizzly morning in late February. The Gryffindor table was in good spirits, having just reacquired its chaser and its seeker, though Harry's lack of a decent broom was worrying Draco. Oliver called a last-minute prep session over breakfast, so the team huddled at the end of the table, scarfing down truncheons of bacon, while their captain modeled quidditch plays with salt shakers. Various classmates drifted past to wish them good luck, including several from Hufflepuff, whose informal house alliance with Gryffindor was well-established. Percy and his girlfriend, Penelope Clearwater, came by the table to wish them good luck, though at the sight of Penelope, Oliver fell silent and gave her a frosty look.

"Come now, Oliver, there's no sabotage," said Percy heartily, as Penelope flushed and averted her face — as if, Draco thought, anything of note could possibly be gleaned from the positions of the pepper relative to the mash. "Penny and I have got a bet on; ten Galleons on the outcome of the match."

"Sports betting is against school rules," added Penelope (a round girl, freckled, rather cute if in a decidedly swotty way, with chunky black glasses and a heavy sheaf of fringe) "but I thought, well, we can make an exception, just the once — if it's between prefects."

"Right, if it's between prefects," said Fred seriously. "George and I recently learned there are lots of rules that don't apply if you're prefects. For instance, being out of dorms after curfew—"

"Boys being in the girls' bathrooms," said George idly, stirring his tea, "girls being in the boys' dorms…"

"Really, the list is endless. Apparently I should have tried harder to make prefect, I had no idea how useful it could be—"

"Anyway," said Percy, loudly. "Penelope and I came over to wish you good luck, because she's a good sport. Unlike some." He turned to escort her away, giving an imperious sweep of his cloak, but paused to whisper something in Harry's ear as he went. Harry's eyebrows lifted, and he smiled to himself.

"What did he say?" asked Draco.

"To try and win," said Harry. "Because he hasn't got ten Galleons."

Draco blanched and buried his nose in his tea. How Percy had managed to get a girl with his finances in that kind of shape lay entirely outside of Draco's understanding. She couldn't possibly fancy him for his looks.

At a quarter to eleven, they marched down to the locker rooms. Compared to the first match of the season, the weather was downright temperate, though Harry still cast a precautionary waterproofing charm on his glasses. Draco added a warming charm to his broomstick and tucked his wand into the inside pocket of his robes. Footsteps rattled the beams over their heads as the stadium filled with spectators.

"...that new seeker, that Chang girl, you've got to keep an eye on," Oliver was saying to Harry. "She's faster than you think. She gave Diggory a run for his money in the match last Friday, and she's only a third year… but remember you've got a year of experience on her, so don't get too wiggy about it, either…"

They emerged onto the field and the stands erupted with applause. The Ravenclaw team stood waiting for them on the field, and Draco gave them a cursory scan, looking for the seeker Oliver was so worried about. It wasn't hard to find her; she was the only girl on the team, and even shorter than Harry, clocking in at five feet if she was an inch. Her long black ponytail fluttered in the wind like a snapping eel. When she saw Harry she straightened up and smiled at him, which was a bit off-putting; Draco, in contrast, got an ugly glower from his counterpart Ravenclaw chaser.

Madam Hooch gave a sharp pipe on the whistle. "Wood, Davies, shake hands… mount your brooms…"

Chang was still smiling while they mounted their brooms. She flew one of the new Comet models, still shiny with factory wax, and the bristles tightly bound. Draco figured he could outpace her with his Nimbus, but he felt uneasy about Harry's chances on the Cleansweep.

"Go!"

The whistle blasted. Draco shot into the air.

He was one of the first up, and his initial burst of speed put him well above most of the others. The only people to keep pace with him were Wood, who could probably break Mach 5 on a bespelled teaspoon, and Chang, who had erupted from the initial tussle for the quaffle with surprising speed, and cut a neat arc around the stadium, her head turning this way and that for the snitch. She was very fast, and very skilled. Harry lagged just a moment behind her, bent low and straining the upper limits of his broomstick. His frustration was evident on his face.

"AND THEY'RE OFF… Gryffindor playing its full roster for the first time since the beginning of the season, welcoming back players Potter and Malfoy, seeker and chaser, from their stint in the hospital wing — Potter's now riding a Cleansweep Four, stark contrast with the Firebolt he was sporting in the first game, unfairly taken in the line of duty; that leaves Malfoy with the best broom on the Gryffindor team— now, he's flying a Nimbus 2001, which means you can't beat it for quality or handling, although the model's about a year old now, and supposedly loses in a head-to-head with the new Thunderbolt—"

"Jordan, where is the quaffle?" interrupted Professor McGonagall impatiently.

"Oh, right you are, Professor, just giving a bit of context. I was going to get around to the Ravenclaws, too— Davies has a Starsweeper this season, fast as murder, terribly sexy—"

"Jordan!"

“AND IT’S GRYFFINDOR in possession, KATIE BELL of Gryffindor, heading for the goal…”

Draco already knew this, having traded the quaffle in a pair of crosses with Katie over the Ravenclaw chaser’s head. As they approached the goals, Harry shot past them in the opposite direction, followed by Chang. He fought the temptation to turn and look to see if Harry had seen something. The snitch wouldn’t show this early in the game; Harry was probably trying to tire her out, to grind down the advantage she had in pure speed. He and Oliver had spent the better part of yesterday’s practice talking it over.

Katie made a shot on goal. It slipped cleanly through the Ravenclaw keeper’s outstretched arms and fell through the goalpost. Draco whooped and hauled his broom around, holding out his arm, and she slapped it as she flew by. The numbers on the scoreboard flipped down of their own accord: GRYFFINDOR 10 - 0.

“That’s Katie Bell, Katie Bell for Gryffindor, ten-nil to Gryffindor, and a beautiful shot it was, too — pretty cross there by Draco Malfoy, did I happen to mention his broomstick — only joking, Professor McGonagall! Anyway, possession to Ravenclaw, and that’s Davies to Burrow, Burrow to Stretton, Stretton to Burrow — oooh! ”

Jordan audibly hissed through his teeth. One of the Ravenclaw beaters had nailed a bludger straight at Harry, and forced him into a swan-dive that narrowly avoided collision with the stands. Draco swore he could see the place where it nicked the back of Harry’s robes. George intercepted the dodged bludger with his bat and sent it hurtling at Davies, who did a barrel-roll to avoid it.

“Bad form!” shouted Angelina. “Who aims for the seeker before the snitch is even out? Fred, teach him some manners!”

“Took the words out of my mouth, gorgeous!” Fred sped past, chasing the second bludger into position. With a crack, he punted it at the other beater’s head.

But Harry was undeterred. His jaw set, he pulled out of the dive and zipped back into the air over the stadium, circling with an eye out for the snitch.

In the confusion, Angelina repossessed the quaffle and was steadily flying back towards the Ravenclaw goals. She and Angelina scored the second and third Gryffindor goals of the game while Draco hovered at midfield, ready to play defense, but they never let the quaffle get that far. Oliver's assessment had been right; Gryffindor had a clear advantage over Ravenclaw in terms of chaser quality, and their new keeper lacked confidence. Katie and Angelina were running a train through him. If Ravenclaw was going to pull a win at all, it would do so on the back of its seeker.

Harry shot past Draco, ruffling his robes. Draco veered to the side and opened his mouth to snap at him, but the objection died on his tongue when he saw how Harry was flying: belly to the broomstick, head down, as if he were trying to wring every last ounce of speed from his subpar broomstick. Chang followed him a heartbeat later.

"And it's Gryffindor, Gryffindor in the lead, eighty-twenty, with Ravenclaw milking two goals out of that confusion with the bludger! But Potter is putting on a lot of speed, and Chang's right behind him, making good time for a Comet, honestly, especially considering the season they just had in the leagues. Never saw a Comet that couldn't blow a lead of fifty paces if you tried to turn it—"

"JORDAN!"

"And Potter accelerates more, he's definitely seeing something we don't, and maybe Chang sees it too — we'll have to wait and see — oh!"

Chang had swept in front of Harry and executed a complicated swivel on her broomstick, blocking him. Harry swerved to avoid a collision, breaking his line, and both the crowd and Oliver roared with disapproval. The captain actually drifted forward a few feet away from the goalposts to shout at him.

“HARRY, THIS IS NO TIME TO BE A GENTLEMAN! YOU’VE GOT TWO STONE ON HER! IF SHE WANTS TO WRESTLE, PUT HER ON THE GROUND!”

Draco, blinking, realized that Oliver was right. Harry, possibly for the first time in his quidditch career, was no longer the lightest player on the field. But he wasn’t used to throwing his weight around like the bigger players, and he hadn’t thought to try and foul Chang to get her off his tail. It wasn’t Harry’s style of play. Draco wondered if Chang had made the same observation before she cut him off.

The quaffle had returned to Gryffindor. Katie passed it back to Draco, who vaulted it over Burrow’s head to Angelina and then cut underneath him in a stomach-turning dive to get past the defender. They wove a braid of passes over the field, scored again, and wrestled the quaffle back from Ravenclaw possession before it got out of the end zone. Draco kept having to resist the impulse to watch Harry and Chang, who were chasing each other all over the upper quadrant of the field, doing a number of theatrical dives that reminded him of what Theo had once called a typical “seeker’s move.”

Rain drizzled across the pitch, thickening as the game went on. Dim clouds drifted across the sky, spotted with the occasional swell of ominous black. The light continually changed as clouds of different density passed over the sun. This sent waves of alternating light and shadow sweeping over the field, like a passing searchlight. With such inconstant visibility, Draco had to concentrate just to see the quaffle. He couldn’t imagine how hard it was for Harry to see the snitch.

“He’s onto something!” said Jordan sharply. “Potter is in a dead heat with Chang — they’re not chasing each other anymore, they’re neck and neck — I think they’ve seen the snitch—”

Draco couldn’t help it. He was a seeker at heart. He punted the quaffle to Katie and turned to watch as Harry and Chang shot overhead, their shoulders locked, chasing a tiny glint of gold.

“He’s got it!” shouted George. “Go on, Harry — it’s all speed, at this point— oh, no you don’t! ” He smacked away a bludger that would have tagged Harry’s broom, and then rounded back in, intent on landing another hit on the Ravenclaw beater.

Draco’s heart skipped. As Harry extended his arm in front of him, a wave of darkness passed over the pitch. The clouds above turned thick and knotty, like a long spread of wet black cloth, and the light plunged. The only sources of visibility were the glowing exit lines in the stands and the moon-like glow of the scoreboard. Draco squeezed his eyes shut, trying to force his eyes to adjust, and when he opened them he could make out the shapes of the other players hovering in the air: they had all stopped moving because of the impaired visibility. It was too dangerous, with the possibility of running into someone — even the beaters had gone still.

“What’s going on? This wasn’t in the forecast!” shouted Oliver. “The almanac said light rain today! Light! Rain!”

“It’s not clouds,” said Draco. He felt very cold.

“What? Malfoy, what was that?”

For it was: not swarming, like they had at the first game of the season, but floating overhead in a huge bank, like a roll of fog. Their ragged cloaks blotted out the full quilt of the clouds. None of them dipped down to enter the pitch, but moved as one over it, like a flock. In the distance, Draco could hear the hoarse howl of their breath, echoing like a roll of faraway thunder.

“Not again,” moaned Oliver. And echoing him, Draco felt a cold pit of fear in his gut, and thought: Not again.

He spun, looking for Harry. But Harry was already prepared. He held his wand in his hand, his expression fierce, and shouted, “Expecto patronum!”

Something silver-white and enormous sprouted from the end of Harry's wand and galloped over the pitch. It wasn't like the Patronuses Black and Lupin had produced; its edges were fuzzier, the shape less discrete, more like an animated hand of mist than a living creature. But it worked just the same. As the ball of white danced past Draco, the cold of the dementors receded, cast off like a coat of frost under the touch of firelight, and his heart started to beat calmly again.

The light started to change. The dementor cloud passed over the stadium and the sun returned. The Patronus, hovering around Oliver's goalpost, dissipated into white mist as the dementors disappeared. With visibility newly restored, Madam Hooch's whistle sounded, and the players sank to the ground, many of them on shaky footing.

"Quaffle to Ravenclaw!" shouted one of the Ravenclaw chasers.

"To Ravenclaw? To Ravenclaw?" Oliver roared. "That was the most obvious interference I've ever seen! The bloody sun went out! Madam Hooch, please be reasonable—"

"Mr. Wood—"

"A blind man could see that counts as extenuating circumstances, and if they get the quaffle then we should get a ten point penalty, because Katie was about to make a shot on goal when the visibility dropped, and everyone on this field knows damn well she could have made that shot in the dark, so if you want to penalize us for playing fair—"

"Mr. Wood, it doesn't matter who has the quaffle!" said Madam Hooch shrilly. "You've won the match!"

Oliver's jaw dropped. Harry, who had just landed in the mud next to them, grinned and held up his fist — in which thrashed the tiny wings of the snitch.

“That’s my boy!” he shouted. He and the other chasers dropped their broomsticks and threw themselves on top of Harry, who went down without a stitch of resistance under a pile of muddy red robes. The Gryffindor stands erupted in cheers. Percy gave a single, deliberate whoop. Ron led a chant of Harry’s theme song, which made Harry blush bright red but which did nothing at all to quell the grin on his face.

Draco, however, could not shake a sense of queasiness. Instead of dropping down to share in the riot of Gryffindor celebrations, he turned right and flew across the field, to the faculty box, where McGonagall and Lee Jordan sat in the commentator’s mic. Behind that was Dumbledore’s seat — now empty — and the seat of the man he was actually looking for.

“Professor Snape!”

Snape carried a wide black umbrella, the type that posed an unapologetic inconvenience to everyone sitting behind him, and tipped it back to regard Draco with an expressionless face. “Congratulations, Draco,” he said coolly. “A well-played match. Endeavor not to drip.”

Draco ignored him. “What was that?” he demanded, pointing at the eastern sky. “Why were they here? They’re not supposed to come to quidditch games, Dumbledore said—”

“And they did not.” Snape’s eyes slid past Draco, to the gaggle of Gryffindors now jumping and hugging each other on the pitch. “On a related note, where on earth did your friend Potter learn to produce a Patronus Charm? He is not famous for his grasp of magic above grade-level.”

Draco knew very well, but he wasn’t about to shout the answer over the full faculty box. Lupin was sitting just a few rows back. “I don’t know,” he lied. “Professor, if the dementors weren’t coming to the game, why did they do that?”

“On ceremony,” said Snape. He rose and cast the water from his robes with a flick of his wand, sending droplets scattering onto Draco. Draco shielded his face irritably. “They were going to greet their master.”

“Their master?” Draco said, chilled. “Who’s he?”

Snape gave him a very strange look. “I should think you would have deduced it,” he said. “They serve the Bureau of Corrections. Their master is the Minister of Magic.”

Chapter 24: The League of Promising Youth

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

Plastered against the windows of Gryffindor Tower, dripping wet and still festooned with spirit wear in red and gold, the house watched from afar as the Minister of Magic entered the grounds. His early arrival had driven the school hastily back into the castle, shepherded by the loud direction of Professor McGonagall, and now their only glimpses of the man were stolen from a distance through the tower window. Draco felt rather sorry for the Slytherins, who from the basement common room would get to see a plum load of nothing at all.

Dementors rose in a dark column against the checkered sky. Dumbledore and a small attache of professors, including McGonagall, Flitwick, and Snape, headed down across the rain-splattered lawns to form a welcoming party.

Hermione, who was short, huffed and craned her neck trying to see over the cluster of heads in the window. Draco stepped aside to let her look, but there was no longer anything to see: the professors had shrunk to a dark watery blot in a sea of green, and disappeared among the trees. “I wonder why he’s come early,” she said intently. “Did he mean to surprise Dumbledore? Catch him off his guard, before he’s had time to prepare?”

“Maybe he got a meeting moved up,” said Draco boredly. “I wouldn’t bother yourself over it, bureaucrats’ schedules are rarely the stuff of reason. Say, Granger — don’t get too distracted by all this Minister rot, would you? It’s not hardly what the rumors make it out to be. He’s not here to talk to students, and only the really slimy ones will try, so for most people it’ll be like he’s not come at all. You’re better off holing up in the library and waiting for it all to blow over.”

“Distracted?” she repeated. He suspected he’d offended her; in his defense, it didn’t take much. “I shouldn’t get distracted? Nobody in this tower’s done homework in three days!”

“Don’t be offended. I’m only telling you that there’s no reason to bother yourself.”

She narrowed her eyes at him. “And yet I don’t see you warning off anybody else.”

He put his hands in his pockets to keep them from fidgeting. She had a way of sniffing out when he was lying — and he was lying through his teeth, to be certain — but he didn’t feel at ease telling her his real concerns: that she, in particular, should endeavor to steer as clear of the new Minister of Magic as was possible.

Draco didn’t have a good reason to feel this way. He just had a strong and irrational urge to put as much distance as possible between Hermione and the Ministry. Perhaps she was right, and it wasn’t fair that he hadn’t warned off Harry or Ron in the same way — but that was different. Ron’s father worked in the Ministry, and Harry was the bloody Chosen One. They had people, good people, wizards, most importantly, who would look after them. Hermione had no one looking out for her at all. Someone ought to do it.

Anyway, the thing with him and Hermione was different than the thing with him and Harry, or him and Ron. Everyone knew that, it was obvious. He didn’t go looking for Harry or Ron when he was bored, and they didn’t save plates of toast for him at breakfast. They couldn’t sit together and read for hours without saying anything, couldn’t talk about loud music and novels and tell him things that actually made the muggle world sound decently interesting. —It wasn’t as if he didn’t get on with Harry and Ron. But there was more to him and Hermione, more layers to it, like fathoms of a seabed. And one of the layers, he suspected, involved not letting each other get embarrassed or insulted or hurt, if it could possibly be avoided. The idea of anything like that happening to her displeased him. It was sour and unpleasant and he tried not to think about it.

Besides, he was fairly certain she would do the same for him. If he was in danger of putting his foot somewhere he shouldn't, he knew she would come running from the other side of the castle to shrill at him.

Exhausting business. How Harry and Ron went about watching each other's backs, he had absolutely no idea; it was like a pair of beagle puppies being appointed each other's keeper.

"Quite, because I don't care if the rest of them waste their time," he said blithely, and he dropped his eyes to adjust the button on his cuff. "I wouldn't care if you did, either, but it felt unsporting not to tell you, since you're playing at a handicap in the world of wizarding politics. Don't get offended at that, it's not an insult. It's not your fault your parents — lovely as I'm sure they are — couldn't teach you."

She wrestled with the decision of whether or not to be cross with him for this. With tangible reluctance, she decided not to.

"I've read loads about it," she said, sourly. "Loads and loads."

"And to my great resignation, I expect you're about to endeavor to prove it," he said. "But do you fancy something hot to drink, first? I still can't feel my toes." He shook his sleeve, and water coursed from his quidditch robes with a polite and emphatic plop.

On their way out of the Tower, he listened to her chatter with a familiar combination of irritation and relief: she showed little interest in the Minister, the Ministry, or any of the subjects likely to land her in trouble. She was far more interested in the Department for the Regulation and Control of Magical Creatures, which he duly informed her was such an underfunded shoebox of a department that nobody in the upper circles even remembered it half the time. Her outrage on this issue carried them all the way down to the kitchens. Then he lobbed her a theoretical question about Transfiguration, and she launched breathlessly into an exposition on a conversation she'd had with Professor McGonagall that appeared to entirely drive the Ministry out of her mind.

In fact, the only other thing she said about it, as they were waiting for their hot cocoas, was: “Ron says he’s a dreadful politician, anyway. His voting record on elvish welfare is purely horrendous. I wouldn’t like to meet a man like that.”

“You mean to tell me elvish welfare isn’t a priority for the Cavalier Party? I’m distraught.”

“Who are the Cavaliers supposed to be, again? Tories or Labour?”

“How should I know? It doesn’t map exactly, our politics are infinitely more complex than muggles’, and there’s years of history between them… Are Tories the ones against taxes?”

“Among other things,” she said passionately, “like human dignity, and distributive justice, and public health—”

“That’s the one,” he said, yawning. “Oh, Granger, look, they’ve still got peppermint wands leftover from Christmas. Don’t tell me you’ve never had a peppermint wand…? Who raised y— Merlin, don’t give me that look, I heard it as soon as I said it.”

On Friday evening, Draco left the common room early. It pained him to do this, because it was just the sort of rare night in Gryffindor Tower that he could tolerate: Ron and Hermione had ceased bickering, if only out of mutual exhaustion, and arranged for an armistice over tea and biscuits, which they nibbled by the fireplace while they occupied themselves with various diversions — she, a book, and he, a chess problem from the Prophet . Harry, exhilarated from the victory of his Patronus, had taken his pocket snitch down to the common room and offered Draco a game of keep-away to keep his seeker’s skills tight. Fred had stolen some trifle tart from the kitchens and George had put one of his muggle records on. So it was with no little measure of self-sacrifice that he turned Harry down, made an excuse about forgetting his Transfiguration notebook, and descended the stairs to the fourth floor lecture hall.

The door to the hall sat slightly ajar, and through it came a slice of golden light as thick and yellow as rich butter cake. Laughter floated from inside, and the clink of glasses against each other, the casual burble of a social occasion. Draco adjusted his tie and twisted his cuffs straight around his wrists. He shook his arms out and breathed deeply and then pushed inside with the confidence of someone who had never hesitated in the first place.

When he had gone to the Yule Hunt at Knotscliff he had been startled and satisfied to see the number of pureblood families concentrated in the same room. Now it slightly alarmed him: he had understood what Theo had meant when he extended the invitation, but it was another thing to see the composition of the party, and to see how many of them wore Ministry uniforms. Witches and wizards in high-collared robes of royal purple drifted back and forth from a drinks table, where towering sculptures of champagne glasses foamed white, and house-elves shepherded around platters of appetizers balanced on their large flat heads. Occasionally a witch or wizard would take one from the tray without looking down or even realizing there was a creature beneath it.

It reminded him of the Samhain bonfire, over a year ago, with its sense of informal camaraderie under veneers of ceremony. It didn't matter whether anyone in the room actually knew each other. Everyone knew why they were there, and that was enough.

"Mister Draco?" squeaked a voice by his knees. He looked down and saw a house-elf with a pair of women's hair ties wound around his wrists, holding a clipboard.

"Dobby?" he said, bewildered.

"Yes, sir, Mister Draco, sir!" chirped Dobby delightedly. "It is so good to be seeing you! You are looking so tall! Goodness, Dobby is having to hurt his neck to look at you! Dobby is sorry for not visiting over the winter, he feels very badly about it, and he is hoping that Miss Narcissa is not angry with him either, but Dobby has made so many friends in the kitchens, you see, and last summer his friends said to Dobby, have you seen the tallfolk city of Lunn Donn, if not then you must see the tallfolk city of Lunn Donn, and so Dobby went, and saw so many tallfolk, and some tallfolk who were not wizards also — is Mister Draco knowing about this? Tallfolk who are not wizards! Like elves without ears! — and Dobby tried to ask one about it, but then Dobby's friend Pippy says no no no Dobby Freed-Elf, you must not talk to them, for they are very scared of us. A tallfolk, scared of an elf! Dobby is astonished still. But he is still sorry he could not be with Miss Narcissa during the holidays."

"Dobby," Draco broke in, a bit pleased, and a bit bemused. "That's fine. We found help."

Dobby paused. "But the help is not as good as Dobby," he said confidently. He shot a furtive look at Draco.

"...Absolutely not, it isn't. In fact, it's dreadful. The house has gone to pieces."

Dobby nodded sagely, as if he expected this. "Dobby is truly sorry, sir. But he is worried also, for his friends are now saying: have you seen the big wizard city of Barleesoona? And Dobby is saying, what do you mean, there is another tallfolk city? How many cities do the tallfolk need? And why so many, when smallfolk and horsefolk and merfolk have none? His friends are telling him, we too have been asking these questions, and we simply do not know. But it is great fun to go to the tallfolk cities, and so Dobby is not complaining."

"Right," said Draco, furrowing his brow. "Of course. Dobby, what are you doing here? It's a private event."

"Well, the Minister is needing to use the Hogwarts facilities for his reception, sir," the house-elf explained, "and this is including the kitchens. Now, Dumbledore has come and said to us — all private-like and secret, when the Minister is gone — you will not be needing to do this as part of your job at Hogwarts, this will be an extra job for volunteering only, and he will pay everyone who is volunteering a double wage for the hours they are working. And many elves are saying, we will not, because many elves are not liking the Minister. But double wages is a lot of money, and Dobby is a hard worker, so he volunteers!" He beamed and brandished the clipboard. "And then Spratt says to Dobby: you will have a very special job! Because Dobby is one of not many elves in the kitchens who knows his letters, you see, Mister Draco! So he is in charge of writing the guest names on a list." He showed Draco the list on the clipboard, which, sure enough, contained a long list in Dobby's tiny chicken-scratch.

"But he is not having to ask you for your name, sir," he added, winking. "You, Dobby is recognizing immediately, always! Even if you is getting terribly tall."

"My mother has voiced the same objection," said Draco. With a sincerity that surprised him, he said: "It's good to hear you're well. You should, er— take care of yourself."

"And you also, Mister Draco!" Dobby glanced around skittishly. He crept closer to Draco's knees and whispered: "Mister Draco, we is not supposed to be touching or speaking to the wizards. So Dobby is going to pretend he has not said anything now. But he is happy to see Mister Draco, and hopes we will be seeing him in the kitchens soon."

And delivering a fond pat to Draco's knee, he hurried away to intercept the next passel of guests.

Draco slipped along the back wall, avoiding eye contact with anyone who could recognize him. He looked for Theo, and found his father instead, holding a goblet of wine and talking animatedly with a group of wizards near the dais. In his company was a tall and square-faced wizard with a black beard and a long, well-kempt mane of hair, dressed in a gray suit and a handsome purple cloak with gold trim. As Draco watched, he smiled at something Sibelius said and sipped from a fingerbowl of champagne. A pair of Aurors hovered only a footstep behind him, their hands resting on their wandsheaths. They weren't drinking.

It had to be Runcorn. Draco recognized his face from the Prophet editorials, and distantly recalled it glowering out from a campaign poster in Knockturn Alley. He was taller in person, and projected a different kind of man than the Prophet made him out to be. He looked calmer than he sounded in the newsprint. Unlike the one in the Prophet, this Runcorn wasn't shouting or glowering or beating his fist on a desk; when he broke into laughter, it put warm crow's feet around his eyes. Really, he could have been a professor. He certainly wasn't half as scary-looking as Lupin.

Beside him stood Sibelius Nott, Prescott Parkinson, Orpheus Greengrass, and Garrett Goyle. Orpheus and Garrett were having a heated debate of some sort. Prescott said something under his breath to Sibelius, who snorted into his glass. Runcorn observed it all, speaking rarely, except to answer a question someone put to him.

Sandwiched between Sibelius and Prescott, looking more uncomfortable than an egg at an omelet station, was Theodore. He wore a cream-colored ascot that clashed horribly with his complexion and held his mouth pursed in a lemon-sour twist of loudly broadcasted displeasure. His expression was a strong argument for euthanasia.

When he noticed Draco, he perked up a little bit, which was not saying much. He lifted his drink slightly, as if to toast him, and gave a horrible twitch of the mouth that looked like a smile with palsy.

"It is considered rude to stare," said a deep, silken voice.

Draco turned on his heel. "Professor," he drawled, masking any startlement he felt. "I didn't know faculty were invited to this kind of soirée."

Snape materialized from a shadowy corner of the room, dressed in a high-necked set of black dress robes that were only slightly more formal than his usual teacher's gear. "I have acquaintances here," he said, in a tone that revealed nothing. “I make a point of maintaining connections that may serve me in the future.”

“So you’re here to brownnose, like the rest of us.”

Snape’s eyes glittered. But he only said: “Careful,” and placed a hand on Draco’s shoulder. With a grip like an iron claw, he steered him out of the Minister’s sight. “Have you come to reacquaint yourself with your father’s old friends? Rarely does one find so many of them concentrated in the same place. Excepting, I suppose, a meeting of the Wizengamot.”

“Theodore invited me.”

“Nott?” said Snape. His expression was unreadable. “Interesting. Are you close to the boy?”

“I suppose. Most of the time he’s a shady little git. Decent gentleman, though, when he puts in the effort. I’d vouch for him, but don’t tell him that.”

Snape’s fingers bit into Draco’s shoulder, hard enough to make him wince — a succinct warning that they were not speaking privately. “He does his father’s bidding.”

“Theodore? No.” Draco scoffed. “He loathes his father. Can’t stand him. He came to France with Mother and I, and his father didn’t write him once.”

“And yet he puts enough faith in his son to introduce him to the Minister of Magic. Don’t you think that indicates a measure of affection for the boy? Men of his position tend to feel… proprietary about their sons.”

The word proprietary sparked something in Draco’s chest. He wondered if his father would have felt that way about him; whether Lucius would have grown more protective or proud of him with age. Then he resolved not to think about such things. It wasn’t as if he needed protecting, anyway. Considering how Theodore spoke about his own father, perhaps he wouldn't have even liked him — and that thought was so profoundly unsettling that he gave a little shudder to be free of it.

"I don't know what his father thinks. To be honest with you, professor, I've not spent a great wealth of time contemplating Theodore Nott's family melodrama."

"True. I imagine you remain plenty occupied with your own," said Snape coolly, which made Draco scowl, not so much at the insult but at being robbed of the last word. He opened his mouth to snip back at him but found that they had moved on, through an archway lined with gold foil and white lilies, up to a cocktail table that glowed white like a pregnant moon. With Snape's hand still fast on his shoulder he found himself herded into the crowd around the table, which included a scattering of spotty-looking wizards in or approaching old age, none of them in Ministry wear. Snape lifted a lavender cocktail from an orbiting golden tray, thrust it unceremoniously into Draco's hand, offered the table a curt utterance of: "Draco Malfoy." Then he retreated, leaving Draco with a full glass, a row of blinking faces, and the welling suspicion that he had just been parked at the kiddie table.

"Was that 'Malfoy,' I heard?" inquired one of the wizards, a bowl-faced old man with a round belly and a rich tweed suit under his traveling cloak. "Not Malfoy as in Lucius, surely?"

Draco twisted his mouth in the thin, vaguely aggressive smirk of the pureblood. "The same," he said. "If we've met before, I don't remember you. Are you with the Ministry?"

It was a courtesy question; obviously the wizard was not, for he wore nothing of the sort. But he pinked with pride and stood up straighter.

"No, m'boy, not I. Never a Ministry man, no matter how hard they begged me, and they have begged me. But I said no, for I was young and full of folly, and I wanted to be an academic… I took my Boards young, you see, for a moment I was something of an ingénue. When you're young and exceptional, truly exceptional, all anyone tells you to do is academia — I'm sorry, I've buried the lede fathomless deep, haven't I? Professor Horace Slughorn, at your service."

Draco nodded to him. "Sir."

"A round of introductions may be in order, since our dear comrade Severus so faithlessly underwhelmed us in that department. This is Professor Ezekiel Ezzazz, Potions Master at Ilvermorny, best hand at a Pepper-Up I've ever seen; Master Spinoza Springbok, research fellow at the Potions Institute of Oxford, dear comrade, like to think I've taught her half as much as she taught me; Professor Pityr Petrovsky, Professor of Alchemy at Durmstrang, I'm sure I don't need to introduce him; and my dear little teacher's pet, Bertha Jorkins, the sweetest Gryffindor I ever taught. She works for the Department of International Magical Cooperation — remind me where, exactly, Bertha?"

"Magical Games and Sports," said Bertha, without much enthusiasm. She was a plump, slightly sour-faced woman around his mother's age, and she wore a rather drab gown of black velvet that even McGonagall might have dismissed as frumpy.

The professors gave him a series of small nods and waves. Draco returned them, and turned to Slughorn. "And where do you teach, sir?"

"I beg your pardon, dear boy?"

"You said you were a professor. I'm sorry, but I'm afraid I don't know where you teach."

"Ah," said Slughorn, as cherries bloomed in the milky swells of his cheeks. "Well, teach — I put that aside some years ago, to do research. I've an emeritus position at Cambridge, so I spend some time there, but really, I so rarely have the time to come in and supervise—"

“Supervise!” crowed Professor Ezzazz, who spoke with the brash, flat drawl of an American. “Supervise? You ain’t supervised anything besides your wine cellar since 1981. If you’ve touched a cauldron in the past five years, I’ll eat my darn wand.”

“Oh, be nice,” said Professor Springbok. “When’s the last time you published, Ezekiel?”

“More lately than him! And the difference is, I got kids I got to teach. It’s not like I’m sittin’ around and gettin’ paid to think about stuff.”

“Secondary school,” simpered Springbok, in tones of delicate scorn. “How taxing.”

“High school,” corrected Ezzazz.

“Oh, yes. High school. Pardon me.”

“My research demands constant attention!” insisted Slughorn. “It is most important work!”

“You’re all potioneers?” said Draco, this time with an interest he did not have to feign.

“Nyet,” said Professor Petrovsky, surprising everybody by breaking his silence. “I am an alchemist.”

Slughorn blew a raspberry and flapped his hand. “Potato, po-tah-to,” he cooed. “Whatever the Soviets call it, these days. Honestly, you’d think that the Slovaki Minister would put some effort into reintegration, especially after everything that’s happened…”

“Is different discipline,” said Petrovsky stubbornly. “Is not the same. You sit over cauldron and stir with little stick. Alchemists tamper with laws of cosmos.”

“Gonna start a swear jar for you saying ‘laws of cosmos,’” muttered Ezzazz.

“Is different! Severus agrees.”

“Severus is a purist,” said Slughorn jovially. “Of course he’d agree with you. He probably thinks we should be doing all our brews in cauldrons of sterling silver, with rods of tempered gold…”

“But that’s better, isn’t it?” interrupted Draco, his curiosity overwhelming his graces. “The purer the metal, the less interference there is with the magic?”

Only Petrovsky nodded at him approvingly; the others shot him a few odd looks. Slughorn said, with a touch of discomfort, “Well, certainly, in terms of theory, that would be right… but in practice, of course, it just doesn’t do. It’s far too expensive, and the quality tradeoff with pewter or cast-iron isn’t nearly enough to justify it. Putting aside the problems with manufacture, silver is notoriously finicky…”

“I see,” said Draco, though all he heard was that Snape had been correct.

“Actually, don’t be so sure,” piped up Ezzazz. “There’s this fella in New York who says he can do things with silver you wouldn’t believe. Guy by the name of Gallahad. He thinks he can stabilize the tempering process enough for mass-production.”

“You can’t possibly mass-produce silver, it’s too expensive,” objected Springbok.

“It is now. But that’s what I’m saying, if you could transmute it from cadmium or palladium, you could have much more of it.”

“Oh, if that’s all.”

Everyone laughed.

“Permanent elemental transmutation is highly theoretical magic,” said Draco. He leaned over his drink, fascinated. He wished

Hermione could hear what the professors were saying; she'd be thrilled out of her mind. "Has someone figured it out?"

"Only in laboratory settings," admitted Springbok. "My team recently converted two moles of mercury into gold and maintained it for three hours without interfering with the stasis chamber."

" How? Where did you get that much energy?"

"Read my paper," she said, a bit smugly. "Forthcoming in the Potions Review, March 1994."

"But you're serious? At your laboratory, you're actually doing that kind of work?"

"I see Severus has already converted you," Slughorn said grandly, cuffing Draco on the shoulder. "That sly old lizard! Isn't it just like him to have a protege hiding under his cloak. Isn't that just like him, Pityr? And he never said a word about it."

Something in Draco's face must have been crestfallen — Snape had never mentioned him, at all? — because Slughorn blanched and hurried to correct himself. "Not that I'd hear of it, if he had," he babbled. "Severus and I don't speak more than once a year… he's a lovely man, I'm sure, but we're not exactly chums, are we? I'm sure he couldn't name any one of my past three apprentices, and if you know me, you know I don't make any secret of it…"

"Peace, Horace," said Petrovsky suddenly, and Slughorn cut himself off with palpable relief. "I know of this child, Malfoy."

Slughorn brandished a hand. "And there you go!" he bellowed. "I'm sure you know Severus better than any of us! Certainly you're the only one he ever talks to at conferences; I can't remember how many times I've turned around to find the two of you holed up in a corner, muttering about formulas."

Draco perked up. “Snape told you about me?” he asked Petrovsky, trying helplessly not to sound pathetic.

Petrovsky fixed his eyes on Draco. They were small, ice-blue, and set in a face of hard planes and deep hollows, like the side of a Nordic glacier. “He asks me for consult on potion,” said the professor. “Requires special ingredient most plentiful where I live. Is difficult to get. I say to him, if you do this thing for me, I fetch. He says, okay. He does favor. I give him ingredient. We meet, and I say to him, why do you need this? This is hard potion. Can achieve similar effect with spells. He says: similar not enough. Must be potion. I say: okay, Severus. But for what do you need mooncalf blood so much?”

A ripple of interest passed through the crowd at the table.

Petrovsky continued to stare at Draco, unperturbed. “Then he says to me: what is point of doing favor for you if you insist on being nosy shit?” (Draco bit his tongue to suppress a grin. He could all but hear his godfather’s voice.) “And again I say: okay, Severus. Your business. Not mine. But perhaps he thinks to himself, I should not make Pityr mad, in case I need ingredient again. Perhaps he thinks, Pityr is good friend to have, he makes things easier for me. So he says: I will tell you little bit, and then you take your nose out of my zadok, yes? And I say deal. And he says, there is boy in England, young boy, big house. Someone breaks into big house and steal shit. I say, ah, so you want potion to find out who? He says no. Need potion for this woman, boy’s mother.”

Draco startled. “My mother?” he said. “What did she want with—”

“So,” continued Petrovsky, without seeming to hear him, “I say, who is boy? And he says, you remember Lucius Malfoy. I say: show me the man who has forgotten Lucius Malfoy, I show you a dead man. And he says yes. This is his child. My godson.”

Slughorn gave a small exclamation. “Godson!” he said. He peered at Draco over his spectacles, as if seeing him for the first time. “He never said anything about a god- son! My goodness! He was that close to Lucius? Stars, I never knew!”

Springbok made a noise of delighted surprise. So did the other professors. They all turned and looked at Draco. It was a testament to the thick mantle of secrecy that Snape wore tightly around his person that the revelation of a godson seemed to shock and please a crowd of people for whom the most arcane complexities of magic itself had long since ceased to be any amazement.

Draco, meanwhile, was vibrating with a queer sort of filial pleasure. It was a pathetically small victory, really, to be simply acknowledged, but it was such an unexpected concession from Snape that he could not help but be pleased.

There was dancing now in the center of the room, in a ring carved out by a line of glowing runes in the floor; white-haired wizards steering their youthful wives in lurching spirals, glossy couples in matching robes holding each other with a fashionable, otherworldly disdain; and in between them, a few students, cherubic and ill-suited to their fine dress robes, still wearing Hogwarts ties of green and silver. A full-bodied witch with hoop earrings so large they sat on her shoulders opened her mouth and poured out a deep jazz contralto, while small fireworks of laughter went off in rotation around the room. More trays of cocktails floated out of the aether, the glasses deeper and wider than the first round, and somehow a wizard’s hat had ended up hooked on the chandelier. A pair of house-elves were fencing with martini skewers for the amusement of some upper-ranking Ministry officials. Unbidden, Draco thought of Dobby, and quickly turned away.

He excused himself from the potion masters and slipped out to the men’s. While searching for somewhere to put down his cocktail near the door, he quite accidentally bumped into Pansy, who had stumbled in after a group of loud Wizengamot members and had yet to remove her fur coat. Her pigtails were braided and studded with emeralds, and she wore a pink dress of shade and cut horrendous.

“You!” she gasped, with a hostility he was sure he hadn’t earned. “What are you doing here?”

“And good evening to you, too. I was about to say it had been too long, but apparently you’d prefer it was longer.”

To her credit, she recovered quickly. “Don’t snip at me, I’ve just spent a simply desolate forty-five minutes with Madam Pomfrey. Dumbledore’s making me take this stupid extra class called ‘therapy.’ I told him it was utterly unfair to make me do extra work, since it’s not my fault he let some murderous creep sneak into his school, and he was lucky I hadn’t told my parents — you should have seen his face, you would’ve loved it — anyway, come here, then,” she grumbled, and hauled him down by the collar to plant an ungracious kiss on his cheek. He gave her a light one on the cheekbone and withdrew.

“I was invited, if that’s so terribly difficult for you to believe,” he added.

Her mouth puckered with distaste. “Of course you were,” she sighed. “Trust Teddy to blab all over the castle about it. Even when we were told to keep our mouths shut! You haven’t told any of the Gryffindors, have you? Say you haven’t, or I’ll have to go put an awl through his head.”

“Tell them what?” he said, frowning. “What are you afraid of? You think some Weasleys might float in by accident?”

She leveled a manicured fingernail at him. “For one, they very well would,” she said darkly, and he had to admit she was right. “This is just the kind of occasion your ragamuffin housemates would love to spoil with some sort of mischief. For two, even you being here is a breach of secrecy.”

He stared at her for a moment, speechless. “Pansy, I’m a pureblood,” he said incredulously. A beat passed, and he added: “My family’s older than yours.”

This touting of the pedigree impressed her not at all. Instead, she smacked his chest, which was the highest part of him she could reach. “For heaven’s sake, don’t you think I know that? Yes, Draco, you’re pureblood. Look around! So’s all of Slytherin house, and most of them aren’t here, either.”

It was true: of the not-insignificant number of Slytherin students (though Slytherin was the smallest house) less than a quarter were in attendance. It hadn’t occurred to him how few were there until Pansy pointed it out.

“So it’s a Ministry party,” he drawled. “All right. That’s no big secret, either, everyone here knows who my father was—”

This drove her even deeper into the throes of frustrated aggression, which she vented by pinching him. “A Ministry party? Draco, think! You know how many Ravenclaws have parents in the Ministry? How many Hufflepuffs? Even your friend Weaselbee’s father works in the — I don’t know — Department of Muggle Crap, or what-have-you.”

“Misuse of Muggle Artifacts,” he said distantly, distracted by the observation that she was right. “Fair enough. Theo didn’t tell me what the occasion was. It’s for the Cavalier party, I suppose, is that it? That’s why Weasley and his lot didn’t get invitations?”

“No,” she said, her irritation patent. “There are lots of Ravenclaws with parents in the Cavaliers, too. No. It’s just Slytherins and you. Why do you think that is?”

He stopped scanning the crowds and looked down at her. She was clasping her winter coat to her chest like a child’s stuffed animal, strangely rigid, as if she were afraid of something. Him?

“Theo invited me.”

“Yes,” she agreed. “He did. Because Theodore, the spectacular dolt, thinks you’re his friend.”

“I am his friend,” he said, stung.

“Sure you are. Yes. But — oh, I can’t say this without offending you, so you’re just going to have to get over it — but here’s the truth. Teddy doesn’t know you’re not a Slytherin.”

He blinked. “Parkinson,” he began slowly, half convinced that this ‘therapy’ had put her off her rocker. “Everyone knows I’m not in Slytherin. Nott especially. He was there, actually, at our Sorting. I wear a tie, I board in the Tower, I fly chaser for the Gryffindor team —”

“Yes, yes, all that rubbish, it doesn’t mean anything and you know it,” she said impatiently. “If I had a galleon for every student who’s ever been Sorted wrong, I could buy your Manor and the next three over! Did you know Cordelia Newcastle has been sleeping in the Hufflepuff common room for three months because she can’t stand being in Slytherin? It’s true. There’s been a spare bed in the dungeons since November. Theo, sweet stupid boy that he is, thinks you’re a Cordelia. And he won’t see reason when I tell him he’s wrong.”

Draco had no idea what to say. For some reason, the first thing that came out of his mouth was: “Why do you think he’s wrong?”

“Because you’re not,” she sighed. “I mean, bless you, and everything, I do think you’re a decent chap, and you’re the only Gryffindor that I don’t want to put my own ears out after talking to, but you’re not one of ours. If it came down to it—”

“If it came down to it, I’m still his friend,” he said coldly, straightening his back. It reasserted several inches of height between himself and Pansy, and he looked down on her from an even greater vantage. “I don’t like your implication, Parkinson, and I recommend that you withdraw it if you’d like to remain on civil terms.”

Unfazed, the second year folded her arms and thrust her chin up to meet his eye. “I won’t,” she said steadily. “You’ll only prove my point if you get upset about this. You don’t look out for him like I do.”

“Of course not,” he sneered, “seeing as I don’t live up his arse—”

“Oh, now who’s being uncivil?”

“I’ll say you have a lot of nerve claiming to look out for him, seeing as he’s had a full plate cleaning up your messes ever since you came to school.”

“My messes? Mine? If you mean the time with the She-Weasel, she attacked me, and you did a fat load of nothing about it until Teddy forced you, which pretty much proves my point!”

“Attacked you? Don’t make me laugh. You called Granger a slur, what did you expect—”

“A slur?” she said softly. “A slur? So the truth is a slur, is it, now, Draco?”

He flinched away. The impassive set of her face made his skin crawl. “All I’m saying,” he said, in tones of cold disapproval, “is that you had no business being surprised when she jumped you. You know very well what that word means, and what kind of reaction it would get when you said it in front of those people.”

The disapproval in his voice made her duck her head and squirm. “Maybe,” she said stubbornly, yielding nothing. “Maybe I wanted to see how you would react. You ever think of that?”

He laughed unkindly. “Don’t let’s pretend that you cared about me until Theo told you to.”

Her head snapped up, expression blazing. “That’s not fair,” she said, with surprising vigor. “He never told me to care about you. I was the one who asked him to introduce me. And I was hurt when you didn’t say anything, you ignominious moron. I wanted to be your friend.”

He gaped at her.

“Are you mad? You wanted to be my friend, so you decided to try insulting my others?”

“What else was I supposed to do? I was eleven!”

“You might have tried an owl, first!”

They stared at each other, bristling with aggression.

“Merlin,” she said suddenly. “This is exhausting. I don’t know how you all live like this in the Tower, I think I’d die. Can’t we just lie and say we’ve made up? I swear not to care if you won’t.”

“Smashing idea,” he said immediately. “Let’s.”

“Good,” she said, and held out her hand. They shook firmly, and the argument was over.

There was a crescendo of silver on glass, and spoons tinkled against a flotilla of champagne bowls. Runcorn had mounted the podium at the fore of the room, and his voice rang out in artificially magnified peals of deep, sonorous bass.

“Witches and wizards, gentlefolk, friends,” he began. “I thank you all very sincerely for joining me here. I know you have taken time away from your jobs — which I know to be very strenuous—”

Giggles of the artificial and obliging variety susurrated.

He smiled with fatherly condescension. “And I apologize for that. The work of saving the world has never been easy. I thank, also, those of you whom I have taken away from your studies; for you, too, the work of saving the world has begun, though as I recall, it never seemed quite so glamorous as the work your parents now perform.”

Claps and laughter rose from the students in the crowd, who raised their voices even higher than their elders, perhaps to compensate for their smaller number.

As Runcorn continued to speak, Draco leaned over to speak in Pansy's ear.

"You never said what the party was."

She kept her eyes locked on Runcorn. One would suspect she had some deep fascination with Ministry smalltalk, so steadily did she refuse to look at anything else. "It's not a party. It's a recruitment event."

"...For what?"

"It's called the League of Promising Youth," she muttered. "It's a civic association for students."

"Pedigreed students," he said.

"Yes."

"Pedigreed Slytherins. With Ministry connections."

"I'm sure they'd let a Ravenclaw join, if one wanted to."

"How much would you bet on it?"

He'd put too much acid in it; she pressed her lips together and arched her nose even higher, as if allowing the remark to drift underneath her notice.

"And the point of this 'civic association,'" he said, in a low voice, "is to do what, exactly?"

"Well, I don't know, Draco, I've only just got here," she snapped. "I assumed they were going to tell us once we'd been properly initiated. I'm not even technically invited to join, it's for third years and up, but my father said I could use his connections to get in if I wanted to."

"And will you?"

“I don’t know! That’s why I came, isn’t it, to see if it’s my shout? I mean, I don’t care a fig for politics, and my father disgusts me utterly, but if all of my friends are going to be doing something, I’m not going to be the only one who’s not in the club.”

“You wouldn’t be the only one.”

“In fact I would. They came around the Slytherin commons and delivered little invitations, wax-sealed with the Minister’s crest and everything. Everyone who’s anyone got one. Theo’s been punched, and Daphne, and Blaise…”

“You wouldn’t be the only one,” he said, “because I wasn’t invited.”

She glanced at him, half-exasperation, half-guilt. “But you’ll get in if you want it, though,” she said. “You know that, don’t you? With your money, and your pedigree? You could walk right up to the Minister and ask.”

Draco’s mouth felt dry. He could hear Runcorn speaking, but he couldn’t focus on what he was saying. A prickle ran up the base of his spine, cool and sharp, like the thrill of fear that afflicted him when he was flying into a steep dive.

“I have to go,” he said abruptly, and turned.

“What? No! What did I say?” Pansy clutched his arm, following him to the door. “Draco. Don’t be dramatic. No one cares if you’re a Gryffindor. It’s just a stupid tie.”

She was lying, or at the very least she was wrong, but he couldn’t concentrate enough to tell the difference. It didn’t matter, anyways. “It’s not that,” he said.

“What, then?” she demanded.

“I don’t know,” he said, taut with frustration, and he was telling the truth. “I should go.”

“What? No. Don’t leave me here,” she said at once. “Don’t be such a girl about it. I need you to protect me against my parents. They want to introduce me to some boy from Scandinavia — I expect they’ll want me to marry him — you owe it to me as a friend to pretend to be in love with me for an hour, at least.”

He tore his arm from her grasp. She let go and stumbled back, eyes wide and wounded, like a spanked cat.

“What is the matter with you?” she demanded. “That was a joke.”

“I’m sick,” he said, and after a moment he realized he wasn’t lying: his stomach had been seizing ever since Runcorn took the podium. “I have to see Madam Pomfrey. I’m sorry, Parkinson. I’ll make it up to you some other time.”

Runcorn’s speech had reached a crescendo. He turned away from Pansy and ducked out of the warm room into the cool, welcoming air of the hallway beyond, where, for some reason unknown to his conscious mind, he broke into a run.

On Sunday morning, after spending the better part of Saturday in bed, Draco went down with Hermione for the first Hogsmeade visit of the term. Ron, who was still not speaking to Hermione on behalf of Scabbers, stayed behind, and Harry gave some half-hearted excuse of wanting to stay in and do homework. Draco could have laughed. If it didn’t hurt Hermione’s feelings, he wouldn’t have cared.

Partly to distract her, he told her what had happened at the party.

“But that’s vile,” she exclaimed. “Absolutely vile. It’s obvious what they’re doing — rounding up all the students who’ll regurgitate their ideas back to them, all the same backwards traditionalist doggerel. It’s nepotism, pure and simple. I’m shocked that Dumbledore’s allowing it.”

“I’m not sure Dumbledore’s allowing much of anything,” he said flatly. “It’s the Minister of Magic. What’s Dumbledore going to do, kick him off the grounds?”

“He could,” she said hotly. “Hogwarts might be a public institution, but that doesn’t give the Minister leave to swan in and do as he likes, especially when it comes to threatening the welfare of children.”

“I hate to break it to you, Granger, but I don’t think Runcorn’s a threat to anyone in that room.”

“And I didn’t say it was their welfare at risk, did I?” she countered evenly, with a subtle lift of her chin. “Nothing you’ve said about these people’s politics makes me feel terribly good about them rallying their children into — what is it, anyway? Some sort of secret society?”

“The League of Promising Youth, Pansy called it.”

“The ‘League of Promising Youth,’” she repeated, curling her lip. “God, it even sounds sinister. I’m glad you had the sense to get out of there, Draco. Those people sound haughty and insensitive and downright bigoted. I’d think less of you if you’d stayed, honestly.”

Her fury warmed him. Talking to Hermione about the party had a way of soothing his nerves, somehow, and dispelling the dismal sense of malaise that had settled over him for the past twenty-four hours. When she spoke, everything seemed so orderly and clear. Of course it was wrong, for the Minister to be cherry-picking his favorite students; of course Draco had been right to leave. Framed this way, the decision made him sound heroic and principled. It was much better than thinking he’d fled because he was too nauseous and cowardly to sit through a harmless speech.

“It wasn’t even a good party,” he said dismissively, as if he hadn’t been having a perfectly good time before Pansy showed up. “I didn’t get to talk to anyone important. I got stuck at a table with a bunch of academics.”

“No! Did you really? Tell me everything you heard.”

He hid a smirk by turning his face towards the lake. “I can’t remember it all,” he said vaguely. “I suppose someone mentioned a bit about pure elemental transmutation; supposedly she converted a mole of mercury, in her laboratory—”

“A mole? That’s not possible!” Hermione whirled on him, mouth agape, transfixed. “You’re joking! You misremembered.”

“Mm, you’re right. It was two.”

“Two!”

He grinned at the lake. It was a very pretty lake, today: the sun was iridescing off the chipped surface of the waves, and refracting pieces of the egg-blue sky. “Yes, two,” he said. “Mercury into — actually, guess.”

“Well, it’s not gold, obviously,” she said. When he remained silent, she gasped: “No. It isn’t! It isn’t. You’re playing with me.”

His cheek twitched. He ironed it out, sternly.

“You ought to pick up the June edition of Potions Review. That’s all.”

“Draco Malfoy, you know I can’t get wizarding magazines!” She was practically wailing. “I’ll be out of school by June, and they don’t deliver to muggle addresses! You’re lying.”

“Then you’ll just have to be very nice to me.”

“Be serious. You’ll get one for me, won’t you? I’d pay you back. I figured out how to exchange currency at Gringotts, you know.”

He wrinkled his nose, disgusted. “When have I ever let you pay me back for anything?” he said, horrified. “It was a joke. I could buy that magazine. I’m not going to shake you down for ten galleons.”

She ignored him. She was talking fast, and walking faster. Hermione always did this: her body ran on words the same way a steam engine did on coal. “It’s just not possible. I don’t think you would lie to me about it. You know how important it is! You and I have talked about it before, this very thing, and we decided it was impossible. Didn’t we say it was impossible? No, you wouldn’t lie…”

“Granger, I’m not lying,” he said amusedly, breaking into a jog to keep up with her. “Stop fussing. I’ll get you the magazine.”

“After you read it first,” she muttered.

“Naturally. The day I let you win is the day you get bored of me.”

“I would never get bored of you,” she said indignantly.

“Because I never let you win. Exactly. We agree.”

“No, because you’re far too interesting,” she said. “You’re like a maladapted bird of paradise. I shouldn’t expect I’ll ever find someone who’s so fully self-contradictory in so many ways.”

He made a scandalized noise. “If that’s not the richest thing I’ve ever — pot, meet the blackest, grimiest, filthiest kettle—”

“Hush,” she said, falling still. He stumbled a few steps and doubled back, following her gaze. They had crested a hill and came upon a row of old stones overlooking a ridge that led down to the gamekeeper's hut. Below, among the orange valleys of the pumpkin patch, stood a trio of Ministry officials in high-collared purple uniforms with silver studs.

“Aurors,” said Draco, frowning deeper. “Why are the aurors here?”

“Shh!”

The door swung open. Hermione made a small chirp, like a startled bird, and then shoved them both behind one of the larger stones. His back hit the rock and he made a noise less of pain than of surprise.

When he opened his mouth to object, she shoved her finger against his lips. Her arm made a brace across his collarbones, surprisingly firm, for all her lack of natural size and strength. He could feel her driving against him with all her might, which was not much — he could have easily shoved her into the dirt with a flick of his arm — but it was more than he expected.

He didn't quite know what to do. If Harry or Ron had taken liberties like this, Draco could have body-checked them into the mud and been cheerfully on his way. He sort of stared at her for a moment, waiting for her to realize the extent of her indiscretion, but the daft girl wasn't even looking at him. She was peering around the rock, holding him in place with one hand, apparently expecting him to simply remain where he was put.

He narrowed his eyes and carefully pried her finger away from his mouth. "Granger," he hissed.

She ignored him, peering around the rock to see what was happening below. "Look!" she whispered.

"Granger, what the hell—?"

"Shut up! I'm trying to hear!"

He rolled his eyes and turned around. The door to Hagrid's hut creaked open, and a trio of aurors stepped out. Two of them carried between them a large steel box with handles welded out of metal, and sealed with a glowing red padlock the size of Draco's head. Both wore gloves.

"...call the Romanians, and have them on standby," said a voice. Draco leaned closer, struggling to hear, and his chest bumped Hermione's shoulder; she made an absent, irked noise, and shouldered him back. He glared at her.

"Yes, sir."

“And notify the Minister, of course, once you’ve done all that. He’ll be invigorated by the progress we’ve made here today. If you can get him personally on the Floo, tell him that the search will be extended by… oh, three weeks should be sufficient, don’t you think? For the grounds?”

“Yes, Lord Nott.”

“Until the end of March, then. With apologies.”

Draco sucked in a breath. Sibelius Nott emerged from Hagrid’s hut, a sight so strange it sent a pang of cognitive dissonance ringing through his skull. Descending from the stairs with a prim and characteristic distaste, Theodore’s father paused in the pumpkin patch and brushed a patch of something pale and crumbling from his sleeve. It looked like ash.

He glanced down at his robes, and his expression darkened. Draco noticed that there was a long, jagged tear in the silk near his knee. “And call Magical Creatures,” ordered Nott, after a moment. “Have someone out to put down that dog.”

“Yes, sir.”

With a last sneering flick of his sleeve, he swept after the aurors, following them down the wooded path to Hogsmeade.

Hermione waited until they were just out of sight. Her expression was dark and unreadable. Draco let out a slow exhale and murmured, “Well, that’s interesting, isn’t it? Do you think that Hagrid —”

But Hermione was gone: she was hurtling down the hill, so fast that even Draco had to sprint to catch up with her.

She flung herself against the door, hammering. “Hagrid!” she shrieked. “Hagrid, open the door! Are you in there? Are you alright?”

The door cracked open, and Hagrid shambled out. Draco balked. The half-giant was in a bad way: red hemispheres rimmed his eyes, and tear tracks ran down in gobbets the size of small rivers through his great uncombed beard. He was even more shabbily dressed than usual, and scorch-marks peppered his shirt.

“They took ’im,” he croaked, kneading a giant and phlegm-clogged handkerchief. “They took ’im away from me. From his daddy that loves ’im, they took ’im, an’ they’re fixin’ ter ship ’im off, Merlin knows where…”

“Took who?” said Hermione breathlessly. “Hagrid, took who?”

“You’re a father?” Draco said, flabbergasted.

“’E was jus’ a little bloke,” moaned Hagrid, “and now ee’s gone! Gone… they took Norbert away…” And he slumped down on the stoop, his head drooping so low that his great shag of hair swept his knees.

Hermione immediately dropped to her knees and cradled his hand between her own. “Who’s Norbert?” she demanded. Her tone was hard and, in Draco’s opinion, not at all comforting, unless you happened to know Hermione. Then it was still not very comforting, but it didn’t give the initial impression, which was that you were about to be horsewhipped for information. “Who did they take away?”

“Or what,” added Draco. Hermione shot him an aggrieved look, but he shrugged: with Hagrid, it was a fair question.

“Ee’s on’y a baby,” sobbed Hagrid.

“A baby?” Draco exclaimed. Hermione scowled and drew her finger across her neck, but he refused to be sorry for it. The idea of anyone entrusting Hagrid with a human child was almost as unfathomable as Hagrid actually siring one.

“Yes,” Hagrid agreed tearfully. “A baby. Jus’ a little baby dragon.”

Draco let out a high-pitched bark of laughter. He couldn't help it. He really couldn't.

Hermione put her hands over her face. "A dragon," she mumbled. "A baby… a baby dragon. So: a dragon."

Draco did not trust himself to speak. Or, rather, he did not trust himself to say anything that wouldn't make Hermione look at him in the way he hated, so instead, he stepped down from the stoop and stalked restlessly over to the nearest pumpkin, where he stood, his hands on his hips, putting every ounce of willpower he possessed into not saying what he wanted to.

He was very proud of himself when he didn't. He walked back to where Hagrid sat and found Hermione still attempting to comfort him.

"It's okay, Hagrid, really," she was saying. "It'll be alright. They're taking him to a sanctuary, probably, where he'll be taken care of, and he'll be with his own kind… lots of other dragons for him to play with, and, and… goats to chase, and everything…"

Draco arched his eyebrow at her and mouthed: Goats?

She threw up her hands furiously. He hid a snicker under a cough.

"But 'ee won' be with his daddy," sobbed Hagrid. "'Ee won' be with me. They don' know how ee likes his milk, and they didn' take his favorite blanket…"

"I'm sure he's distraught," said Draco dryly, and Hagrid — apparently in concurrence — broke into a great wail. Fang broke into a pang of sad howls, too, apparently sensing his master's distress. It took several minutes for Hermione, with scant help from Draco, to calm them down.

"How did you even keep a baby dragon?" Draco said, mostly rhetorically, since Hagrid was in no state to answer. "You live in a wooden hut. Next to a forest. That's remarkable. It's actually remarkable that you haven't died."

"You," hissed Hermione, "are not helping."

Luckily, Hagrid seemed not to hear them. "An' now I can' teach, either," he managed, between gulps for breath. "Because they've suspended me license. An' I'm on temporary probation fer unlicensed possession of a Class Five creature. An', an' when they come back, they said, they were comin' with a warrant ter search the rest of the paddock… all of me stables an' warrens…"

Hermione sat up very straight. "They're coming back," she said, in a strangely calm voice. "You're sure?"

Hagrid nodded shakily. "They said they're lookin' for signs o' Sirius Black," he sniffled. "Tha's how they got a warrant fer Norbert, was someone gave 'em a tipoff about me hut… I dunno what ter do. I really don'. If tha's what they do with Norbert, I dunno wha' they'll say when they find Buckbeak…"

Draco said, "You're right, they'll probably take him," and realized too late that he sounded altogether too chipper. Too late, for Hagrid roared with dismay. He cringed, and hastened to add: "But, you know… he can fly, so I don't think their odds are very good of keeping him. He's a wild animal. I'm sure he'll get out if he wants to."

"He won', though," moaned Hagrid. "Tha's the rub of it. I've trained 'im to fly back here every time he takes off, because he's expectin' treats and food and the like. They'll know jus' where to find 'im, if he gets out. An' if they think they can't release 'im into the wild, they'll — they'll—"

Based on the way Hagrid exploded into an even more violent profusion of tears, Draco had a pretty good idea of what they would do.

Hermione, however, had gone quiet and still. She had ceased to comfort Hagrid at all; she had even dropped his hand, and now was lacing her fingers in front of her mouth, deep in thought.

“The whole grounds?” she said. “All of it? Including Hogsmeade.”

Hagrid bobbed his head. “Tha’s what ee’ said.”

“Right,” she said calmly. “Right. Of course. They’d want to be thorough.”

She stood up and brushed off her hands. “Hagrid,” she said, with all the warmth of a staff sergeant, “you’ve got to reapply for your creature handling license. A special license, this time. Draco’s right, the general one really isn’t appropriate for someone in your position, and you’ve more than enough experience to pass the written exam. I’ll help you. There’s books on it at the library, you can take them out on my account. I’ll come down with some materials tomorrow, and we can start working on the appeal.”

Hagrid lifted his head and blinked at her, his craggy face bright with hope. “Ye will?” he said. “Tha’s — tha’s plum kind of you, Hermione, but — no, yer a student, yeh shouldn’ take time out of yer studies for tha’.”

“Nonsense,” she said crisply. “This is what my studies are for. What’s the point of knowing everything if you aren’t going to help people? We’ll have tea after classes. By the way, you really must keep Fang inside. Don’t let anyone from the Ministry see him.”

With that, she gave Hagrid a brief but mighty hug, and then bid him goodbye. “Come on,” she whispered to Draco, taking his arm and pulling him away from the cottage. “There’s no time to waste. We’ve got to find Professor Lupin.”

“What now?” he said, irritated at being yet again denied access to the memorandum on where, exactly, they were going. It didn’t stop him from following her, though. “Why Lupin? Has he got a hippogriff stashed in his closet?”

She paused and stared at him, wide-eyed, as if she couldn’t believe that he didn’t see what she saw.

“No,” she said. “They’re doing a full sweep of the grounds. That includes the Shrieking Shack.”

Plots, Plans, and Potions

Chapter 25: Plots, Plans, and Potions

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

Whatever wisdom Lupin might have had to offer about the situation, they never heard it, because after almost an hour of all but ransacking the castle, Draco and Hermione were informed by an unamused Professor McGonagall that Lupin was not there.

“What do you mean, he’s not here?” Draco demanded. “It’s a Sunday afternoon. Where else would he be?”

“What Professor Lupin does with his weekend is quite his affair,” replied McGonagall, “and I fail to see how it should concern either of you. If you require something to occupy yourselves with, the silver in the armory needs polishing, though it may not for long, if you continue to take that tone.”

Draco apologized, and steered them quickly back to the common room; the clipped tones of McGonagall’s disapproval made Hermione look so wretched he worried she might try to kill herself.

Harry and Ron were stationed at a table under a wide hemisphere of unfinished homework.

“Look who it is,” Ron said sulkily, as soon as her head cleared the portrait-hole. “Quick, Harry, check on Hedwig. She might ‘run away’ any minute now.”

“Any other time, Ron, but we’ve much more important things to do,” said Hermione breathlessly. “Both of you, put that away and come with us.”

The boys gaped at her with twin expressions of pure horror. Harry took off his glasses, looked at them, and then put them back on.

Only a catastrophe of life-altering proportions could impel Hermione, of all people, to admit of an activity more important than homework.

Hermione windmilled her arm towards the portrait hole. “Well? Come on!” she exclaimed. “Up! Up! We haven’t a country age!”

With a shriek of jostling chairs, the boys scrambled to their feet and hurried out. Draco, who was enjoying their panic far more than Hermione could ever be allowed to know, said, “Hup, hup,” and swung the portrait-door closed behind them.

Hermione sped through the labyrinthine corridors of the castle at a breakneck pace, almost bowling over an unfortunate gaggle of fifth years who paused to stare as she careened by, heedless of Draco’s trail of hapless apologies, neglectful of fellow student and staircase alike. She cruised right under the leering visage of Peeves, who launched into a rude limerick as she passed, and without turning around, she aimed her wand over her shoulder and said: “Langlock!” with such crisp efficiency that she might have been locking a door; with a gulp, Peeves’ jaw snapped shut, and he fumbled at his throat with panic that was slightly comical.

“Ruthless, Granger,” said Draco admiringly.

“Percy taught me that one,” she panted, without pausing for breath. She hiked up her robes and dashed down a flight of stairs, hair bouncing wildly in her wake. He hopped on the banister and slid down on his hips, landing lightly on the balls of his feet.

They rounded the second-floor landing, and she breezed into the second door on the right without knocking. Draco was about to follow when he finally got an eyeful of the door itself, and jumped back with such scandalized vigor that Ron plowed straight into his shoulder blades.

“Granger!” he hissed.

She hauled the door open. “What?”

“This is the girls’!”

“Oh, please. Like it would be your first time.”

Harry snickered. Draco used his eyes and fingers to communicate what he thought of this manly betrayal.

“That was two years ago,” he whispered, shooting a furtive glance down the hallway, and finding it thankfully free of any potential witnesses in need of Obliviating. “And do you remember what happened when I did? It rhymes with fountain roll. ”

“It’s a loo, not a dungeon, you baby,” she said. “You’re just skittish because you don’t want to get caught in the girls’! But you needn’t worry. This is Moaning Myrtle’s bathroom; it’s the first place I could think of where nobody will be able to overhear us.” She paused. “Well, except Myrtle. But she doesn’t really count.”

“Who’s Myrtle?” said Ron.

Hermione grimaced. “You’ll see,” she said. She held the door ajar and pointed her chin meaningfully inside. Sending another pained glance up and down the hallway, Draco ducked in.

“A whole magical castle at your fingertips, and your first thought was a privy?” he hissed at her as he passed. She made a face at him, and he stuck his tongue out at her, which made him feel much better, all things considered.

In a moment, the door shut, and enclosed them in a disarmingly clean marble bathroom, octagonal in shape, with high deep windows that strained afternoon sunshine through whorls of dust. Their footsteps echoed on the pale stone, and when he scraped his heel on the tile, the sound went skittering into the high vault over their heads. It smelled of rock and damp and other old-castle things, which was none too pleasant a thing to smell, but as one of Merlin’s few small mercies, it did not smell particularly like a bathroom that was often used.

“Who’s there?” cried a queer, watery voice from above. Draco’s wand was out and pointed warily at the ceiling before he had time to look, and saw a dark-haired specter in the rafters. The ghost was a girl, and a young one, with long black pigtails that triggered an unpleasant flare of familiarity in the back of his mind. That was where the resemblance to Pansy ended, though: the ghost girl had a long nose and a small, woeful mouth, with thick glasses which had been inflicted, rather unfairly, he thought, on a face of very little beauty to begin with.

“Hello, Myrtle,” Hermione said tentatively, locking the door behind them. “It’s me. You remember me, don’t you?”

“Oh, yes,” said Myrtle, sinking closer. The sunlight through the windows passed through her body and bleached it out, rendering her almost wholly transparent. “You’re the one who was always crying.”

Draco frowned at Hermione. She rolled her eyes and said, with a touch of color in her cheeks, “Yes, but that was years ago. I’m quite recovered now, thank you.”

“That’s nice,” said Myrtle sadly. “Must be really nice, to be able to get over things… to go out there and make a lot of nice friends… it’s much harder for me, of course, I never get to go anywhere…”

“Yes, that’s very sad, Myrtle,” Hermione said briskly, setting down her bookbag. “I’m sure that’s terribly rough for you. Maybe you should have thought of that, before you became a ghost, though.” She caught Draco’s astonished eye, and whispered: “You can’t give her any sympathy, or she’ll really work herself into a fit. She likes feeling sorry for herself, and she especially likes when other people feel sorry for her. If she gets going, we’ll be here for hours.” Raising her voice again, she called: “Now, do you mind giving us some privacy? We’ve something important to discuss.”

“Some-thing im-por-tant!” Myrtle mimicked her. “Oh, very important, yes, I’m sure. Much more important than anything I have to say. After all, who cares about Myrtle? It’s just stupid old Myrtle — dumb old Myrtle — I'm not someone im-por-tant, like little Miss Hermione Granger!"

"Yes, that's the long and short of it. Could you go in your toilet, please? We only need a few minutes."

"Oh!" At this indignity, Myrtle was too overwhelmed to speak. She gave a howl of misery, and swept through the doors to one of the stalls. The toilet inside gave a riotous, rageful flush, and water began to lap out from under the stall door, trickling into the drains in the floor.

Ron balked and gave the water a wide berth, twitching back his robes. "She's not really inside the toilet, is she?"

"In fact she is," said Hermione. She sat down on the floor near the window, settling herself in a nice pool of sunlight, and drew her wand. "Muffliato. There, she shouldn't be able to hear us now."

"But why?"

"Why what? Oh, that's annoying, isn't it. Silencio," she said, aiming her wand severely at the still-gurgling stall. It fell silent with a pitiful squelch.

"Why a toilet?" said Ron, a question Draco had dearly wanted to ask, but considered it beneath himself to give voice to. Ron often did this for Draco.

Hermione shrugged, as if she couldn't possibly be bothered to entertain the logic of a creature so deeply beneath her own powers of reason. "Ask her, I suppose. Ghosts are bound to the place they died, or places that were particularly significant to them while they were alive. Either way, it's rather depressing, isn't it? Really not worth thinking about."

"Poor thing," said Harry, staring at the stall.

Hermione said, “You’d feel a lot less sorry for her if she started bellowing every time you were trying to relieve yourself. Now sit down, please, Draco and I have just heard something terribly important and I don’t know how long that Muffliato will hold.”

They gathered in a circle on the bathroom floor. Draco, for whom this was easily the worst thing to happen to him all week, and possibly all month, cast a Cushioning Charm, and sent a rueful mutter about choosing better meeting locations in Hermione’s direction.

Quickly, in brisk, unornamented language, Hermione related to Harry and Ron what had been revealed at Hagrid’s hut.

“So we have to save him,” said Harry immediately. His tone was edged with panic. “We can’t let them take him. They can’t take Sirius back to Azkaban. He won’t do it. And Lupin! What will he do? Sirius won’t go, he’ll go down fighting, they both will, they’ll die.”

Ron was nodding glumly, as if he, too, saw this as a foregone conclusion. Draco, overall nonplussed at the dour mood of the congregation, decided to give them both a dose of medicine.

“Potter. Weasley. Shape up. Nobody wants to see my cousin dead,” he began. Then he considered. “Except, of course, the Ministry of Magic. And the dementors, though they don’t count. They want everything dead, it seems, so Black isn’t so much an exception as the rule. And most of the Wizarding World, of course, they’re against you. But of the people you’re talking to, zero of three.”

In return for this endorsement, he received a trio of bleak stares. He cleared his throat and added, “A very good start, one thinks.”

“Thanks for that,” said Ron incredulously.

Harry drove the heels of his palms into his rumpled hairline, clearly saddling up for a nervous breakdown. Draco was privately impressed that he had held out this long.

“Harry, calm down. Draco, stop trying to calm Harry down,” Hermione pleaded. “There’s still time. The man from the Ministry said they were extending the search for a month, and they’ll most likely start at the castle and move out, so they won’t reach the Shack for a few weeks, at least. The Forest will give them plenty to deal with in the meantime. All we’ve got to do is figure out how to move Sirius out of the Shack before then.”

“Trivial, really,” drawled Draco. “That’s all? Move a wanted criminal across a grounds packed to the gunwhales with dementors, smuggle him across the border — which we can’t cross, mind you — and move him to an as-yet undiscovered safehouse? While the top dogs in the Ministry sniff around?”

She glowered. “If you don’t want to help,” she began, heatedly, but he scowled and batted the suggestion away with his hand.

“Come off it, of course I’m going to help. He’s my cousin, not yours.” He pretended to inspect the soles of his shoes for bathroom-floor-grime.

This was not the reason he cared in the slightest what happened to Sirius Black. The reason he cared was five foot two and currently polishing his glasses like he could somehow scrub his abandonment issues out with a ratty sleeve. But Draco would rather end up haunting a toilet than bequeath that piece of information to anyone living.

And so Hermione could give him as many knowing smirks as she wanted. She could simper and wink and pretend to understand as much as she liked. Didn’t mean she knew anything. Didn’t mean it made him feel better, her looking at him like he’d just handed her a signed first edition of Bathilda Bagshot or lassoed the moon or something. Didn’t mean he liked feeling like he’d bested a basilisk with his bare hands.

Really, she might at least give him the dignity of feigning self-interest.

“Right. Er— anyway.” Hermione turned away from him, and her hair fell to cover her face, but her voice betrayed that she was still smiling. “There are three problems to solve, I think. One: we need to get Sirius out of the Shack and down into Hogsmeade, at least, where he can Apparate or use the Floo. Two: we need to make sure the dementors don’t get him — or us, frankly. Three: we need to make sure no one from the Ministry, or anyone else for that matter, sees us moving him.”

Ron rubbed his chin thoughtfully. “Well, last one’s easiest, isn’t it,” he said. “We’ve got to do it at night.”

“Night makes it harder because of curfew,” Hermione reminded him.

“Yeah, but c’mon. Filch? Mrs. Norris? We’ve been sneaking past them since first year. Nothing compared to the number of eyeballs about during the day.” He grimaced. “Believe me, I’m not too keen about skulking around the Forbidden Forest at night, either, but I don’t see how any of this works, otherwise.”

“We can use the Cloak,” Harry suggested.

Ron pursed his lips. “Sure,” he said, “but even if we use the Cloak, there’s no way we can fit five, especially if one’s a full-grown bloke. We can fit two of us, maybe three.”

“No. Just Sirius,” said Harry. He looked like he was gearing up to take a kick from a hippogriff, with all the grim seriousness of someone for whom this would not be the first hippogriff-kicking. “He uses the Cloak. The rest of us just risk it.”

Draco raised a finger. “Objection,” he said. “Can we come up with something better than ‘just risk it’? For preference? It’s just that I get so much more pleasure from having my soul here, inside me, rather than having it sucked out through my mouth like a fine soup.”

“Maybe we could try a Disillusionment Charm,” mused Hermione. “Flitwick says Professor Dumbledore can produce a Disillusionment Charm so powerful he's almost invisible."

"Great, maybe he'll do one for us," said Draco. "Because surely none of us will. It's sixth-year spellwork."

"I know, but we could learn!"

"In three weeks? Enough to fool a dementor? Even you and I have limits, Granger."

"What about a disguise?" suggested Ron. "There's lots of magical ways to disguise yourself, aren't there? Charlie said most of seventh year with McGonagall is just human transfiguration."

Draco blanched. "It's N.E.W.T.-level for a reason," he replied, stricken. "With respect, I'm not letting any of you numpties point a wand at my face unless you have a maxillofacial Healer's license and a cert from St. Mungo's. Not even Granger there, and she's the second coming of Merlin, if you believe McGonagall."

"Oh, stop it," said Hermione, who quite obviously did not want him to stop in the slightest, and she hid a beam behind her hair. "But Draco's right, we haven't a chance at managing human transfiguration, not at our level… I wonder if there's something we could brew…?"

She gasped. She turned to Draco, who abruptly sat up straight, cursing himself for not beating her to it.

They said at the same time: "Polyjuice Potion."

She smacked her forehead. "I'm an idiot!" she said. "Of course! A bit of Polyjuice—"

"Nick some hairs off of a Ministry official—"

"See if we can't get our hands on a uniform—"

“No one would stop us, all we’d have to do is grab him and walk him out. It’d be trivial.”

“Anyone who saw us would assume—”

“—it was just Ministry business,” he said. She nodded fervently.

The thrill of finding the answer was so all-consuming that it took him a whole three seconds to remember there was a world outside of their conversation.

“We’d be breaking about fifty school rules,” she added.

“If they catch us.”

“And we’d have to actually make the potion. Which would be difficult.”

He snorted.

“No, it would be, even for us. Even for you! For one thing, we’d need to find the ingredients somehow. And it takes almost a month.”

“Lucky us, then, we’ve got almost a month to figure it out.”

“And it’d be a lot of work.”

“I don’t know who you think you’re talking to, because I’m certain it isn’t the only person in this castle who’s ever beat you in Potions.”

“Because Snape likes you better, not because you actually do—”

“Oi,” said Ron loudly.

Draco and Hermione turned in unison.

“Whenever you two feel so inclined,” he said, aggrieved, “there are, not to shock you or anything, two other people here. Get back to us before we graduate, would you?”

“But you know what Polyjuice Potion is,” said Hermione instantly. “Snape mentioned it last year.”

“D’you think I’ve got nothing better to do in Potions than listen to Snape?”

“Truthfully?” said Draco. Hermione pinched him.

“It transforms you into somebody else,” she said.

“What — forever?” Ron was alarmed.

“It wears off after a while,” she muttered, digging through her book bag. “But getting hold of the recipe will be very difficult. They don’t teach it in Potions, we’ll need the recipe from a really old book… The Darkest Arte, maybe? Or we could try Most Potente Potions, it’d definitely be in there…”

“Is this Dark magic?” said Harry, frowning.

She scoffed. “Hardly!” she said. “It’s forbidden because it can be abused easily, that’s all. But it’s not hardly as dangerous as lots of the magic they teach here at Hogwarts, and that’s all perfectly legal.”

Draco caught Harry’s eye and rocked his hand to-and-fro: equivocating. Harry’s frown deepened and grew its own miniature set of frowns. His face was a frown breeding pit.

Hermione blazed on, heedless. “But Most Potente Potions is bound to be in the Restricted Section of the library. We’d just need a note from a teacher, which would be impossible to get without explaining what we wanted it for… I suppose we could say we were interested in the theory, but I don’t think McGonagall will fall for it, knowing us… we might ask Lupin…”

“Come to think of it, why haven’t we asked Lupin?” suggested Ron. “He’s sure to have some say in all this, hasn’t he?”

“And would do, if we could find the bugger,” Draco replied. “He’s gone off the map. Whatever he’s doing, he isn’t making himself available for consultation.” Harry gave a sharp intake of breath, and Draco felt badly. But there was no sugarcoating the matter.

“Perhaps he’ll be back tomorrow,” said Hermione doubtfully. “If not, we could try McGonagall, I suppose… or, Draco, you could always ask Snape.”

Draco tipped his head back and let the idea roll around in it. Unlike McGonagall, Snape wouldn’t dismiss the request out of hand, and he might even indulge him; but the problem was, he could read Draco like a book, and he didn’t have a good reason for wanting it that didn’t involve breaking school rules. He wasn’t sure how much he was willing to bet on being able to fool his godfather. “Alright. Fair enough. And what do I say when he asks me what I want it for?”

“Tell him the truth: you’re interested in potion-making, and you want to study it outside of a classroom context. It’s true, isn’t it?”

“It’s true, but that book—” He cut himself off. “Did you say Most Potente Potions?”

“Yes. I mean, I’m sure it’s in other books, but that’s the first one off the top of my head.”

“We don’t need to use the library,” he said excitedly. “I have that book. Snape gave it to me for Christmas last year.”

“But that’s perfect!”

“I know! All I have to do is write home to Mother asking for it — she’ll wrap it up and ship it for me, we’ll have it by the week’s end!”

“Marvelous!” breathed Hermione, radiating the warmth of a solved problem. “Marvelous. In the meantime, we can work on our Patronus Charms.”

The air went out of Draco like a skewered zeppelin. “Our what?”

“Patronuses,” she said, scrawling something in her notebook. “We’ll be outside after dark, with no chaperone, and the dementors will be about. Sirius can cast one, but that’s only one, and it’ll be better if we all can… Harry, you said Lupin taught you to cast a Patronus, didn’t he? You did a solid-looking one at the Ravenclaw game.”

“I can do it alright, I guess,” said Harry sheepishly. “It’s not as good as his.”

“Well, it’ll have to be good enough,” said Hermione. “We can ask Lupin to help us, once he comes back, but there’s no sense in waiting. You can teach the rest of us, and we’ll practice that while the potion is brewing. I’ll make a list of all the things we have to do. Draco, you’ll write to your mother for the book this afternoon… we should start stealing the things we’ll need, it’ll look more suspicious if we try to smuggle it all in at once… we’ll have to get a spare kit from the Potions classroom, and a burner, don’t know how we’ll set that up in here…”

“What do you mean, in here?” demanded Draco. “We’re not doing it in the bathroom, are we?”

She blinked at him owlishly. “Where else?” she said. “There’s nowhere I can think of that’s as private, or as sterile. We certainly can’t do it in the Tower, someone would knock it over or try to drink it before the day was out.”

“But it’s a bathroom!”

“Yes, so?”

“For starters, it’s unhygienic, it’s humid, and it’s haunted, for Merlin’s sake.”

“You,” she said knowingly, “just don’t want to be seen coming and going from the girls’ bathroom.”

“Frankly not!”

“Tosh,” she said. “You’ll be fine. Use the Cloak. Harry, Ron, you’ll have to help us get the ingredients. The base for the brew is a standard Cosmetic Potion, so there’s some things I know we’ll need right off the bat. Lacewing flies, leeches, fluxweed, and knotgrass… I’ll make copies of the list.”

Harry said, “I don’t think I’ve been sold on the ‘not using Dark magic’ bit of all this, really,” but Hermione ignored him. She was writing with a haste fit to leave skid marks behind her the quill-tip, and her hair had started to drift out of its elastic in a static halo, a quirk of her excitement that was probably unconscious magic.

“But—”

“And,” he added, “if I’m lying, Potter, do you really want to know?”

“No,” said Harry frankly. “But the fact that the book’s coming from Snape doesn’t make me feel a lot better, either.”

“Yeah, but look at it this way. At least we’re doing it for a good cause,” said Ron easily, brushing off his knees as he stood up. “If it’s between this and a bloke getting the Dementor’s Kiss, I’m not bothered. Anyway, don’t worry, Harry. When the aurors come, we can always say these two told us it was a Pepper-Up Potion.”

They decided to wait until dinner to stage their first theft, hoping that anybody lingering in the classrooms would have been driven out by hunger or boredom. Harry and Hermione went to nick a Potions kit from the student cupboard in the Potions classroom — “Stuff it under your cloak, like you’re preggers,” suggested Ron — while Draco went to the owlery to write his mother, and Ron took up a watch outside Lupin’s door, in the hope of making contact with the professor who (they reasoned) might well have just been out for an afternoon stroll. Agreeing to rendezvous at dinner, the four of them went their separate ways, and with all the enthusiasm Sisyphus felt for his rock, Draco hauled himself up the long, dismal stairs to the owlery.

Since the Ministry was screening his mail, he didn't fancy using Ulysses to carry the letter, but he didn't see any other choice. He couldn't explain to Snape the urgency of getting a missive to his mother on such short notice. So he scrawled out a letter that was as simple as possible: Jasmines are having a good season this year. May I have my copy of Most Potente Potions? Extra credit project. Don't tell Uncle S, I want to surprise him. He strapped it to Ulysses' leg and cast him out into the gloomy February fog.

His stomach noisily asserted its rights, and he made his way back down the stairs to the Great Hall. Near the foot of the great spiral staircase, the doors hung open, and a cluster of students had swept in from the cold, dusted with snow and whisking little snowdrifts into the hall around their ankles. Draco drew his cloak tighter around himself and curled his lip at the unwelcome intrusion of chill.

One of the students was Neville. He was trapped between Marcus Flint and Terrence Higgs, a pair of sixth-year Slytherins, who were amusing themselves with a game of murtlap-in-the-middle. Their toy was something small and mottled brown. Each time one of them tossed it, Neville gave a shrill squeal and went running after it, unaware or perhaps unwilling to admit that there was no possibility of him stealing it back. Despite the chill, his round face was splotched red and glossed with sweat. The Slytherins found this endlessly entertaining.

Draco had as much appreciation for a mean-spirited game of mockery as the next man, but watching them, he discovered that he had a significantly higher threshold for novelty. In first year, bullying Neville had been something of a school sport. By third year, he was astonished that none of the older students had found anything more important to do.

Fed up with waiting, and hungry besides, he drew his wand.

He threw a lazy slash of his wrist at Higgs, and the Body-Bind Jinx nailed him in the sternum. The boy's joints snapped into rigid formation, his expression locked in a comical gasp of surprise, and with a muted groan he tipped forward like a felled oak tree.

"Oi!" Flint fumbled out his wand and aimed it up the stairs. "What'd you do to Terrence?"

Draco gave him the sort of look that begged to know whether it was a sincere question.

Without warning, Flint threw a Stinging Charm up the stairs. Draco sidestepped it — it was really laughably easy, he didn't even think about a Shield Charm, it went so wide — and thought about trying the Banishing Charm Flitwick had introduced last week, but he recalled that Flitwick had been quite somber about the potential consequences of Banishing a living creature. He countered with a neat partial Body-Bind to Flint's ankles, and the boy, whose shot had already drawn him off his balance, tumbled onto his rear in a puddle of melted snow.

"Draco?" said Neville, a bit wondrously.

Draco sheathed his wand and stalked down the last stairs to the entrance hall. "Longbottom."

Neville had darted over and pried whatever it was they had been tossing from Higgs' rigid fist: coming closer, Draco saw that it was a toad. The poor creature was shivering violently in Neville's cupped hands. "Thank you," he mumbled. "I c-c-can't tell you how g-g-glad I am you s-stepped in. I didn't think Trevor could handle much m-m-more of that."

"Don't bleat. I wanted dinner, and you were in my way. You ought to do a better job of holding onto your pets."

“I t-t-try, honest.” He followed Draco into the Great Hall, cradling Trevor happily to his chest. “I was c-c-coming back from the greenhouses when they found me. They t-tried to take my Herbology notebook, but I t-t-told them they w-w-wouldn’t make any sense of it, and then Trevor got sc-c-ared by the shouting, and he jumped out of my b-b-bag.”

“And why the devil did you have your toad in your book bag?”

“He likes the humidity in the g-g-greenhouses.”

“He said so, did he?”

“Hagrid says it’s g-g-good for his skin.”

The mention of Hagrid did nothing for Draco’s mood. He snapped, “Then put him in a jar or something. I don’t know. After three years, you should have figured out—” He stopped. “Longbottom.”

“Yes?”

“You have access to the greenhouses?”

“All the teachers assistants’ do,” said Neville, blinking. “So we can check on the mandrakes. Why?”

Ten minutes later, he was whinging bitterly about the cold while Draco tapped his foot, waiting for him to unlock Greenhouse Three. The sun sank so early in February that it was already dark as midnight, and the snow fell in light flurries, crowning their dark robes with mantles of white.

“We’re really not sup-p-posed to be here after dark!”

“Don’t be such a ninny.”

A creak of glass-and-metal hinges announced Neville’s success. They hurried into the warm box of the greenhouse, whisking the door hastily closed behind them. Inside it was just as profoundly dark as the outside, merely mustier, and full of the sticky-sweet smell of earth and chlorophyll and pollen. During the winter the greenhouses pumped heat magically through the flagstones, so the soles of Draco's feet marinated in warmth wherever he set them on the tile.

Within seconds, the snow on their shoulders had melted and soaked through their cloaks, dampening their hair. It made Neville's bowl cut, which Draco already considered the nadir of men's grooming, somehow even worse.

There was a snap, and a row of lightbulbs blazed along the line of the planters, filling the room with a red glow. Neville shucked his robe and tossed it over a chair near the doorway. He looped a weathered brown apron around his neck and fastened it behind the thick swell of his waist. "What are you l-l-looking for, again?" he said.

Draco fished the list out of his pocket and held it out between two fingers. Neville took it and drew a pair of reading spectacles out of his breast pocket, holding them at a distance from his face, like an opera spectator. It was a very pureblood gesture, in a way Draco couldn't quite explain; it was the same invisible print of class that shone through how one folded a pocket square, or carried their wand-holster. Draco remembered, with a bit of surprise, that the Longbottoms were one of the finest wizarding families around. Neville simply didn't make a production of it, because it wasn't his way.

"Lacewing flies, leeches," read Neville, squinting, "well we don't have those, they're not p-p-plants… fluxweed, knotgrass… oh, that's easy. I know where those are." He dropped the glasses to hang by a chain on his neck and bumbled cheerfully down the aisle, strapping on a thin blue glove of some strange rubbery material.

"So it's common, then?"

"Ooh, yes. Descurainia pinnata — though only potioneers call it 'fluxweed,' most people just say tansy mustard — grows like w-w-weeds. It's stubborn as an erumpet, practically won't die unless you rip it up by the r-r-roots! And knotgrass is a perennial, so it's around all the t-t-time. How much do you need?"

"How much can you spare?"

"Not all of it," said Neville doubtfully, wiping his nose on his sleeve. "Sprout will nn-notice if there's some missing."

"Well, just say that you were trying to—"

He clapped his hands excitedly. "Never mind, I know! I'll say I used the fluxweed to make khakshir. It's this drink Romilda made for us the other d-d-day." He bent and examined the fluxweed plant, twisting one branch this way and that. "She gave us her d-d-dad's recipe, she says they make it all the time d-d-during the summer, it's actually quite refreshing. Did you know Romilda is great at Herbology? I hope she joins the TA group next year, Sprout likes her, too. I'm going to put in a good word… she's really clever, Rom-m-milda, b-but she doesn't think the other girls like her v-very much…"

Neville was talking more to himself now than to Draco, in the tone of someone used to muttering to themselves. While he talked, he carefully clipped a few sprigs of fluxweed from the small feathery plant. He tweezed them into a bit of cheesecloth in his other hand, and then stroked the plant he'd cut from, as if comforting it. In all this had the precision of a surgeon and the tenderness of someone changing a nappy.

Meanwhile, Draco was locked in a standoff with a wandering tendril of Venomous Tentacula. It was getting far too amorous with his ankles. He put a hand on his wand and glared it down, fully prepared to reassert his evolutionary prerogative.

"Longbottom."

"...fair to her, because Parvati really does try to include everyb-b-body — hm?"

“How on earth do you remember all that?”

“Remember what?” said Neville, folding up the clippings in cheesecloth.

“Which plant is which. And what it does, and what it’s called, and where it grows, and everything.”

“How do you remember all that stuff about p-p-potions?” said Neville philosophically. “I dunno. I’m not very smart, but I can take care of things. And I’m g-g-good at it, which means it must be pretty easy.” He patted the knotgrass plant and smiled.

Draco could not dwell on Neville’s wistful tone; he was locked in combat. He stamped hard on the flagstone, and the Tentacula whipped its tendril away just in time to avoid amputation by bootheel. “It’s not easy,” he said hotly. “It’s wretchedly hard. How should I know if a plant wants watering? Or fertilizing? Am I to ask it? It’s worse than Care of Magical Creatures, if you ask me.”

“B-b-but it tells you,” Neville said. “See, here? This droopy bit? That’s it telling you it needs some water. And when it gets these little spots on its leaves, it’s telling you it needs medicine. It’s d-d-dreadfully easy, once you know what you’re l-l-looking for.” He tied the cheesecloth with a bit of twine, handed it to Draco, and drifted further down the aisle of planters, speaking absent-mindedly over his shoulder. “Easier than p-people, anyway. With people you can never tell how to make them happy,” he said. “There are all these little rules that nobody tells you what they are, and if you don’t follow the rules then they don’t like you. A-and it doesn’t matter how n-n-nice you are or how hard you try to follow them… but plants are easy.”

The Venomous Tentacula flopped a tendril around Neville’s neck as he passed, apparently to attempt an affectionate strangulation, and he brushed it off with a fond pat.

“One supposes,” Draco said nervously. He had not come prepared for emotional disclosure, and now found there was no way of extricating himself without coming across as uncouth or driving, alas, still deeper into the morass of Neville's feelings.

Neville, seeming to understand Draco's dilemma, shot a wry glance over his shoulder. "It's okay," he said. "We d-don't have to talk about it."

"Good," said Draco, relieved. "Decent of you."

"But I am glad that I g-g-get to help you, now," he added, plunging Draco back into discomfort. Gratitude was even worse than self-pity. He wished Neville would go back to moping. "After all the t-tutoring you've done for me. I don't really understand why you d-d-do that, when I'm s-such a t-t-t-terrible student."

Gruffly, Draco said: "Come off it, you're not terrible," but this was a bald lie. Neville giggled.

"It's okay. You've s-said so often enough, and I do listen, even if you think I d-d-don't. All I want is to get by an Acceptable on my O.W.L., and then I can drop it… My Gran s-s-says I shouldn't even bother to sit the O.W.L. in Potions. But they won't l-let you become an herbologist without at least an A."

"Why?" said Draco, intrigued.

"B-b-because herbologists and potioneers work together all the t-t-time," Neville said slowly, as though Draco were testing him. "Half the work herbologists d-d-do is for potion-making. It's even harder for potioneers, though; they have to take the Herbology O.W.L. and the N.E.W.T."

"They do?"

"Yes, of course," said Neville warily, as if he still thought he were being quizzed. "That's why it surprised me when you said you didn't like Herbology. I assumed you wanted to be a p-p-potioneer, since you're so good at Potions."

“I… I’ve certainly considered it.” He briefly imagined taking four more years of Herbology, and shuddered. “But what a stupid requirement. What’s the point of having herbologists, if you’re going to force your potioneers to do all their work for them? Utter waste of time.”

“I don’t know. I’m sure you’ll be good at it, though,” Neville said reassuringly. “Everybody knows you and Herm-m-ione will get top ranks in everything.” He folded up another sack of cheesecloth and gave it to Draco. “Besides, if you r-really hate it, maybe I can t-t-tutor you. As p-p-payback.” He grinned.

There was a long beat of silence. Neville, his smile fading, said timidly: “Only joking, Malfoy. Sorry.”

“That,” said Draco, “is — no. It’s fine, Longbottom.” He looked down at the bundles of cheesecloth. “I suppose I ought to thank you.”

Neville shrugged. “S’nothing,” he said. He began to polish his spectacles on his apron. “Really, I’m just g-glad to be helpful.”

“I,” said Draco, and paused. A heavy bolt of something sour was curdling in the bottom of his stomach. He tried again: “I think I may owe you… a concession.”

“A concession?”

“I’m not apologizing.”

“Okay,” said Neville, wide-eyed with alarm.

“But I think… that is, I believe it is possible, at times, over the past few years… before I had access to all the available information… I may have indeliberately — and, of course, non-maliciously — said things that implied you were unintelligent.”

“You called me a thick-skulled moron with pudding for brains.”

“You know, it’s perfectly tactless of you to see a man trying and throw it right back in his face—”

“But you were right. I am stupid,” said Neville, staring.

“No,” said Draco resignedly. “In fact not. What you are is uniquely and fatefully dreadful at Potions.”

There was a pause.

“Okay, I knew that, thanks.”

“But you are not,” he added, “utterly, all the time, a moron. No more than anyone else at this school, anyway. Which is not saying much.”

Neville’s face screwed up like he’d tried a staring contest with the sun.

“Well, thanks,” he said, sort of pleased, but mostly confused. “That’s awfully nice of you to say. Er — you’re not a moron, either.”

“Of course I’m not! Do you think I didn’t know that? Did someone say I was? Don’t answer that. And don’t look so cheerful. All this means is you haven’t got an excuse for switching the burner to the wrong setting, and before you say anything, yes, you very well did, and if you hadn’t then you wouldn’t have ended up with a cauldron full of muck, and Longbottom I swear to Merlin if you don’t wipe that smug look off your face I’m going to turn that toad into ribbons.”

By Tuesday morning, most people had noticed the Ministry officials lingering on the grounds long after the Minister had taken his leave.

“I thought they were supposed to leave days ago,” said Ginny impatiently. “What are they lurking around for?” She had been apprehended by an auror on her way to the Great Lake and ordered to explain her business outside the castle so close to curfew; she had thereafter received a harsh reprimand from Professor McGonagall for giving the answer of ‘streaking with Sirius Black.’

“They’re here for our safety,” said Percy severely. He flipped open his newspaper and gave it a significant-sounding rustle. “You ought to be grateful they’ve stayed as long as they have. Black has been on the lam for almost six months now; I shudder to think how Fudge would have handled the situation.”

Draco narrowed his eyes at Percy. The elder Weasley was spending an awful lot of spare time hanging around the Ministry workers, with whom he could occasionally be seen escorting around the grounds, or leading down various passageways in the castle. He always seemed to be in the middle of a long, pontificating speech about the castle history, interspersed with exclamations of: “And of course, as Head Boy, I could also show you…” and in general showed a humiliating level of ignorance as to his own obsequiousness. Whatever his game was, it appeared to be working, however: last week, Draco had spotted him sharing butterbeers with some of the aurors in Hogsmeade. He didn’t know if Percy knew he’d been seen, or if he cared.

“Isn’t Fudge in your party?” he said.

Percy rolled his eyes. He lathered his scone with blackberry jam in thick, brisk strokes. “Really, Draco. You of all people should know it’s perfectly reasonable to want to criticize members of your own party.”

“‘Of all people’?”

“Dad says it’s illegal,” fumed Ginny, massaging her wrist. She had spent three hours last night writing ‘I WILL RESPECT MY ELDERS’ for McGonagall, and a hand cramp had done nothing to improve her mood. “He says you can’t search a magical domicile without a warrant, and Hogwarts qualifies as a domicile for everyone in residence.”

“Yes, but you see, Ginevra, it’s also government property,” said Percy, in a tone so snide and simpering it made even Draco want to see him smacked. From Ginny’s glower, she was clearly willing and able. “The Ministry funds Hogwarts. Do you know people like you and me wouldn't be able to attend Hogwarts at all, unless the Ministry stepped in? It'd only be people like—" And he nodded, less than subtly, at Draco. Draco saluted, ironically, and sipped his tea.

"That doesn't mean they get to barge in and ruin it!"

"Don't be so hysterical. They're not ruining it, merely keeping it safe. And besides, the Magical Security Act changed all of that rot about warrants last year, anyway. Or don't you remember? What am I saying, of course you don't. The Magical Security Act gives the Department of Magical Law Enforcement the ability to search, scour, or Trace any suspects charged with a crime. Now that Hagrid's been caught out in one — and really, what a shameful day for the school, to have a teacher hoarding contraband, in all my years at Hogwarts I've never been so embarrassed—"

"Quirrell had the Dark Lord in his head," said Draco, but Percy ignored him.

"—naturally, the Ministry's entitled to be concerned. I mean, who knows what else he could be hiding in those woods?" Percy said, rhetorically, though Draco in fact knew the answer. He hoped Nott would stumble into a spider or two on his way in. "As the Minister says, if someone is willing to break one law, he'll break another…"

Dean Thomas lifted his head from his book. "Come off it, now," he said to Percy, in tones of gentle chastisement. "You don't really think Hagrid's done anything dangerous."

Draco, who was of the mind that 'something dangerous' happened every Care of Magical Creatures lesson, could list half a dozen things for Percy to mention. But Percy flushed and said, "I beg to differ. He's absolutely done something dangerous. He's threatened the rule of law."

"Yeah, and it was bloody cool," said Seamus sulkily. A box of his firecrackers had been confiscated the previous day. "They should go on and leave him alone. He's my favorite teacher." Dean patted his leg in comfort.

"That's your own folly," said Percy peevishly. He had spent too much time scrubbing firework residue off the Gryffindor walls to have much sympathy for Seamus. "Frankly, I think Dumbledore should seriously consider replacing him. Let him stay as gamekeeper, if you must, but he's got no business being a professor. Did you know that Hagrid didn't even graduate from Hogwarts? He hasn't a N.E.W.T to his name. Everyone at the Ministry thinks he's a joke."

Ginny — who, between a sore hand, a sore pride, and a sore spot for condescension, had very obviously spent her last reserves of patience on Percy long ago — jumped to her feet. "Why do you care what they think? Everyone here thinks you're a joke," she snapped. "You're making a fool of yourself." She stood up, tossed her fiery hair over her shoulder, and stormed off to sit with Lavender instead.

Percy blinked. Briefly, he looked very hurt.

Then he glanced at Draco. "Children," he sighed.

Draco said merely "Hmm," and stirred his tea. He had no stake in Weasley family politics, and did not want one. He remained silent when Percy, after several minutes of no one talking to him, threw down his newspaper and stalked over to the Ravenclaw table to sit with Penelope.

News of the Ministry's snooping had evidently taken its toll on the teachers, too, for the following day they had their first lesson with Lupin since the Minister's visit. It was the first of Lupin's lessons to disappoint them. Instead of a field trip or a live demonstration, they filed into the classroom to find their desks arranged neatly in rows, with a small booklet atop each desk. Lupin leaned heavily on his desk, sallow-faced and almost blanketed by his traveling cloak, as tired as Draco had ever seen him.

Everyone understood at once what was happening, and several gave cries of disappointment or betrayal, for it had come to feel as though Lupin were not a teacher but a peer and friend.

“Yes, I’m sorry,” said Lupin good-naturedly, through the groaning. His voice was quiet and gravelly, and Draco mentally checked the calendar: the full moon had been several nights ago. “I’m afraid I let time get away with me, this weekend, and I haven’t got anything good planned. We’ll have a quiz today, and I’ll make up for it with something rather more interesting next time, I hope.”

Hermione, who ordinarily would have greeted this with cries of jubilation, did not even have the heart to celebrate. She finished her quiz in breakneck time, scribbling so quickly that the nib twice snapped off her quill, and then hurried to the front of the room. Draco, sensing that she had secondary motivations, scrawled out the last few answers and hastened to meet her.

“...didn’t know where you were, this weekend,” she whispered to Lupin in a low voice. “We tried to find you — to tell you — they’re searching the grounds, we think they’re going to find S—”

“Padfoot,” interrupted Draco, sotto voce. Hermione paled at her near-mistake, and flashed him a grateful look. “The Ministry’s going to find Padfoot. In a month, if not less. We’ve got to move him.”

“I understand.”

“...What do you mean, you understand?”

“Children,” said Lupin tiredly, “I appreciate your efforts and your worry. However, we are both aware of the problem.”

“You are?” said Draco. He paused. Then, more loudly: “Why didn’t you tell us, then?”

“Shh!”

He turned and saw Lavender Brown mashing her finger to her lips. He threw her a rude gesture behind his back, and she gasped.

Lupin murmured, “Find your seats. We will discuss this after class.”

“But Professor—”

“Professor Lupin?” Hannah Abbott approached his desk timidly, cradling her paper to her chest. “Can I ask you something about Question Three?”

“Certainly,” said Lupin warmly, turning to Hannah. “What’s the problem? …Ah, I see… With these kinds of questions, Hannah, there’s no one right answer; personally, I would take the vampire first, but as long as you demonstrate you’re thinking strategically…”

When the class was over, Hermione and Harry were the first out of their chairs. Unfortunately, they had to wait for the rest of the students to shuffle out entirely before they could speak to Lupin, who sagged visibly as soon as the last student went out the door.

“Professor Lupin, are you alright?” demanded Harry. He had spent the last half-hour of class tapping his foot frantically to vent all the anxious energy about him. “Where have you been? And when’s the last you heard from Sirius? He’s safe, isn’t he?”

In response, Lupin pointed his wand at the door, which closed, locked, and bolted itself. “Please keep your voice down,” he added, and Harry shrunk into himself, chastened. “I’m sorry to worry you. Sirius is quite well, or as well as he can be, under the circumstances; I visited him just last night.”

“So the Ministry hasn’t found him yet,” Hermione said, relieved.

“No.”

“Why haven’t you been around the castle?” Harry said pointedly.

Lupin rolled his wand between his fingers, an absent gesture. “I have made myself scarce,” he admitted. “I thought it was… a prudent move, given the circumstances. Dumbledore agreed.”

“Prudent how?” said Ron.

“Prudent insofar as I have no desire to subject myself to Ministry inspection.”

“Inspection?” said Hermione quickly. “What do you mean, inspection? You haven’t got anything illegal, have you?”

Lupin paused. “Hermione,” he said gently. “My existence is a crime.”

“No, it’s not!” she said hotly. “Nobody is a criminal for existing, that’s silly! And they haven’t got anything on you; you can’t tell when someone has lycan—”

“Lice,” Draco hissed. “You can’t tell when someone has lice by looking at them.”

Hermione grimaced, nodding. Lupin chuckled to himself softly.

“You can’t tell when someone has lice,” she continued, “no matter how much you search them. You’d need a blood test. Which they can’t take without a warrant.”

“Unless I’m charged with a crime,” he said calmly. “Like harboring a Death Eater, for instance.”

“Padfoot isn’t a Death Eater,” Harry gasped.

“Certainly not,” he agreed. “But the aurors will charge him as such, if they find him. Or if they find evidence of association.”

“Which they don’t have,” Hermione argued.

Lupin said, “Yet.” He rolled his wand out on his fingers, spun it, and caught it, all absent-mindedly. “The kind of secret that one cannot keep from four thirteen-year-olds — albeit rather perspicacious thirteen-year-olds — does not strike me as particularly secure information."

"But that was only because we had the map," exclaimed Hermione. "Draco never would have seen you with Sirius, otherwise. If you just hide the map—"

"A good idea. However, I have found the map rather useful in my efforts to avoid crossing paths with the Ministry," said Lupin. "Particularly at certain times of the month… regardless, it doesn't matter. I appreciate your concern, you four, but really this is none of your business."

"None of our business?" Harry said incredulously. "None of our business? Sirius is my godfather!"

"Yeah, and my cousin," snapped Draco, who thought Lupin made a good point, but he wasn't about to leave Harry out to dry.

"And a thirty-four year old man," said Lupin calmly. "Who is more than capable of looking out for himself. Harry, your concern is noted and appreciated. Draco, so is yours. But it is not your lookout to fear for the fates of two men who have had more than enough experience taking care of ourselves."

"Yeah, right," said Ron sarcastically. "Mate's been in prison for thirteen years, I'm not sure 'looking out for himself' is his shout."

Lupin said stiffly, "We'll manage."

"But we have a plan!" said Hermione. "A good one! We figured out how to sneak Padfoot out of the Shack—"

"No," said Lupin sharply. "Absolutely not. You will finish out the year and attend to your studies. Padfoot and I have drawn more than enough of your attention away from what matters."

Her jaw dropped. “But—”

“What matters is you,” Harry said. His voice was strangled. “You and Sirius. I don’t give a damn about school. What do I care if I get an E or an A in stupid Divination, if you two aren’t — if you don’t—”

“Harry, we’ll be fine,” said Lupin. He rose to his feet, and in kinder tones, he said: “Padfoot and I will make arrangements as we must. Do us the favor of not underestimating us. In any case, if I allowed you to put your life at risk for mine, I do believe that the ghost of James Potter would rise up and trample me to death.”

They retreated, in various stages of resignation; Harry was not disappointed so much as angry, stomping and muttering down the long stairs to lunch. Meanwhile, Hermione had vaulted right over any emotional reaction whatsoever and into the planning phase, which was one of the things Draco cherished about her.

“We’ll just have to do it without him,” she said grimly. “If he’s not willing to help… damn. I wanted him to let us use the map. It would’ve made things so much easier.”

“That’s ironic, seeing as you wanted it confiscated,” said Ron pleasantly.

“That was ages ago! And this is much more important, can’t you see that?” She sniffed. “I don’t like breaking the rules,” she said. “And I’m not inclined to break them for no reason. But if there’s no way around it… and if there’s something more important at stake… well, just imagine what would’ve happened last year, if you hadn’t gone into the Forbidden Forest, for example! I might still be in the hospital wing. Or worse!”

Draco shivered. “Don’t go saying that, ‘or worse,’” he said irritably. “You make it sound like you might have died.”

“Paralysis often has complications,” she said matter-of-factly. “I was lucky to escape without nerve damage. Anyway, Harry, did you get the boomslang skin? You did? That's excellent. We'll set up in Myrtle's bathroom later today during free period, but before that, I want to have a word with you about Patronus Charms…"

As they rounded the great staircase, they intercepted Theodore and Pansy, who were coming up from the dungeons. Theo greeted them with a broad wave.

"Afternoon, lions," he called. "Potter, Weasley, Granger... Draco. Lovely seeing you at the reception. Shame you couldn't stay for the discussion."

"I didn't know there was one," Draco lied. "I had a bad stomach. Had to run."

He and Pansy exchanged a glance. She lifted her eyebrow at him and looked away. He felt a pang of gratitude to her.

"Shame," repeated Theo blandly. If he could spot the lie, he didn't show it. "There's another one happening this Friday, you know. In the Slytherin lounge. Same invitation stands."

Draco's stomach flipped, hard. "Sorry, chap," he said coolly. "I've a prior obligation."

"Oh?" Theo yawned. Dark circles bracketed his eyes. "Ah, well. I'll give the Minister your regrets."

Ron snorted. "As if you're friends with the Minister."

"Closer to it than you are, Weasley. Or has your father made inroads in the Department of Whatsits and Doodads?"

"No," said Hermione suddenly. She turned to Draco and gripped his arm. Her fingernails left divots in his sleeve. "You don't. Remember? I had to cancel that study group, because of Lavender's birthday party."

Draco blinked at her. His mind pinwheeled like a cliff-diver in freefall. It was: (1) nowhere near Lavender's birthday, they (2) did not have a study group on Friday nights, and (3) if they did, Hermione certainly would not have canceled it for a birthday party, let alone (4) Lavender's.

"So you should go," she whispered.

"...You want me to—"

"You were just saying," she said loudly, "how much you liked the first one. It was the best party all year, you said."

Theo tilted his head, obviously pleased. "Did he really?" he said. "You old scrooge, you might have said so."

"So you really shouldn't let me stop you from going again." She squeezed his arm so tightly he gave a small hiss. "Don't. Let. Me. Stop you."

In her great brown eyes there was an appeal, as naked and earnest as he had ever seen, for him to trust her. He resisted it for several harrowing seconds.

"Alright. Fine. If you're… sure… you don't want to study."

"No. It's really alright."

He turned to Theo. "It appears my mind's been changed for me," he drawled. "I'll see you on Friday. Ta, Nott."

"Ta, Malfoy," Theo said cheerfully, and escorting Pansy by the arm, he went into the Great Hall. As they passed, Pansy twisted her head over her shoulder and sent Draco a querulous stare, as if to say: And what was that about? To which he could only shrug, for he honestly didn't know.

"Alright," he said, as soon as they were out of earshot. "That's my Friday evening shot, then. Granger, you'd better have an exceptional reason—”

“But don’t you see it’s a perfect opportunity?” she said eagerly. “The Polyjuice Potion needs hairs from the people you mean to turn into, and students almost never get near Ministry officials unless they’re being searched. I’ve been wracking my brains for how to get them. And here comes Theodore Nott, handing you the perfect opportunity to get elbow-to-elbow a bunch of drunk Ministry men with their guard down!”

Reluctantly, he admitted she was right. Nevertheless, he sorely resented having his time volunteered so freely, as if he hadn’t anything better to do than whatever Hermione Granger told him to.

He didn’t, but she couldn’t be allowed to know that.

“Grand idea. I’ll just sidle up to Sibelius Nott and give his wig a good yanking— you know, most of them are wearing toupees anyway?”

“Hair gets everywhere,” she scoffed. “You can pick it off their robes.”

“Speak for yourself.”

She excavated her notebook from within her book bag and frantically scribbled in it. “You’ll want to take someone to help,” she said. “As backup, of course. Normally I’d go, but I’m right out, they won’t let me through the door. Harry would work, I suppose — Harry, you’re pureblood, aren’t you?”

Draco and Ron both made the same sort of pained equivocating noise.

“I’d go, but I don’t think most of them would be too happy to see me,” said Harry. “What with me being the Chosen One, and all.”

“Allegedly,” muttered Draco.

Hermione rounded on Ron. “Oh, but I’m so stupid! I’d forgotten! You’re a pureblood,” she exclaimed. “You could go!”

Draco and Ron exchanged a look of mutual understanding and disease.

“Hermione,” Ron began, “you’re not wrong, but… just because my mum and dad are both wizards doesn’t make me the sort that gets invited to these parties. I’m not a pureblood like Draco is.”

“Of course you are. You haven’t any muggles in your family, have you?”

“Not really, it’s — well, plenty of them, if you go back far enough, but that’s not really the problem.”

The twist of her mouth belied a deep skepticism. “So, to be clear,” she said, “these people aren’t just bigoted against muggle-borns, and half-bloods, and half-humans, and non-human sentient creatures, but even among purebloods, some of you just aren’t up to snuff?”

“You have to understand the way these things work,” said Ron, surprising Draco, who had assumed he would have to do the explaining. “It’s not about blood, right? I mean, you can’t get in unless you have the right blood, but once you’re there, it’s all about maintaining appearances. Using the right spoon, and the right titles, and bowing and arse-licking and all that rubbish. My family’s not like that, never has been. We like muggles, and muggle-borns, and it’s not as though we make any secret about it. Mum says she’d rather live in a hovel on ten galleons a month than have to put on airs and sneer at good people who never did nothing wrong.” He added, “Plus, we don’t have money.”

Draco said, without any particular pleasure, “That’s why they’re called blood traitors.” He paused, and in the ugly silence that followed, he felt pushed to add: “Obviously it’s not a pleasant thing to say, but it’s — it’s how they see them. People like the Weasleys, the Abbotts, the Lovegoods — the idea, which I don’t necessarily endorse, mind you, is that they’ve committed treason against their own kind.”

“That ‘kind’ being purebloods,” said Hermione shrewdly.

“Yes.”

Hermione chewed on her quilltip for a moment, thinking.

“Ron,” she said, “didn’t your mother say that you came from a pedigree? At one point, a long time ago?”

He scratched his head. “Er, kind of,” he said. “My mum’s descended from a Sacred Twenty-Eight family, but that’s my mum. The Weasleys haven’t been in good graces with the pureblood set for generations.”

“Sacred Twenty-Eight?”

“Wizarding aristocracy,” said Draco. “The top of the top of the pureblood set. The youngest bloodline in the Twenty-Eight is about two hundred years old.”

“The Malfoys are a classic Twenty-Eight family, for example,” said Ron, sticking his thumb at Draco. “And probably the oldest, too, right? Because the oldest family for a long time was the Blacks, but er, well…”

“I suppose we’re probably somewhere near there,” said Draco, trying not to preen.

Hermione drove a brutal line through something in her notebook and snapped it shut. “Well, that has to settle it,” she said, in businesslike tones. “Ron, you’ll go with Draco. You seem to understand all this much better than Harry or I, and you’ve got the best chance of not raising suspicions.”

“No,” said Draco patiently. “That was the whole point, he isn’t a proper pureblood. He’ll stick out like a big red thumb.”

“Thanks, mate,” said Ron peevishly.

“What? It’s true. I stick out,” he said, thrusting his finger at his own chest, “and that’s only because my tie’s the wrong color. The name ‘Weasley’ won’t get him past the bouncer.”

In fact, it probably would, since the bouncer was a three-foot house-elf that adored Draco with the passion of a hundred suns. Still, it wouldn’t get much farther.

“So you can’t use the name Weasley, of course,” said Hermione, as if it were obvious. “You’ll go under your mum’s name. The Twenty-Eight one. Prewett, wasn’t it?”

This took both Draco and Ron off-guard. “Um,” said Ron, “yeah, but the Prewetts are gone. Caputo. Extinct in the male line, just like the Blacks. Plus, these guys know my dad, they’ll see—” He waved his hand in front of his face, indicating his general Weasleyishness. “And they’ll clock me from a mile.”

“So we’ll dye your hair, and borrow concealer from Lavender,” she said impatiently. “Unless you want Draco to go it alone—”

“Which I could,” added Draco, mostly to defend his honor as a man. It would be hard to get hair from four different Ministry officials without raising suspicions. Having more hands would make the job easier, and besides that, he didn’t like the thought of going back to the League of Promising Youth by himself.

“—you’ll have to make it work. You can say you’re a new cousin they dug up somewhere,” Hermione said. “I’m sure these things happen all the time. And if any of them press you about it, you can say you’re illegitimate. That ought to shake them off your tail.”

Ron turned several shades warmer at the suggestion that he pretend to be a bastard.

“And I can come, under the Cloak,” added Harry. “As extra backup.”

Hermione beamed. “There you go,” she said. “See? It’s all coming together.”

“I want it said, for the record, that I was against this plan,” announced Draco. “And though nobody has asked for my opinion—”

“As if that’s ever stopped you,” said Harry, and was still giggling even after he caught a none-too-gentle chaser’s elbow in the ribs.

“—I will disclose, for posterity, that the chief fault of this plan is its reliance on Weasley pulling off a degree of subterfuge. We are wagering a large share of my dignity and my reputation on his being able to convince the snobbiest set of wizards Merlin ever made that he, Ronald Weasley, is the scion of a Sacred Twenty-Eight family. Are we holding our breath? I, for one, am not.”

“Nah, this’ll be easy,” said Ron, grinning. “I’ve been hanging out with you for three years. S’not hard. All I have to do is groan and whinge a lot, and I’m halfway there. ‘Eugh, Mummy, I said I wanted three castles for Christmas, not two! Now where will I put my swimming pool full of galleons?’ Throw on a cane and a monocle, I’ll be properly invisible.”

Harry and Hermione were now both snickering, though one made more of an effort to hide it than her counterpart. “Go on then, and try it, we’ll see how long it takes you to end up jinxed,” said Draco. Then he brightened. “On second thought, never mind. This is an excellent plan.”

Operation Prewett

Chapter 26: Operation Prewett

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

The weekend after Valentine's Day, a package came for Draco in the morning mail. Ulysses dropped it in Draco's lap and alighted primly on a roast ham, giving Colin Creevey such a fright that he toppled back off the bench.

It was wrapped in gold foil, and tied with an emerald ribbon.

Dear Draco,

Hello, my sweet one! Mummy is very sorry she has been so absent these few months, but she has been most preoccupied with her travels. Did you know that Briselda can carry absolutely marvelous amounts of luggage on her back? Rather like a pack animal! Really, we should have started using human help years ago. And she can be quite hilarious, too!

I attached the book you asked for. It did take some doing to find it; the library has grown sulkish and temperamental for lack of use. You know how magical libraries like to hoard their treasures. But be proud of me, dear one: I stood fast and threatened quite meanly to auction it all off to a public charity unless it shaped up and gave me what I wanted, and it snapped to attention (although I think it tossed a volume of my favorite romances into the Biography section, so I doubt I shall see them again). Your father always said the way to deal with a library was like dealing with a dog: you have to hold your ground and remind it that YOU are its master. Otherwise it will run all over you and never give you what you want and you will end up reading Proust for the rest of your days.

A surprising batch of white roses have bloomed under the willow tree. The narcissus are flourishing. They take so well to Briselda's care.

I love you more than tea and champagne and porcelain and silk pillowcases, my little crown jewel of all worldly pleasures.

All my heart,

Mummy

P.S. I was so proud to hear you're already into advanced brewing; Moste Potente is a classic! Did you know my Aunt Walburga was something of a potions mistress herself, before she wed? Perhaps I can scrounge up some of her old recipes for you, once I have rested from my bout with the library. XOXOX.

"Is that what I think it is?" said Hermione, peering over Draco's shoulder. "Ooh, it is! Give it here — let me see—"

He slipped it behind his back and caught her groping hand. "Manners, now. It's my property, remember. I'll have the first look."

"Fine!" she said impatiently. "But look quickly."

From spite, and also from the desire to see what her face would look like when he did it, he nestled the package into his book bag and went back to his omelet.

Feeling her daggered stare on his cheek, he murmured, "I'm not going to open that thing at the Gryffindor table, are you mad? It's a Dark book. If a teacher sees it, the game's up, and I personally don't feel like making a charitable donation to the Minerva McGonagall Fund for Confiscated Materials today."

Hermione wrestled with the tactical wisdom of his decision, which warred terribly with her own desire to hoover up all information as soon as possible, like a fuzzy-haired Charybdis.

“Hurry, then,” she urged, and perhaps feeling the need to demonstrate what hurrying looked like, she shoved a whole wedge of toast in her mouth at once. She shoved her plate away and leapt up from the bench. “There’s no time.”

“To do what, digest?” he said, appalled. Two seconds and a rather unsporting yank on his collar later, he was scrambling up from the bench, muttering: “Fine! We’re going! Don’t mind me, I’ll just starve, I suppose.”

At which point an apple came winging over her shoulder and nearly whacked him in the eye.

Back in the bathroom, they set up a portable cauldron and some stools. The location of their setup had been the subject of much bickering between the potion-makers of the party. Draco insisted that a windowsill would provide more ventilation, which would become crucial in the not-unlikely event that something went wrong, and they found themselves whiffing lungfuls of toxic fumes; Hermione, who was many parts less concerned with either of their safety than he, countered that the temperature would vary too widely between day and night; they compromised on a sheltered alcove in the corner of the chamber, where the cauldron could sit just out of the sun, and Draco could reach the window with a well-placed Bombarda if he needed to.

“Now this has to brew for eighty minutes,” read Hermione. She held Moste Potente Potions cracked open between her crossed legs, which, Draco thought idly, would have given Snape an absolute conniption if he’d ever seen it.

They had breezed through the first step of the brewing. The copy of Moste Potente, being secondhand, had all sorts of little scrawls and notes in the margins, some of which were illegible or obscure, but Draco found that many of them were quite helpful. One note about grinding the lacewing flies with some nettle dust had saved them an hour of stewing time; another note, with reference to the best knife work techniques for leeches, had not improved the potion per se but led to greatly reduced mess during prep, which he appreciated, since Hermione still made him do all the butchery. Whoever had been writing the notes had an extraordinary knowledge of potioneering and a willingness to experiment: some of the notes were struck through, a few more violently than others, or given addendums such as: Didn't work, or Not helpful, or once, simply and alarmingly: DON'T, thrice underlined.

He had suspected the notes were Snape's, but the man's name appeared nowhere on the book; the plate on the inside cover said only H.B.P., which gave him little help in the way of identifying the previous owner.

"The lacewing flies we'll have to do after Potions, once Harry and Ron get back from the stores," Hermione said, flipping ahead. "Do you think maybe one of us ought to stay and watch it?"

Draco, who lay sprawled-out and drowsing in the pool of sunlight, rolled up on one elbow to see if she was serious. When he saw she was, he cracked a smirk. "Hermione Granger," he said, "are you suggesting we play hooky?"

She turned a shade of pink he had rarely seen outside of rouge advertisements. "Well," she said, with adorable wretchedness, "I don't like it, but yes! Just for the potion's sake. We can do our best to secure the bathroom, but a teacher could still come in, or a prefect, and frankly, I don't trust Myrtle, either."

As if on cue, the toilet gave a sour rattle, and a jet of water spurted from the stall. Draco, who was still acclimating to the sensation of being surveilled by a nosy bit of septic engineering, said sharply: "Mind your own business, would you? Silencio," and the stall fell silent with a lonesome gurgle.

“We’d have to take turns,” Hermione added. “If we don’t want the teachers to suspect.”

“They’ll suspect something if you miss one class. I expect some of them will reasonably conclude you’ve been killed. Do you have any idea who you are?”

“Yes, I thought of that! And I don’t want to miss classes, obviously! But you can’t stay here all the time,” she objected. “That’s not fair.”

“I appreciate the even-handedness, but in all candor, I had no intention of volunteering myself to remain captive in a bathroom. Such selflessness lies outside even my considerable powers of generosity.”

She snorted at the word “considerable,” which he resented deeply.

“So what’s your suggestion, then?” she asked. “Let it sit here?”

“No,” he said thoughtfully, lacing his hands behind his head. He laid back and wriggled comfortably on the warm stone, closing his eyes. “That won’t do.”

“So why don’t you help me come up with something, instead of lazing about over there?”

“I’m thinking,” he yawned. “It takes effort to perform this sort of profound cognitive activity. Haven’t the strength to do that and sit up at the same time.”

“Sometimes,” she said, more amused than irritated, “it amazes me that we make the same grades.”

“Me, too. Must make all that studying feel like an awful waste of time.”

He could hear her smiling. “It might, if I didn’t know your secret,” she said. “I’ve never understood why you like to pretend you don’t study.

Being apathetic isn’t half as impressive as all the work you actually do.”

It did not please him at all that she thought he was impressive; in fact, he couldn't care less. He repeated this to himself several times, so as to commit it to memory.

“Au contraire, mon swot. What are people to envy me for, if I don’t make it look effortless?”

“You think people envy you, do you?”

“Of course they do. I’m wonderful.”

“And you like that? Feeling like people envy you?”

“Why wouldn’t I?”

She hesitated. He slitted open one eye and angled it meaningfully at her.

“Being envied doesn’t make people like you very much,” she admitted, giving the potion a whisk to clear some residue at the bottom. “From experience.”

“So? That’s their affair,” he said indifferently. “They want what I have. And why shouldn’t they? I’d want it, if I didn’t have it. There’s nothing worth having that someone else doesn’t want to take. Just don’t let him take it, and you’ll be fine.”

Hermione’s brows became a little brown caterpillar that wriggled more suspiciously with every word. “I don’t think Crabbe and Goyle want what you have,” she said carefully. “For example.”

“Are you joking? Of course they do.” He sat up and braced himself on his elbows. “There’s nothing they have that I haven’t got better, plus more. I’ve got a better bloodline, a bigger house, a bigger fortune, I’m better-connected, I’ve got better looks—”

“It’s a wonder they don’t like you,” she muttered.

He went on, counting off on his fingers, in part because he knew it was obnoxious. “More charming, more intelligent, better grades, better friends — see, you’re not denying it — not to mention I’m better at sports, and I’ve got better hygiene than a mountain troll. If they don’t envy me, they need to have their heads checked.”

“Really, Draco. One would think you’ve never had a self-conscious thought in your life.”

“That’s easy, I haven’t,” he said cheerfully. “Whenever I feel sorry for myself, I simply remember that I’m marvelous. You ought to try it sometime, it might cheer you right up.”

“Remembering that I’m marvelous?” she said, a bit distracted by adjusting the burner temperature.

“No, that I’m marvelous. You know, as a source of inspiration, or something.”

The wad of paper that smacked him in the head was not particularly surprising, though he was rather impressed by the precision of its aim.

“None of this solves the problem of who’s to watch the potion,” she said, chewing her lip. “Maybe we could set up a rotation? I’ll take one class, then you, Harry, Ron…? I could always ask Myrtle nicely, but I really don’t trust her.”

“Nonsense. I know.” He sat all the way up and stretched. “We’ll ask Dobby.”

“Oh! Now that’s a good idea,” she said, with frankly insulting levels of relief, “but are you sure he’ll do it? Can you summon him and ask?”

“Can’t, he’s not my elf anymore. He wouldn’t hear me.” He amended, “But I can pop down to the kitchens and ask him, and he’ll do it for me as a favor, I'm pretty sure. We can always get him a scarf or something as payment."

"He should be paid in galleons—"

"Which he is, thank you."

"—but aside from that, it sounds fine," she sniffed. "If he checks in every hour or so, that should be enough. I'll feel much better knowing that nobody will wander in."

Indeed, Dobby was happy to watch over the potion, with or without the promise of knitwear that Hermione offered. It gave him special delight to think that he might be helping Draco perform an important operation for one of his friends; they did not tell him what the potion was for, but assured him that it could very well save somebody's life.

"Saving the life of a wizard!" said Dobby. His eyes had reached sizes previously regarded by magizoologists as theoretical. "Dobby could be a hero? Like Mister Dumbledore?"

"Well," said Hermione doubtfully, "in a manner of speaking, I suppose..."

"Yes," Draco interrupted. "Absolutely the same. They'll probably give you a chocolate frog card."

"You shouldn't lie to him," Hermione complained, after Dobby had fallen into spasms of excitement and then scurried off to perform his duty. "Just because he's not a human doesn't mean he's stupid."

"No, the fact that he's Dobby means he's a bit stupid."

"Don't be mean."

"I didn't say it to his face, did I? Anyway, I lived with him for twelve years, I should know. He's a good little creature, and I'm fond of him, but you know full well that he's two sickles short of a galleon."

“He has a big heart,” she said stubbornly.

“Simply tremendous,” he agreed. “It takes up half the space for his brain.”

If Draco had dreamed that the long waiting periods required for the Polyjuice Potion would be spent idly or at rest, he was rudely awoken. When they weren’t in classes, in Myrtle’s bathroom, or asleep, they were in an abandoned Charms classroom on the fourth floor, learning Patronus Charms from Harry. Mealtimes, recesses, and study halls were sacrificed to this dubious goal, which subjected Draco to far more emotional scrutiny than he thought appropriate, necessary, or dignified. At the beginning of each interminable period of torture, his tutor would produce a model Patronus in the vague form of a quadruped, while Draco’s own wand refused (understandably, he thought, in bitter solidarity with it) to produce more than wisps of fog.

“A happy memory, Draco, a happy one,” was the constant exhortation, as if he didn’t damn well know what a happy memory was. “Something from your childhood, something simple and easy, come on…”

On the few days when he managed, stiff-jawed and white-knuckled with effort, to summon a gust of macilent mist, he was immediately shown up by Ron. After hearing Harry describe the spell once, he nodded, screwed up his face in concentration, and let out a wary: “Er. Expecto patronum,” and summoned a dense white clump of something that pranced boastfully around his ankles until Draco called him a showboat.

As for Hermione, whose idea the whole thing had been in the first place, she was mysteriously absent from Harry’s lessons. Oh, she had come to the first one all right, and listened with breathless fascination to Harry as he described the theory of the charm and its uses. But after several dozen attempts at casting a Patronus ended in harmless white shimmers, she had turned pink in the face, stomped out of the room, and declined to return even on Harry's invitation. This was a small mercy to Draco, who did not have to try nearly so hard in her absence, and a greater mercy to Ron, whose relative ease in producing a Patronus gave her an obvious and sore temptation to strangle him.

Harry admitted to Draco in confidence that she had asked him to teach her separately.

"She doesn't get it, I reckon," he said. "It doesn't come naturally to her. And she's used to everything coming naturally, so it feels like she's failing in it. That's her problem, really; she focuses too much on doing the spell right, and not enough on actually doing the spell."

"I'm sure that made sense somewhere in that scar-addled head," mumbled Draco, mopping his brow with a handkerchief. Ron was busy trying to get his fuzzy white creature, whatever it was, to go fetch a rubber ball.

"It's just that there's no right way to be happy," said Harry. He passed Draco a flagon of water, which Draco gratefully drank. "The memory isn't even really the crucial bit, says Lupin. It's the feeling that's important. And that's what's hard about doing it in front of the dementors, too. You've got to feel joy, really feel it."

"Yeah," agreed Ron. "It's hard to explain. It's like… this warm thing, coming up from your belly. And then you have to push it through your wand, sort-of. And then you get this white stuff, which I — oi," he said, when Harry and Draco started snickering. "Laugh it up! It's true, though. I thought it might help to hear how it feels from someone else who's actually done it."

"Thanks," said Draco rudely, and Ron, hearing his tone, wisely turned around and went back to practicing.

"You know, I thought about that," said Harry in a lower voice. "I don't know why you're having so much trouble with it. It kind of surprised me. Hermione I thought might have a problem, but I didn't think you would."

This, from Harry, was rather like a bowtruckle telling you it was disappointed you hadn't memorized the Grammatica Arcana. "It's not like you to be a bad sport, Potter," he said indignantly. "And for a third year trying to pick up a fifth year spell from another third year, inside a week, I think my performance has been remarkable. And here's another thing. I don't go around asking you why you haven't made a better showing in Potions."

"No, no, I'm not trying to rub it in!" he said earnestly. "I really did think you'd get it quickly. You use your wand more than any of us. Even more than Hermione, with all her practicing. And I thought, because you and Ron both grew up around magic, you have this sense for it that Hermione and I don't. So the Patronus would be easy."

"Weasley must simply have a more joyful disposition than the rest of us," Draco said, still unconvinced that Ron had not somehow cheated.

Harry made a thoughtful sound. "Ron is pretty cheerful," he said. "I mean, he's always said he was fairly happy, growing up. I suppose that's probably part of it. He's got a lot of good memories to draw on."

The implication, which appeared to drift freely over his thick skull, was that neither he nor Draco had the same. Which Draco resented, if for no other reason than that it cast a terrible reflection on his mother.

"And you've had such a happy childhood, have you?" snapped Draco. Harry went stiff, and Draco spent the ensuing moment of silence counting the potential uses for magical time travel, e.g., not putting one's foot in one's mouth, ever; not revealing, by accident, a profound lack of tact, kindness, or practical intellect; and also never having to apologize to one's friends.

“Sorry,” he muttered. “Below the belt.”

Draco contemplated this. He had been using the memory of an early Christmas with his mother and father at the Manor, one of the few he could remember. He thought it best to reach as far back as possible, so that there weren’t any complex feelings about Hogwarts mixed-in. And it was a happy memory: they had curled up together on the divan by the fireplace, and gone through all their Christmas cards, and laughed at the tacky ones. His father had read to him from Euripedes Gaunt’s Decline and Fall of the Roman Pureblood Dynasties while his mother played piano. Dobby had brought biscuits and hot cocoa. It had been snowing; he remembered it clearly, years later, as one of the best days of his life.

Of course, that was before Dobby was freed. Which was — distracting, now that he thought about it. Hard to think about the memory of Dobby bending and scraping without wincing, internally, at the needlessness of it. Not that it had been Draco’s fault, of course. He had been a small child. He wasn’t to know that there was anything wrong with having a house-elf. Even so.

He curled his lip. It wasn’t his fault that Dobby hadn’t been freed yet. It was still a good memory. He’d been happy. He could remember being happy. If it wasn’t good enough, what was he supposed to do about it? Were all his memories before Hogwarts sullied? He might as well give up, then, because after coming to Hogwarts, everything was too complicated to possibly be of use.

“You don’t have to be sorry for me,” said Harry, which was unexpected for Draco, who had mostly been feeling sorry for himself. “It’s not as bad as that. It’s only a few months every summer, and then I get to come here. That’s enough happiness for anyone. And Dudley was jealous as anything when he heard I got to fly.” He rubbed his mouth, as if to scrub away a smile he was not proud of,

but he failed. “I told him that he could use Petunia’s Swiffer, he just had to jump high enough. Milked that one for about a week.”

“Your situation baffles me.” Draco stood and massaged the sore tendon in his wand-arm. “You loathe them whole and entire. Why go back?”

“Because Hogwarts doesn’t run summer school?” Harry said, amused. “Where would I go? They’re the only family I’ve got.”

“Oh, please. You know if you asked Granger, she’d be happy to host you. Or even Weasley, though Merlin knows where they’d put you.”

“I couldn’t do that to them! I couldn’t ask their families to take me in.”

“You think they’d rather you live in misery for three months?”

“It’s not miserable,” lied Harry, who himself had called it miserable too many times to mention. “It’s only three months. And… maybe it won’t be forever. I mean, a lot can change in the next four years.”

Draco paused and lowered his wand. That was oddly prescient, for Harry.

“You’ve considered Lupin,” he guessed.

A streak of guilt crossed Harry’s face.

“You’ve spoken to Lupin,” Draco said in surprise. “That’s why you’re so chummy. Has he offered?”

“No,” he said shyly, averting his eyes. “He says he can’t make any promises. I didn’t ask him, really, but I was having dinner with him and Sirius one day, and Sirius just… said it.”

“He suggested taking you in? Sirius Black?”

“Yeah. After his name’s cleared, I mean, he couldn’t do anything until then. So it would probably be a year, maybe more. But he said that once he was free, and once he found a place to stay, he'd come get me. If that's what I wanted."

He was trying and failing to hide a wondrous smile.

"And what would Dumbledore have to say about that?"

Harry's smile disappeared. "Probably he wouldn't like it," he admitted. "He thinks I should stay with my aunt and uncle. But Sirius said that I could stay with them for a few weeks, days maybe, just so Dumbledore would be happy. There's this blood protection thing, apparently, that's tied to my mum… I don't understand it, but Sirius says he could protect me better than the Dursleys could. And I reckon that's right, isn't it? He's a wizard, after all."

"Sirius Black," said Draco, dry as parchment, "has half of Azkaban's security out hunting for him."

"He won't always, though," said Harry stubbornly.

"Sure. Right. Revised: Sirius Black is a homeless man, and most of the world thinks he killed your parents. At what point does he expect to be gainfully employed?"

Harry dodged these reasonable points like a man on the run from a hail of arrows. "So what?" he insisted. "So what if he hasn't got a — a flat and a corner office? Maybe I'm alright with that. I don't mind having to be on the move, and it'd be pretty exciting, anyway, getting to travel."

"You are not seriously contemplating going on the run with this man."

"Lupin would come with us," said Harry in a small voice. "It'd be safe."

Draco could see, for one horrible moment, the world that Harry was imagining. What's more, he could feel what was alluring about it: two parents, loving and fierce. A place you could come home to.

Unbidden, he envisioned Malfoy Manor in wintertime, a snowy tableau of brick and glowing windows, with his father waiting beside his mother on the steps.

For that reason, and the profoundly uncomfortable volumes of pity that were flooding his endocrine system, he said only: “Your funeral, Potter. Don’t come crying to me when you’re having cigarettes for dinner.”

The last week of work on the potion snuck up behind Draco and caught him like a bludger to the head. He and Hermione worked through every meal period for a week on the Polyjuice, which had turned the color of mud, and the viscosity of pus, and with each day Draco found more and more reasons to dread ingesting it. In order to make the hours of tedium spent simply stirring the damn cauldron bearable, he had brought his wireless speaker into Myrtle’s bathroom, and they played some of the new cassettes he’d gotten for Christmas: bands that she found in muggle stores over the summer, Stone Temple Pilots, Third Eye Blind, Echo and the Bunnymen. He even grew to enjoy some of those afternoons in the bathroom, lying in a pool of sunlight while Hermione took her turn stirring, listening to the strains of muggle strings and synths ricochet through the stone chamber. Under blue moon I saw you, so soon you’ll take me…

Hermione had picked over his engineering on the magical wireless and with reluctant astonishment pronounced it sound. She said he had made an utter hash of the wiring, and she hadn’t the foggiest idea how he managed to welt magic with muggle technology without short-circuiting the battery, but it undeniably worked. “Not that it should,” she said, jabbing at the batteries suspiciously with her wand. “I don’t know how you ripped out as much as you did without damaging it, but I suspect it’s being held together by whatever battery of charms you used on it.”

“Tosh. See? Muggle technology’s not so complicated after all.”

“You should show this to Seamus,” she added. “He’d love it. He’s always trying to find a way to make things louder.”

“Are you mad? I like it intact, thank you.”

On Friday afternoon, he left his post by the cauldron to Hermione and went up to the Gryffindor boys’ dorm with Ron, where he spent a baleful half-hour excoriating every article of clothing in the boy’s closet.

“Merlin’s bones, don’t you have a single shirt that isn’t wrinkled? Don’t answer that. I won’t even bother asking about a dinner jacket, I’m not that green. You’ll have to wear your uniform. I’ll loan you a jacket, so you don’t look like some panhandler I picked up from a shelter. Do yourself a favor and don’t spill anything on it, I don’t think your family can afford a second mortgage.”

He turned and gave a squawk of horror. “What are you doing?”

Ron paused, his Gryffindor tie looped in a loose knot around his neck. “My tie?” he said slowly. “For the prissy suit you’ve got? You’re wearing one.”

“You’re not wearing it that way!”

“...No, I am,” said Ron, after a furtive pause in which he appeared to decide it was a trick question.

With a heavily put-upon sigh, Draco tugged out Ron's tie. Ignoring Ron's sound of protest, he began tying it himself. “Welcome to Society, Weasley,” he sniffed. “If you wear a tie, you wear a Windsor. Acceptable alternatives include, but are not limited to: the Balthus, the Eldredge, the Trinity, or, if the occasion permits, a cravat. But under no circumstances should you appear in a half Windsor, Prince Albert, or, God forbid, a four-in-hand.”

“You made some of those up,” accused Ron.

Draco massaged the bridge of his nose. “This is going to work,” he said. “This is going to work, because it has to work, because I refuse to endure the abhorrent levels of humiliation I will undergo if it doesn’t. Do you hear me? I refuse.”

“Embarrass you?” said Ron indignantly. “My hands are still blue from that box-dye, and I'm wearing more of Lavender’s makeup than she is. ’Sides, my complexion’s not meant for black hair, I look like a ghoul.”

“I hadn’t noticed,” said Draco. “It’s good enough to be getting on with. Come along, then, Prewett.”

This time, the lecture hall had been draped in Transfigured diamonds and was lit by the blaze of two dozen bronze sconces. Purple-and-gold paper lanterns drifted in packs like wild birds, bespelled to give off the scent of lilacs. There were fewer Ministry officials, but more students, and the energy in the room was higher than it had been the previous night. An expectant excitement ran through the crowd like an electric pulse, transmitted by the hardly-concealed whispers of eager children, trading rumors and champagne glasses like candies on Christmas morning.

Draco noticed Snape’s absence. He presumed that Snape had more important things to do than frequent parties meant primarily for children, and in truth, he was relieved not to see his godfather. Keeping Ron’s familiar visage away from Snape’s prying eyes had been his chief fear going into the evening. He was preoccupied with other, more important things, such as: keeping Ron’s familiar visage away from the eyes of anyone else who might recognize him. His vertical aptitude made this a problem. There simply were not many Slytherins as tall as Ron. This was an observation that Draco had made privately, the once, and Ron had made loudly, many times.

“Blimey, this is posh,” mused Harry’s voice. Draco mustered all his powers of cool and impassivity not to jump out of his mortal skin. “Is this what it’s like in Slytherin? You throw big parties and hobnob with prats?”

“How should I know? Half of my house couldn’t spell ‘hobnob’ with two hours and a dictionary.” Draco was trying not to move his lips. “Try not to talk. Someone could hear.”

“So what, I’m invisible,” said Harry, and, as if to prove his point, stole a canapé.

“Try also to not do things that make me want to perform arcane violences on your person.”

“That’s everything I do, isn’t it?”

“Yes, you’re starting to get the idea.”

It was admittedly pleasant to see Ron squirm. Every time a group passed by, their eyes did the old seesaw up-and-down of his person that Draco had so dearly come to enjoy, for in his case it was often followed by the classic eyebrow-jump and head-bob; in Ron’s, however, it more often preceded a discerning squint-and-scowl, or worse, the suspicious double-take. Ron gulped and reached for his tie knot, only to be dealt a fierce smack to his hand.

“Don’t you dare.”

“Good. The better to throttle you with, if you mess this up.”

The band was playing something slow and sleepy that even the most excitable students deemed un-dance-worthy, so the crowds had clustered in little geodes of conversation around the sides of the room.

“You came!” cried Professor Slughorn when he saw Draco. “Dear boy! Such a pleasure to see you again. I must introduce you to my friend Lord Thicknesse. He’s a premier undersecretary to my dear absent friend Barty. You’ve heard of Barty, I’m sure? Crouch? Of course, not many haven't, he's simply one of those men. And who is this?"

Ron was too well-trained in the art of weathering Percy's bluster to bat an eye at this barrel-dump of irrelevant information. He turned to Draco and cleared his throat, which was the agreed-upon sign for: Do I sneer at this person or simper?

Draco clicked his tongue, and Ron arranged his face into the weakest, most un-hateful impression of a scowl that Draco ever had the pleasure of not being offended by. He was doing something with his eyebrows that made Draco want to shave them off and burn them at the risk of ever seeing it again.

"Professor, this is Lancel Prewett," said Draco. He himself indulged in a bit of show-offery with a designer expression from the Malfoy boutique of exquisite sneers — a scalding curl of his lip that in only a flicker of movement conveyed the vast gamut of scorn, indifference, and resentment at the indignity of being forced to expend oxygen on someone of so little consequence.

Slughorn's eyes slithered over Ron in a swift appraisal. "No relation to Ignatius Prewett, surely?"

"Yeah," said Ron, too quickly. "He's my great-uncle."

"By marriage?"

"Er — no, the other thing."

"Blood," Draco said sharply. "He's the blood son of Gideon Prewett. Professor, do you remember Gideon? You must have taught him, he was in your time."

"Now there was a wizard, Ignatius," said Slughorn, already distracted by whatever he had thought of to say next. "Quite the specialist in Charms. A talent! But the real prize was his wife. A rare match, volatile, but so much promise… a real shame they never had children…”

Harry coughed, and Draco took Ron by the shoulder. “Fascinating,” he said firmly, in tones that admitted no fascination whatsoever. “Truly. Professor, you must excuse us. As you can deduce by looking at him, Lancel has a condition, and if he doesn’t ingest a liter of champagne every twenty-four hours, he’ll faint dead away. Come, Lancel.”

“Yes,” said Ron. “Champagne. Dizzy. Goodbye.”

The food table had been festively burdened with little trays of crab puffs and stuffed peppers, sandwiched inside a flock of snow-white napkins folded, perhaps a touch too realistically, in the shapes of swans. A trio of Ministry workers sat at a table off to the side near the dias, each dangling a flute of champagne from their fingers as if it were too cumbersome to flex the muscles in their hands. They were Orpheus Greengrass, Sibelius Nott, and Prescott Parkinson. Only Sibelius appeared to be having a good time; the others were bored and restless, as any adult at a party populated mostly by children ought to have been. Their conversation was occasionally interrupted by the approach of a boil-faced teenager, heart in hand, who desired to swoon or bootlick one of them. These were dismissed with the very lower bound of civility and sent unceremoniously away.

“They’re almost the only Ministry people here,” whispered Harry. “Where are the others?”

“Gone, I expect,” Draco said grimly. “Why would they stick around? The Minister’s not here, so what do they care?”

“But why are they still here, then?”

“Because of their children,” he said, with a chill pang of understanding. “That's Greengrass and Parkinson. And Nott, of course, but we knew he’d be here already. Bet you anything they’re all here tonight.”

“But that’s everything shot, then. They all know me.”

“Calm down, W— Prewett. For one, I highly doubt any of them will recognize you. You look good and awful, there’s a chance they’ll try to avert their eyes from politeness.”

“I danced with Daphne at the twins’ Christmas party! She knows what my face looks like, knobhead!”

“You are at far greater risk of being found out by using the word ‘knobhead’ than you are by the miraculous possibility that someone like Daphne Greengrass even remembers you.”

At this, the malevolent puppeteers in control of Draco’s fortunes gave a gleeful yank of the strings, and someone like Daphne Greengrass herself came limping into the room.

She wore a shimmery skirt in blue so pale it glowed silver under the lights, like its silk had been spun by someone thinking very hard about an untouched bowl of pigment somewhere to the left. Over this she wore a white fur stole of tremendous size that enveloped her whole bodice, a commitment of enough fabric to martyr at least two polar bears, and she wore her hair loose down one shoulder in a billow of yellow curls. She was the kind of beautiful that made everyone else in the room feel a little hopeless and miserable about their own life prospects. This was doubtlessly the desired effect, and Draco respected her for it.

In her left hand she wielded a silver cane long enough to hide a dueling sword. She applied it liberally in the task of hobbling over to them, at which point she thrust it down with a punishing crack against the tile, lifted her chin, and said: “Ronald Weasley, whoever told you to go black over ginger should be locked up with a randy dementor. Are you dying?”

A disembodied fit of mirthful coughing broke out somewhere over Draco’s ear. Draco covered his mouth with his hand. Ron’s cheeks warmed to the normal color of his hair.

“Are you terminally ill?” she continued relentlessly. “Are you counting your time in days? Why would you do this to yourself? You had lovely hair!”

“I did?” said Ron in bewilderment.

“Yes! A lovely copper-red, it was perfect! And this!” She swiped a finger around his ears, and it came away blue. She brandished her fingers in his face as if she intended to drive them into his eyes. “Thank Merlin it’s not a spell. You go home and you wash that at once, and then you tell me what girl hates you.”

“Why do you assume it’s a girl?” said Draco, who thought this was somewhat unfeminist, and also hilarious.

“Because there’s not a fourteen-year-old boy on the planet who’d touch a box of hair dye unless a girl told him to,” she said crisply, “and most of them still wouldn’t, unless they were in love with her. Draco, give it to me honestly. Who is it? Is she pretty?”

“That would be Hermione Granger, and I’m declining to answer the other question, on the grounds that the gut quite simply rebels. You’ll have to use your own judgment.”

She gave a scandalized little gasp. “Hermione! She is pretty. Is he in love with her?”

“No,” said Draco sharply. “That’s disgusting, Greengrass, don’t be ridiculous.” He paused. “And what do you mean, Granger is—”

“But she doesn’t hate you! So why, why, Ronald, why would a nice girl like Hermione—?”

“Undercover for what? The morgue?” When no one answered, she grimaced at her stained fingers and wiped them on Ronald’s shirt. It was by a matter of centimeters that she missed Draco's dinner jacket; Ron turned impossibly whiter. "Alright, don't tell me, it's sure to bore me anyway. But if you're planning some Gryffindor prank, please don't spoil the party until after I've left, it took ever so long to do my hair."

"Wouldn't dream of it," Ron managed, and she patted him absently on the chest.

"In fact I'm glad you came," she confided in Draco, looping her arm over his. She passed the cane off to Ron, who was quite tickled by it, and 'accidentally' clubbed at least three purebloods in the leg before Draco snatched it away. "The plan was me and Pansy and Theo, but Pansy got a detention for making fun of Eloise Midgen and messed it all up."

"What'd she say?" said Ron, around a mouthful of crab cake. Draco glared at him and emphatically pressed his own jaw shut. It was as if he were the only one concerned with the 'undercover' business at all.

"Some nonsense about her boils. I told her not to get into it, but you know Pansy, she'll pick a fight with an empty room. Anyway, I was worried, because it was down to just Theo and me, and I think he'd climb out the window to avoid me."

Her tone was fickle with the deliberate carelessness of someone who cared about it deeply.

"Ugh. Haven't you two sorted all that out?"

"Sorted out what?" said Daphne, impossibly airier. "I haven't any idea what I did to disturb him. Maybe he just doesn't like me. Some people don't like me, you know. No, it's true," she added, when Ron scoffed.

"Theo likes you fine. Tell him to stop being an idiot."

“I have. Slytherin has.”

“Well, tell him again, then.”

Ron opened his mouth, closed it, raised a finger, and chewed vigorously. He swallowed, and unaware that Draco stood beside him almost aflame with pride, said: “Reckon he likes you, doesn’t he.”

“Theo? No, no. Oh, no, no, no. I’m sure he has a row of little alarm bells and levers in the back of his head that start going off whenever he gets Feelings, and it shuts down all blood flow beneath the brain. It’s an injustice, you know, for someone fit to be so unavailable; the Slytherin girls are thinking of unionizing… Oh, piss. Turn me around, quickly. And give me the cane.”

It was too late. Orpheus Greengrass, having spotted his daughter through the maze of heads, had left his table and now came bearing down upon them like six feet of fretful stork.

“Daphne Greengrass,” he hissed, like there was any other Daphne he might be squawking at.

Nothing individually, but the combination of his tone, expression, posture, and accidental resemblance to an anemic swan filled Draco with an instinctive antipathy.

“What am I to make of this? Where is your chair?”

“I don’t know,” said Daphne, sounding sulkier than he’d ever heard her. “The dungeons, I suppose.”

“When I sent Plinky to escort you—”

“For Merlin’s sake, what I’d do with a rolly-chair in a castle full of staircases beggars the mind, as does what possible use I’d have for Plinky, since house-elves can’t be used on Hogwarts grounds, like I told you, Dad.”

“Snape would make an exception,” he said stubbornly.

“You have a house-elf?” said Ron curiously.

“Two,” she said bitterly. “One for me, and one for Astoria. Dad, I asked permission to come.”

“Which was revoked. Your mother and I talked about this. You agreed! After what happened on Tuesday—”

“What happened on Tuesday?” said Ron.

“It was tiny,” Daphne snapped. “Basically nothing. I didn’t even go to the Hospital Wing.”

“What was tiny?” insisted Ron.

Finally the Greengrasses extricated their noses from each other’s business, and ogled him. Daphne was embarrassed and grateful and slightly incredulous, like she couldn’t believe he had the stones. Orpheus Greengrass’ wide gaze traveled from his boots all the way up to the top of his box-dyed hair, and then returned for another helping of the blue stain Daphne’s fingers had left on his dress shirt.

Ron coughed and stuck out his hand. “Lancel Prewett,” he said. “Son of Gideon. And you are?”

Draco was very nearly impressed: And you are? came out dripping with sticky condescension, as if he couldn’t be bothered to move his jaw. Now, that didn’t change the outrageous faux pas of asking for the name of a man who absolutely should not have required an introduction. Someone named ‘Prewett’ ought to have clocked Orpheus Greengrass at a mile. But perhaps, Draco thought valiantly, they could play it off as a simply seismic fit of daring.

“In any case,” said Orpheus, after an arctic lull in the conversation. He turned back to Daphne. “I should have thought—”

“Is this your dad?” Ron interrupted, turning now to Daphne once he realized Orpheus wouldn’t talk to him.

Daphne was frozen in the beam of her father's disapproval. Draco tried to transmit through her occasionally thick skull the importance of playing this correctly.

"Y-yes," she said. "Father, this is my dear friend… Lancel."

There was a pause before Lancel so long that several conversations seemed to start and finish in the background.

"Pleasure," said Orpheus, as if someone had eked it out of him with a chisel and an awl.

"Smashing," said Ron indifferently. "What's this about a Hospital Wing? You didn't tell me about that."

"I beg your leave," said Orpheus quietly. "This is family business."

"Yeah? Funny place for it," said Ron. "I was minding my business with my friend here until you came over."

"R— Lancel," interrupted Daphne, still caught between embarrassment and gratitude. "It's okay. My Dad's just—"

Orpheus gave a yelp and whirled around, clutching his hair. There was no one behind him.

Draco hastened to draw his attention back to the group.

"I want a drink," he announced. "Does anyone else want a drink? I'm parched—"

"What kind of example," said Orpheus, with an almost tender sort of anger, "does this set for your sister?"

The effect was immediate: Daphne burned white, then red, then suddenly choked up hard on her cane, and Draco swayed back, seized by a fleeting alarm that she was going to swing with it. "For Astoria?" she shrieked. "For Astoria? You have the gall to tell me I'm bad for Astoria?"

“Following your example has fared poorly for her in the past,” said Orpheus, and Daphne actually shrieked, a momentary pitch above the normal volume of the crowd, driving him back in an apparent peal of fright.

“My example? Mine? How dare you throw her around like that, how dare you, you think you’re the only person who cares about her? I’m the only reason Tori is still alive, and you have the gall to stand there with your heinous presumptions and call me selfish for wanting a life, as if it’s any harm at all to Tori what I do? As if I’d breathe if it stood a chance of hurting her — I’d give a lung for her, I’d give both my lungs for her, don’t you dare throw Tori at me!”

“Whoa,” said Ron quickly, and shouldered in front of her, putting himself in the most probable line of a cane-strike to Orpheus’ head. Orpheus seemed like he didn’t know whether to be grateful or furious. “Let’s put the brakes on. Take a huddle? Take a huddle.” He herded Daphne out of the group, hustling her out of her father’s sight. “Draco,” he added, “why don’t you take the big guy over here —”

But this was a moot point; as soon as Daphne had raised her voice, Orpheus had staggered back. He said to Draco, thickly: “Excuse me.” Then he whirled on his heel and cut away, moving so swiftly that the crowd before him had to part or be trampled.

“Blimey,” said Harry quietly, “are they all like that? Your lot’s parents?”

“That,” said Draco shortly, “is not ‘my lot.’” After a pause, he added, “And my mother would never.”

In a secluded corner of the room, Ron was trying to calm Daphne down. She was hyperventilating.

“It’s all about the breathing, right,” he coaxed. “In and out. Let’s get you something to eat. Mum always says getting something to eat will fix you right up. Gives your mouth something to do, and your hands…"

"I don't want anything to eat! I want to bludgeon his stupid smug face in with this cane! I want him to die!"

"Got that. On the agenda," he agreed easily. "Eat first, though. Beat your dad's arse after. What, you're going to do cane murder on an empty stomach? Not bloody likely, let me tell you."

She sniffed, wringing the handle of the cane like it was a neck. Ron lifted a cheese puff from a passing tray and held it patiently, unobtrusively, in his palm. After several beats, she snatched it and shoved it in her mouth.

When Draco judged there to be a negligible risk of getting himself caned or bitten, he interjected himself into their dour silence with an announcement of: "Is your sister dying?"

"Merlin, mate," Ron said, flashing him an annoyed look. "Buy a sense of timing."

Daphne swallowed around something large and painful-sounding in her throat. "Not while I'm alive," she said hoarsely.

"So there's some degree of uncertainty on the subject."

"I can't believe he'd say that. Tori lives for my stories, anyway. It's not bad enough I have to lie to her every time I go home, give her a sense of hope—"

"Second question," interrupted Draco. "Are you dying?"

"Not presently."

"I was looking for a categorical answer," he said, staring at her. "Third, final question: What the hell, Greengrass?"

She glowered at him. Then she whipped out her wand and pressed it to her own wrist. “Finite incantatem,” she snapped, and a layer of cream-pale glamour peeled off like a sleeve. Beneath it, a long, jagged scar ran from the soft of her elbow to the tapered span of her wrist. Ron sucked his breath through his teeth.

“How recent is that?”

“You won’t believe me,” she said, “but summer.”

“Four months? But it looks awful.”

“Turn out,” she said, “that’s what four months of healing looks like, when you’ve been on a night-mare-y-go-round of medications and blood thinners. It’s murder on the skin and I’m very near dead of anemia, but at least this way I might live until thirty.”

“Thirty? What do you mean, thirty? Are you — are you ill?”

Ron’s eyes were so wide Draco could ride a broomstick through them. He’d chide him for staring if he didn’t suspect he was doing the same, all slack-jawed and stupid with shock, as if they were two rank imbeciles who’d never heard of someone being sick before.

Daphne drew her wand back down her arm and re-cast the glamour. Her expression would have been embarrassed if it were not so very sad. “It’s not so much an illness as a condition,” she said. “Mum calls it a blood maladict. Don’t ever tell her I said so, but I think she likes the way it sounds, all dramatic and evil, like it’s a curse visited upon our house for its sins. Whatever my shit-for-bones body has to do with the sins of the house of Greengrass escapes me entirely. The healers call it something long and complicated that I can never remember. Hereditary something-or-other. Tori and I both have it. Hers is worse than mine, I think I’ve given her half a dozen transfusions since last year. Oh, don’t look at me like that.”

“Like what?” said Ron weakly.

“It’s not as though I’m losing an arm,” she said casually. “It’s blood, I make more. My parents would do it, but they’re not matches.”

“So when she fell this summer,” Draco began, recalling a distant conversation.

Daphne shuddered. “Yes, that was quite the exciting day for both of us. I don’t think I’ve ever given quite so much at once.”

“That’s why you couldn’t come to France? Your sister?”

“I asked them to take her, too,” she said vaguely. “She could have come, but then you all would’ve had to be let in on the secret, because we’d have had to bring the medical equipment, and the nurses, and the healers… for her and me. And as you might expect, they’re none too keen on spreading the word…”

“But you said thirty,” said Ron, appalled. “You mean with the treatments — and all your medicines, and everything — Greengrass, you are going to get better, aren’t you?”

She shrugged. “I am better,” she said. “I can walk around, and go to school, and everything. I’ll get my O.W.L.s, I’ll get my N.E.W.T.s. That’s more than my grandmother ever got to do. She was bedridden at fifteen. The healers are very optimistic about me, in comparison.”

“But—”

“Don’t boohoo for me, darling, I’ve had quite enough of it for a lifetime,” she said dully. She grasped her cane and hauled herself, wobbling, to her feet; when Draco moved to take her arm, she slapped his hand. “Don’t you dare baby me, either. I haven’t told anyone because if I get so much as a hint of the treatment I get at home, I’m going to set the whole castle on fire and run screaming into the Black Lake. I’m serious. I’ll tolerate it for Tori, and Tori only, but otherwise I’m rather fond of being treated like a person, and I’d like it to continue.”

Draco said, “Your father’s right about the chair, isn’t he?”

“Right about what?”

“That you need it,” he said. “You’re pushing your luck. Look at you, Greengrass, some days you can barely walk. If you fell — Merlin help you, if you’ve got anemia and you walked into a trick stair—”

This riled her with shocking efficiency. “And if I pushed you down those stairs, it’d snap your neck too, so don’t you explain danger to me, Draco Malfoy!” she said shrilly. “I’ve lived here just as long as you have, and I’ve managed, haven’t I! I’m astounded you have the gall to lecture me, when you’re off every year with some madcap plot to get yourself and everyone who likes you killed — just last year you came closer to dying than I ever have, and it was for Harry Potter, of all people, on the quidditch pitch!”

He could feel it when his face locked down, ironing out the traces of hurt. “I’ve handled myself perfectly well on each of those occasions. At least I was putting myself in danger for a reason.”

“For a reason! Life isn’t a reason? My own happiness isn’t a reason? You don’t understand. Nobody understands, nobody except Tori, and she’s all of nine years old. Draco, for my own good, butt out. My health isn’t your shout.”

“It’s my shout if I say it is, and I say it is. Do you think it’d be all trifle and butterbeers for me, if you keeled over tomorrow? Do you think it’d be fine with Nott?”

“Don’t bring Theodore into this.”

“He’s in it whether you want him to be or not. If you died I think he’d just about challenge the Reaper to an honor duel, and count himself lucky to get killed in the bargain.”

“Oh, and there you go, talking like you know him,” she said, regal with scorn. “Shows what you know. That would require him to give a single solitary damn about anyone other than—” But she broke off, pressing the back of her hand to her wobbling lip, and then tumbled back down onto the window seat, where Ron put his arm around her.

“Easy,” he said sternly, to her and Draco both. “Take a cheese puff. You, too, Malfoy.”

Draco did not, in protest, eat another cheese puff. Daphne did, however, and it seemed to calm her somewhat.

“It seems like Nott is a touchy subject,” said Ron tentatively, “so, proposal: let’s leave off him for a second, yeah? Bloke’s not even here to defend himself.”

“Why isn’t he here, come to think of it?” said Draco, frowning. “His father’s here. This is his party.”

Daphne, after annihilating a cheese puff with all the violence Draco suspected she wanted to enact on him, daubed her lips with a napkin and said primly: “He might be late. He’s trying to miss his father’s interval.”

“Miss him?” Ron was confused. “Other way around, isn’t it?”

“If he liked his father a mite more than snogging a blast-ended skrewt, it might be,” she said delicately. “As it is, he’s trying to balance matters. He’s got to keep his father happy, which in his case involves seeing as little of him as possible while keeping up appearances. I don’t envy him… well, not most of the time, anyways.”

“You shouldn’t,” Draco said shortly. He had met Sibelius Nott too many times to harbor many doubts about his ability as a parent. “Nott’s a piece of work.”

“Like father, like son, I suppose.”

“Hopefully not.”

There was a thump from the crowd, and a tray of champagne glasses went crashing to the floor. While the partygoers whirled and gawked, a shimmer appeared in the air over Ron's shoulder, and Harry's face peeked out from a slit in the air. It was sort of like talking to a nose with fringe. "Oi, layabouts," he hissed. "I've been running around yanking the hairs off half the purebloods in this room. What happened to working together?" He noticed Daphne, curled shelteringly under Ron's arm. "What's all this?" he said, switching with breathtaking speed into the role of fretful mother hen. "Is she alright? What's the problem?"

"No, mate," Ron said, not unkindly. Daphne was mystified into silence at Harry's talking nose. He patted her shoulder. "We just put this thing to bed. Tell you later, but we're not picking it up again."

It was a testament to Harry's worth as a friend, and his unwavering trust in Ron as the same, that he didn't object. "Do we need to get her out of here?" he said, nodding to the door. He drew the cloak back a little. "She can have this — I'll put my hood up, we can make a dash for it."

"You have an Invisibility Cloak?" gasped Daphne.

"Er. No," said Harry, uselessly.

"Yes," sighed Draco. "Greengrass, this is another one of those pain-of-death secrets, alright? Gentleman's honor."

"Obviously," she said. "But what is he doing here? Is that why you've done such awful things to Ron's hair?"

"That's another pain-of-death secret," said Draco irritably. "Since apparently Potter has decided, without consulting the group, to induct you into our growing circle of trust."

Harry shrugged. "She seemed alright," he said. "Hermione said she had a cat."

“I do have a cat,” said Daphne eagerly. (“That’s not a recommendation,” said Ron darkly.) “Can I be in on the secret? I’ll keep it, I promise.”

“No,” said Draco.

“Sorry, no,” said Harry the Nose.

“Unfortunately,” sighed Ron, “it’s not ours to tell. There’s other blokes involved, and they’ve got a lot of skin in it, you see.”

“I understand,” she said, and Draco felt surprisingly grateful to her: trust a Slytherin to implicitly understand the importance of discretion. “But I do so love secret plots. I just gobble up all those muggle novels with the people sitting around talking about murder. Are you part of a secret society? Is it dangerous? Is it deadly?”

“Sort of dangerous, yeah,” said Ron, slightly smug. “Deadly, well, you never know. Probably not, but we take our chances, we do.”

She gasped.

“Weasley, knock it off,” said Draco shortly. “You’re not Godric Gryffindor because you gatecrashed a party with a bad dye job. And I’m not sure you want to be made an accomplice here, Greengrass.”

“Oh, but I do,” she said eagerly. “This is the first time anything exciting has happened to me in ages and ages. I can be helpful, you know! And if you’d only come to me in the first place, I could have done a much better glamour than whatever you’ve put in his hair. Would you like to see?” She drew her wand.

“Not here,” hissed Draco, shoving it down. He took back what he’d said about Slytherins; she was as bad as a Gryffindor. It was right back to herding cats. “If you really want to help us, you’ll help us get out of here without attracting attention, since we’ve already done plenty of that. And Potter, put your cloak back on, before someone with more than two brain cells to rub together notices your chin bobbing around like a buoyant wedge of cheese."

"Uncalled for."

Daphne drew herself up to her full height and squared her shoulders. "An exit is easy to do," she said eagerly. "Would you like a distraction? I'm wonderful at those."

"Should say you are," muttered Ron, and then coughed, as Draco's elbow mysteriously appeared in his spleen.

"That'd be aces," said Harry. "Can you, er — get the attention of the room? As many of them as possible? We're going to try to get out without anyone noticing, or talking to us."

"The full room? All of them?"

"Yeah. Or as close to it as you can, it doesn't have to be perfect—"

"Please, don't be absurd. I was only clarifying. You'll go that way?" She pointed to the far door. Ron nodded.

"Thanks, Greengrass. We owe you one—"

"Oh, your manners are atrocious," she said fondly, standing up. "Don't you know anything? You don't say you owe me one, Mr. Prewett, you just bask in miserable envy of my talents while I save your skins. And then you buy me a very nice birthday present."

Draco was nodding in agreement.

"In the interest of which," she added, to Draco, "for your recollection: I'm a cool winter; I prefer silver to gold, and diamonds to pearls. But if it must be pearls, then pearls in gold, not pearls in silver. And I favor llama fur to cashmere, for preference. I can write it down, if you like."

"Don't insult me."

She glowed. “You are so nearly tolerable,” she said, which was great praise. Then she turned to Ron, kissed him on the cheek, and said: “You’re a darling. Never touch your hair without my say-so again. Goodnight.”

Hefting her cane, she cantered boldly into the center of the dance floor and turned about, giving her audience some tactical consideration. With a certain satisfaction, she tossed away her cane with a clatter. Then she flung herself to the floor, clutching her heart, and let out a perfectly operatic scream.

At which point — as the party exploded with the uproar, and Orpheus Greengrass very nearly clobbered a third year to death in his effort to get to reach his passionately writhing daughter — Draco, Ron, and Harry made a swift and timely exit.

-draco, confronted with a possible narrative foil and/or counterpart: absolutely not. no thank you

-i may have mentioned this before, but daphne started out as being a much smaller component of this book, but sort of wrestled her way into the narrative by sheer force of personality. in many ways, she's more like draco than any of the other slytherins — they're both more changeable, more flexible, and more open to new experiences. and they are both, of course, self-described hot blondes.

-the question of patronuses also raises the question of J.K.R.'s statement — word-of-god, naturally — that draco can't cast a patronus. this makes about zero sense to me and always has. the terms of the patronus charm are consistently described as emotional; your moral disposition, or how good of a person you are, has no bearing (usually) on whether you can produce a happy memory.

-e.g., bellatrix lestrange. this bint is heinously awful, and she is never not having the time of her life. being cartoonishly evil IS her calling. her job satisfaction is 100%. so she should be able to cast a patronus at the drop of a hat, right? but death eaters can't, apparently. which means that either lupin doesn't actually describe the patronus in full accuracy to harry in book 3 (strange) or, alternatively, lupin is right, but that means the only reason that draco would have trouble is if he is sincerely so depressed that he can't manage a happy memory at all, which... honestly would be an incredible character detail if the books tried to take that seriously. but it's an INSANE thing to drop on us via word-of-god. like, that's a profound, character-altering fact. that should have been mentioned in the books.

-anyway, long digression just to say that I think it makes more sense if Draco does have happy memories, but he overthinks them, because one of his great faults is his cynicism, whereas Ron is generally an optimist. that explains why he can't cast the charm and also draws the parallel between him and hermione, who has the memories and knows how to use them, but just views magic as a clinical field, to her own detriment. /END RANT.

-next chapter next week! a promise: there will be quidditch. thank you to everyone commenting; you're the reason i'm still here. love and good luck with all school/work/lives starting up again in the new year. ciao!

The Blind Spot

Chapter 27: The Blind Spot

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

“Put your hands up and move away from the cauldron,” said Draco.

Hermione looked bewildered. Apparently when he said move away from the cauldron, she’d heard sit on your bum and stare at Draco like he’s grown another head, which was understandable, considering what both heads would have looked like. Even so, this was no time to sit around goggling at astonishingly beautiful objects. There would be plenty of time for that later.

“What’s wrong? Did you hear from Sirius?”

Draco shook his head and strode into the bathroom. Harry and Ron lingered by the door with their arms folded, doing their best impressions of brick walls.

Hermione, being by several orders of magnitude the smartest person Draco had ever met, deduced at once what the unlikely allegiance before her meant.

“Oh, no. Oh, no, no, no.”

“This is for your own good.” He plucked the stirrer from her hands and clamped the lid back on the cauldron, which burbled in healthsome cheer. “I’ve spoken to Dobby. He’ll mind the potion for the next three hours. Not that he needs to, since it’s all but finished, as you very well know.”

“What if it boils over?”

“It won’t.” He flicked his wand at her books, and they rose to cheerfully pack themselves into her bag, even as she fumbled to stop them.

“What if it curdles? Dobby won’t know what to do. It’s really better to have someone who knows the signs—”

“Save your breath.” He held out her bag. “Up you get. Step lively.”

She gave a steep intake of breath, which she held in her chest for three baleful seconds, during which time he worried that she was going to make herself pass out in protest.

Then she burst out: “But I don’t want to watch stupid quidditch!”

Draco clucked his tongue. “Big mistake, Granger,” he said. “You should have stopped before ‘stupid.’”

“On the day of the big game, Hermione,” Harry said, beside himself with shame.

“Turn around three times and spit,” Ron ordered.

“Throw some salt over your shoulder,” said Harry.

“Burn some incense, while you’re at it,” advised Draco. “Today is no day to take chances. It’s the final, and none shall suffer a deserter to live. Up you get.”

“That’s why I don’t want to go! I don’t want to watch you two almost die, again! I’d be much happier if it were two strangers getting clobbered!”

“You’ve mistaken this for a negotiation. Now, either you can come, and watch your beloved housemates earn eternal glory with the best game of quidditch this castle has ever seen—”

“I choose the other option,” she said immediately. He shook his head.

“You didn’t let me finish. The end of that sentence was ‘and you can come easy, or you can come rough.’”

She drummed her fingers on the tile, concentrating so deeply it appeared she was trying to Apparate. When she spoke, however, it was in tones of such sweetness and entreaty that it flagged his fight-or-flight instinct, like the sweet colors of a poison dart frog. “Of course I’m happy to support you,” she said, doing something with her eyelashes that might be described as ‘coy,’ if the person describing it had dementia and cataracts. “I’d love to come. Really. I can’t go like this, though; I don’t have my red scarf, or my streamers. Let me go back to the dorms and fetch them, and I’ll meet you at the pitch.”

This was about as cunning as a club to the head. Thank God she hadn’t been in Slytherin.

Draco shifted his weight skeptically onto one hip. She continued doing that thing with her eyelashes, intensely, as if that was supposed to do anything except amuse him.

“Roughly it is. Boys?”

Harry and Ron moved forward with resignation. Hermione yelped and scrambled to her feet.

“No! No! I’m not coming, I won’t! Harry James Potter, if you come any nearer, they’ll have to dedicate you a whole ward in St. Mungo’s!”

“Fair enough, but wait for after the game,” said Harry, with the brave stoicism of someone who understood that this was no idle threat. “If you whomp me beforehand and Oliver finds out, they’ll have to dedicate you a building.”

Carrying her out of the bathroom was the hardest leg, as Hermione, in the true spirit of her house, fought to the bitter end with tooth and nail and jinxes that Draco only usually moved fast enough to block. When they arrived at the grand staircase there was a quick and spirited renegotiation of terms, in order to prevent the disastrous consequences of someone dropping her, and she continued the rest of the way down to the pitch while riding piggyback on Harry. Needless to say, she complained vocally the whole time.

Slytherin was leading the tournament by two hundred points. This meant, as Wood had very well beaten through their heads, that they needed to win the match by more than that to win the Cup. It also meant that Harry was under pain-of-death instructions not to so much as think of touching the snitch unless Gryffindor was up fifty.

The day was cloudless and temperate, its ice-blue sky offered up like a rare jewel in an unusually gloomy May. Students of all houses streamed down across the dew-clad lawns, vibrating with excitement for the upcoming match. Most of them wore red-and-gold scarves, hats, or jumpers, even if they weren't Gryffindors, while just a few defiant non-Slytherins waved green handkerchiefs tied to their wands. There was hollering and noisemaking, trumpeting of horns, clapping of hands; a few raggedy choruses of Let's have a holler for Harry Potter… and, from farther down, a hard BANG! and a small blaze of red-and-gold fireworks, followed by a screech of: "FINNIGAN!" in the unmistakable howl of Filch.

They passed some Ravenclaws with red-and-gold streamers in their hair, one of whom was Cho Chang. When she saw them, she smiled and waved.

"Good luck, Harry!"

"Good luck Harry?" Draco repeated, disgruntled; but then he noticed that Harry was blushing.

Reaching the turnstiles, Harry let Hermione slip off his back. "You should hurry, if you want good seats. The stands will fill up fast."

"I don't want good seats," she said passionately. "I don't want to see you fall and break your neck, actually, it's rather low on the list of things I'd like to see."

“That only happened the once,” Harry said, offended.

“Once is usually enough!”

“Nah, don’t worry about it, Harry, we’ll take care of her,” said Ginny, shouldering her way through the crowd. She wore a giant cherry-red jumper with a G on it (Draco recognized Mrs. Weasley’s handiwork) and someone had painted a lion on her cheek. “S’only pre-match jitters. She’ll cheer up once we start winning. Come on, Hermione. You can hold my hand if you get scared.”

She held out her hand. Hermione grasped it with the grim expression of someone sealing a pact with the devil.

“I’m going to vomit,” she informed Harry and Draco, matter-of-factly.

“Save it for when the Slytherins come out,” said Harry. “It’ll seem like a statement.”

Muttering to herself, she allowed Ginny to steer her up into the bleachers, gripping the other girl’s hand like a hydraulic press.

“Best go change, I s’pose,” said Harry. “Think Wood’s about done sacrificing that goat.”

But they were stopped on their way through the turnstile by Professor McGonagall, who was dressed in a frock of spiritless black, save for a single red ruby in her jabot. “Potter. Malfoy,” she said thinly. “Why are you not in your quidditch robes? Warmups will begin shortly.”

“Yes, professor. We were just going—”

“Come with me,” she ordered. Draco and Harry traded a glance of apprehension and followed her down to the sandy den of the locker rooms. The last time McGonagall had intercepted them before a quidditch match, the news had been rather dour.

She swept them into a side room near the lockers, its size and smell evocative of its former life as a broom cabinet. Draco's heartrate spiked, and he ran through a mental list of people who might have died.

"Potter," she began, and paused. Draco sagged: thank Merlin, it was probably just the poor sod's wretched aunt. If there was any justice in the world, she'd keeled over dead during a bout of muggle 'dentistry.'

"Er… yes, professor?" Harry was pale with dread.

"You are flying a Cleansweep Four. Correct?"

Neither he nor Draco knew what to say to that. "...Yes, professor."

McGonagall pressed her lips together. Being a thin-lipped woman to begin with, this gave her the impression of having bitten a lemon.

"You are a very competent flier, Potter."

"Thanks," said Harry, sweating bullets.

"You have a fine talent for broom handling and a high level of general athletic skill."

"Thanks a lot," said Harry, sweating even more.

McGonagall steepled her fingers. It was like a row of birch twigs coupling. "At the risk of redundancy, however," she said primly, "it remains the case, for good reason, that professional quidditch players do not fly on Cleansweep Fours."

"Right, professor," said Harry, who at this point would have agreed to virtually anything. It was like watching a fellow get waterboarded. Draco almost broke into a spate of nervous laughter, and was glad he didn't; he liked McGonagall, and considered her dignified and fair, but she did not take kindly to japery of any sort.

“As Head of Gryffindor House,” she said coolly, “it would be entirely inappropriate for me to spend personal funds equipping our quidditch team. Each house team receives the same budget at the beginning of the school year; its spending lies at the discretion of the captain. It would be a violation of school rules, to say nothing of poor sportsmanship, for a teacher to become involved in the outcome of a school sporting event.”

“That’s tosh,” said Draco, incredulous. “There’s loads of money that goes into the Slytherin team. Look at their brooms!”

McGonagall regarded him impassively over her pince-nez. He closed his mouth.

“Professors,” she said, mostly to Harry, “do not play favorites. Head of House or not.”

Harry nodded. “I understand,” he said. “It’s alright, professor. I’ve been practicing on the Cleansweep, and I’ll do my best — it doesn’t matter how good their brooms are, we’ll just out-fly them. They can all come out on Firebolts if they want to. You can’t buy player quality, that’s what Wood always says.” He nudged Draco, who gave an affirming sort of cough, though philosophically he was unconvinced.

McGonagall gazed at Harry. Her eyes were bottle-green and clear, like a piece of sea-glass laved smooth by violent waters. They were also, if Draco wasn’t mistaken, slightly soft.

“Yes,” she said, after a long moment. “There are a great many things money cannot buy.”

She flicked her wand at the nearest cabinet, which flew open. “Including,” she added, in a raised voice, “the contents of that box, upon which not a single knut was spent.”

“What box?”

She nodded to the cabinet.

Tentatively, Harry withdrew a long wooden case that was several inches taller than he was. Draco had to help him lay it out on the floor, because it was heavy: the box was rich, aromatic rosewood, so deep a red it was nearly purple, with handles of gold flecked by age. The clasps were sticky, and so it took a moment to open, but once they did Harry let out an audible gasp that Draco was hard-pressed not to echo.

It was a broomstick. A beautiful broomstick, and an old broomstick, with antique warping on the seat, brass-and-leather stirrups, and a bush that had started to thin and splinter with age. For all that, though, it had clearly been taken care of: the handle gleamed a lush walnut brown, lustrous from many polishings, and the leather grips were all brand new.

The lettering on the handle read: NIMBUS 1995.

“Oh my God,” shrilled Draco. He couldn’t help it. Harry looked at him wildly.

“It’s — it’s good, isn’t it?” he said. “It looks pretty good — it’s got nice customaries, and everything—”

“You gibbon, of course it’s good! This is the grandfather model for what I’m flying! It’s the original Nimbus!”

“The original?” repeated Harry stupidly. “There are others?”

“Merlin’s saggy wet armpit, I’m going to find my copy of Quidditch Through the Ages and beat you with it. This is the first Nimbus broom. It’s got to be nearly thirty years old. And I’m willing to bet this is an original model, based on the seams along the handle… you can see, it’s three pieces, it predates the wood-warping techniques they’d develop for the 2000… a bit less structurally sound, maybe, but unless you’re trying to hit semisonic speeds that could compromise the broomstick—”

“Mr. Malfoy,” interrupted Professor McGonagall, without so much as a blink. “You will refrain from beating Mr. Potter, now or at any point in the future. And you will recall that this box does not belong to you.”

Draco whisked his hands away, cheeks burning. “Sorry, professor.”

She was not smiling — anyone who confused her expression with a smile should be fitted for glasses — but neither did she seem displeased. In sharp contrast with her expression, there were two points of lively color dancing in her cheeks. “Your excitement is appropriate,” she said. “As is your assessment. That Nimbus was purchased within the first week of its release.”

“Merlin,” whispered Harry. He looked at her. “Is it, er… did you want to… I mean, I don’t want to assume, if…”

McGonagall adjusted her pince-nez. “What you do with athletic equipment that you find, of your own account, in the Gryffindor locker rooms,” she said impassively, “is between you and your captain. As a teacher, I can have no say in the matter.”

Harry’s jaw came close to unhinging. So, for that matter, did Draco’s.

“I can fly this? I mean, you’ll let me?”

“As I said,” said McGonagall, still very much not smiling, “I have no power to change the decisions made by any member of the Gryffindor quidditch team.” She opened the door. As she was going to leave, however, she hesitated in the doorway. She spoke with her head turned away from them, in a lowered tone, almost hushed.

“It’s tall for you,” she said. “Choke up.”

Then she vanished, and the high fast clicks of her heels were fading down the hallway.

Harry said, “Draco, look.” He was pointing to a bit of lettering on the underside of the case, near the handle. It read simply: M.M.

A beat passed.

“No,” said Draco.

“Probably not,” agreed Harry.

“It was just — a nice thing to do. Another student must have left it around somewhere.”

“Yeah,” said Harry, and then they both looked doubtfully at the Nimbus, which did not look like it had been ‘left around’ anywhere in its long life.

Footsteps swelled again in the hallway, these ones much quicker and much heavier. “OI!” roared Fred, shoving his head through the door. “There you are! Would either of you two malingering bastards care to honor the team with your presence, or shall I and the rest of Gryffindor keep tearing the bloody stands apart for you?”

“Sorry!” cried Harry, as they scrambled to their feet. “Sorry! We’re coming! We got sidetracked!”

“Oh, you got sidetracked, did you? On the way to the championship game? Well, good, you can explain all that to Oliver while he’s in recovery from his heart attack!”

They sprinted down to the lockers. They could hear the shouting through two walls and a locked door.

“THERE YOU ARE,” bellowed Oliver, as soon as they skidded in. “WHAT WERE YOU BLOODY DOING? YOU’RE NOT EVEN IN UNIFORM!”

“Long story,” gasped Harry, as he and Draco divested themselves of pants with a haste usually reserved for much more enticing circumstances. “Got here — fast as we could—”

“SLYTHERIN IS WARMING UP AS WE SPEAK! THEIR ADVANTAGE IS GROWING EVERY SECOND WE’RE NOT IN THE AIR! THIS IS MARCUS FLINT'S WET DREAM!"

"Thanks a lot, Oliver," said George. "I was scared enough to go out there without worrying that Marcus Flint wants me carnally."

"If that doesn't make you fly faster, nothing will," muttered Katie.

"NINE THIRTY! NINE THIRTY, I TOLD EVERYONE TO BE IN THIS ROOM, GEARED UP, AND WHAT TIME IS IT? WHAT TIME IS IT NOW? IS IT NINE THIRTY? ANGELINA, IS IT NINE THIRTY?"

"Nope," she said, popping her gum.

"NO! IT'S NINE FORTY-NINE! WHICH MEANS WARMUPS HAVE BEEN GOING FOR HOW LONG, GEORGE?"

"About four minutes," said George, "but honestly, Oliver, you could cut them a break. I think I spent the morning before my first championship taking an enormous terror-shit in the prefects' bathroom."

Fred and Angelina tittered. It did a decent job of breaking the ice, though Oliver was still ready to breathe fire.

"Potter got a new broomstick," blurted Draco, partially because he thought it was worth mentioning, and partially to get Oliver off their backs. Oliver broke off, heaving for breath.

"You did?" he said. "Glad to hear it. Didn't want to say so, but the Cleansweep was a bit rubbish, honestly. What'd you get?"

"It's a Nimbus. It's pretty old, but, um, it's been well taken care-of."

"Bang-on," said Oliver approvingly. "Any Nimbus can dust a Cleansweep, that's for certain. Should do you a favor, too, since Higgs is on a Comet. Anyway. WOULD YOU GET YOUR ROBES ON YOUR SODDING BACKS AND GET MOVING, OR SHOULD I STICK A NIFFLER ON A BROOMSTICK AND TAKE MY CHANCES?"

They walked out onto the field to a joyful explosion of noise. A giant paper-machê lion danced above the stands, levitated by a crowd of industrious Ravenclaws, and enormous banners bearing “GO GRYFFINDOR!” and “LIONS FOR THE CUP!” unfurled from the stands.

“And here come the Gryffindors!” yelled Lee Jordan, who was wearing a suspiciously bulky black windbreaker. “It’s Potter, Bell, Johnson, Malfoy, Weasley, Weasley, and Wood! This is the best team that we’ve seen in some years, folks, and that’s with most of them on Cleansweeps. Potter’s not on his today, though, looks like he’s upgraded, thank Merlin— though not sure I recognize the model he’s carrying—”

He was drowned out by the roar of cheers from the Slytherin side of the stands as the Slytherin team landed in formation.

“And that’s the Slytherin team, for you,” said Jordan, with much less enthusiasm. “Higgs, Flint, Montague, Warrington, Nott, Goyle, Bletchley. Bit easier to make out than the Gryffindors, aren’t they, since they’re about two-thirds of the student body by weight.”

More boos came from the Slytherin crowd, and laughter from the Gryffindor one, though Draco thought it was a bit unsporting. He especially didn’t like how Goyle reacted when Jordan said it, which was to draw his head into his shoulders like a turtle and shrink into himself.

Theo, on the other hand, smiled and blew a kiss off his third finger in the direction of the commentator’s box. The Slytherin stands roared.

Flint and Wood approached each other and performed the ceremonial crunching of fingerbones.

Draco, standing across from Flint in the lineup, leaned over to whisper at Goyle. “Greg,” he said. “He’s only joking.”

“He knows that, Malfoy,” Theo said boredly. He whacked Goyle gently on the thigh with his club, and Goyle snickered, thumping him back. “Flint has this funny thing where he likes his players bigger than a dormouse on Growth Potion.”

“What’d you bring to the table, then?” said George, yawning.

“Not sure, but I think it’s whatever you do,” said Theo, “plus class.”

Draco had something for this, but he broke off when he got a better look at Theo’s face. A dark bruise circled Theo’s left eye, deep and yellowing in some places, green in others, a patchwork quilt sewn around the button of his bloodshot cornea.

“Good Lord, did you walk into a bludger?” said Draco. “Or twelve?”

Theo twitched his face away, irritated. “Shut up.”

“This isn’t trash talk, you prideful louse, it’s concern. Is Flint letting you play like that? Your visibility’s got to be piss-poor.”

“And it’d still put me just about level with your beaters on their best day, so why don’t you concern yourself with them, and not about what my captain’s letting or not letting me do.”

“Nott, for Merlin’s sake, you look like someone went at your eyeballs with a melon baller.”

“Would it kill you, for once in your life, to butt out?” snapped Theo. “Does it rankle your Gryffindor sensibilities to not have a finger in every pot in this stupid castle? Is it so hard for you to grasp the idea that your involvement is not only unwanted, but unhelpful?”

His first instinct was to give as good as he got. His second instinct was to wallop the first instinct in the nose and demand a straight answer. He honored neither of them.

Instead, Draco took his tongue between his teeth, and bit down until the pain flushed out the venom. He watched Theo while he waited, considering.

When he spoke, it was so quiet that only Nott and Goyle could hear, and Goyle frowned like he didn't understand.

"Why did he do it?"

Theo flinched.

"Theodore Nott? Suffer in silence? Don't make me laugh," murmured Draco. "If that was more than an hour old, you'd have gone to the infirmary. And they'd ask the same questions I did. But that's not fresh, and you're not there, so what did you say to him?"

"I—"

"MOUNT YOUR BROOMS!"

Theo jerked away, nakedly relieved. Draco swore and threw a leg over his Nimbus.

"Three… two… one…"

Her whistle disappeared into the roar of the crowd. Fourteen brooms rose into the air.

"And it's GRYFFINDOR in possession, Draco Malfoy of Gryffindor with the quaffle, headed straight for the Slytherin goal! Through Flint, but whoops, quaffle intercepted by Warrington, Warrington of Slytherin in a dead shot up the field — oh! Drops the quaffle to dodge a bludger, that's a bit of George Weasley's handiwork, devastatingly handsome chap, that George Weasley, still single, ladies, if anybody's wondering — and it's Johnson who recovers, Gryffindor back in possession, swerves Montague, ducks another bludger, and that's a shot that's a SHOT TAKE THE SHOT — SHE SCORES! TEN-ZERO GRYFFINDOR!"

Angelina swept over the Gryffindor stands, cheering, and a roar of delight followed her. A row of seventh years started doing the Wave.

That was, until Flint came careening past her and knocked into her shoulder with a painful THUMP. She screamed and nearly fell from her broomstick, only to be boosted up by Katie.

Flint spun around, waving his arms. “Sorry! Sorry, I didn’t see her!”

Draco couldn’t tell if he was serious. He didn’t seem like he was lying, but clearly no one on the Gryffindor team believed him. Wood was bellowing for a red card. The pitch fell into disarray for a moment, and Hooch whistled for a halt.

A moment later, a beater’s bat smacked into his skull, driving his nose into the handle of his broom. Draco winced.

Fred Weasley swooped past, empty-handed, to recover his bat. “Sorry, sorry!” he snarled at Flint. “Didn’t see you!”

“MISTER WEASLEY!” Madam Hooch shot between them, pumping on her whistle, while Flint clutched his bloody nose and wailed. “That’s quite enough! Yellow card to the Gryffindor beater, for deliberate damage by improper means! And penalty shot to Gryffindor for incidental damage by negligence!”

“Come off it, Miss!” howled Fred, but Madam Hooch blew her whistle. She threw the quaffle to Draco, who caught it and zipped off to take the penalty.

“Come on, Malfoy!” yelled Jordan. “YES! HE’S BEATEN THE KEEPER! TWENTY-ZERO TO GRYFFINDOR!”

Harry swept by Draco and slapped him on the back with a breeze of laughter. The boy was speeding like the blazes, churning wind on the Nimbus ’95, his hair raked back over his head. The broom was too big for him, but that only let him zip around faster, his body arched down over the broomstick in a single clean line. Draco didn’t envy the Slytherin seeker, Higgs, who had to strain to keep up with him with his greater bulk. As he watched, Harry spun up into a dizzying corkscrew, bent himself in an inverted U over the field, and then soared back for the ground with a giddy WHOOP, WHOOP that all but taunted Higgs to try to follow.

Show-offy prat. Draco couldn't help but be proud.

Professor McGonagall had a front row seat in the faculty box, sitting between Jordan and Professor Snape. Her face, naturally, revealed nothing, but she was watching Potter as if he were the only player on the field.

"Gryffindor in possession, back to Slytherin, back to Gryffindor, and it's Katie Bell, Katie Bell for Gryffindor, damn fine chaser, damn fine, she's dodging Flint — YOU FILTHY SCUM!"

Montague blocked Katie, and instead of seizing the quaffle had grabbed her head. Katie spun into a somersault in the air and barely kept ahold of the broom. The quaffle dropped into Warrington's hands. Madam Hooch's whistle rang out again as she soared over to Montague and began shouting at him.

A minute later, Katie put their second penalty past the Slytherin keeper.

"THIRTY-ZERO! THIRTY! HOW DOES THIRTY TASTE, YOU DIRTY SONS OF—"

"Jordan, remember our conversation!"

"But 'dirty' is a technical term, professor!"

Draco took the lapse in play during the quaffle repositioning to fly close to Theo.

"Nott," he shouted, "be reasonable. None of your bludgers are coming close—"

Theo whirled, nearly taking Draco out with a swing of his club. "Get out of my airspace, Malfoy, or I'll tell Hooch you tried to foul me," he snapped back.

“I’m trying to help you! You can’t see out of that eye! Forget the bludgers, you can barely fly!”

“I don’t care! Piss off, or I’ll take a page out of your beater’s book!”

Theo whirled his bat into position to make good on the threat. It would have seemed more menacing if his voice hadn’t been so desperate.

Hooch’s whistle screeched again, and they tussled out another brief round of scoring, swapping the quaffle back and forth across midfield. Gryffindor scored twice before Draco could get near Theo. This time, one of his bludgers had veered wide, and nearly taken out Cassius Warrington.

“Nott,” he shouted again. “You’re listing. You’re slow. You’re right-handed! You hit to your left side, which you can’t bloody see!”

“I can see you well enough to hit you!”

“If you crash, Pansy will kill both of us, and then my mother will find something creative to do with our corpses!”

This, at last, seemed to give Theo pause. The mention of Narcissa had him pulling up and scowling at Draco as if he had thrust a rank-smelling fruit under his nose.

“What do you care?” he shouted.

“What do I — what do I care? What do I CARE? How about I don’t want to see you maimed, you noisome twat, God knows why! Because I don’t love the thought of watching you punch yourself a new nose on a goalpost! Because, for some irrecollectable reason, my mother likes you, and if you make her cry I will quite simply not invite you to the family séances. God, Daphne likes them dumb, doesn’t she, you’re as thick as— oh, hell.”

Theo had nearly fallen off his broomstick.

“WHAT?” he bellowed at Draco.

Hooch piped her whistle. “Malfoy, stay away from Nott!” she shouted. “No foul play!”

“I didn’t,” Draco cried indignantly, but she was already zooming away: Goyle had nailed a double-hitter of bludgers at Wood, which caught him in the stomach, one after the other. He reeled in the air, clutching his stomach.

“YOU DO NOT ATTACK THE KEEPER UNLESS THE QUAFFLE IS WITHIN THE SCORING AREA! Gryffindor penalty!”

Angelina scored. Sixty-ten. Fred Weasley pelted a bludger at Warrington, knocking the quaffle out of his hands, and Alicia seized it and put it through the Slytherin goal. Seventy-ten. The Gryffindor crowd was screaming itself hoarse. Draco was off his rhythm, too focused on following Theo to pay attention to the movement of the quaffle. Anyway, it was Harry’s game, now: if he caught the snitch, that was the match and the Cup.

Draco passed the quaffle to Angelina, and the crowd gave a howl that was wildly out of proportion to the quality of the pass. He spun around in time to catch Harry shoot overhead, putting on a great burst of speed, his hand outstretched. His heart jumped, and he let out a shout, ready to cheer.

A bludger hurtled into Harry’s gut. Harry shouted and slid backward on the broomstick, his momentum jolting him forward so hard that for a second he was bent double. The sound of the impact was sickening. The strap for his glasses snapped, and they went twinkling into the air below.

Katie yelped and dove to catch them, while Harry slowed to a halt and clutched his stomach, gasping.

Every eye on the pitch whirled on the source of the bludger, and every eye saw what Draco did: Goyle and Theo, having a heated argument in midair.

“FOUL PLAY!” Lee Jordan was howling into the megaphone, dancing out of Professor McGonagall’s reach. “OBVIOUS FOUL on the seeker! YOU DIRTY MEAN LUMP—”

Professor McGonagall didn’t even bother to tell him off. She was standing up, her hat abandoned, her face white as marble.

Heart racing, Draco scanned the pitch. Who could help him? Who would? To them, he was the Slytherin beater. They couldn’t give a damn if he got hurt or not.

But then again, he thought wretchedly. Then again. Maybe — maybe, sometimes, people could surprise you. Maybe.

“George,” he shouted.

George swept to a halt, hovering alongside him, and raked back his sweat-soaked hair. “Wotcher, Blondie,” he panted. “You alright?”

He pointed at Theo. “The Slytherin beater can’t see,” he shouted. “He’s blind from his left eye. If he gets clipped, he might fall.”

George grunted, waiting for the point.

“I don’t — it wouldn’t be — it’s not fair, is it? He’s playing with a bad eye. We shouldn’t let him — listen, Weasley, would you — I know it’s a lot to ask—”

George squinted. “I know him,” he said sharply, after a moment. “That’s the kid who came to our party. Theodore Snot.”

“Yes!”

He scratched behind his ear. “He’s a Slytherin.”

“Then he’s been punished quite enough, don’t you think?”

George massaged his chin. “You know,” he said to Draco, almost conversationally, “he did laugh at the Snot joke.”

Katie tossed the glasses to Fred, who zipped up to Harry and pressed them safely into his hands. There was a brief exchange that Draco couldn’t hear; Fred touched Harry’s shoulder, and Harry nodded. Then Fred shot off again, his bat outstretched in a deadly angle to his body. He swung at the bludger, sending it hurtling back towards the Slytherins, towards Goyle — but it was Fred, Draco knew, and Fred’s signature move was a backhand that spun wickedly, that spun so hard it banked the bludger in a sharp rightward curve at the last moment — devilish hard to beat, especially if you couldn’t — if you couldn’t see from your left eye—

“NOTT!” he bellowed.

Theo turned his head in time for the bludger to crunch into it.

He floated free of his broomstick, his limbs slack and unmoored to the broom. The collective gasp nearly shook the stands: it was very rare for a bludger to hit so squarely. Fred must have assumed that Theo would duck.

Draco thought he could hear two women screaming, although that was, of course, his imagination. There was no way he could pick their voices out at this distance.

He threw himself forward and started to accelerate, but he knew at once that the math didn’t work. He was too far, and Theo too low to the ground, for him to make any difference. He had caught Harry, once, on a wing and a prayer and some very unsafe flying; he couldn’t make the same magic work twice.

Head lolling, Theo tipped backward and crumpled off his broomstick. The Slytherins erupted in screams.

And then George Weasley swept up from below and caught him in his arms.

Now everyone was screaming. The Slytherins were screaming in relief; the Gryffindors were screaming in confusion; Wood was screaming, too, possibly from both. Madam Hooch was blowing her whistle at anything that moved.

“That’s WEASLEY, GEORGE WEASLEY, with the save,” Jordan said, faint with bemusement. “He’s got Nott, taking him back to the ground… and Higgs is grabbing his broomstick… everyone’s coming down for a time-out, now…”

Draco splattered a wide radius of mud when he landed. “He’s alright?” he demanded, shouldering through the Slytherins.

George had deposited Theo, none too gently, on the ground. Theo had regained consciousness and was leaning heavily on Goyle while Madam Pomfrey checked his reflexes.

“I’m fine,” said Theo weakly, clawing his way into consciousness. “Big bloody hoo-ha, for what, I ask you — I was taking a break from the game, I would’ve been fine in a moment.”

“You pissant,” said Draco in disbelief. “You were in free-fall.”

“You can’t prove that.”

“You could have broken your neck!”

“Oh for Merlin’s sake, it’s quidditch, Malfoy, the ground has Cushioning Charms.” He shoved himself upright, grumbling. “When did you become such a girl?”

“Red card,” Flint said, as soon as Madam Hooch was within earshot. “Red card on Weasley. Did you see that? He almost killed Theo, would have killed him—”

“If not for George,” snapped Angelina, landing nearly on top of him. “And nothing about Fred’s play was illegal, Flint, which is a lot more than you can say for most of yours, so why don't you shut up and thank us for saving your player."

"Thank you? He wouldn't have been in freefall if it weren't for that bloodthirsty, mud-loving savage."

Angelina's wand was out and at Flint's throat before he could blink. He scrambled backward out of pure instinct at the look in her eyes. "Say that again," she said coldly. "Say that about Fred again, I dare you—"

"FLINT! JOHNSON! BOTH OF YOU, BACK DOWN!"

They lurched away from each other with bad grace.

"Bad behavior!" cried Madam Hooch, thrusting herself between them. "Bad behavior! Very bad indeed, from everyone, with the singular, commendable exception of Mr. Weasley! Both of you, back in the air. I don't want to see you look at each other unless one of you has the quaffle. Mr. Nott! Consider yourself benched, for your own safety."

A groan went up from the Slytherin stands: this was the equivalent of red-carding them.

"No! No! No complaints!" ordered Hooch shrilly. "Flint, you're lucky you're not facing a demerit for having him fly—"

"He's good to play, Madame H.," said Flint earnestly. "Really, he is. He'll swear it up and down."

"Like he said," Theo muttered, fumbling for his broom. "Up and bloody down."

"I'm sure he will! But he'll do it from the bench!"

The thirteen players rose into the air again. Draco deliberately didn't look at Theo, who was scowling so badly it must have made his bruise hurt worse. He did, however, throw Flint a cold glare as he shot past him on the way up.

“It’s Johnson with the quaffle for Gryffindor,” said Jordan, with a certain solemnity. “Johnson to Bell, back to Johnson, dodges smellyuglybrute I MEAN CAPTAIN FLINT OF SLYTHERIN, dodges Montague also, to the goal — and Potter comes in to block Warrington — SHE SCORES! Gryffindor, eighty-twenty!”

Harry, who had almost pelted headlong into the stands, skidded to a halt in midair, reversed, and zoomed back into the middle of the field.

Draco, who was still reeling from the play with Theo, tried to lift his hand for a pass. Katie saw, and shot it over, but he fumbled, nearly dropped it, and had to sink in the air to keep possession.

Harry was racing towards something.

Draco wove through Warrington and Montague, the ball clutched under his arm. A shadow passed over his head: it was Flint.

Harry pressed himself flat on the broom handle and spun to avoid a bludger, like it was easy, like it was child’s play. The old Nimbus gleamed in the sunlight, carrying him like a dream.

Draco flipped the quaffle high in the air, sending Flint diving for it, and swept beneath his legs. Then he banked up, sharply, and tweaked the end of Flint’s broomstick. Flint yelled and tumbled sideways, rolling. Draco caught the quaffle.

Cheating wasn’t bad form if the other person cheated first. That was as good as in the rulebook. He was pretty sure he’d heard George say it, once.

Or maybe Flint just should have minded his mouth about Fred.

Harry threw himself forward, both hands off his broom. But Higgs was coming in from the other direction.

Draco swept up and almost careened into Goyle, who came in swinging his bat.

Harry knocked Higgs' arm out of the way and lurched into midair.

Draco pulled up short and punted the quaffle as hard as he possibly could.

"YES!"

The stadium exploded. Harry soared above the crowd, shaking something tiny and golden in his fist. The quaffle soared free and was caught by Angelina, who hocked it carelessly into the stands and shot towards the Gryffindor goal hoops, where all members of the team were rapidly converging. Draco, grinning, flew to join them.

Wood was on his knees in the mud, his arms out as if awaiting divine abduction, tears flowing freely down his face. His body quaked with great ugly sobs for the five unhindered seconds before Fred plowed into him at full speed and drove him to the ground in a bruising embrace. Then George came down bellowing on the pair of them, and Angelina and Katie leapt on, too, and Harry dropped in on top, splayed over the pile of limbs. Draco landed just aside this horrific eldritch amalgamation of limbs and house spirit, and said, smirking: "What was that about Marcus Flint's wet dream, you s—"

But he never finished, because a hand lashed out, and he was hauled in by the robes, yelping.

Inside the team hug it was warm and sweaty and smelled profoundly bad. It sounded like several people were crying; Wood was at least two of them. There were many people touching Draco at once, and he did not care for it at all. He barely enjoyed hugs with people of his own choosing on good days. This was far from being even that tolerable. It was an imposition into his bodily autonomy, for one; for two, it was damned uncomfortable. He squawked as his face got mushed up against someone's collarbones, and an elbow drove into his stomach.

Then again: they had won the Cup. So.

Draco sighed, and went limp. Some things had to be tolerated.

The hug dissipated after too many damn minutes, and he saw that the crowd had flooded the field. Percy was hopping around like a jubilant rabbit. Their former quarrel long forgotten, Ginny had climbed her older brother like a limpet to use as stilts, and now rode on his shoulders, waving a giant Gryffindor flag and screaming. Next to Lee Jordan — who had leapt onto the microphone podium and ripped open his windbreaker to reveal a ‘GRYFFINDOR RULES’ tee-shirt underneath it, roaring — was McGonagall, who had not even reprimanded him, for she had buried her face in a red-and-gold handkerchief.

And at the head of the crowd rushing to greet them were Ron and Hermione. Ron, greeting a pile that was thirty percent Weasley already by composition, simply bellowed and threw himself into the team hug, which welcomed him noisily and immediately. Hermione, however, came rushing up — her eyes were red from crying again, but not from sadness, he didn’t think — and threw her arms around Draco’s shoulders.

He staggered back.

“Granger, Potter is over there,” he said, jerking his thumb at the pile. “The bloke who won the Cup. Caught the snitch and everything.”

“For the last time, I don’t care about quidditch,” she said, though her voice was thick. “This is for not dying.”

“I… well, alright then,” he said, trying not to sound too pleased, and consented to fifteen generous seconds of submersion in Hermione’s riotous sweet-smelling hair.

When the crowd thinned enough to leave the stadium, they were marched back to the castle amidst a parade of red and gold. Draco felt odd and surreal and the levels of good cheer that were being leveled at him: almost everywhere he turned, someone was clapping or flashing him thumbs-up. Someone actually went so far as to ruffle his hair, but when he whipped his wand out to eke satisfaction from the vile offender, they had melted into the crowd.

The whole school roved up the lawns to the castle in good spirits. But they stopped when they reached the entrance courtyard, milling around in a maze of bumping shoulders.

“What’s going on?”

“There’s something happening in the courtyard,” said Hermione, who the crowd had sandwiched under his arm. Someone jostled her into his ribs, and he gave them a rough shove back, clearing a small bubble for her to stand. “But I can’t see — can you?”

“No, I can’t, besides which there are about sixteen different people touching me. I’m sick of this. Let’s clear a path.”

He pulled out his wand; Hermione gave a squawk of disapproval; he rolled his eyes and said, “Relax, would you, I’m not going to maim anybody,” and cast a small Buffeting Charm into the crowd before them. Then he grabbed her arm and pulled her quickly through the gap, before the crowd could close up again.

In the courtyard there was a Shield Charm and a Muffliato cast around it, which meant they couldn’t hear what was happening, merely see it. The sight alone was dreadful enough, however. Sibelius Nott stood by the fountain, a stone-faced auror at either flank, holding a scroll of paper before him like an oustretched knife. Opposite him was Albus Dumbledore — looking angrier than Draco had ever seen him — and Professor Lupin, whose expression was in contrast rather calm.

“Can you hear?” hissed Hermione. “I can’t hear, can you?”

“No, they’ve got a Muffliato over the courtyard.”

“Can we get inside it?”

“Maybe if we had the Cloak, but it’s up in the Tower. Shame we can’t cast a Disillusionment Charm.”

“If only we could! Ugh, I’m such a nitwit, I spent all summer reading the Runes textbook, when I could have been doing something actually useful, like next year’s Charms—”

“Don’t beat yourself up, everyone needs some light reading,” Draco said absently. “But Nott’s leaving. Suppose we’ll have to ask Lupin himself.”

He was right. Nott took his leave of the courtyard with a flare of his purple cape, which Draco found horrifically pretentious and obviously wanted to copy for himself as soon as possible. When he crossed the threshold, the Shield Charm and the Muffliato both dropped, and he could hear the burble of the fountain once more.

Professor Dumbledore and Lupin were conversing with their heads together, a mirrored vignette of industrious woe. They scarcely took notice when Draco and Hermione appeared at their side.

“What’s going on?” demanded Hermione. Lupin had the scroll from Nott, and he held it away from his body as though it contained poisonous ink.

“Professor Lupin is taking a brief sabbatical,” Dumbledore said calmly. “A successive strain of illnesses have taken a toll on him. He will be retiring for an interminable length of time to his quarters—”

“It’s alright, Albus,” interrupted Lupin. He sounded tired. Lupin never sounded chipper, exactly, but now Draco feared him likely to keel over, so heavy was his tone. “Ms. Granger and Mr. Malfoy are trustworthy students. I have been placed under house arrest.”

Hermione shot upright like someone had sent a Petrificus straight up her spine. “For what?”

“Suspected contact with Sirius Black,” he said, with a hoarse irony that was almost amused. Draco glanced at Dumbledore, whose weathered face revealed nothing. How much did the old man know? How much had Lupin revealed?

Hermione said sharply: “On what evidence?”

“On the evidence that we were childhood acquaintances,” said Lupin reluctantly. “And on the evidence that dementors report sighting Black on the premises of Hogwarts; on the evidence that I am, of course, the most likely to have abetted his crimes—”

“That’s nothing!”

Draco jumped. Hermione radiated fury like heat. If she were capable, he believed venom would have flown from her lips. “That’s nothing! That’s so far below the threshold of reasonable suspicion it should make you laugh! Who’s your solicitor? Draco, can you call that man — Gamp, or Gunt, what was his name?”

“Gatz, yes. Easily done. I’ll owl him tonight. Unless the professor has someone he prefers.”

Lupin pinched the end of the paper and rubbed it between his fingers. “There are other charges.”

“Well? What are they?” Hermione planted her hands on her hips.

Draco interrupted, “Professor, does the Ministry think you have lice?”

It was hard to tell whose expression was stranger: Hermione, who apparently thought he had started talking in French, or Dumbledore, who thought it more like Ancient Greek.

“There are reasons for them to suspect it,” Lupin said quietly.

“What reasons? Good reasons? Standard-of-proof reasons?”

“They have… testimony from an old acquaintance of mine.”

“Does your ‘acquaintance’ have proof, then?” said Hermione.

Lupin shrugged. “As much as one ever can,” he said evasively. “Of course, if they had proof, one wonders why I was not arrested... nevertheless, I believe they take his word very seriously. If you will excuse me—”

He lifted his chin, and Draco turned to follow his gaze over his shoulder. A pair of aurors stood in the entryway to the courtyard, their hands clasped behind their backs.

“I have an appointment to keep,” said Lupin dryly. “I believe I was told that if I cooperate, they shall find no need to employ Veritaserum. Albus, you will find my lesson plans in the upper right-hand drawer of my desk. Please make the next third-year class as engaging as possible; I promised them something entertaining.”

“Don’t,” Hermione broke out. “Don’t go with them. Don’t let them interrogate you! What about Pad—”

“Albus,” said Lupin, authoritatively, and Dumbledore settled a hand on Hermione’s shoulder. Hermione broke off as if someone had cut the strings of her throat.

Lupin limped across the courtyard, a short walk made longer by the slow scrape of his cane and his bad leg against the cobblestone. Then the aurors flanked him, and taking him each by an elbow, they escorted him back into the castle. The doors swung shut with a sound as cold and final as a key turning in a lock.

Dumbledore waited until Lupin was gone to release Hermione’s shoulder. “Miss Granger,” he began, soft as velvet.

She twisted out of his reach and grabbed Draco’s hand. “We have to go,” she gasped. “Sorry, professor — I know it’s rude, but it’s really urgent — Draco, come on—”

For once, he didn’t resent her hauling on his arm like he was a reluctant oxen. He gave Dumbledore a short nod and ran after her, his long legs easily keeping pace with hers, as they flew up the stairs to the castle and careened through the double-doors.

As soon as they were out of the crowd, Hermione spun around and dragged them into a secluded alcove under a window. “Lupin,” she whispered.

“Yes. I know. They know. It’s obvious, I was right there with you—”

“But no proof—”

“They only suspect.”

“They’re going to question—”

“With Veritaserum, you damn well know it—”

“Doesn’t matter what he says—”

“—wouldn’t pass up the chance, never mind that rot about ‘cooperation.’”

“Yes! I know! But even if not—”

“Magical Security Act means he’s got the Trace on him,” he said darkly. “He’s trapped in the castle. He can’t reach Padfoot. He can’t warn him.”

“Yes, but the important part—”

“Is the interrogation will reveal Padfoot’s location, I know, I told you, I’m not Potter or Weasley, you don’t need to explain it to me—”

“No! Listen to me! The important part is the house arrest!”

He broke off. Their breath was coming in such short sharp bursts that it fogged the windowpane beside them.

“Why,” he bit out, aggrieved by the indignity of asking. He hated when she got somewhere before he did.

She didn’t notice his acrid tone. Her face was drawn with terror at whatever realization she’d come to while he was busy blustering like a ponce. “It’s a full moon tonight,” she whispered.

A bolt of fear sank deep into his gut.

“And he’s not—”

“No.”

“Even with the potion—”

“All they have to do,” she said, with remarkable evenness, though her voice was trembling, “is wait in that room with him. That’s all they have to do.”

He threaded his hand into his hair and gave a brutal, grounding tug. “Alright,” he said thickly. “So. What do we do? We have to get him out—”

“We have to take the potion, is what we have to do,” she said. “Tonight. And when he transforms—”

“Sirius won’t leave without him.”

“Sirius doesn’t know about it,” she said quietly. Her eyes were dark and clear with diamond-hard focus. It was sort of mesmerizing. “We’ll try to get the aurors off of Lupin, of course we will, but we only brewed enough potion for each of us to get two hours. If we can’t get him out, we’ll have to — I mean, Sirius is the one who doesn’t have protection. I don’t think — I have to believe that Dumbledore won’t let Lupin come to harm while he’s at Hogwarts.”

He nodded.

“Do you — do you think I’ve got it wrong?” She twisted her fingers, as if trying to wring out her indecision through her knucklebones. “Do you think I’m being cruel? To Lupin? I mean, we do have the potion — we might be able to, to, I don’t know, go get him first, and then take him, and—”

“You haven’t got it wrong,” he said. His hand closed over her fingers, stilling them. They were warm and soft, never having wielded anything tougher than a quill. “It’s brilliant. We’ve got it worked out. All we have to do is execute.”

“That’s the part where it always goes wrong.”

He drew his hand away quickly. Wouldn’t do to stand there holding her hand like a sappy twat. He wasn’t bloody Sir Luckless.

“Less of this dour nonsense, Granger, or you’ll put me right off the affair. I’m not in the business of investing in bad ventures. Remember what I said. When in doubt, just think: I’m marvelous.”

“Thank you, yes. When I’m running from a horde of dementors with a werewolf and a wanted criminal, and I’m trying to cast a Patronus, which, for the record, I have never done, I’ll just think, oh, you know, Draco Malfoy is perfectly marvelous!”

“First off, I’ve heard of worse ideas. But no, you horrible ninny, I meant you.”

And then he gave her a good-natured yank on her hair, hard enough to sting, so she didn’t think he was going soft or something. The sound she made ought to have been worth a Patronus all on its own.

-this one goes out to everyone who liked the quidditch game in chapter 23. brought to you buy: a useless amount of research about what would even constitute a "foul" in a game this dangerous. these guys live in a pre-CTE world, babey.

-professor mcgonagall continues to be my favorite teacher because she has an immaculate poker face but underneath it she goes harder than literally any professor ever has. why does everyone make fun of dumbledore for child endangerment when mcgonagall gives a first year a BROOMSTICK and lets him play in a league against SEVENTEEN YEAR OLDS. put some respect on her name. no one does it like her.

-in case it confuses someone, "sir luckless" is a reference to a Beedle the Bard story, but I won't say which one.

-someone had a question in the comments about whether hermione would have a time turner in this AU, which I'll answer here because it carries zero risk of spoilers: she doesn't! mainly because time travel plots are insanely difficult to write, and I hate them. I don't like how POA has Harry and Ron just sort of ignore Hermione going absent for certain periods of time, and I think it's unrealistic that she would be able to hide it from them for that long; at any rate, in this fic, Draco definitely would notice. and with respect to this story's continuity, it would not make sense for Hermione to need one, since she doesn't end up taking Divination (that comes up in Chapter 17) or Muggle Studies, which frees up her schedule.

-Also, less relevantly, I think the existence of time turners pushes the suspension of disbelief in the HP universe a biiiiiit further than I'd like, for preference; i.e., I think too many necessary plot developments (both in the canon storyline and before) would realistically be obviated by the existence of a time turner. secondary to that, I don't really even think the time turner was necessary to solve the problem in the original POA book, since I can think of a dozen other ways that Dumbledore could have helped out Harry and Hermione in saving Buckbeak and Sirius, if he really wanted to.

-thank you to all who commented — i read all of them! new chapter going up next week. things are about to get hairy. wink, wink.

Hello, Old Friend

Chapter 28: Hello, Old Friend

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

They went to dinner with everyone else, but none of them felt like eating. The greatest hallmark of their low spirits was Ron, who took three piddling bites of his beef wellington, pushed it away, and said, “Can’t, my heart’s not in it,” with the grief of a dying prince. Draco quietly Vanished his plate out of dignity, and Hermione did not even bother to fill hers, but drank four cups of coffee with sugar and nibbled a bonbon until she jittered like a screaming kettle.

After dinner, they went straight to Myrtle’s bathroom. Harry had stuffed the Cloak down the front of his robes (“Congratulations, mate, you’re finally out of training bras,” said Ron) and Hermione carried a laundry bag of old robes that had been left behind in the laundry rooms.

The potion had congealed to a sort of brick roux at the bottom of the pot, burbling and glutinous. When Draco gave it a testing stir, it clung to the stirring wand like a thick mud. Black smoke rose in tight coils like crimped hair. Every so often a bubble floated to the surface and caved with a wet plorp.

Myrtle floated above them, her chin pillowed in her hands. “Eugh! Yee-uck! What is that? It smells sim-ply aw-ful.”

She was absolutely right, but Draco ignored her. “Weasley, you’ve got the goblets?”

Ron pulled out a set of glass tumblers from the Great Hall that had found their way into his bag.

“Good. Potter, the hairs?”

“Got them,” he said, fumbling out a few vials from his pocket. “I tried to keep track of which one was the woman. I’m sorry, Hermione, I think it’s this one, but I can’t be sure.”

Draco ladled helpings of potion into each glass and held one up to the light, flicking it with his fingernail, until the portion leveled out. “A hair in each,” he ordered.

The first frothed and turned a sour snot green; the second waxed yellow like bile. The third turned the color and consistency of sour milk, and the final glass was a deep reddish brown, like clay.

“Yum yum,” said Ron grimly. “Some nightcap.”

Hermione shook out the laundry bag on the floor. “I Transfigured some Ministry robes,” she said nervously. “They’re a bit shabby, but between the fabric and a bit of patch-up sewing, they should hold for the night. They don’t have the crest, though, so I hope nobody looks too closely.”

“They won’t,” said Draco. “Our faces will be proof enough. Potter, who’s each hair from?”

“Me? Oh, I don’t know.”

Draco, who was still holding the ladle, reminded himself strongly that he did not believe in corporal punishment. “You collected them,” he gritted out. “How can you not know whose hair you were yanking?”

“How was I to tell? I don’t know any of them! You and Ron were off with Daphne.”

“You didn’t think to check— no, never mind. There’s no use now. We know one of them’s Orpheus Greengrass, I suppose; we’ll just have to hope that another isn’t Sibelius Nott, since he happens to be still lurking around the castle.”

They each took a glass. Ron and Harry took the blue and green, respectively; Hermione reluctantly accepted the yellow, and Draco took the red.

“Remember, it has to be all of it,” he ordered. “Otherwise you won’t get the full two hours. When we’re done transforming, we’ll have to move quickly. And remember, you’ll be acting as purebloods, so you have to really sell it: keep your noses up, keep your back straight, and if anyone asks you what you’re doing, the answer is always who’s asking.”

The others nodded solemnly.

“Well,” he said bleakly, “sláinte, as my father would say.”

He threw back his Polyjuice Potion in a long double-pull without coming up for air. It tasted like rotting fruit, a sweetness so intense it tipped into sourness. He gagged and forced himself to swallow, which, aside from staring down Quirinius Quirrell and apologizing to Hermione Granger, was a dead ringer for the hardest thing he had ever done.

Polyjuice was a fast-acting potion; inside a minute, his guts were writhing as intensely as a pair of copulating snakes. A searing burn emanated from his stomach out to the surface of his skin, which began to bubble as if it were hot wax. Ron said thickly: “I think I’m gonna be sick,” and ran into the nearest stall.

“Yeah,” said Harry, “Me too — uh oh—” and he flew into the one beside him.

“Don’t throw up,” Draco ordered, speaking thickly through the horrible quakes of nausea that were rolling up from his throat. “If any of you throw up, after I — ugh — spent a month on that bloody potion — ah —”

He dropped to his knees. His legs were growing, his hands thickening, the nails widening in their beds. His robes stretched taut and split at the seams; he shucked them hastily, along with his pants, before he split those, too. A final peal of nausea drove him to the sink, gasping; and then it was over, as suddenly as it began.

Myrtle, in the background, was wailing. “Horrible,” she cried. “Oh, you horrible, horrible boy — you vomited on me!”

“They’d better not have,” said Draco, in a voice he didn’t recognize. It was deep and throaty, with a twang of London, rather than his usual Wiltshire drawl. He brushed back a sheaf of mousy brown hair around his eyes and checked the mirror. In doing so, he had to swallow a sigh of grief: gone were his fine white locks, his father’s eyes, his mother’s graceful nose; in their place were the cartoonishly square features of Garrett Goyle. A box of a jaw jutted under a hard, deep brow, and his hair was longer on the top than on the sides of his head; he recalled that Garrett usually wore it in a topknot.

Despite the hideous downgrade in appearance, he grinned. It worked. It had worked. He, Draco Malfoy, had brewed a N.E.W.T.-level Dark potion on a portable cauldron in a corner of a girls’ bathroom — admittedly, with help from Hermione — and it worked perfectly.

“I’m a sodding genius,” he breathed, touching his weathered cheek. In a better world, he would’ve had time to dash down to Snape’s office and boast till he was blue in the face.

“You three alright?” said a thin, elderly voice. In the mirror, Draco saw Brutus Travers hobble out of the bathroom stall, wearing Harry’s glasses. He was holding a lump of tattered clothes tactfully in front of his unmentionables. “Er, Malfoy, is that you?”

Draco, realizing that he was perilously unrobed, immediately hocked a set of robes over his shoulder and wrestled on some pants. “It’s me,” he said, unsettled by the deep pitch of his own voice. “Potter, looks like you got Travers. He’s a retired veteran from the Bureau of Curse Breakers. He used to be on track to become an Unspeakable, but he resigned to join the Dark Lord. He mostly does philanthropy now."

"I'm a former Death Eater?" said Harry, repulsed.

"Barely. Travers was old when my father was gestating, I daresay he never cast more than a Stinging Hex in the Dark Lord's name — oh, there you are, Weasley. You remember Orpheus."

Ron crept out of the stall, tottering around like a newborn giraffe on his newly-elongated limbs. Watching Daphne's father smack his head into the stall crossbar was, admittedly, very funny, though Draco had to execute a sharp pivot to avoid getting intimately acquainted with the Greengrass family jewels. "Granger, you alright?" he called.

"Yes," said a low woman's voice. "Can you — can you pass my robes over the stall, please?"

They did, and she emerged, a round-faced blonde woman in the shape of a pear, with sallow cheeks and stubby fingers. Draco almost didn't recognize her without all the work she'd had done.

"Did you boys manage to… oh, you're tall," she said in alarm, craning her neck. "Goodness. Didn't I grow at all?"

"Not much," said Draco frankly. "Constance Crabbe is a short woman. If we see anybody, I'm Goyle, and that's Travers and Greengrass."

"If we all know each other, oughtn't we be using our first names?"

"Not in front of other people. Besides, you and I had a fight about a year ago, and I don't think we've spoken to each other since."

"Oh, dear," she said, tucking her wand into her robes. "Won't people be confused, seeing us together, then?"

“Possibly,” he said, with a flat look at Harry, “which is why it would’ve been ideal for Potter to ask me before he went around filching follicles willy-nilly. But it can’t be helped. Come on, we’re burning minutes. Are we all presentable? Robes on? Good, and don’t forget — Weasley, what did I tell you about the tie?”

They cracked the door of the bathroom, checked that the coast was clear, and set off.

“Stop doing that with your hands,” he muttered to Hermione.

“Stop what?”

“Fiddling with them. Constance Crabbe went to finishing school, she knows better than that.”

“Oh. How’s this? Better?”

It wasn’t. “For Merlin’s sake.” He grabbed her hand and clamped it down on his arm, where it couldn’t distract either of them. “There. Hold on, and don’t look so worried. These people don’t have to worry about anything, remember? Your biggest problems happen in the Society pages of Witch Weekly.”

Her fingers dug into his forearm. She lifted her chin and flattened her mouth into a puffy pout.

“Not bad, but make it richer.”

She lifted her nose.

“Even richer.”

She lifted it more.

“Perfect.”

They went down the marble staircase. The way out of the castle took them past the Defense the Dark Arts classroom, and as they passed the door, Harry lagged behind.

Draco was the first to notice. “Travers,” he said warningly, and when Harry didn’t reply, he hissed: “Potter!”

“He’s stuck in there with the aurors,” said Harry, lingering outside the classroom with the pie-eyed longing of the hopelessly orphaned. “We look like we’re Ministry. We could walk in and tell them to leave.”

“Potter! No! The plan! Stick to the plan!”

“Sorry,” he whispered, and then he vanished into the classroom.

“You’re retired!” Draco shrilled at the closed door. “You can’t give orders! You’re not an employee, you— you—”

“But I am,” said Ron quickly. “I’ll run in and back him up.”

“No!” Draco was whisper-shouting at the top of his register, which hurt his throat. “Weasley! Stop! You don’t even know what department you work in!”

Ron gave a roguish little half-shrug, which looked utterly bizarre on Orpheus, and followed Harry.

There was nothing else for it. He let go of Hermione’s arm and hurried after him.

Harry was locked in argument with a pair of aurors at the door to Lupin’s office. “And I’m saying I need to talk to him,” he croaked, in a not-terrible impression of a crotchety old man. “I don’t care what you have him doing, I have important business! Business I can only discuss with the suspect!”

“Roger that,” announced Ron, striding up the aisle. “Travers and I have an important message.”

Draco wanted to concuss him with something. Roger that? Roger that?

“We’re under orders from the Minister’s Chief of Staff,” said one of the aurors, a mean-looking fellow with a prominent wand holster on his hip. The spikes on their coats made them seem taller. It wasn’t that Draco was intimidated, he was just observing a good design choice. “We don’t move until dawn.”

Draco shouldered Harry and Ron out of the way. ““And who do you think sent us here but Lord Nott? He requires both you in the Astronomy Tower,” he snapped. “At once. It is a matter regarding—” What would Nott care about? “—the escaped convict. Sirius Black.”

“Why wouldn’t he send for us?” said the other one, with all too reasonable skepticism.

He pitched his voice into its most nasal register. “Do I seem like I dribble my hours away contemplating the motivations of Lord Nott?” he snapped. “Is it for you or I to question the right hand of the Minister? I have done my duty, sir. You do yours.”

The aurors glanced at each other. Their expressions were uncomfortably knowing.

One auror reached out to touch Draco’s arm. “Sir—”

The door burst open, and in flew Constance Crabbe, breathing as if she had just done two laps up and down the grand staircase. “HELP!” she screamed, pointing at the doorway. “Help! Help! Please, help!”

“Mrs. Crabbe,” exclaimed one of the aurors. “What’s wr—”

“DEMENTORS IN THE CASTLE!” she shrieked. “Dementors in the castle — they must have seen Black!”

“What! Where?”

“I don’t know where it is now,” she screeched. “It was headed for the dungeons! Are you just going to stand there, or will you do your job?”

One of the aurors swore. “I told Nott he shouldn’t have brought those overgrown blankets to the castle. Never send a creature to do a wizard’s job, I said.”

“Yeha, well, you go and take care of it. I’ll handle the werewolf.”

“Fine. Tell Lord Nott where I’ve gone.”

The first auror jogged out of the room, leaving them alone with the other. Draco wracked his brains. Harry mouthed, ‘Now what?’ at him from behind the auror’s back, and he made a furious face back. What was he supposed to do?

“Sod this,” said Ron suddenly, and took a running leap at the auror.

“Weasley! NO!”

The auror’s shielding ward flared to life, and caught Ron with a crackle of white energy. He was thrown back against the wall, and the auror whirled on him, his wand high. Draco spat a curse and drew his wand, fired a Stupefy that fizzled against the same ward, and then two more Stunning Spells that ricocheted ineffectually against the stone walls. Hermione and Harry followed it up with charms of their own, but the auror’s warding was excellent — they were trained to deal with far worse — and his returning Stunner very nearly caught Ron in the chest.

Their one saving grace, thought Draco hopelessly, was that the auror had no bloody idea what was going on. “What the hell,” he bellowed. “What the actual hell, Travers? You were at Tracy’s birthday party—”

“And it was bloody awful!” roared Ron, shooting a Knockback Jinx that the auror cast off with barely a twitch. “I’ve secretly hated you for years!”

“Have you gone mad?”

“On the contrary! I’ve finally come to my senses!” He shot a Disarming Jinx at the same time as Harry, and with a slash, the auror dissolved both into harmless sparks — but in so doing, left himself open for Hermione’s Flipendo, which sent him bowling over the table and into the back wall.

He staggered upright almost at once, but Draco was quicker: he cast his wand at the bookshelf behind him and snapped, “Carpe retractum.”

The bookshelf keeled forward with a thunder of falling books and magical knickknacks. The better part of Remus Lupin’s considerable library descended on the auror’s head, and the iron-and-wood frame followed it with a tolling THUD and the unmistakable crack of bones.

The auror did not move.

“Bloody hell,” said Ron, in tones of awe and commingled fear. “Did you kill him?”

“Ron!”

“I was just asking!”

“I’m sure you didn’t,” Harry assured him.

“I hope not,” said Draco crossly, “but you two didn’t give me many options. At best, he would’ve Stunned you and hauled you in for questioning; at worst, you would’ve gotten a first-hand introduction to the ghoulish universe of spells they teach you in auror training.”

Hermione dashed to the office door and jiggled the handle. “Alohamora,” she murmured. It clicked open. “Oh, thank goodness. We’re lucky they didn’t hex it closed; we don’t have time to try ward-breaking, and I’m still a novice at Runes.”

“We didn’t have time for any of this,” Draco snapped, as they hurried out of the Defense Against the Dark Arts classroom. “We had two hours! Two! You'd better hope that everything goes as smooth as butter with Padfoot."

Which, he would later admit, was the sort of idiotic fortune-tempting that made him, too, partially responsible for all that would transpire.

They descended a winding staircase and jogged along the narrow hallways leading towards the entrance. In this part of the castle there were few windows, and the torches burned low, leaving wide shadows on the stone floors. The hallways were mercifully empty, since most of the students had retired to their commons.

In an alcove by the door, however, their luck ran out. A pair of students were engaged in heated whispering under the sconce, and with horror, Draco recognized both of them.

Daphne and Theo were bickering as though it was their last night on earth to air out their grievances.

"—right, I don't care what they say! He's a Hogwarts professor—"

"—course he is, but there are things—"

"So tell me!"

"I can't! It's more complicated…" This was muffled. "...want to end up like me."

"Don't you try to tell me… more pain in my life than you're capable of imagining."

"—don't want you to be… would have done worse…. think he'd do to you?"

"I don't care! And I don't care if he is, anyway! Blood purity, blegh... Half the purebloods in Slytherin… out of a paper bag!"

"You don't mean that."

“I do! Oh, but I do! I would rather live in a box and snog a muggle than than have to marry some rat-faced incestuous pureblood prat —”

“Don’t say that. Daph, don’t you say that ever.”

There was a scuffle, and a squeak. Then a pause. Draco held out his arm, sequestering the four of them behind a corner.

When silence fell, he crooked his fingers, and they swept into the hall.

Daphne and Theo whisked their wands away from each other's throats and hid them behind their backs.

“Dad?” said Daphne.

“Mr. Greengrass,” said Theo, with a cool mouthful of snide. “Mr. Goyle. Mrs. Crabbe. Lord Travers. What brings you to the castle tonight?”

Daphne stepped forward before Draco could answer. “Is Astoria alright?” she said, rigid with dread. “Dad?”

A beat of silence.

Draco angled his wand behind his back and covered a Stinging Jinx with a sneeze. Ron yelped.

“She’s fine! She’s fine. She’s alright. Er… resting,” he said, massaging his rear. “Listen, we’ve got to go… kiddo. We’re here on Ministry business. Top secret.”

“Oh,” exclaimed Daphne. “You mean you… you’re going to—”

Theo hauled her back by the elbow, a movement made brutal by haste. “Daphne’s had a long night, Mr. Greengrass. I apologize most sincerely for her impoliteness. I’m taking her back to the dorms so she can rest.”

“Don’t touch me! Dad, is it true? You’re going after—”

Theo’s strength surprised him: he hauled her up by the waist and bundled her down the nearest set of stairs. “We’ll be off, now,” he said loudly, over Daphne’s yowl of fury. “Give my regards to your families. I sincerely apologize for disrupting your evening.”

“Theodore,” said Draco. Theo blinked.

“Your eye looks brutal, boy.”

“Ah, yes. I walked into a hippogriff,” said Theo crisply. “It was my own mistake, sir, I was looking for your son.”

Ron developed a suspicious rasping cough, and Hermione thwacked him punishingly on the back.

Draco drew his wand. “Come here,” he ordered.

Theo turned the color of maggots. “I’m sorry, sir, I didn’t mean it.”

“Come here, boy.”

“My father is in the castle. I’ll tell him — I swear, if you hurt me, he’ll know—!”

He threw up his hands as Draco pointed his wand at his face. This made Draco vaguely sad for reasons that he had no desire nor time to examine.

“Episkey.”

The ring of purple around Theo’s eye receded, replaced by a clean pucker of healed skin. It wasn’t the best job in the world — Draco wasn’t a dab hand at healing spells — and there was still some bruising around the socket, but it was much improved, and it no longer made Draco want to gorge by looking at it.

Theo stared at him, agape.

“Do you mean to catch flies?” He swept his hand at Theo. “Make yourself scarce.”

Theo didn’t bother with thanks. He dashed down the stairs after Daphne, leaving them free to exit the castle unobserved.

The sun had set, and the sky glowed with the cool blue light that always lasts for twenty minutes or so after nightfall. The trees rose in a black wall to the west, and the moon sat full and gleaming over the turrets of Gryffindor Tower. A dementor drifted across it, giving a distant, lonesome moan.

More of its kind floated in a train of ghostly black silhouettes over the lake. Two drifted in the arms of the Whomping Willow, and a handful scuttled along the mist-clad grounds near the Forbidden Forest.

“Patronuses,” whispered Hermione. “Harry, Ron — Draco, if you can —”

Draco, swallowing, drew his wand and thought of dinners on his private beach with Theo and Pansy. “Expecto patronum.”

It didn’t work, but he knew it wouldn’t. He couldn’t picture Theo’s face without seeing the black eye.

“That’s alright,” Hermione said bracingly. Her attempt hadn’t worked, either, and he took comfort in that. If Hermione couldn’t do it, it usually wasn’t worth doing. “Two should be enough; they shouldn’t come near us, anyway, unless we provoke them. Come on.”

They made it to the foot of the Whomping Willow, whose branches shivered idly across the clear night’s pergola of stars. Hermione bent, hunting for a twig to poke the knot-hole. She let out an exclamation.

“Ron! It’s Scabbers!”

Ron gaped at her. “What are you talking about?”

“He’s here! He just came out of the Whomping Willow — ow!”

She snatched her hand back, nursing a bead of blood on her finger, and something small and furry raced between her feet. But Ron was too fast for the animal: he swept down, and plucked the fleeing rat out of the grasses. With a frantic squeak, it began to writhe in his hands.

“Scabbers!” said Ron, with more astonishment than relief. “What are you doing here?”

Scabbers looked terrible, which, considering that he was a rat, was really saying something. He was thinner than a rail, balding in wide patches (Draco had not been aware until this moment that rats could go bald), and he writhed in Ron’s hands as though in his death throes. Draco wondered if it hadn’t been a mistake not to let Crookshanks at him.

A rustling came from the base of the Whomping Willow, startling them all, and a black dog came tearing into the moonlight with a deafening snarl. Draco actually leapt back at the slavering snap of its jaws, even knowing it was Sirius: the ceaseless growls that tore from the creature’s chest made his guts turn to jelly.

At the sight of them, he gave another monstrous snarl, and dropped into a crouch, preparing to lunge.

“Sirius!” Harry gasped. “Sirius, it’s me, Harry — we took Polyjuice — we’re not Ministry, we’re your friends! We have to get you out of here!”

But Sirius paid no attention to Harry. His yellow eyes fixed unerringly on Ron. He prowled forward, his growl increasing with every step.

“Sirius?” said Ron weakly. He crept back. “C’mon, Sirius, it’s me… Ron… I know I’m ugly at the mo, but it’s temporary…”

“Sirius,” Hermione interrupted, “we’re here to rescue you. We have to get you somewhere safe. The Ministry’s searching the grounds.”

She reached out, and he snapped his jaws at her. With a squeak, she whisked back her hand.

“What’s wrong with him?” she whispered. “Is he alright? Doesn’t he recognize us?”

“Maybe he doesn’t, as a dog,” said Ron. “Maybe he can’t understand what we’re saying. My mum told me once that Animagi lose parts of themselves in the transformation...”

“Did she say how to make him transform back?” whispered Harry.

“Yes, there’s a spell for that,” said Hermione, wringing her hands, “but we haven’t learned it. McGonagall told me about it after the lesson on Animagi… it’ll be on the O.W.L…”

“Good to know,” said Harry flatly. “Remind me to put that on my study guide, if I’m alive tomorrow.”

“Don’t snip at me! I’m just as scared as you are!”

“STOP!”

All four of them spun around. Even Sirius stopped growling. Draco gave a thin groan of horror.

Daphne Greengrass was limping down the lawn at top speed, and quite possibly breaking a land speed record for the use of a cane. Her jaw was rigid with determination.

“DADDY!” she shouted, tripping down the uneven slope. “I want to speak to you! You must listen to me!”

“You’re joking,” wondered Harry.

“Ron, do something,” hissed Hermione. Ron made an outraged choking noise, which, Draco supposed, did technically satisfy her request, just not in a particularly helpful way.

As she drew up on them, she staggered in the wet grass. “Dad,” she said, breathless from exertion, “they’re going to go after Professor Lupin. You have to stop them.”

Ron’s jaw fell open.

Ron greeted her declaration with a weak: “Fair enough, then.”

She had been filling her lungs for a sequel. At his acquiescence, they emptied, abruptly, with an amusing whoosh. “Good,” she said fiercely. “So you’ll speak to Lord Nott?”

“Sure,” said Ron thickly. He was struggling with Scabbers, who was meanwhile going completely beserk, twisting and flailing in his hands. “Sounds great, honey. Now, would you get back to the castle? We’re kind of busy with something here—”

He gave a shout and dropped his rat. A ring of bloody toothmarks scored his hand. Scabbers tumbled into the grass.

Sirius lunged, knocking Ron and Harry aside. Draco stumbled back with a cry, and the rat screeched, burrowing into the long grasses and fleeing as fast as he could. “Sirius!” Ron bellowed, chasing them. “Sirius, stop! That’s my rat!”

“Sirius?” Daphne said. Her eyes were so wide they could fit moons in them. “As in Sirius Black?”

Draco seized Daphne’s arm and shook her. She squealed in fright. “You need to go back to the castle, now,” he snapped. “You’re in danger.”

“Mr. Goyle?” She could not have been more confused if Albus Dumbledore had appeared on the back of a unicorn. “Lord Travers? What are you all doing?”

“Ministry business,” said Harry, the Boy Who Lived To Be Unhelpful.

With a triumphant roar, Sirius pounced on Scabbers, who gave a scream and darted back under his legs. The dog’s gnashing jaws closed once, twice, over the place where he’d been, and a moment later, the rat sprinted out from between his paws. And then—

Then, something happened that made Draco wonder if the whole night had been an awful dream.

As if caught in an Engorgement Charm, the rat began to grow. A head shot upward from its tiny neck like an inflating balloon, and four limbs sprang from its tiny sockets. The fur shrank into its skin, and a thin crop of colorless hair sprouted around a wide bald patch on the head. The rat finally took the shape of a short, thick-waisted man, though something rodent-like remained in his narrow face and watery eyes, which darted here and there between the four of them.

He threw back his head and gave a mighty caterwaul.

“HELP!” he screamed. “HELP! HELP! IT’S SIRIUS BLACK! HE’S TRYING TO KILL ME! HELP! HELP!”

“Stop him, someone’s going to hear,” hissed Hermione, and Draco, his wand moving before she even spoke, threw a Silencio at him. But the damage had been done. As one, every dementor on the grounds began drifting towards the Whomping Willow.

Draco, in reflecting on his life and the many opportunities he had to die in it, would have preferred almost any of them to this.

For surely it would have been better, he thought, as the swarm of dementors descended on them, to die in a quidditch game, saving Harry Potter’s life; or to die in the Forbidden Forest, with one quick flash of a Death Eater’s spell; or to die in a vault below Hogwarts, at the hands of the Dark Lord himself; or anything, really, rather than to have his soul ripped out and eaten in the company of a murderer, his cousin, and four of his doomed friends.

When the dementors started moving, a spell of horror had frozen them all to the spot. Sirius was the first to act. He transformed back into a man, erupting in a riot of black hair and shabby robes.

Daphne let out a scream.

“That’s Sirius Black!”

“Enchanté,” snarled Sirius, whipping out his wand. “Patronuses, now, all of you, if you want to live.”

He whirled his wand in a familiar hand movement, and a familiar quadruped beast erupted from its tip. It landed, snarling and corporeal, on the ground before them and paced restlessly as the dementors drew closer. Harry and Ron cast their own, too, and their clumps of white joined the beast.

One of the dementors, testing its limits, gave a groan and dive-bombed the patronus, flinging itself against the silver beast. The beast snarled and lashed with its claws, and the dementor screeched as the light fell on its withered skin.

It swept away as quickly as it had come, and the others formed a ring just out of the Patronus's reach. Draco watched his breath turn to fog in the air before him, and his skin tingled with the beginnings of a familiar chill.

"Testing us," said Sirius grimly. "Stay strong… oh no you don't!"

The rat-man had been slinking back towards the Whomping Willow. Sirius whirled and snarled a curse that made ropes burst from the end of his wand. They snared the man and knocked him to the ground, where he fell, thrashing and moaning.

"No! No, help me," he wailed. "Harry… please, help me… he's going to kill me, like he killed J-J-James…"

"Really, Peter?" Sirius strolled forward, twirling his wand through his fingers. "Begging for help from a child? I suppose I shouldn't be surprised; you always did like to hide under James' skirts."

"You're Peter Pettigrew," said Harry, astonished. "You... you betrayed my parents."

"Yes," said Sirius grimly. "And he's going to die for it."

Harry startled. "What?" he said. "Sirius, no—"

Pettigrew shrieked and struggled against the ropes.

"Sirius," said Hermione urgently. "Your Patronus."

It had disappeared when he cursed Pettigrew. Without the silver beast to protect them, the only Patronuses were Harry and Ron's thin incorporeals, and the dementors were beginning to test them. They crept forward to the radius of light cast from Harry and Ron's wands, hissing and probing the barrier with their shriveled fingers. They were much closer than they had been when Sirius was there.

"In a moment," said Sirius. His eyes were glued to Pettigrew as if they were the only two creatures alive. "It'll only take a moment."

With a squeal, Pettigrew transformed back into a rat. The ropes fell slack around his body, and he skittered away into the grasses. Sirius gave a roar of anguish.

“Sirius! Sirius, no!”

But it was no use. He leapt forward and transformed into a dog, and took off at a gallop after Pettigrew, baying furiously.

“No!” roared Harry. “Sirius! Stop!”

When no answer came, he whirled on the others. “He’s going to kill Pettigrew,” he blurted, tight with panic. “He’s going to become a murderer, and then the dementors will come for him—”

“Who cares about him?” snarled Draco. “They’re about to come for us!”

The dementors had sensed the vulnerability in Harry and Ron’s patronuses, and now swept closer, pressing into a tight ring. His throat closed over.

“Expecto patronum!” cried Harry. “Ron, come on! Expecto patronum!”

“Expecto,” said Ron thickly, “expecto — expecto…”

But he couldn’t do it. The dementors were closing in.

“Expecto — expecto patronum —”

Ron dropped down on his knees in the grass. Fog was closing over them, thick and white, and it was hard to tell what was natural and what wasn’t. Draco could no longer feel his fingertips.

“Dad?” said Daphne, in a very small voice. She sank to the ground beside Ron and put her hand on his shoulder. “I don’t like this. Please — tell them to go.”

Draco was sorry for Daphne. He was more sorry for himself, Hermione, and Ron, and a little bit less for Harry, who he held partially at fault for getting them all into this mess; but really, he felt terrible for Daphne, who would have done better to listen to Theodore Nott. She had chosen rather the wrong night to become a better person. She would have lived longer if she had stayed selfish.

And so, probably, would he.

“Potter,” he began, drafting a sermon on the many ways in which he would hunt Harry’s spirit across the afterlife. It clocked in at one hundred and thirty-two words, and seventeen were expletives. But Harry said, “Shut up for a second, I need to concentrate,” and Draco was so offended by his audacity that he actually did it.

Harry closed his eyes and screwed up his whole face. “Do you remember New Year’s?” he said. “New Year’s Eve, in the Shrieking Shack? With Remus, and Sirius on his violin?”

“Of course I remember it,” Draco said tartly. “It was the last New Year’s of my life, and I spent it in that hovel. I’m considering coming back to haunt it.”

“I never thanked you for coming.”

A strong contender for the saddest thing Draco had ever heard in his life, and coming in just under the wire, as it was about to end. “You poor imbecilic mutt,” he said, aggrieved. “You don’t have to say thank you for that. Have some self-respect.”

Harry smiled. His eyes were still closed.

“You’re such an ass,” he said. Then: “Expecto patronum!”

A dazzling silver animal burst from the end of his wand, enormous, with long legs and a forked coronet of antlers that protruded almost a meter over its head.

It cantered forward, regal and blazing a silver brighter than moonlight, and the dementors parted before its touch with a terrible shriek. They could not bear to touch it. Its hooves left no mark in the soft mud.

“Prongs,” whispered Hermione, nonsensically. Draco absently patted her arm. Poor thing was going mad from shock.

It lowered its head and broke into a gallop. The dementors peeled back at its approach, whirling in raggedy circles like a flock of alighting vultures. It galloped in a loop around the hemisphere surrounding them, sending dementors spilling into the night; then it whirled and cantered back, scaring off the few that had crept back in its absence to try and get at the children. It reared up on its legs, towering over them, and struck out with one powerful hoof. The dementor it caught howled, clutching its body, which — Draco stared — had started to smoke where the Patronus touched it.

“A full corporeal,” said Ron hoarsely. “Blimey.”

“Thanks,” said Harry faintly. “I’ve never… I mean, I didn’t…”

“Don’t let’s get excited,” said Draco warily. The other dementors were swooping in, and they had started to flank the Patronus on either side, boxing it in. It fended them off as best it could, but it could not be in two places at once.

“Ron, can you do one?” pleaded Hermione. “To help it?”

“I — I can try, maybe, but it’s damn hard to concentrate—”

“I know, but please — it’s struggling, anything helps—”

For the sheer number of dementors was taking a toll on Harry. A pale sheen like death had descended on his face, and long bolts of cold sweat dripped down his hair and cheeks. He was maintaining the Patronus with a viselike grip on his wand and gritted teeth, but with every new dementor, another peal of cold rolled down Draco’s back, and a fresh wave of despair broke over his head. He couldn't imagine holding onto a happy thought, now; he couldn't imagine being happy ever again. Had he ever been happy? It was hard to remember.

"Come on, Harry. You can… you can do it, just think… think about Sirius. Think about Lupin…"

A white light bloomed through the fog. At first he mistook it for the stag, but the stag was all but gone, its flickering remains struggling against the encroaching hands of a dozen dementors. The light in the distance was brighter, stronger, even cleaner than Harry's stag. It swelled into shape as it came nearer, and the four legs of another horse-like animal resolved into focus.

Galloping over the wide lawn, trailing strands of silver like gossamer, came a pure white doe. Its hooves left little starbursts of white over the lawn wherever it stepped, and its wide eyes shone with an unearthly magic light, like the eerie bloom of Lumos.

It leapt into the horde of dementors and shattered them effortlessly. The creatures shrieked and split away, steam rising from their melting cloaks. The doe rounded and made another pass, tearing into them with savage intensity, as the cold receded from Draco's trembling frame.

Now Harry's stag found its second wind. It reared up and galloped after the doe, sweeping another row of dementors back from the Whomping Willow. The sky filled with the ragged hems of fleeing monsters.

"Is that yours?" Hermione asked Draco.

"No," he breathed, pushing the sweat-damp hair off his face. It was so cold he could feel crystals of frost tangle around his ears. "I don't know whose it is."

“Don’t know, don’t care. Whoever it is, I’m going to kiss them,” Ron declared. He hauled himself upright, bringing Daphne with him, though she was in a bad way: she sagged on him almost entirely for support, her face utterly leached of color. “Let’s hurry, before they find something else to do. Daphne, er — can you stand?”

“Yes, Daddy, I… I’m sure I can… but you sound ever so strange,” and then keeling forward, she passed out.

He caught her.

“Balls,” said Ron. “That’s one more thing to worry about.”

“Poor thing,” said Hermione. “She was just trying to help Lupin.”

The grounds were very dark now; the only light came from the distant windows of the castle. The moon shimmered behind a thatch of clouds. Hermione said, “Lumos maxima,” and her wand cast a wide beam.

“Shall we go find Sirius?” she ventured nervously. “He must be somewhere out there, on the grounds.”

“Sod Sirius,” Ron said savagely, adjusting Daphne in his arms. “He left us there with the dementors. I hope they do get him, mangy old git.”

“Don’t say that, you don’t mean it!”

“Yeah? Where’s he, then? While we risked our skins to get here.” He shook his head. “Scabbers,” he muttered. “Scabbers, my rat… Peter Pettigrew… I let him sleep in my bed… eugh…”

“We’ll have time to reflect on the latent horror of your childhood later,” said Draco. “What we ought to do is get inside. We only have an hour left on the Polyjuice, if that.”

“But Sirius is still out there,” said Harry.

“So? I’m with Weasley.” He jerked his chin at Ron. “If it weren’t for that doe, he’d have hung us out to dry. And frankly, we couldn’t find him even if we wanted to; he could be anywhere in the grounds, including the Forbidden Forest. There’s not a chance.”

“We can’t just leave him—”

“Can so,” said Draco coolly. “And I will. I already volunteered to die once for my scurrilous rat of a cousin, tonight, and I shan’t be doing it again. Nor will you.”

“You’re leaving?” said Harry, shocked. Draco bristled.

“No, we’re leaving,” he snapped. “All four of us are going back to the castle. I don’t care if I have to Stun you and drag you in by your ankles. I’m not letting you kill yourself for a man who wouldn’t do the same—”

“Draco, please,” said Harry. Seeing earnest anguish on Travers’ wrinkled face made for a killer dose of cognitive dissonance. “He’s my godfather. He’s the only family I’ve got. What if — what if it was your mother?”

In terms of dirty shots, this was somewhat like bringing a rusty knife to a game of checkers. He might have expected that from Theo, or Pansy, or even Hermione, when she wanted something badly enough, but Harry Potter didn’t go fumbling for ammunition in his family history. It wasn’t his way.

“What do you mean, if it was my mother?” he snapped. “It doesn’t — she’d never put us in this position. She wouldn’t. My mother wouldn’t leave me. Ever.”

Harry shrank into himself. Another rusted knife, straight through the gut, and Draco was only a little sorry for it. Served him right, didn’t it. Teach him to start fights he couldn’t win.

“We have to do something,” said Hermione quietly. “We should get Daphne back to the castle, at least. She didn’t sign up for any kind of rescue mission.”

“If you want my vote, we carry her up, then go to Dumbledore,” said Ron. “He could do something about Pettigrew, at least.”

“That is an excellent idea, Weasley.”

“Actually — yes, it is,” said Hermione. “Of course, we’ll be in so much trouble, but maybe if we explain…”

“Trouble?” repeated Ron incredulously. “You think? We’re to tell him he’s got a murderer and Sirius Black loose on his grounds, and you’re worried about losing House points?”

“House points? If we’re lucky! Breaking curfew, attacking an auror, improper use of a Polyjuice Potion — even if it was all for a good cause, I expect we’ll be in detention forever. Speaking of which, do they let you study in detention, if you get your lines done early? I hope they do. Maybe Professor McGonagall will answer questions about the exam; then at least it wouldn't be such a waste of time.”

“You cock-eyed optimist, you,” said Draco.

Together, they hurried back up the path to the castle. As they passed Hagrid’s hut, they heard voices. A cluster of wandlights emanated through the fog from the pumpkin patch.

“Oh, damn,” hissed Hermione, drawing them back. They ducked behind the massive swell of one peach-pale pumpkin, which comfortably hid the five of them, such was its size. “Who’s there? Draco, can you see?”

Draco, un-enamored of his conscripted scouting duties, inched his head up over the pumpkin. A group of men stood amongst the squash blossoms, speaking in low voices. In front was Sibelius Nott, his hood drawn low over his narrow face. Beside them stood another Ministry official and a hooded wizard holding a long silver blade. The fourth had his back to Draco, but he was unmistakeable: it was Hagrid.

“Where is the beast?” said Nott.

“He’s — he’s in the paddock,” Hagrid croaked.

Draco whisked his head out of sight as footsteps crunched up the garden path, and he swept his hand down. The four of them ducked.

“You retain the right to hear the official notice of execution,” Nott was telling Hagrid. “You and Macnair will both sign it. Macnair, remember: one clean stroke, no dallying. The last lawsuit was bad enough...”

Draco mumbled a curse under his breath.

“What? What is it?” whispered Harry, who was at the back of the party, and could not hear.

“They’re killing something,” he replied. “One of Hagrid’s creatures, I couldn’t hear which. Could be any of them, really—”

“Fang?” gasped Hermione.

“No, I don’t think so.” Fang trotted in Hagrid’s wake, his tail between his legs. “He said it was in the paddock.”

“Bet it’s Buckbeak, then,” whispered Ron unhappily. “He keeps the hippogriffs out there, remember?”

Sure enough, Nott’s voice drifted back to them. “It is the decision of the Committee for the Disposal of Dangerous Creatures that the hippogriff Buckbeak, hereafter called the condemned, shall be executed on the sixth of May; sentenced to execution by beheading, to be carried out by the Committee’s appointed executioner, Walden Macnair... as witnessed below. Mr. Hagrid, please sign where directed.”

“Well, let's get this over with,” said the Ministry man. “Mr. Hagrid, perhaps it will be better if you go inside.”

“No, I — I wan’ ter be with him... I don’ wan’ him ter be alone.”

“We should save him,” Hermione whispered wildly. Draco snapped his head around and stared at her like she’d proposed a quick game of draughts. “We could do it now — just run along behind the paddock, and let him go!”

“Are you daft? They’d see us!”

“Not if we were quick!”

There was a rustling of pages. “Macnair, you will sign where directed, as well.”

He fought the urge to pin her down and sit on her until all endangered creatures and deadly foes had safely passed them by. “We’ve taken on enough lost causes tonight,” he hissed at her.

“And at least this way it wouldn’t be for nothing!”

He was preparing to summarily demolish her argument with a yet-to-be-identified piece of logic, but he was interrupted. Somewhere in the distance there came a long, throaty howl.

“What’s that?” demanded Macnair. “Are there wolves in the forest, Hagrid?”

“You don’ get wolves up in these parts,” said Hagrid haughtily. “They don’ take well to the weather, an’ the centaurs don’ like ’em.”

“Centaurs? What centaurs?”

“Blimey, yer green. Biggest population of centaurs in Europe lives righ’ in these here woods,” said Hagrid indignantly. “Even my firs’ years know tha’.”

Nott lifted one spindly finger, a silent order for peace. They obeyed him. The howl came again, even closer. He gave a small, horrible smile.

“It’s not a wolf,” he said. He drew his wand. “Macnair, Exavier, with me. Hagrid, we’ll be back for the beast shortly. Retreat to your domicile and lock your doors.”

“Wha’?” said Hagrid, bemused. “Where you lot goin’?”

“Hunting,” said Nott, and the three men set off into the night.

“Stop them!” hissed Hermione, as soon as the garden gate clicked shut. “Stop them, stop them! They’re going after Lupin!”

Draco said, “Fine, but what’s the pl—” and made it no further: Harry had taken off like a shot after the executioners.

“Harry! Harry, wait!”

Hermione took off running, too.

Draco turned to Ron.

“I’m going to kill him,” he said calmly. “I am. I’m going to tie him to the Whomping Willow and beat him with a Cleansweep until he’s broken every bone in his arms and legs, and then I’m going to feed him some Skel-Gro and beat him to death again. I’m telling you now so I don’t lose my nerve, later, once he’s said something sad and orphan-y. But I am going to kill him. Even if Granger gets cross with me. He’s not getting out of it, this time.”

“Move fast then, mate, because Nott’s ahead of you in the queue,” said Ron.

“A good point,” said Draco, “well made,” and he ran after Harry and Hermione.

In the shadow of the forest, they dodged skirts of dense black underbrush, and gnarled roots that surged unexpectedly from the gloom to snare their ankles. Sibelius Nott was hurrying at top speed, which for a man of his age was not very fast, and they closed the distance quickly.

“Stupefy!” hissed Draco, and a red bolt caught Macnair in the back. He went down without a sound — Hermione cast a clever Silencio on his falling body — and Sibelius, caught up in the thrill of his pursuit, never heard him fall. Then Harry cast another Stupefy that snagged the Ministry official in the shoulder, but Hermione’s Silencio went wide, and the man crashed noisily through the brush.

Nott whirled around. His eyes searched the underbrush for his comrades.

“Exavier?” he called warily. “Where are you?”

Draco ducked behind a tree, panting.

“Back up,” said Harry urgently. “They might see us.”

“Oh, God,” said Draco, mostly to himself. “Merlin. God and Merlin, together, buggering each other on a table — I attacked a Ministry official. Unprovoked. Potter, we both attacked a Ministry official.”

“I know that, thanks, I was there. Can you duck? Your head’s showing.”

“We’ve committed assault. That’s a crime. We’re juvenile delinquents.”

“What? Yeah,” said Harry distractedly. “Good thing you’ve got the lawyer from hell, otherwise we’d be in actual trouble.”

“Yes. No, you’re right, that’s true. Thank you for reminding me,” said Draco honestly, feeling much better.

Harry whacked him in the head. He made an outraged noise and clutched his skull, which frankly hurt not at all, but served as a handy metaphor for his pride.

“I wasn’t serious! We could’ve been done for just then with the dementors, and now you’re getting worried because you might get a citation? Blimey, you and Hermione deserve each other—”

“Both of you, shut up!” hissed the aforementioned girl. She, Ron, and Daphne’s thankfully still-unconscious body were crouched in a blackberry thicket. “Is he gone?”

Harry kicked Draco’s shin in a way that communicated how he, the tallest of them, should try and see.

“He seems to be,” he reported. “He’s gone off looking for Profe—Moony. Who, if he’s got any sense, has slunk off to the Shack by now, so he’ll be looking for a while.”

“Good,” groaned Ron, “because I’m just about to...” And he made a noise that Draco could have lived a glorious life without hearing, but now never could, having heard it.

Shades of Weasley red erupted through the sheaf of blond on his head, and the cartilage of his nose bent and sprouted into its normal shape. His face rippled and sank in on itself as if the flesh were melting plastic. Watching the transformation was horrifying in ways Draco hadn’t remotely contemplated while he was undergoing it, but fortunately he didn’t have to for long, because at that moment, a roil of nausea caught him in the gut, and his own face began to do the same.

“Damn — ugh — that’s our disguises gone.”

“They might as well, it would’ve been hard to explain to Dumbledore,” said Hermione, in the hoarse cadence of her real voice. Her real body was swimming in Constance Crabbe’s robes, and the high-collared blouse draped low around her collarbones, making her look like she'd been cast as a charming ragamuffin in Oliver Twist.

Harry was rifling through the pockets of his now-vastly outsized robes. "Anyone remember where I put my glasses?" he said helplessly.

She sucked a breath through her teeth. "I might have them. Check your pockets?"

"Wow, good idea, wish I'd thought of it—"

"Well, it's your own fault for not keeping track of them!"

"Shush," said Ron suddenly. Being shorter, he had shifted to carrying Daphne over his shoulder, which was an indignity Draco decided at once to conceal from Daphne all her life, as a gesture of respect. "You hear that?"

The grounds radiated the eerie quiet that only comes in perfect darkness. Bullfrogs cricketed under the lake, and wind whistled through the trees, but these were superficial noises, insufficient to melt the underlying veneer of silence that emanated from the forest and the empty lawns, the clouded sky, the curls of intruding fog.

"Patronuses?" whispered Hermione. She came to stand beside Harry and Draco.

"Yeah," said Ron warily. "Yeah, let's get those up again. Harry?"

Their spells died on their lips. A figure loped through the fog. In the billows of silken gray it was a silhouette, and then a sharper one — its progression from shroud to biped stirred first anxiety, then relief, then anxiety again — and then it sharpened to the point of distinction, and all relief died a cruel death in Draco's roiling stomach.

It was eight feet tall, with limbs that hung to its knees and claws that hung well below that, stifle-jointed legs that moved strangely, as if it wasn’t accustomed to walking on two instead of four. The hunched length of its body was unnaturally skinny around the waist and flared into a haggard, skeletal ladder of ribs, layered in waxen gray skin. Atop its shoulders drooped a canine snout and a razored ridge of yellow teeth. Its eyes were the luminous, wild yellow of rabid dogs.

Its head hung low from a ghoulish long neck, swiveling from side to side. Its nose was twitching.

It was walking towards them.

The Killing Moon

Chapter 29: The Killing Moon

(See the end of the chapter for more notes.)

Draco made all of these observations using about five percent of his brainspace; the other ninety-five was reserved for pure and mind-annihilating terror, which he thought was an impressively low percentage, considering.

“Lupin,” said Hermione, in a voice that was barely more than breath. Her choice of name was kinder than Draco’s; his mind was stalling on werewolf.

He gripped his wand. He prepared a Stunning spell that he knew very well would not work, because he had asked the werewolf who taught it to him.

The creature walked faster, its bony arms swinging horribly at its sides. Every step made something deep in Draco’s mind writhe with discomfort. It looked wrong. It looked like someone had taken a human body and stretched it like taffy, and then performed all manner of arcane curses on it. It looked like the kind of thing for whom existence itself was suffering.

“Draco,” said Hermione.

“Yeah, Granger.” His voice grated out through a thick strainer of fear, in coarse lumps.

Her hand found his. She laced her fingers through it. It brought him to bear. It brought his mind, which had been floating pleasantly somewhere between atmospheric layers of fear-based mania, back down to the earthly realm of normal, hair-raising terror. He slotted their fingers together. Squeezed. Felt alright — not great, but not like he was already dying.

Alright, he thought. There were, in fact, worse ways to die. Not many of them. But there were a few.

“In a few seconds I’m going to run,” she said calmly. “Would you like to run with me?”

“Interesting. It’ll try to run after us.”

“I know that. I read the textbook.”

“You recall, then, that a werewolf is a coursing predator.”

“Yes.”

“Meaning it likes to chase its prey.”

“Of course I do. But I read this one paper that said getting eaten has a one hundred percent mortality rate, so I was thinking—”

“Don’t get lippy, obviously we’re running, I’m just hypothesis testing.”

“Well! Thank you for your attention to scientific procedure!” she said, strangled, and it was a comfort to know they were both hysterical. “Would you care to run now, or let it get closer, and test a few more hypotheses?”

The werewolf dropped to all fours and broke into a dead sprint. They ran.

Branches splintered at Draco’s robes as they tore up the hill to the castle. A trawling finger of an old elm tore a cut in his cheek. Thorns and bracken grasped at his ankles like they longed for his fall. The four of them thundered through the forest with the grace and subtlety of a stampeding wildebeest, though none of its precious speed, and behind them the thundering feet of a baying creature swelled in volume until he fancied he could hear it slavering in his ear.

Fear did him a favor: it made him care not one bit about anything else. His trembling limbs — his legs sore from quidditch — the nausea of Polyjuice on an empty stomach — all these fell aside in a clean pure surge of adrenaline, which answered his hindbrain's call to remove this dreadfully soft mortal body from danger.

He was faster than Hermione, and so nearly dragged her through some of the dicey patches, the small ravines and ledges of gnarled roots — a felled log knee-high stood in their path, and without pausing to consult her he leapt up and swung her over by their tethered hands, jumped down, and kept running, ignoring her shriek of surprise.

Harry, meanwhile, kept pace. His lack of glasses made Draco nervous, because it gave him a tendency to stumble and run into things at the time when they could least afford it, but there was nothing to be done about it. If they survived, Draco was going to weld the stupid things into his goddamn face.

It was Ron who scared him. Ron, who was carrying Daphne's on his shoulder, and making admirable time for it, nevertheless lagged behind them, closest to the werewolf, who was faster than all of them by a margin Draco could not really bear to think about.

In the end, it didn't matter if he thought about it, because it was true. A snarl like shredding sheet metal ripped open the air, and it was joined by Ron's scream.

Harry whirled around.

"RON!"

Draco and Hermione skidded to a halt up the path, and he rounded in the grip of a dread so thick he thought he might throw up.

The werewolf stood on its hind legs over Ron and Daphne, who had tumbled to the ground in a tangle when Ron fell. Its skeletal torso heaved and swelled, and it threw back the unnaturally long column of its throat to howl.

Harry leapt forward. Draco had time for only one thought — a mental apology to Ron — before he threw his arms around Harry's waist and hauled back with all his strength.

With a bellow of betrayal, Harry was torn away from his best friend's side.

"LET ME GO! LET ME GO, HE'S GOING TO KILL HIM—"

"Yes! He's gone, he's down, it's right on top of him, do you want to die too?"

Harry was inconsolate. It was not at all obvious that he could actually process the words Draco was saying. "RON!" he bellowed. "RON! RON, GET UP!"

The werewolf lunged down. Ron, with heretofore unknown agility, hurled himself to the side and rolled into the bushes, avoiding the brutal shutter of its jaws. Harry let out a wild bleat of relief.

Remaining unmoved, however, was Daphne.

"Oh God," said Hermione in a high-pitched whisper. "Oh, God, oh God."

The creature reared back from its first attempt, snarled, and lunged again. Its jaws snapped closed, and this time, instead of the cold whisper of air, there came the wet crunch of meat and bone.

Draco could not speak. He knew that they should be running — it was almost certainly what Daphne would do, in their place — but he was transfixed by the horror of what he was seeing. His mind had deactivated itself in self-defense.

“No,” gasped Hermione. She clamped a hand over her mouth and gagged.

After several seconds of eternity, the werewolf raised its head. Viscera covered its muzzle. Draco did not, out of respect or temerity, permit himself to look down at what lay below it.

It lurched forward and roared at them. Blood and spittle flew from its jaws.

“Professor Lupin?” said Hermione. “Please—”

“He can’t hear you.”

“Professor—”

“He killed Daphne,” said Draco, hearing his own voice distantly, in all its strange calmness. Why did he sound so calm?

“Remus,” said Harry quietly. “Poor Remus.”

A candle of fury ignited at that, and he clung to it, desperate for any feeling that wasn’t dread. Poor Remus? Poor Remus! Half of Daphne was on its teeth—

The creature took another lurching step. Draco drew his wand and with his heart in his throat he prepared the last spell he would ever cast.

Which never escaped his throat, as it happened, because a jinx from behind him hit the werewolf and launched it violently into a tree.

The trunk bent. Bark sloughed. Leaves scattered. The werewolf fell in a flounder of limbs, and Draco had not the time to even turn before his sternum gave the queasy jolt of a Seizing Charm.

He sailed backwards, feet skimming over the ground, and was dumped unceremoniously on his face in the grass. A tritone of thuds beside him sounded off for Harry, Ron, and Hermione.

A black cloak flickered in his periphery. He rolled over and sat bolt upright. It gave him two wide eyefuls of a miracle.

Severus Snape always held his wand like it was a weapon. Usually, this meant it was point-down, moved little, and used sparingly. At the moment, said wand was extended fully in front of his body and aimed at the werewolf unerringly, unflinchingly, without a quiver of hand or twitch of cheek to indicate he felt anything but the impersonal disgust of an exterminator for vermin.

Severus Snape's wand was a weapon for a reason. The look on his face said the reason was this.

The werewolf stood up and staggered blearily into a curse that clipped off its left ear. It screamed and clawed at its head, ducking away, as Snape advanced.

"Incarcerous."

Ropes leapt from the end of his wand like starving cobras. One lashed itself around the werewolf's wrist and squeezed until bones snapped. The other left a red welt like a horsewhip on its chest. A third snaked up its neck, curling around its throat in a killer's embrace. The werewolf staggered and gave a howl of pain. It cantered drunkenly at Snape, who raised his hand and not his voice, and said: "Deprimo."

An invisible fist knocked the werewolf brutally to the ground. Its snout was hammered deep in the dirt and dragged through it, thrashing and yowling, as dirt and twigs splintered against its face. Its arms bent unnaturally behind its back as the force laid it flat and held it down, twitching, at the unwavering point of Snape's wand.

"Sonoraria," he intoned, in tones so calm they neared boredom.

From Draco's view, nothing happened, but the werewolf felt differently: it screamed, bucked, and clawed at its ears as if it wanted to rip them off.

Snape did a strange thing, then: he sighed. He spoke so quietly that Draco almost missed it.

“If I retained a single modicum of compassion for you, I would kill you,” he murmured. “Certainly Albus would.”

The werewolf writhed in the dirt, in great pain.

“But you should live to see what you are. It’s far too late, of course, for it to do any good. Only your last hours will be spent in contemplation of the revolting arrogance which has led you on this long path to your ruination, and has terminated, not unfittingly, with the slaughter of a child.” He paused. “I regret only that it will make your death a considerable relief to you.”

A flick of his wrist ended the spell. The werewolf ceased writhing and slumped in a shuddering heap.

Snape put his wand-tip nearly flush to its head. “That said. You will be amazed, Remus, at the things that fail to kill you.”

“So would you, Snivellus.”

And Sirius Black strode out of the shadows.

His frayed overcoat swept behind him like a mantle of raven-wings. His wand dangled from his bony fingers, loose and lazy, dangerous like a smoldering fuse. In his eyes there lay not the slightest degree of levity, nor apprehension, nor even lack of murderousness, any one of which, Draco thought, would have been welcome.

Snape didn’t turn around.

“I told him that he was helping you into the castle,” he said softly. “I told him again and again. Let me follow him, I said. Let me search the Shack. It was always your old hideaway—”

“You tried that once,” said Sirius, eyes glittering. “Didn’t think you’d want an encore, old sport.”

“I want you to know that I take no pleasure from this,” said Snape. “Albus said he was harmless. I told him he was foolish — a tame werewolf, I said, listen to yourself — and he said I had too little faith. Understand that I wish he had been right. I made the creature his potion. I gave him every possible chance. It was my own mistake to do so, though I ultimately lay the blame with Albus.”

“God, but I forgot how you could whinge the ear off a statue,” said Sirius coolly. “It’s always fascinating, watching you become the victim of all your stories.”

“But not yours,” said Snape, his voice silken. “That would be James Potter.”

The following silence could swallow a thunderclap without breaking. Sirius pointed his wand at the back of Snape’s head, and there were one, two, three beats where he visibly wrestled with whatever spell was on his tongue. Snape did not even deign to turn around.

Sirius wrenched his hand down and took a breath that shook his whole body. His eyes screwed closed, and when he opened them, they were wet.

“Yeah,” he said brightly. “Yeah. Hey, remember when you asked Slughorn to expel James for fancying Lily?” He gave a bitter grin that was barely more than a flashing of teeth. “Only good joke you ever made, to be honest. How’s it feel to peak at eleven?”

Snape whirled. His wand pointed between Sirius’ eyes.

“Give me a reason,” he murmured. “Give me a reason to do it, and I swear I will.”

Sirius stopped dead.

“Could you?” He tilted his head. “Could you really, Snivellus? You have to mean them, you know. For James, yes, I’d believe it, and Peter I doubt you'd ever waste an Unforgivable on, but I wonder if you could manage it. For me."

"You're a fool if you think I'd need an Unforgivable."

"Why? I mean, you said 'give me a reason,' but I'm sure you've got one already, or you wouldn't be here. Asking honestly. What did I ever do to you besides serve up well-earned humiliation? Or are you still nursing a grudge over a stupid prank?"

"A prank? A prank?"

His hand shook. Draco had never seen his godfather so uncomposed, and it frightened him almost as badly as the werewolf.

"You killed her."

Harry, who had begun to stir, fell still at Snape's whisper.

Draco's eyes darted to an agape Hermione, who mouthed: Her? But he didn't know who Snape was talking about; Snape wasn't married, had never been married, and had never thought about any women in that way, and certainly none that Sirius had ever killed.

"The Dark Lord was your weapon, perhaps, but it was by your hand they were slain. By your carelessness. By that flaw which has plagued you your whole life, the want of a held tongue."

Sirius startled. "No," he said suddenly. "You've got it wrong. Peter betrayed James and Lily."

"Azkaban has a reputation for infecting its residents with madness. I am not surprised that your weak mind was vulnerable to it."

"He was secret keeper! The Death Eaters got to him — it was through his mum, I figured it out — and he caved under torture. He's been living as a rat for thirteen years, but now he's here, on the grounds, and if you help me, we can find him—" He spoke more quickly, with palpable excitement. "And I'll go when the dementors come. I swear on James Potter's unavenged grave, I'll walk into the Kiss with my arms wide open, and you can watch every second, you snotty wet cack, if you just help me — and if you let me have him first."

Snape's mouth was parted.

"You are mad," he said, after a moment. "What a pathetic pair you are. The madman and the werewolf. I — you know, I actually feared you, once."

"Severus. Please."

"No," said Harry, loudly. He was standing up. His glasses were squarely on his nose. And he looked furious.

Draco realized, with no shortage of emotional distress, that he was going to have to get involved again.

"He's telling the truth," said Harry.

Sirius broke away from Snape. "Harry," he breathed. "You're alright? You're not hurt — he didn't hurt you? The dementors — I'm sorry, Harry, listen, I'm sorry—"

Harry swiftly stepped around him and planted himself between his godfather and Draco's. "He's telling the truth, and you're not going to hurt him."

"Like your father before you," said Snape, each word so brittle it seemed to splinter against his teeth, "one seems to find you perpetually enmeshed in things beyond your intelligence, capability, and right to interfere with. Step aside, or I will carry you back to the castle unconscious."

"Why don't you listen to him?" Harry demanded angrily. "He's telling you the truth! I saw it with my own eyes! Peter Pettigrew was here.

He’s somewhere out there right now, a murderer, and you’re standing around here rehashing, what, your school drama—”

“You are an ill-tempered and arrogant child,” said Snape calmly. “It is a regrettable thing to be, though not particularly surprising, considering your forebear. But it is not a death sentence, and so I will not allow you to labor under this delusion any longer. The man behind you is a murderer. He killed your father, and—” his breath hitched— “your mother. He conspired with a Dark creature to conceal his crimes, and assuredly would have killed you also, had he not managed to delude you into taking up his defense.”

“He’s my godfather,” said Harry.

“That does not matter to him. Potter, listen to me. That man is not your family. He does not love you. He does not care for you. I would wager he never even thought of you until you became necessary for his survival. Take this on my word, and I will swear it on the grave he neglected: Sirius Black has never loved any creature on this earth besides himself.”

When Snape finished speaking, Sirius looked murderous. Harry did not. Harry was unaffected.

“Yeah, maybe,” said Harry. “But the thing is, he’s my godfather.”

A shadow rose behind Snape while he rolled his eyes. “Potter—”

There was a horrible shriek. The werewolf, wild-eyed with pain and dripping blood from its jaws, lunged at him with a wild scream.

Draco gave a hoarse cry and sprang to his feet, but Sirius was faster: in three quick strides he lunged forward and transformed. The black dog hurled itself into the air and locked its jaws around the werewolf’s neck, dragging it away from Snape.

Dog and beast locked jaw to jaw, snarling, and rolled over and over in a blur of snapping teeth. The werewolf staggered to its feet, whipping its head in the effort to shake free, but the dog held fast. Black blood welled around the wounds its teeth left in the werewolf's throat. It whimpered where the werewolf's claws shred through its fur, but still, it held fast.

Snape was on his feet in a flash, and swept down on Harry. "You," he snarled, "and you — all of you are going back to the castle. Go."

"But sir—" Hermione was distressed.

"Not a word, Miss Granger."

"Something needs to be done about Daphne," interrupted Ron. He was shaking, but his voice was firm.

Snape nodded shortly. "Understood. I will deal with the girl. It may not be outside my powers to save her. But you must go—"

There was a howl and a rumbling growl; Draco turned to see the werewolf taking flight. It galloped into the forest. The dog bayed and followed, nipping on its heels.

Snape hissed: "To the castle. Go," and flew after them, his cloak billowing like the shadowy helm of a dementor.

"Sir!" Draco called, in horror. "Where are you going?"

Snape hesitated.

"Something that I should have done a long time ago," he said. "Take your friends. Hurry. Send for the headmaster; I will deal with the beasts insofar as I am able."

And he disappeared, too, into the Forbidden Forest.

There were several heartbeats of stunned silence. Four students stood alone in the forest glade, and one fallen alongside them.

Then Ron tripped over to Daphne's side. He was limping badly.

“Ron, your leg,” Harry said urgently. “Did it—?”

“Nope,” Ron said crisply. “Don’t be a worrywand, it feels like a sprain. I can still walk.” His tone was one of good-natured levity concealing extreme pain.

He knelt gingerly and gathered what was left of Daphne into his arms. “Merlin,” he muttered. “She’s — God, Lupin really… Hermione, maybe don’t look.”

“I already did,” said Hermione in a small voice.

“He’s going to kill Sirius,” Harry said.

They all turned to him.

“Something he should have done a long time ago,” repeated Harry, urgently. “He said beasts, plural. That’s not… he’s talking about Sirius. Killing him. He should’ve done it the night my mum and dad died, that’s what he means.” His hands were bundled in fists at his sides. “He would’ve done it earlier, if I hadn’t stopped him.”

“Harry,” said Hermione, “whatever you’re thinking: please, please don’t.”

He was shaking his head. “Here’s — here’s what we can do, alright, you’ve got to get Daphne up to the castle, but I’ve — I’ve got to go.”

“No, you don’t,” said Draco, dumbfounded. “That’s my godfather out there, too, with a werewolf after him, and you don’t see me swooping in—”

“Yeah, but it’s different, isn’t it?” said Harry brusquely. “You know that. It’s different for me.”

Which it was. And moreover, Harry was simply different from Draco, in a deep and fundamental way, simpler, bolder, and shinier, and Draco knew it. He had understood it so long ago he couldn’t remember when it happened.

But that didn’t mean he could go gallivanting off and kill himself.

“Potter. See reason, for Merlin’s sake.”

Harry didn’t listen. He smiled, a bit sadly, and then turned and ran into the forest.

“HARRY!” shouted Ron. He swayed to his feet, holding Daphne. “I’m going to put dungbombs in his mattress for a year. Two years! Nutter.” He looked at Draco and Hermione. “I don’t — oh, damn. Neither of you can carry her, can you?”

“With Levitation Charms, we’ll manage,” said Draco. “Between me and Granger, we could even lift Goyle. As for the matter of Potter, however—”

“No, you have to go after him,” said Ron calmly. “It’s safer with two, and I’m the only one who can carry her, plus my leg would slow you down. So it’s you two.” He shifted on his bad leg and grimaced.

“What,” said Draco.

“But you’ll make sure he’s safe,” he said sternly, “won’t you. You won’t come back without him. Because I wouldn’t.”

“I say again,” began Draco.

“Yes, of course,” said Hermione. “Only if you’re sure you don’t need help taking her up.”

Ron shifted Daphne in his arms. He glanced down at her and grimaced. “Yeah,” he said. “I reckon I don’t. She’s not fidgeting much, is she.”

“Straight to the Hospital Wing. I know we said Dumbledore first, but under the circumstances—”

“Of course, Hospital Wing, barmy. My priorities are in order, remember?”

“Well, I’m only saying that someone might try to stop you.”

“They can try,” said Ron darkly. Hermione nodded.

“Be safe, then,” she said bracingly. “And — a Patronus, maybe? For safety?”

“Oh, yeah. Good idea, Mione.” He wrestled his wand out of his pocket and managed a sloppy swish without letting go of Daphne. His bad form, Draco noticed despairingly, did nothing to impede the quality of his Patronus, which erupted more corporeal than ever: a pure silver sheepdog, which ran a merry circle around the glade and then came to nudge at Ron’s ankles, herding him towards the castle.

Hermione cooed. “It’s beautiful, Ron.”

“Not bad,” Ron admitted. “I was thinking of… well, doesn’t matter. I’ll tell you when I see you.”

He saluted. “And if I don’t see you,” he said, “then you should know, for the record — drinking that potion was the worst thing either of you ever made me do.”

Hermione laughed. Draco narrowed his eyes.

And assuming a businesslike stride, Ron loped up towards the castle, his Patronus yipping at his heels.

It was dark in the Forbidden Forest. In other news, water was wet, and Draco was going to kill Harry Potter. The moonlight filtered down distantly from the treetops, barely glancing the branches above their heads, winnowed all away by the time it reached the forest floor. Draco kept his wand lit at a low level and hung close to Hermione.

“I didn’t know that, about Snape,” she said, by and by. Though she didn’t raise her voice, it felt queerly loud in the silent forest.

“Neither did I,” he said, and paused. Perhaps it wasn’t better to admit that. He was his godson; he sort of felt he ought to have known. Hastily he added, “I knew they went to school together, of course. And that there wasn’t any love lost between them.”

“But why?” Hermione was ponderous. “Even if it is a case of school bullying, thirteen years is awfully long to hold onto it. Imagine if I was cross at — say, at Pansy Parkinson, for the next thirteen years. Enough to kill her! I don’t think I could do it.”

“Are you?”

“Hm?”

“Still cross at Pansy.”

“For calling me a mudblood?” said Hermione coolly. “I don’t know, I have a sort of sensitivity to it, Draco.”

“Right. Fair enough.”

“If she apologized, that would be one thing,” said Hermione absently, peering into a glade. They were winding downhill, on a path that scissored back and forth across one side of a small valley, and at the bottom there was a river that fed into a lake. “I don’t believe in… indelible sins, and such… everyone should get a second chance, but that doesn’t mean…”

“That doesn’t mean you have to like them. I understand.”

“No, that’s not it. I’d forgive her, I suppose, she’s only twelve, and she had a hell of a year — but she never—” She pulled up short. “What’s that?”

A creature cantered through the clearing. It had the body of a horse, the head of an eagle, and the eyes of an instrument of war. A broken chain dangled from its neck.

“Buckbeak!” said Hermione in delight.

“Ah,” said Draco calmly. “Good. Another thing that wants to murder us. That’s what, six? Seven, tonight? Fancy we can set them all against each other, and have a tournament.”

It gave an inquisitive screech as Hermione stepped into the clearing. She swept into a deep bow, after one heart-pounding moment of which Buckbeak sank to his scaly knees.

Miraculously, it remained there when she picked up its chain. “It looks like someone went at this with bolt-cutters. Hagrid must have freed him when the Ministry people left.”

“Marvelous. Once again, Hagrid is a friend to all beasts except humans. Get clear of him, would you? I like the number of limbs you’ve got, it suits you.”

“No,” she said incredulously. “We’ve got to help him.”

He tried not to whinge. “You’ve said that about half the things that’ve tried to kill us tonight!”

“Oh, don’t be such a wuss,” she said, uncannily channeling Ron. “Besides, if we run into Lu… into the werewolf again, then I bet you’ll be glad to have Buckbeak around.” She fumbled somewhat with its chain, and then — he squawked in fear — swung her leg over its back. “Hop up, come on!”

“No.”

“Draco Malfoy, stop whinging and get on the hippogriff!”

“It wants to eat me!”

“No, it wants to eat corn and dormice,” she said primly. “Which you’d know, if you paid attention in Care of Magical Creatures!”

“I was busier trying not to get eaten in Care of Magical Creatures.”

“Would you hurry? Harry’s out there somewhere, and he’s all alone!”

This was a clumsy hail mary, but it worked. “I’ll say this, and you can ruminate on it while we’re getting gored to death. You don’t get those kinds of teeth from eating dormice,” he muttered, but he begrudgingly swung his leg up and settled himself gingerly behind her on the hippogriff’s back.

“You have to hold on to me.”

“Oh, now she’s an expert on hippogriff riding, what can’t she do—”

“It’s like tandem riding a broomstick, idiot, you’ll slide off if you don’t have a hold. Put your arms around my waist. Surely you remember?”

She was far too smug. Something had to be done about her ego, or it’d soon collapse the gravity of the planet.

He put his arms stiffly around her waist. She let him hold onto the chain, which made him feel better, and then flicked the chain to start the hippogriff, which made him feel worse. It hissed and cantered forward, a jolting, horribly bouncy ride that made him feel like he was strapped atop a stagecoach going over lava fields.

“Ow! My head!”

“Just hold still, honestly—”

“You hold still, if it’s so easy.”

“—not my fault it’s moving around, hold on better—”

“Fine,” he snapped, and he hauled himself forward until his knees slotted around the outside of her thighs. “There. Happy?”

She squeaked. “Good,” she said thinly. “Just fine, so long as you stop complaining.”

The hippogriff trotted smoothly through the midnight forest. The rhythm of its gait bumped Hermione’s back against his chest, and he resigned to ignore it, along with the way the wind whipped her hair against his face, and the way his arms got sore from holding himself against her. The whole thing was dashed uncomfortable and not at all how riding horseback had been advertised to him — but then, most horses didn't have the will to power.

They reached a lip overlooking the lake, and Hermione cast Lumos. The light filtered down over the little bowl of the valley, revealing a black span of water, a thin slice of pebbled beach — and on the other side, two figures, hunched low in the reeds, their faces indistinct. A silver stag paced in the air beside them, its head high.

"Harry? Harry!"

"Shh, don't bring the whole forest down on us."

Hermione did not answer but did what he considered possibly the only stupid she had ever done: she nudged Buckbeak's side with her heels.

Buckbeak squawked and leapt straight into the dark air. Draco let out certain sounds that did not bear repeating and clung to it with every ounce of strength quidditch had ever imparted. This was a good deal more than Hermione had, who launched heedlessly into screaming as soon as they took flight. He clapped a hand over her mouth and wrapped the other one around the chain, and with gritted teeth, he held on for her sake, too.

The great wings pumped powerfully beneath them. Air and water rushed under their feet as Buckbeak glided over the lake, which drifted up beneath them quickly — too quickly — Draco thought for a sickening moment they were going to plunge inside — and then it was pebble and grass, and its claws touched down with uncharacteristic grace in the dirt. The creature galloped to a halt, and Draco wasted no time in vaulting as far away from its back as he could.

Hermione hunched over on its neck, trembling. "Oh, no," she said. "I didn't… oh, I really didn't think it would do that. Had no… no idea."

He patted her on the leg, still doubled over for breath. “Not one word,” he gasped, “about quidditch. Ever. You madwoman.”

She gave a stifled whimper and slipped down. He reached up to catch her and lowered her onto the moss.

Hermione took a deep breath and knocked her head against his collarbone. He looked down, surprised.

“Interesting,” she said. “I — do you know, I hate flying? All flying. It’s not just broomsticks, I’ve recently discovered.”

“If it keeps you away from hippogriffs, I’ll take the good with the bad.”

“Yes. Certainly. Mm. Let’s… oh, Harry, is he…”

They turned to the figures on the beach. It was Harry, bent over a shabby man in a coat, facedown.

Hermione said a word that made Draco snort in appreciation, and raced over to his side.

“Harry! Harry, are you alright? Is he…?”

Harry lifted his face from Sirius’ cloak. His cheeks were wet. “Snape went after Lupin,” he said hoarsely. “He hit Sirius with… with some sort of curse, I don’t know what, but he isn’t waking up.”

“Ennervate.”

“Tried that,” croaked Harry, as the spell vanished ineffectually into Sirius’ chest. “Whatever it is, it doesn’t respond to the counter-jinx. I dunno how to wake him up, so I’ve just been trying to keep the dementors away.”

“We’ll take him up to the castle, and Dumbledore can have a look,” said Hermione seriously. “There’s not a spell he can’t undo. Or Madam Pomfrey. Ron’s already gone up with Daphne—”

“You said Snape went after Lupin?” Draco said queasily. That his godfather was quite probably one of the strongest wizards alive did not enamor him with the possibility of his facing off against an angered werewolf.

“Yeah. Remus threw Sirius off, and then Snape hit Sirius with a jinx — I think to hold him in place — and ran after Lupin. I think he meant to come back for Sirius once he’d… once he’d…”

“He’s not going to kill Lupin.” Hermione rubbed Harry’s shoulder, bracingly but perhaps none too comfortingly, as if she were trying to scrub his anxiety out of his skin. Nevertheless, Harry seemed calmed. “He said so, didn’t he? He wants Lupin to stand trial, for…”

She trailed off and traded a hopeless look with Draco. There was no way to frame what Lupin had done in any way that would exonerate him. If he was lucky, they’d only give him the Kiss. If not, then Snape was still right — there was a lot that happened in Azkaban that didn’t involve death.

Draco said, as tactfully as he was able: “He’ll have the chance to defend himself.”

“But it’s the Ministry’s fault,” snarled Harry. Draco and Hermione both startled. “If he hadn’t been trapped in his office, he’d have taken his potion, and he wouldn’t — they wanted him to transform, they were baiting him — I bet they wanted someone to get hurt, so they could —”

“Even if you’re right, they were probably aiming for the aurors, not the students,” said Hermione quietly. Both boys looked at her. “That would be much cleaner. He transforms, attacks an auror, they subdue him, he goes to Azkaban. That’s what I — that’s what someone would do, I suppose, if they wanted to entrap him.”

Draco inclined his head at her curiously. She shrugged.

Draco thought that philosophically there was a great deal of ground they had yet to tread before they could come anywhere near that conclusion, including a discourse on the question of moral culpability in altered states and what was a reasonable expectation of risk, but the time for none of it was now. “Let’s get him out of here,” he said, nudging Sirius’ head with his boot. “Least he’s not killed anyone tonight. Not for lack of trying.”

Together, he and Hermione lifted Sirius with a pair of Levitating Charms, and maneuvered him onto the hippogriff. Harry mounted its back and tied himself to Sirius with the length of the chain, fastening their waists together. “If he starts to slip, you should let him fall,” warned Draco. “No use going diving for him, he’s probably survived worse.”

“And you should go straight back to the castle. If you see Lupin—”

“No matter what Snape’s doing to him, mind—”

“—let him be,” Hermione finished.

Harry raised an eyebrow at their little vaudeville act.

“Aren’t you two coming up?”

“No,” said Hermione.

“No,” said Draco passionately.

“I don’t think so, actually, thank you.”

“We wouldn’t fit.”

“I’m sure Buckbeak has a weight limit,” Hermione demurred.

“Even two was a strain.”

“In fact I thought he was a bit slow, don’t you?”

“You know, Granger, it was the first thing I noticed.”

Harry snorted. “Thank you for coming,” he said. “I wish I could — you’ll be alright, going back?”

“Harry, of course we will,” said Hermione warmly, with a confidence that Draco didn’t feel at all. “It’s only a short walk, and there’s two of us. Take Buckbeak, really.”

She sounded confident enough that Harry seemed mollified.

Draco added, “And if you don’t stop thanking me for things like Christmas parties and not letting your godfather perish of his wounds, Potter, I swear—”

“Alright,” said Harry, grinning. “Alright.” He turned to his Patronus. “Er — stay with them, will you?” he asked it. “As long as you can.”

The stag snorted and pawed the ground with its silver hoof.

“I think that’s a yes,” he said, after a moment. “I’m not really sure. Okay. See you two soon; hurry back! I’ll tell Dumbledore to send someone out to help. Or Hagrid, if I see him.”

“Bully,” said Draco dryly. “Saved by invasion of the blast-ended skrewts.”

Harry waved good-bye, brushed Buckbeak’s flank with his ankle, and the creature galloped off into the trees.

The stag remained with them, watching a bit quizzically as its owner disappeared.

“Question,” said Draco.

“Yes.”

“That business about ‘a short walk,’ and ‘it’s fine, there’s two of us’ — that was bluffing.”

“Of course it was. We’re alone in the woods with a werewolf and a murderer, there could be four of us and it wouldn’t matter. And it’s twenty minutes to the castle, at least.”

“So. We’re still in mortal peril.”

“Oh, some sort of peril, probably,” she agreed.

He took a deep breath.

“They should have an option to list you as a cause of death on autopsy reports.”

“What! Me! What did I do?”

“Ask Saint Peter. If you’ve anything to say about it, I won’t live long enough to get the job done.”

They cut a crescent path along the lake, their way lit by the glow of Hermione’s wand and the silver stag. It was silent except for the crunch of gravel and the whisper of running water. “Who do you think sent the doe?” Hermione wondered.

He shrugged. “It could have been one of the Ministry’s.”

“You think Sibelius Nott can produce a full corporeal?”

“He’s a powerful wizard. You don’t get to be the Minister’s right hand unless you’ve got chops. Why wouldn’t he?”

“But he’s so cranky!”

“So’s Weasley, before he’s had his breakfast. That’s nothing to do with it. I’m sure there are some terribly cranky people with beautiful Patronuses. Patroni. Patronae?”

“Patronudes,” mumbled Hermione, which he resented himself immediately for laughing at, as it was highly dumb and also swotty, and neither was to be encouraged. Nevertheless, she looked pleased. “And I suppose you’d better hope so.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?”

“You know.”

The leaves overhead whistled in the breeze. Shifting clouds threw layers of gauze and silk over the opalescent moon. They followed the brook through the forest until it widened, and fed into a thick stream that slipped through winnowing trees and onto the round silver plate of the Black Lake.

“But we’re on the other side of it, now!” said Hermione excitedly. “We came in at the other end. Did Buckbeak take us that far?”

Draco shivered. “Space can move differently in magical places, Granger. Best not to think about it.”

The friendly lights of the castle glimmered through their white stoles of mist. A distant, crooning howl wavered in the air. They both fell silent, though it was so far that there was no chance of them being overheard.

“At least he’s alive,” said Hermione after a moment.

Draco did not comment on the fact that this was the kindest thing either of them could think to say about him.

There was movement in the reeds ahead. Draco put a finger to his lips, and they crept forward with their wands extinguished, stepping softly on the gravel beach. Harry’s Patronus fell in step with them, queerly silent.

It was a man, laid on his back in the clump of bullrush. He was groaning and holding his leg as if someone had put an awl through his knee, although the moon gave insufficient light to see if it was merited.

“Help… help, oh, help… help me…”

“He’s been hurt,” whispered Hermione. Draco, keenly aware that this was Hermione’s trigger phrase for unwise action, held his arm in front of her.

“Hold on. Can you see his face?”

“No; can you?”

“I think it’s Pettigrew.”

He was in a sorry state: the right leg of his trousers was stained all through with blood. His face was smeared with mud where he had been rolling at the lake’s edge. He had attempted to bury himself.

“Black must have gotten to him, after all,” he said.

“Or Lupin,” said Hermione. Her tone was strange: she was staring at Pettigrew with intense and ungenerous scrutiny, like he was an Arithmancy program she’d twice gotten wrong.

“What.”

“Nothing. It’s just… it didn’t occur to me before, but that’s… that’s the man who killed Harry’s parents.”

“In a manner of speaking,” he said, thinking once more that there was philosophical ground left untilled on the subject; but then she raised her wand, and he squawked, grabbing her wrist. “Granger! What are you doing?”

Her eyes blazed. “He’s an evil man.”

“I’m not sure evil is a useful — never mind that. Think strategically. If we bring him in, it’ll clear Black’s murder charge.”

“The Ministry is a corrupt, backwards, bigoted, antiquated—”

“—political body with discrete, if problematic, interests, and killing innocent wizards isn’t one of them. Believe it or not, they’re not going to off Black just for laughs. Also — Granger, come off it, really, you’re not going to kill him. Not even for Potter.” He said, more quietly: “He wouldn’t want you to, anyway.”

Hermione huffed instead of agreeing.

“Incarcerous.”

Ropes erupted from the tip of her wand and lassoed Pettigrew’s hands together. He thrashed upright, shouting.

“H-h-help! He’s after me, he wants to k-k-kill me—”

“Shut him up,” Draco snarled, “he’s going to bring half the lake down on us—”

But Pettigrew didn’t need a Silencing Charm: he choked on his own spittle. His eyes had fallen on the Patronus, and they grew so large the animal could have cantered through them.

A sickly, ash-pale cast crept over his skin. He gave a horrible quake. “Oh,” he said. “Oh — oh, God. Oh, God. Oh, God.”

“What’s his problem?” hissed Draco.

“I don’t know! Search me!”

Pettigrew wiggled backwards, writhing like a worm. “No,” he moaned. “Please, please — I’m s-s-sorry, you must believe me, please! I didn’t mean it — s-s-see how I p-p-protected the boy, I t-t-tried to…”

Harry’s Patronus bucked its head mildly and took a few steps forward; in response to which Pettigrew screamed as if someone had planted a stake in his heart.

“Please! Please, Prongs!”

Hermione gripped Draco’s shoulder. “He thinks it’s James Potter,” she whispered.

And Draco saw what she meant: for in the moonlight, through tuffets of fog, to a man half-delirious with pain and the residual madness of thirteen years spent as a rat, Harry’s Patronus could very well be mistaken for a ghost.

“It was always you and me,” breathed Pettigrew. “Always you and me. First, wasn’t it? You were my f-f-friend first. The boys from the Hollow. Brothers. And, and, and I always did right by you, didn’t I, Prongs?”

Harry’s Patronus, apparently bored of Pettigrew’s whinging, dropped its head — ostensibly to sniff at a patch of grass — but Pettigrew, mistaking it for a charge, screamed and whipped out his wand.

“Draco, he’s got—!”

“I know, move—”

One of them moved first, though unclear who, because they both hit the grass in the same place more or less and knocked into each other, landing clumsily in the mud. Pettigrew’s spell lashed through the place where they’d been, sailed harmlessly through the Patronus, and struck the trunk of the Whomping Willow, where it cleaved the bark three feet deep. Draco thought of himself standing in the air where it passed just a moment ago, and went cold.

The Willow did something he had to call a scream, even though it didn’t have a mouth to scream with. All its branches went rigid at once, rising in a perfect halo around the black pillar of its trunk, where the wound wept sap as bright and red as blood. Then it whirled and, bending itself down, brought the full force of its body down on Pettigrew with a mighty WHOMP.

It was hard to describe the sound of a tree attempting homicide. In many ways it was like watching one fall, only faster, with purpose.

With a tremendous crunch and splintering of branches, the whole upper half of the tree rolled down like the mallet of God, making a noise that blotted out even Pettigrew's incoherent screaming. Draco shoved at Hermione and shrilled, "Go go go go go," feet scrambling in the slippery bank, as they careened out of the way of its hurtling branches.

Wood snapped and leaves flew. With a final groan, the Willow bent low, almost double in the middle. Some of its roots had erupted on the other side, forced up by the pressure of its exertion. The riverbank where Peter lay was covered in shattered branches, and nothing moved.

Hermione and Draco lay just clear of it, sprawled on the beaches, breathing hard. The water came up to lap at their ankles, and small red fish nibbled at the soaked ends of their robes.

"Do you think," Hermione whispered, "did he — did that—"

"Hard to say," said Draco, though he couldn't imagine surviving something like that. The tree must have weighed several tons. It was like dropping a small house on someone's head.

A coarse moaning filled the air. Black shadows coalesced in the branches of the Willow.

"They heard," snarled Draco. "Excellent. Now I'm going to die because of a vengeful tree—"

"No time! Get up!"

They scrambled up the bank. Dementors coursed over the lake, their cloaks skimming the silver face of the water. Down from the lawns they poured, too, drawn by the Whomping Willow's war cry.

“Where’s Harry’s Patronus? Did the tree kill it?”

“He must have cast another spell,” gasped Hermione. “They’re not lasting invocations, Patronuses — and you can’t cast two spells at once, that’s Merlin’s Second Law—”

“Fitting as it would be,” Draco gritted out, “I’m not going to die listening to you tell me things I already know. Did you ever, incidentally, manage a Patronus?”

“No!” she wailed. “I can’t! It doesn’t work for me, I’ve tried and tried —”

“Come off it, me neither. Maybe you can’t do it if you’ve got any brains. Nonetheless, wand up. We’ve got a few seconds left to master it in, and you and I have done much better in less.”

A thin wisp of silver escaped his wand and hovered like mist before him. At the same moment, Hermione sank to her knees in the grass, gasping for breath. A cold vise closed around Draco’s throat. He still stumbled to kneel beside her, and she gripped his arm for balance, her eyes fluttering in her fight to stay conscious.

He spun around, the familiar, icy cold penetrating his insides, fog starting to obscure his vision; more were appearing out of the darkness on every side; they were encircling them.

Hermione trailed off, teeth chattering. She slumped forward and braced herself on the ground. “I’m so c-c-c-cold,” she murmured. “S-s-s-so cold.”

“Granger. Granger,” he said sharply, shaking her. She gave an uninspiring noise of protest. “Don’t go to sleep.”

“What?”

He could barely think except to mumble, “Don’t go to sleep,” again, because something in his cold-addled mind insisted that was important. She couldn't be allowed to fall unconscious. That was paramount. That was the one thing.

White fog descended over his eyes. There was nothing he could do. He would die here, and he would die nothing, no one. His father would revile him in hell, surely, for having done so little of consequence — and to die for what? For a man he didn't even know, who his rightful family had rejected long ago, and who would probably die tonight, anyway. And he would not even have the pleasure of dying for something noble. He would die because he'd been too stupid to save himself.

What a pathetic end. What a pathetic life.

Something happy, he thought. Something happy.

Christmas at the Manor. His mother on the piano. His father's laugh. He couldn't remember that too well, but he remembered he'd liked it. His first broomstick ride: the rush of air through his robes, the ground swallowed in clouds under his feet. A fleet of boats on the Black Lake. His first spell. A troll in the girl's bathroom. Shattered toilet stalls. A smarmy little know-it-all who did everything first, best, and perfectly—

Well, of course it didn't work. That wasn't a happy memory, dolt.

Hermione let out a final breath and dropped to the ground.

"Granger. Get up. Get up. This was your idea, you don't get to… to skip out…"

His head was full of cold fog. His eyes fluttered closed.

Warm afternoons over a cauldron. Smoke rising in thick coils against a vaulted roof, sunlight streaming through frosted glass, the foul smell of Polyjuice, a witch throwing bits of paper at him. Doing it perfectly, the first time. Doing something important. You should donate your brain to science! The color of the light on her hair always reminded him of marigolds. There had been a room full of them, and they'd been sitting on a bed, talking about Transfiguration. She'd missed classes and asked him to give her the homework. He'd stolen the sweets people left at her bedside, and she'd tried to pull his hair when she found out — he held the wrapper over his head and she'd well nearly tackled him, candy and Transfiguration notebooks everywhere, and after that he'd been picking her hairs off his robes for days, in that warm, summery hospital ward that smelled of flowers.

"Expecto patronum."

From his wand blossomed a profusion of mist. It swirled together in the air over his head, gaining shape. It sprouted two wide feathery wings, a pair of talons, a heart-shaped face.

It soared high over the lake, its wings trailing ribbons of silver mist, and everywhere the mist fell, dementors scattered. The fog overhead unspooled itself and unveiled a bright bowl of stars like crushed diamonds. The air was warm again, warm like the first night of summer, warm like the nights he'd spent in the hospital wing last year.

Draco laughed, high and loud and delighted.

A fuzziness was encroaching on his head, so it was in something less than full lucidity that he congratulated himself, and scripted mentally the boast he'd make to Hermione, once she woke up. He'd done it. Exhausted, sleep-deprived, on an empty stomach and a gut full of fear, he'd done a corporeal Patronus for the first time in front of a full horde of dementors. Hermione would be eating crow for months. Hermione was going to gnaw her own teeth to nubbins with envy, and he was going to rub it in her face until she tried to kill him. Forget losing to him in Potions. Emotional magic was his bread and butter. Emotional magic was his wheelhouse. He was the god-king of incantations and alchemy and all majyyks under the sun. Oh, it was going to be so bloody good. He was going to compose an ode to himself, something full of fanfare and rhyming couplets, about how he, the brilliant and powerful Draco Malfoy, the greatest wizard of his generation, would ride eternal in the sacred bowers of living memory.

Then the greatest wizard of his generation keeled over, banged his head on a rock, and passed out.

Content warnings: Violence and gore (oblique, PG-13). Context: a teenage girl is attacked and partially eaten by a werewolf.

I'm standing by "patronudes" and owning to it. The last chapter of Book 3 will drop in a week, and I'm very excited for it. Almost as excited as I am for Book 4, which I'm halfway through and having the time of my life with. Much thanks, as always, for encouragement!

Sidebar: I'll probably bump the rating to M after the next chapter drops. While in theory "T" should cover all PG-13 material, in practice, I think most people read "T" to be a sort of "for all ages" rating, while "G" means no romance/no sexual feelings. Many people think differently, I'm sure, but the "M" rating will comfortably cover everything I plan to do, as well as all the violence & gore (which, as we all know, upticks precipitously in the second half of the series, and — without spoiling too much — will also uptick even more precipitously in this fic).

The Prisoner’s Flight

Chapter 30: The Prisoner’s Flight

He was delighted to wake up, not because he was in any particular comfort, but because it brought the relieving assurance that he was still alive. Or, if he wasn’t, then he was in some permissible configuration of afterlife, because Hermione Granger was wriggling and making the funny irritated noises that she always did when she fell asleep on the common room sofas, which meant he’d have someone around to bother for the rest of eternity.

The whole side of him was cold and achy from the pebble beach, and water lapped at his legs. He lifted his head blearily and found his face more or less submerged in a familiar bird’s nest of hair, none the more tamed for having been slept on. The front of him was wonderfully warm. It wasn’t until his head cleared that he figured out why.

Hermione had burrowed into him while unconscious — or perhaps the other way around — and his arm was thrown haphazardly across her waist, curling her spine into the hollow of his chest. Every so often she mumbled and bumped her shoulder against him, as if to check on him, which would have been sweet if it wasn’t irritating and probably the reason he’d woken up.

His face felt hot.

He blinked, twice, and then rolled over and scrambled free of her. Just like her to use him as a bloody coverlet, no mind for his comfort, and wake him up in the bargain — and how she’d managed to sleep in such apparent comfort on a bed of rocks, he had no idea. Perhaps falling asleep on library tables was a sort of endurance training.

His mouth tasted as if something had died, decomposed, and spawned a new species of fungi inside it. He climbed wearily to his feet. The sky was still dark, but an inkling of light clustered suspiciously on the eastern horizon, suggesting the time that had passed since he fell unconscious. The Whomping Willow was back upright, he noticed; the ground beneath it was scalloped and crushed, the reeds laid flat in the mud, but no one was there.

“Draco — Draco! Is that—? Draco!”

He turned, and over the rounded cusp of the lawn came Harry Potter, fresh-faced, unhurt, and dressed in his own robes. Ron followed a heartbeat behind, running freely, without the slightest mind to the injured leg he’d sported when Draco last saw him. The two dashed down the hill to the lake, beaming like hell.

Draco spared a moment of gratitude that he had woken up when he did, so they hadn’t seen how he’d slept.

“Potter!”

“Draco! Hello — what are you — oh, sh—”

Far too late to save himself, Harry saw the Stinging Jinx that came soaring up the hill. He yelped and spilled onto his back, dragging Ron down with him, and Draco stalked over in a snit of thinly sublimated murder.

“That’s for running away and nearly getting yourself killed — the first time — this is for the second — that’s for the third—”

“Malfoy, c’mon, he didn’t mean—”

“You! Off! I’m going to do you after, for making me and Granger go get him.”

“I broke my ankle!”

“Good, I’ll do your other one. Get out of the way! Oh, don’t hug me, if you so much as touch me I swear I’ll make you wish you’d snogged a dementor when you had the sodding chance—”

In the end, Draco only jinxed him a little bit, throwing several halfhearted Knotting Spells on his shoelaces and a curse that would leave his socks inexplicably wet for weeks. It was still no surprise when Harry tackled him. Ron followed and — to Draco’s slight surprise — joined in, throwing a brotherly arm around Draco’s shoulders and shaking them in a quite-glad-you’re-not-dead sort of hello.

“We’ve been looking everywhere,” Harry said breathlessly. “Hagrid’s out searching the forest; we thought you might’ve been hiding in there.”

“Please. We got bored of waiting for you slow louses, so we fancied a nap.”

Hermione opened her eyes and stretched with a yawn that ought to have cracked her jaw. “Oh, hello,” she said sleepily. “You’re here. Ron, your leg.”

“Pomfrey fixed it,” said Ron gladly, lifting his trouser-leg to show a hale and fine-looking ankle that any Victorian would be proud to flaunt. “Only sprained, she said. I let her fix me up and then I snuck out, once it felt alright.”

“Oh, Ron, you really shouldn’t do that, the healing process might not be finished, it’s not s—”

“If you say ‘not safe,’ I’m dumping you in the lake,” Draco informed her.

She sniffed and climbed to her feet, accepting his hand up. “Harry, what about Sirius?” she said. “He’s not—”

“He’s alive! I took him to Dumbledore, and we explained everything — I told him about Sirius and Pettigrew—”

“Oh, Harry, Pettigrew — he was here, on the riverbank, but the tree went after him, and we didn’t see—”

“He might be dead,” said Draco, “but if he is, his body’s at the bottom of the lake. It’ll take an age to dig him out.”

“That’s alright; Dumbledore believed us,” Harry said eagerly. “He said Lupin had given him a similar story when they spoke—”

“He knew all along?”

“No,” exclaimed Ron, “no, that was the thing; Dumbledore didn’t know Sirius was here, but Lupin always believed Sirius was innocent —”

“—he just couldn’t prove it, you see, so he was out looking for Pettigrew—”

“—which is what he was doing those thirteen years before he came to teach—”

“But he couldn’t find him, could he, because Pettigrew was living as Scabbers,” Hermione finished, with all the satisfaction of a finished problem set. “So he came to Hogwarts, and told Dumbledore what he’d been doing.”

“Only Dumbledore believed him,” said Harry. “Everyone else thought he went mad.”

The four of them stood there, breath churning into mist in the fine dawn air, with expressions of exhilaration. A fine atmosphere of triumph that lay over everything, like a layer of gilt. They had made it through the night; they were alive, and no one had died. The monsters were gone, and now it was morning again.

Draco was reluctant to disturb the tranquil atmosphere, but at length, he felt he had no other option. “That’s a fine mystery that we’ve just solved and everything,” he said, “but there’s still the problem of the Ministry.”

Three expressions deflated in the same crestfallen swoop. “Oh,” said Hermione. “Drat. Of course; I’d forgotten. Without Pettigrew, we can’t prove anything.”

“Forget Pettigrew,” said Ron incredulously, “think about Lupin. He’s done for. Once they find out about Daphne—”

His stomach clenched: he’d forgotten about Daphne.

“Is she,” he said, and swallowed. “Is she—”

“Daphne Greengrass has been admitted to the hospital,” said a calm voice. “Thanks to the herculean efforts of Poppy Pomfrey, perhaps the finest Healer currently living, she is expected to survive.”

Draco spun on his heel, wand out, more from instinct than hostility. Hermione immediately yelped and shoved his hand down, aghast beyond measure, for Professor Dumbledore sat on a stone outcropping over the lake, a train of ice-blue robes pooled gracefully behind him on the stone. His weathered face was washed full of strange serenity in the pink dawn light.

“She will!” said Hermione faintly. “That’s wonderful—”

“How did you get there?” demanded Ron.

Dumbledore smiled at this rank intransigence. “The Hogwarts Headmaster must have his secrets and bolt-holes,” he said. “Else, what reason could one have to take the job?” He inclined his head at the four of them. “Besides, of course, the obvious pleasure of watching such fine and enterprising young minds enter the kingdom of their powers in juvenile delinquency.”

For Harry, to whom male figures of authority had always and would always be a hamartia, this was a knuckleduster to the gut. To Draco, for whom male figures of authority lived in the same part of his brain as rival quidditch teams and muggle rockstars, this was a dropped gauntlet.

“Sorry, sir,” said Harry weakly.

Draco thought that he was nowhere near the kingdom of his powers, and was about to tell him so, but Hermione interjected and saved them all from the fallout. “Sir, can you tell us what’s happened to—”

Something funny happened then: all three boys finished her sentence with a different name.

“Sirius?” said Harry.

“Lupin?” said Ron.

“Professor Snape?” said Draco.

—In the aftermath of which there was a great deal of awkward foot-shuffling and embarrassment by all.

Dumbledore held up a hand. “Permit me to move chronologically,” he said. “I have had a very long night. Profesor Snape returned to the castle with Professor Lupin in the early hours of the morning, and has since been in treatment for wounds sustained during his efforts.”

“Wounds?” said Draco sharply.

“Several superficial curses,” said Dumbledore calmly, “and the sorts of gashes which tell a story. Nothing that time and talent will not heal. Professor Lupin and Sirius Black have both fled the castle, being that the Minister’s appointees — including one quite badly injured auror — have charged both of them with murder and aggravated assault, respectively.”

“But Sirius never—”

“There is not a shred of proof to support Black’s story, except your word, Harry. A street full of eyewitnesses swore they saw Sirius murder Pettigrew. I myself gave evidence to the Ministry that Sirius had been the Potters’ Secret-Keeper.”

“But you believe us?” said Hermione anxiously.

“I do,” said Dumbledore. “But I have no power to make other men see the truth, or to overrule the Minister of Magic.”

Draco felt the sense of disappointment that he had come to associate with Dumbledore, which was that he could not simply wave his wand and make problems go away. He had expected that a man of his station would be able to do something — but he supposed even Dumbledore’s power had limits.

“So they’re gone?” said Harry quietly. His body was a slump of resigned grief. Draco was suddenly angry at both Black and Lupin, jointly, for failing to stick around long enough to say good-bye; who cared if they were on the run, anyway, when Harry had risked his life for them, and apparently hadn’t even earned the dignity of a goodbye.

You couldn’t do that to people. You couldn’t waltz into someone’s life and out of it, as if they were so much a revolving door. You had to go in deliberately, being mindful of the furniture, and be careful not to kick anything over. You oughtn’t move in unless you meant to take care of it.

Dumbledore tipped his head back to the skies. “Dawn is my favorite time of day,” he murmured. “There is a moment, between the last hour of night and daybreak, when one can perceive the exquisite contrast of the sun in one end of the sky and the stars in the other. A more splendid fabric of heaven I have never seen.”

Draco cleared his throat impatiently.

“You four are out of bed far too late,” he added, “but before I release you into the clutches of young Percival Weasley, would you care to take an hour and stargaze together? The Astronomy Tower is an especially nice place for sightseeing.”

“Respectfully,” Draco began, but Hermione stopped him.

“Yes,” she said suddenly. “Yes, please, Headmaster, we’d love to.”

Dumbledore smiled. He twitched back the sleeve of his robe, and revealed a silver charm bracelet, studded with what must have been dozens of charms that clinked together like a rack of keys. Selecting one from his wrist, he lifted it high between thumb and forefinger in the swelling dawn light: it was a small telescope.

“Ah,” he said. “Good. Now, Miss Granger — if you and your friends would kindly join hands?”

“What on—”

Hermione seized Draco and Harry by the wrist, and elbowed Harry until he grabbed Ron. Dumbledore ambled over and extended his other hand to Ron, who stared at it like it had boils, but took it.

Dumbledore lifted the charm and pressed his finger to a jewel in its center. There was a hard, unpleasant jolt somewhere behind Draco’s navel, and the world twisted around him like he was being folded through a crack in the very air.

When he came to, he was standing on the main deck of the Astronomy Tower, bathed in the blinding pink of sunrise. Sirius Black and Remus Lupin stood together on the railing, their shoulders brushing, their faces turned into the rising sun. Beside them stood the horrible silhouette of Buckbeak, the Hippogriff Death Forgot, whom Draco was dismally surprised to find had survived the night.

“Sirius,” breathed Harry. “Remus—”

At the sound of voices, the pair of men turned.

“Harry!” bellowed Sirius, and he flew away from the railing. Harry tripped forward, giddy with delight, and Sirius snatched him up, spinning him around in a way suited to children much younger than Harry. Harry, by appearance, gave not one solitary goddamn about this or most other things in existence. He wrapped himself around Sirius as if he had no intention of letting go before the millennium expired.

Lupin stayed where he was. He held himself as if tied together with flimsy and string.

“There you are,” Sirius rasped. “We were worried you wouldn’t make it. Dumbledore said you might be busy with your friends—”

“I thought you’d left without me,” Harry said in a rush.

“Perish the thought. Kill it dead, boy. I’d have mowed down the whole Ministry.”

“Oh,” said Harry, vibrating onto a heretofore undiscovered plane of joy. “Alright, then.”

“You’re not hurt, are you?” rasped Lupin.

Sirius made a production of picking over Harry, who flushed with a humiliated pleasure. “I’m alright,” he said. “Really, you should be worried about Ron — he’s the one who got hurt—”

“No, I didn’t,” said Ron hastily, when both men turned on him. “No. I mean, yes, but I got better.”

“You made a sacrifice for us,” said Sirius gravely, placing a hand on his shoulder. “We won’t forget it.”

“Well,” he said modestly, “I mean, I won’t stop you, if — you know, you want to get me a broom or something.”

“And to think, we’re indebted to a Malfoy, now, too,” added Sirius. “I really did think I’d seen everything.”

Lupin cleared his throat, a sad little facsimile of a laugh.

“I just know Lucius is rolling,” Sirius continued dreamily. “God, wish he’d lived, I would’ve rubbed in his face forever. But you — you, boy! You! Harry says you’re the Potions whiz — the Polyjuice was your handiwork, I take it?”

“Helped? Helped?”

“Ow! Fine, it was a joint operation. Let me go.”

He tried not to preen. Then he gave up trying, because humility was dismally boring, and after all, he had done something marvelous.

Sirius gave a low whistle. “Sneaking out and impersonating a Ministry official,” he said. “Smuggling a wanted man off of Hogwarts grounds; fending off dementors; riding a wild hippogriff—”

(“He’s not wild,” said Hermione indignantly, “he’s quite domesticated, and if you treat him with respect—”)

He clucked his tongue. “Sort of intimidating, isn’t it, Moony? The ante’s been upped. The Marauders are old news. Dull as dirt. I’m going to wind up with an office job and one of those desk toys that bobs up and down. I feel like I should set fire to something, to prove myself.”

Lupin shrugged and turned back to the railing.

Sirius set his teeth unhappily and turned to speak in confidential tones to Harry. “Listen. He’s in a bad way, just now. He’s had a hell of a night, and Dumbledore just told us about the girl—”

“But Daphne’s alive. He didn’t kill her.”

“He didn’t… kill her. No, that’s true.”

“...What happened?”

“Nothing that he should feel guilty about, the fool,” he muttered. “He didn’t do anything. A man and a werewolf are different things. He knows that as well as I do.”

“Speaking of which,” said Lupin. He fumbled into his robe again. “I do — I must — I have something, here—”

He withdrew a letter and pressed it into Draco’s hands. Draco reached for the seal, and Lupin hastened to say: “No, that’s for — it’s for her.”

Draco flipped it over. The name Ms. Daphne Greengrass lay across the front in hurried black script. It was not signed, and there was no return address; the seal was a single blot of unmarked red wax.

Draco paused, thinking, and then brandished the letter. “This says you’re a werewolf.”

He nodded.

“You’re giving written testimony of your lycanthropy. To a recent victim of said lycanthropy. Whose father happens to be an official in the Ministry of Magic.”

“Yes, that’s about right.”

“And none of your so-called friends have brained you on the head for this idea?”

Lupin broke into a thin smile. “You are like your father, a bit,” he admitted. “If your father hadn’t been so miserable all the time. He abhorred mess, above everything.”

“Stop trying to distract me with sentimental hogwash, you ham-fisted old biddy, I’m talking about your right against self-incrimination!”

“Definitely Lucius’s,” said Sirius sagely, leaning on Lupin’s shoulder. “I think ‘ham-fisted old biddy’ is what he called me after I danced with Cissa at fifth year formal.”

“Both of you are — fine. Don’t come to me when your lawyer pitches a fit and this shows up in discovery—”

“Draco,” said Lupin quietly, “Severus Snape informed Sibelius Nott that I was a werewolf. An auror witnessed me transform. My plausible deniability is so shot through as to be a fine mesh. I think that one letter to a very scared young girl is not without my power nor my obligation.”

“Snape!” said Ron, outraged. “That slimy bugger, he told on you?”

“He has always considered me a danger to those around me. In this case, he was right.”

“But you took the potion! You weren’t hurting anybody! If they hadn’t started nosing around, you would’ve been fine!”

He shrugged again. “Maybe, maybe not,” he said. “We’ll never know. Snape has hated me since we were in school together, virtually from sight, for the crime of being a friend to James Potter. And being none too kind to him, myself, I might add.”

“He deserved everything he ever got,” muttered Sirius. Draco scowled.

“It doesn’t matter. He who laughs last, laughs longest, as they say… and even though I have evaded Azkaban, God willing, I expect Severus will be laughing for a very long time.”

Draco stiffened. It wasn’t possible; it couldn’t have been. Snape wouldn’t — Snape—

But he would. He knew his godfather. He also knew what his godfather would do to a man he disliked. He had never harbored any illusions about Snape being noble, or answering to his better angels. Part of what he liked about his godfather was his lack of any sort of noble impulse at all.

He just hadn’t — seen the other side of it, until now. It was an astonishingly cold place to be. He closed his arms over his chest and wrapped the outsized cloak tight against the spring winds buffeting the Astronomy Tower.

“Reminds me,” Sirius announced. He pulled something from his robe pocket, “this is for you, Harry. I doubt I’ll have reason to use it in the near future, so it might as well end up with its natural heir and successor — in any number of senses.” He gave him the Marauder’s Map.

“Thank Merlin,” said Ron. “Check where Percy is, would you?”

Buckbeak snorted and clawed the roof. Dumbledore, who had been pointedly admiring the landscape for a while now, turned and cleared his throat.

“It is almost sunrise,” he said softly. “The Ministry will expect me soon. I would not advise that you be in the castle when they re-enter it.”

Sirius and Lupin turned to Harry.

“Take me with you,” he said, the poor predictable git.

“No,” said Lupin.

“Please — I can come, I’ll be quiet, I can camp out anywhere—”

“You have to finish school, Harry.”

“Then after school! Once the term ends, I’ll come find you — or you can find me at the Dursleys’, they won’t care if I go, really, they’d be thrilled!”

“We’re not going anywhere I’d want you to see,” Sirius said, aghast. “You deserve three square meals and a warm bed to sleep in. Someday — and I mean it, someday, the minute I can manage it — but we can’t offer anything you deserve. We’re not — we’d not be good parents, just now, Remus and me.”

“I don’t care!” said Harry indignantly. “I don’t have those anyway!”

Everyone found somewhere to look that wasn’t Harry.

“You should have been with me from the beginning,” said Sirius, haggard with grief. “But we can’t take you with us. It’s too dangerous. I couldn’t do that to James.”

“Who cares what he wants?” said Harry loudly. “He’s not here!”

It would have been kinder to take a mace to both of their faces. They crumpled in the same way.

Dumbledore finally intervened. “Sirius and Remus must go,” he said softly. “Harry, it is time for your goodbyes.”

Harry, fuming, submitted to an embrace with Remus and Sirius that was as brutal as it was tender. Draco pointedly turned his back. A man wasn’t meant to see this sort of thing.

Almost by accident, his eyes fell on Hermione. She, too, had turned away from Harry and his godfather, and glancing up at him through the unbrushed shag of her fringe, her eyes were wide and shining. He mouthed: Gryffindors, and she smiled wetly through the curtain of hair.

Then she stepped closer to him and cleared her throat, sort of brushing her arm against his, as if she wanted his hand but wasn't quite prepared to ask for it; and he was glad she didn't, for it probably would have embarrassed him into speechlessness, but this way he could lean into her arm, asserting a nice comforting pressure, and her arm was warm despite the chill of the morning air, which was welcome, and it was all — manageable. It was just a nice little gesture, perfectly ordinary. He'd seen Harry and Ron do it dozens of times.

And if their knuckles brushed together, hidden in the wide sleeves of their baggy robes, where no one saw — that was accidental, and meant nothing in any case, for Hermione gave no sign of having even noticed it. And if she did — if she twitched her fingers a little, opening them up — then that didn't matter, for he didn't try to reciprocate, and he certainly didn't let the touch linger for any longer than the moment allowed.

Harry, Lupin, and Sirius finally broke apart. Sirius stepped forward and clasped Ron's hand. "Still got a good arm," he said, "and that patronus isn't half bad, either. Sorry about your rat."

"Sorry about your life," said Ron reasonably, and they shook hands.

Lupin turned to Hermione. "You've got a hard task ahead of you," he said. "But at least one Marauder ought to know what she's doing. Take care of them for me, will you?"

Hermione, who loathed weeping, tears, and any expressions of human vulnerability in herself whatsoever, gave a quick sniff and then ground her knuckles furiously into her eyes, as if trying to shove the tears back where they came from.

“That’s a yes,” advised Ron.

Then it was Draco’s turn. He prepared for a manly and dignified handshake, but Sirius had other plans.

“You’re a miscreant, a criminal, a delinquent, and a filthy disgrace to the name of Black,” he said, and clapped him on the shoulder. “So I suppose Cissa finally did something right.”

“I beg your pardon?”

With a bellow of laughter, Sirius threw himself onto Buckbeak, and helped Lupin up behind him. The animal shrieked, reared, and bounded up to the railing of the Astronomy Tower, where it gave a last piercing cry. The two men turned, backlit by the rising sun — and there was something strange and queerly peaceful in their expressions, for two people who had nothing ahead of them, and very little to leave behind.

Then Buckbeack leapt, and they soared into the bloody sunrise.

Harry sniffled.

“You must hurry back to Gryffindor Tower, if you do not wish to be seen,” Dumbledore said.

“Blimey,” said Ron. “I forgot about curfew. After last night, Filch seems like small potatoes.”

“Yeah,” mumbled Harry.

“No,” said Hermione.

Dumbledore smiled. “Then for our last act, we shall have a final trick,” he said. He once more unveiled his charm bracelet and removed one from its number: a silver charm in the shape of a lion, with a glittering ruby for an eye. “With my well-wishes, and my thanks for your assistance in something I could not have undertaken myself, though it sorely deserved an attempt: try not to scare your housemates."

"What do you mean by that?" said Draco suspiciously.

But Hermione said, "Oh, thank you, professor!" and took the charm eagerly, gathering the boys into a circle.

With grim portent of what was to come, he let himself be crowded in. He traded a dark look with Dumbledore over his shoulder, and his last glimpse of the man — before Hermione pressed the jewel, and there came a mighty jerk behind his sternum — was a sly, benevolent smile.

Then they were standing in the middle of the Gryffindor common room. At once, the jewel glimmered out of sight in Hermione's palm.

"Well!" said Ron, whistling. "That's decent of him. Be a shame if we got stuck in detention after all that—"

"WHAT ARE YOU DOING OUT OF BED?"

There was a mighty squeak. A tousled Penelope Clearwater stood under the boys' staircase beside a shirtless and red-faced Percy.

Ron let out a peal of glee.

"Morning, Perce! Bit nippy, isn't it!"

"I don't — I — I — you should be in bed!"

"Don't even bother, mate," he said. "Hey, Pen. Good sleep?"

She squeaked again and covered her face in her hands.

"For goodness' sake," said Hermione tiredly. "If I wasn't dead tired already — Penny, there's a back staircase into the boy's dorms if you go through the broom closet, you should really try that next time."

Draco looked at her sharply. “How do you know that?”

“Lavender talks in her sleep. And yes, it’s hell, thanks for asking.”

“Well, I’m headed up,” said Ron, grinning like a Cheshire cat. “Gonna see if Fred and George are up yet, I fancy a little brotherly chat—”

“You stop right there! Ronald!”

Ron dodged Percy’s grab for him and raced up the stairs. Percy followed, hollering, and the Weasley boys scrambled up to the dorms in a thunder of footsteps and slamming doors.

Penelope darted her eyes at the portrait hole. Draco jerked his head at it, in a sort of: well, out-with-you sort of way, and whimpering, she made a hurried exit.

“At least one person had more fun than we did, last night,” offered Harry.

“Potter, if you make me contemplate anything related to Percival Weasley’s unvested person, I will Summon a dementor into this room and leave you here.”

And that was that: normalcy restored: they were back to a world where the worst they had to worry about was their prefect’s reaction to being humiliated, and succeeding in their exams, and whether or not they would be well-rested for their Transfiguration lesson in the morning. In the warm and sweet-smelling universe of the Gryffindor common room, where woodsmoke guttered softly from the fireplace, and the banners celebrating Gryffindor’s victory in the quidditch cup still hung high from the rafters, there was nothing to fear — this was the place that patronuses were born, a place where neither dementor nor murderer nor ancient grudges could encroach on those old stone walls. It had stood for centuries, and it would stand for centuries more. No one here would hurt him, and no one here would do worse than tease. It was the one place, besides the Manor, that he could be sure of a welcome and a cup of tea, perhaps a biscuit, and a place to warm his shoes by the fire; and if Seamus was playing some muggle music, or if Oliver was talking about a new quidditch play, he would have entertainment, too; and if Hermione was curled up in her armchair, he would have someone to talk to about whatever he wanted, who would lift her head and give him the same bleary smile she did when she woke up from deep thought, and everything would be momentarily good.

It was the most ridiculous feeling, really, being home.

It was two weeks before Madam Pomfrey allowed anyone into the hospital. What happened to Daphne, as far as the school was concerned, was an exciting mystery; rumors ranged from a unicorn attack to an indecorous encounter with a group of wild centaurs. The disappearance of Professor Lupin, and his subsequent replacement by Professor Dumbledore, led conversely to a certain allure: why he had gone, and for what reason he could not say goodbye, incensed the imaginations of all and decorated tales of his departure with details that would have made the real Lupin blush. He was, by miscellaneous accounts, supposed to have run off and eloped with Celestina Warbeck; been chased down by a rogue gang of snatchers for a king's ransom; and cornered by a wizard he had jilted at the altar some ten years ago, who had returned to exact his revenge and his bride price. (This last one Draco was fairly sure came from Witch Weekly.) Then the Ministry put out a warrant for his arrest on the charge of lycanthropy, and the stories were more or less the same, only more explicit, which was horrible.

The Hospital Wing, however, was closed to visitors. Out of respect for Daphne's privacy, Madam Pomfrey refused to let anyone in unless Daphne agreed that she knew them, only because Daphne loved attention, she agreed to everyone, regardless of whether she knew them or not, which annoyed the nurse endlessly. So it was with palpable reluctance that Madam Pomfrey said, "She'll see you, Mr. Malfoy," when he came to the door.

The Wing was the same as it had been last year, when Hermione had lived in it. Wide, crystalline windows spilling warm light into the room; comfortable beds separated by silk screens; the scent of flowers and old stone. Only one bed was occupied, and it already had visitors: a dark-haired boy and girl with robes hemmed in green. Each held one of her hands.

“There you are,” said Pansy.

“Came as soon as I could.”

Half of Daphne’s face wore a mask of bandages, and the sheets were drawn high around her collarbones, showing only a hint of the gauze layered around her neck. Her one good eye was slitted open, circled with dark bags, and fogged with painkiller like a clouded opal.

It didn’t seem real. Things like this didn’t happen at Hogwarts. There were dangers, of course, but everyone survived, and everyone was well again, in the end; hadn’t Hermione been alright, after all, last year? Hadn’t Colin Creevey? Hadn’t all of them come out safely from the Vault, being trapped with the monstrous Quirrell? It wasn’t possible that someone could walk away from Hogwarts worse than she came. The idea kept slipping out of place in his head.

But she was there, in the Hospital Wing, and Lupin was gone.

“Draco,” she slurred. “Hullo. Thanks for coming.” Her lips moved slowly from pain.

“Naturally.” He dropped a pair of twigs in the jar by her bedside and Transfigured them into lilies. “Here. Couldn’t come by llama fur on short notice. One’s from me, and one’s from Weasley.”

Theo, who had been bent solemnly over Daphne’s hand, gave a twitch. “Weasley?” he said quietly. “What’s he care?”

“Ronald is my friend,” said Daphne, her voice breathy from exhaustion. “He and I… had a smashing time… at a party, once.”

With one eye hidden, it was impossible to tell — but he could have sworn she winked at him.

Pansy gave a shuddering breath. When she lifted her face, it was coated in a sheen of tears.

“He’s going to pay,” she said. “If I have to kill him myself, he’ll pay for it.”

“Loose lips, sunken ships, Pans,” said Theo, with a glance at Draco.

Daphne flapped her hand. “It’s… alright,” she managed. “He can know… ‘bout Lupin. Won’t be… a secret long, anyway… once everyone sees.” She gestured to her face.

“Did you know?” Pansy snapped. Her lip trembled. “Did you know they had a monster in the castle? Teaching children? Again?”

“How would I know?” said Draco coolly.

She held his gaze for a long moment before she turned away. Guilt twinged. He liked Pansy. He wanted well for her. But a few secrets would never hurt her, and they wouldn’t hurt him, either.

There was a new badge on her robes. It was heart-shaped and golden, and it had the letters L.P.Y. engraved on it, with a small insignia of a wand and a spear of ivy, crossed.

“S’okay,” slurred Daphne. “Lots of attention… whole school… likes me now.”

“Everyone liked you before,” said Theo.

“Stop… lying. Makes me feel like I’m… dying.”

“You’re not dying,” he said firmly, and squeezed her hand. “You’re going to be well again soon, do you understand? I’ve all sorts of terrible designs on our summer, and you’ve a part to play in all of them.”

“Should’ve told me earlier, prat,” she mumbled. “If I’d known I had… summer plans… I would’ve pushed my mauling up… to January.”

Pansy barked a laugh. Theo gave a smile that didn’t reach his eyes.

“I’m going to tell Madam Pomfrey to lay off whatever’s in that drip. It gives you such an awful mouth.”

“Imperious,” she sighed. “I should perish… just to teach you a lesson. S’what… you would do.”

“I should never forgive such pettiness. It is beneath you as a lady to stoop to my level.”

“That’s true. Dratted unfair, too. Get me some… ice water?”

“For the lady? Anything.” He rose to his feet. “Come, Pans,” he said. “Let’s scare some victuals off one of the nurses. I feel like terrorizing someone, just now, and there aren’t any first years about. Draco, will you watch her?”

“I’m not dying,” groaned Daphne. “You all… harpies… gerroff. Leave me… and my wounds.”

“I’ll stay,” said Draco. Daphne poked her tongue out at him.

Theo motioned for Draco to step out. Draco followed him outside the screen, and they moved out of Daphne’s earshot.

“What did Madam Pomfrey say—”

“Very little,” said Theo grimly. “She doesn’t want to scare us — like looking at her wouldn’t scare anyone badly enough. No one knows how far the venom got into her system before the healers extracted it. She’s slated to stay for the rest of the month and check in with a specialist at St. Mungo’s.”

“But she’ll live?”

“Live, yes, thank God… in what state, and for how long, no one can say, considering— other factors.”

“You mean her blood condition?”

Surprise parted Theo’s mouth, but he erased it with a twitch of his jaw. “They’ve only done limited tests, because she’s so frail. So far, there’s no sign of it worsening, but these things can sour in the course of a minute.”

“And the other thing?”

“The other…?”

“You know what I mean.”

Theo folded his arms and glanced over his shoulder. Daphne had tipped her head toward Pansy and they were murmuring together in soft, wet whispers. “They don’t think she has lycanthropy,” he murmured. “Yet.”

A weight removed itself from Draco’s back. “Side effects?”

“Some. A taste for rare meat; heightened senses of smell and hearing, from what they can tell. Aggression, potentially, though that might just be Daph. It’ll take a full moon to tell.”

“I thought her blood condition might make her more susceptible.”

“Remains to be seen.”

“Well. Good, then.”

“To say the least.”

Daphne gave a feeble cough. It echoed in the cavernous Hospital Wing. Pansy held a cup to her lips.

“You know, when I came to Hogwarts,” said Theo suddenly, “I thought it was the greatest place on earth. That it was this epicenter of magic, and power, and politics, and all the great wizards in history came here to be trained... You know, they take you over the lake in those boats, and you see it swimming out of the fog, and you think... suddenly they've got you sitting there like an idiot, believing in a castle in the sky.”

“...What’s your point?”

Theo shook his head. “What a joke,” he said bitterly. “What do you think they do here? Teach? This is the same school it was forty years ago. The same classes, the same books, the same people, the same problems. And while they fill your brain with rot, they’ll leave you out to dry in the face of actual danger — where were the teachers, for Daphne? Where were they for Pansy, last year? It’s a joke. I’m so goddamn tired of it.”

“I say again,” said Draco, masking alarm, “what is your point?”

“That we used to be the greatest wizarding school in the world, and now we’re lucky if we can keep our neck above the water with Durmstrang. My father said it was a husk of a place, and I should have listened to him. Then maybe Daphne would — it doesn’t matter. And Dumbledore is part of the problem. Everything that happens here is his fault, and when they come for this place, I hope they start with him.”

His voice was cold and flat. Draco doubted whether he would even hear it if Draco tried to argue; he seemed lost in his own world.

“Dumbledore didn’t do that to Daphne.”

“He hired a werewolf,” said Theo. Draco took a step back. “A monster. That’s the second time one of my friends almost died, and just because we’re not Gryffindors—”

“To be clear,” said Draco. “You think you were targeted because — you’re Slytherins.”

“Yeah! Yeah, I do! When’s the last time one of your housemates got hurt, Draco? When’s the last time a teacher went after one of your friends, and don’t you dare say Snape, because Daphne’s in the Hospital Wing and Pansy still wakes up screaming, and the worst that’s ever happened to you is losing house points—”

“No, you idiot, Pansy was targeted by a Death Eater because he knew her already, which was her father’s fault, not Dumbledores’ — and Daphne broke curfew voluntarily, her house didn’t have a thing to do with it—”

“Yeah? Yeah? Really! So it’s pure coincidence, then? That it’s my friends who keep getting hurt because of Dumbledore’s carelessness?”

“It wasn’t carelessness. Lupin wouldn’t have—”

But he couldn’t say that. If he revealed the Ministry’s role in the attack, he would have to explain how he knew where Lupin had been on the night of the full moon, and why he hadn’t taken the Wolfsbane Potion, and how Draco knew he hadn’t taken it in the first place.

“Lupin wouldn’t have what?” Theo demanded. “Wouldn’t have what? Because if you tell me he didn’t mean to kill her, I swear on my house I’ll end yours right here.”

“Werewolves don’t have sentience or intention.”

Theo snorted. “Sure,” he said. “Sure. That’s your defense. Okay, sure.”

“I’m not saying it’s not awful. Of course it is. And Dumbledore should face the consequences—”

“Dumbledore should be sacked, if not subjected to thumbscrews. Draco, I don’t think you can fathom how sincere I am.”

Draco had never seen Theo so heated in his life, except the once, and it was almost exactly this time, last year. His face was pink, his collar askew. It was unsettling.

“Granger was in the Hospital Wing for a month,” he said quietly.

Theo’s nose wrinkled. “What?”

Draco reached out and tugged his collar straight, eliciting a little noise of disgruntlement from Theo. He kept his tone neutral. “Granger was in the Hospital Wing for a month,” he repeated. “Creevey was in for three. You don’t know Leanne Thompson, I expect, but she lost almost a full year of her education. Had to repeat a term. You asked when was the last time a teacher went after one of my friends. I told you.” After a pause, he added, “What happened to Parkinson was unconscionable. But she wasn’t the only one.”

At this, Theo’s face became impassive. He didn’t blink.

“If I ever see Lupin again, he’s going to wish he never touched a wand,” he said.

“Spare me the theatrics. I’m not a girl, and I don’t know who you’re trying to impress.”

Theo snorted.

“Bastard,” he said, but it was calmer. Draco shrugged.

“How’s the eye?”

“Fine,” said Theo crisply. “As it ever was.”

“Yeah. Alright. Bad luck about the Cup, by the way, but there’s always next year.”

“I could still out-fly you eight days of the week, Malfoy.”

“I’m still waiting for you to prove it.”

Theo hesitated. “Tell George Weasley,” he began, and pursed his lips. Then he managed: “Tell George Weasley that — that I haven’t forgotten.”

“Absolutely not, I’m not your owl. Tell him yourself, if you’re driven to such hysterics of passion over it.”

“Or don’t, then, git, see if I care.”

“Hold your breath, I dare you.”

They jostled each other in a fraternal antagonistic way, and Theo swept from the Hospital Wing. A gleam of gold sat beneath the Slytherin badge on his robes.

Pansy had gone to find Madam Pomfrey and get more ice chips. Draco took her place at Daphne’s bedside, and Daphne turned her head to locate him with her one good eye.

“Draco.”

“Greengrass. Comfortable?”

“As I’ve ever been.”

“So not at all, then.”

“Ha, ha. Funny boy.” She moved her hand and flopped it rather pathetically on top of his. “Draco.”

“Yes,” he said, alarmed. He leaned away somewhat. If she was going to throw up or burst out bleeding, he’d prefer she do it somewhere away from his person.

“If I tell you something, will you make a triple-secret pinky-swear promise not to tell another living soul?”

“No,” he said. “I'll promise normally, though.”

“Okay,” she said, and beckoned him closer. He put his ear to her mouth.

“I can walk,” she whispered.

He drew back. “What?”

Her eye twinkled. “I'm… strong now. I can feel it… in my bones. At night, when Madam Pomfrey goes to bed, I get up and I… I can run… I can leap, and jump… and the closer it gets to the full moon… the stronger I am. I feel like I could run forever… and never get tired. I could dance all night… and never need to sit down... And I can… My body… after fourteen years of no… it’s finally saying yes .”

“...You’re imagining things.”

“M’not. I can feel it. You see that… dent in the railing?” She pointed to a divot in the rail of her bed. “I made that… the other day… trying to get up, for my bath. With my bare hands. Theo doesn’t believe me… but you will, won’t you? You know… I wouldn’t lie.”

He stared.

“What?” she whispered. “You don’t… you don’t think I’m… a monster, do you?”

“No, of course not,” he said at once. “I’m not sure you’re sane, but you’re certainly not a monster. You understand what you’re saying is preposterous.”

“Everything about my life… is preposterous. Now it’s just… finally getting… preposterously good. Isn’t that… nice? After all this time?”

“I’m a little caught up on the premises here. You’re not worried about transformations?”

She smiled, a sly, ferocious little thing. “Well,” she said. “They’ll have a hard time keeping me inside then, won’t they?”

Then she giggled at whatever expression he was making. “You don’t believe me,” she said. “That’s alright. You will.”

“That’s not it.” He drew the letter from his pocket. “I have something for you.”

She reached for it feebly. “You wrote… me a letter? Goodness. Are you in love with me?”

“I should sooner put my own eyes out with an awl. Any affection I may harbor for you is tacit and strictly familial. In my heart of hearts I regard you as my ebullient and uncomfortably flirtatious aunt.”

“Such… a prude,” she sighed. “Well. You can’t blame a girl… for trying.”

She opened the letter. After a moment, her brows twitched together, and the mirth fell from her face.

“Where… did you get this?”

“Dumbledore gave it to me,” he lied. It wasn’t exactly wrong. Dumbledore had been involved. “He wanted it conveyed to you.”

“And did he… tell you… who sent it?”

There was a delicate game to be played herein. “He said the letter was from someone who cares very much for your well-being.” Draco paused. “And someone who you stand to help considerably, if you feel inclined to it.”

“He wants me to lie?”

“No. He doesn’t. And I’m not asking you to. I’m telling you, as a question of fact, that what you tell the Ministry will change the course of his life. Having those facts, it is your business entirely what you do with them.”

“You can be such a dreadful bureaucrat,” she sighed, leaning her head back on the pillow. “You won’t just… ask me to lie, will you? Because that wouldn’t be… proper.”

“It wouldn’t be appropriate. It’s your decision to make.”

“So moral,” she said, amused. “Pansy… was right.”

“I beg your pardon?”

“She told me,” said Daphne, her eyes fluttering closed, “that it wasn’t about… disposition, or bloodline… it was about… who you were… in extremis. What happened… when the chips were down… and you had to get what you wanted. Hook or crook… she said… you’d choose the knife… you were never really like us… in extremis.”

“What on earth is that supposed to mean?”

But she had no answer; her head turned against the pillow, and her body slackened in sleep.

Exams came and went. It was sunny again, and Draco spent the few hours he could escape the library flying in quidditch friendlies with the Ravenclaw team, which Harry always seemed to greet with curious eagerness. The D.A.D.A. exam had been canceled, leaving most students with only an aggregate grade, and since Lupin’s grading policy had been generous, few had anything to complain about, though many regretted his leaving.

“Wonder what they’ll give us next year?” said Seamus gloomily.

“I’d take a vampire, if he lets us play music again,” said Dean.

The closer summer came, the more subdued Harry became. Going home was not a cheerful prospect for him, and Draco suspected that it was made worse by the idea of living together with Sirius. That was Sirius' own fault, for nurturing outlandish hopes, but it couldn't be helped now, and it didn't help to tell Harry that the hope had been outlandish: that only depressed him more.

Draco had thought about asking Dumbledore if they couldn't let the poor sad sack come and stay at the Manor, for the sake of God and country, just to stop him from sighing and slumping around the common room like a wet cat. But Ron told him in confidence that Harry had already submitted these requests, discreetly, and been denied. At that point, Draco's first instinct was a more direct course of action, e.g. removing the aunt and uncle from the picture entirely — a proposal that Ron wholeheartedly endorsed, but he admitted to having worries about the extraordinary grounding he would receive for committing the murder act on vacation, which Draco acknowledged and agreed with.

"Besides, we'd be expelled for doing magic out of school," he said, pouring himself some pumpkin juice.

"You wouldn't need spells," said Draco haughtily. "They're muggles. You could knock them out with a strong Sleeping Draught."

"Now there's an idea. Hell, you could probably just set Dobby on them, he'd do it — oh, hey, Harry. Hear the news? It's dismal."

"What?" said Harry, throwing himself down beside Ron. Hermione joined them. "What's this about Dobby?"

"No. Percy passed all his N.E.W.T.s," said Ron glumly.

"Oh, well done, then," said Hermione, reaching for a bread roll. "Congratulations. I expect he's very proud."

"No, it's not! He'll be on about it all summer! When Fred and George get their O.W.L.s back, if they haven't failed anything — that's something to celebrate. I think the only ones they cared about were Transfig and Charms, and maybe Potions, though they're dropping it next year… Fred said if he had to spend one more minute in that musty old dungeon listening to Snape, he'd—"

"Actually learn something?" said Draco dryly.

"Gargle some boomslang venom, I think, was what he said. Lucky git, wish I could drop Potions. Every time Snape looks at me I think he regrets not letting the werewolf have a go at me."

"One sympathizes," muttered Draco.

Ron put down his fork. "So I use your broom polish once, yeah, and I'm bloody dead to you, am I—"

"It's fifty sickles a pot, it says 'PROPERTY OF D. MALFOY,' I don't know how much clearer I can possibly be—"

"EY! 'ARRY!"

The familiar brogue drowned out the rest of Draco's winning argument. Hagrid hurried down the Gryffindor table, his girth almost eclipsing the aisle. "Glad I caught yeh!" he cried. "Wanted ter congratulate yeh on the exam — top marks! All of yeh! Great bi' abou' the hippogriff flight patterns, too, 'Arry, I wouldn' have thought yeh would know tha' all jus' from the textbook."

Harry grinned. "It seemed intuitive," he said. Draco rolled his eyes, while Hermione broke into a furious coughing fit.

"Got some good news for yeh," added Hagrid. "Ron, had ter thank yeh for putin' me in touch with tha' brother of yers. He's says he'll take care of everythin', even the fancy permit business — I'm due ter visit his place in Romania over the summer."

"Least I could do," Ron said generously. "It was really a birthday present for Charlie, anyway, he's nutters about this sort of thing. Say hello to Norbert for me, would you?”

“I will! Although Charlie said somethin’ funny about tha’, in the letter,” Hagrid admitted. “Said he’s in perfect health an’ everythin’ — only they call her Norberta, now.”

“Oh,” said Hermione, with a tinkling laugh. “She’s a girl-dragon?”

“Mad, innit?” said Hagrid happily. “Yeh got ter wait for the firs’ clutch to tell. Anyway, Charlie said he’d help me study for me license over the summer. An’ Dumbledore says that if I pass the test, he’ll hire me back next year!”

“That’s great!” said Harry enthusiastically.

“Yes, that’s wonderful,” said Hermione, less so.

“So I’ll be looking for all of yeh in my class,” he said, clasping Ron and Harry on the shoulders. The movement nearly slammed both of their faces into their plates. “I’ve got a great idea fer the firs’ day, this time, too! There’s summat called fire crabs off the coast o’ the Mediterranean — yeh’ll jus’ love em!”

“I thought the classification system was wizard-centric and antiquated,” said Draco.

She gave him a plaintive look. He dropped the smirk and nodded at her. They had agreed not to continue with Care of Magical Creatures next year. Besides, it would free up a block for Muggle Studies, and he wanted to find out how one went about acquiring muggle music if your friend didn’t send it to you by owl post. These, along with things like ‘Cadbury’ and ‘normal muggle girl Christmas gifts,’ had become objects of unanticipated significance in his life, and he was begrudgingly willing to tolerate lectures on boring things like lektrisitty and Tories in order to understand them.

Gryffindor had won the house cup that year. Draco cared very little for this except that it meant they ate under red-and-gold banners for the end of term feast, and it made the Gryffindor common room almost unwalkable during the night before they left. Before making his perfunctory appearance at the party, however, he went down to the dungeons with a book under his arm.

Light spilled from under the door to Snape's office. He raised his hand, hesitated, and then knocked, firmly, thrice.

No answer came. He pushed in anyway.

Snape sat in a high-backed chair by the fireplace, a book open over his lap. When the door opened nothing moved except for his eyes, and Draco felt the cool shiver of a ward passing over his body, leaving him intact but awakened to the possibility of a very different outcome.

"I did not invite you in."

"I know, sir. But since we're leaving tomorrow, I wanted to speak with you before we left."

Snape's eyes moved to the door behind him. Draco shut it.

"It is past curfew."

"I presume detentions carry over into the next year, professor."

Snape gave a small grunt of acquiescence. They both knew very well the likelihood of him giving Draco a detention, but he disliked having his bluff called. Draco came in and sat down on the ottoman beside him. The fire provided ample warmth for the small stone room, and he noticed a bottle of brandy at Snape's elbow.

"What is it?" said Snape.

The words he had prepared deserted him. He was left with an empty mouth and an empty head and a pair of half-empty hands. "This book," he said finally. He held out Moste Potente Potions. "You gave it to me last year."

Snape glanced at it and nodded.

"Right. Thank you, also, for that, sir. But I wanted to know— are the annotations yours?"

"Perhaps. Why should it matter?"

"Well, they're very good. And I used them to brew a potion that was rather difficult, and they made it much easier than it would have been — considering my level."

"Which potion would that be?"

"Polyjuice," Draco admitted, after a moment.

Snape's eyebrow gave a judicious twitch. "You brewed a Polyjuice Potion."

"Yes, sir."

"Successfully."

"By my eye, sir."

"May I ask where?"

"Second floor girls' bathroom, sir," said Draco, evenly.

Snape closed his book and put it on the table. He steepled his fingers and put his fingers over his mouth.

"You are aware—"

"It's against the rules. Yes. Sir."

“Draco, I want you to answer this question with all possible care for your own well-being and mine. I suggest you take commensurate time in crafting your answer. Does it serve me to know the purpose for which you required this potion?”

Draco took commensurate time in crafting his answer.

“No, sir.”

“Am I wrong in presuming it bears some relation to your involvement in the affairs of Harry Potter and Sirius Black?”

He spat Black as if it were something foul he had discovered lurking behind his molar.

Draco thought about it. He thought about his godfather, who he cared about more than most people in the world; and his friend, who cared about his godfather, also, more than most people in the world, despite a lamentable difference in quality between the two.

“I don’t believe it serves either of our interests for you to know that, sir.”

“Good,” said Snape crisply. “I take it on faith that it does not. If you did brew a Polyjuice successfully — which I doubt you did, in truth — then it would have been a formidable piece of magic. I will refrain from assigning detentions to you and any of your extraordinary inept conspirators, whose names I have not the slightest inkling, in light of the fact that it is impossible and therefore unlikely to have occurred.”

“But I did— I mean — well, fine.”

He sulked. The lack of an outright denial was the closest thing to acknowledgement he could hope for. He clung to it anyway. Praise, from Snape, was a rare thing.

The book weighed heavily on his lap. He slid his thumb along the line of ancient gilt.

“If I may, sir—”

“You may not.”

“Why do you dislike Professor Lupin?”

Snape did not recoil; that would imply some level of movement. Rather, the displeasure on his face soured and fermented into a deeper shade of foreboding.

“He is a danger to Wizarding society. He is a creature of violence and low cunning. He would have killed you and your schoolmates without hesitation. I could go on, but I do not believe I must.”

“He’s a werewolf, sir.”

“Your point?”

“That it isn’t his fault,” Draco ventured. “Entirely. Respectfully.”

Snape shut the book in his lap and put it to the side. Draco sat up straighter, nervous for no reason at all.

“Remus Lupin,” said Snape softly, “has manufactured himself a past he can live with. It appears I alone will not indulge him in it. He remembers a world, a Hogwarts, and a set of friends that bear no resemblance to the people I or anyone else knew. Inside him is a rotten core of selfishness that no grandiosity of pretense will ever cut out. He has no dignity, no loyalty, and no code higher than his own pleasure. He would choose Sirius Black over every man, woman, and child in this castle… and he did.”

Draco didn’t really see evidence to believe that, but this was not the day he dared to ask why Snape did. What he did want to know about, and the last piece of the puzzle he had yet to grasp, was the last Marauder he hadn’t met.

“And James Potter? What was he like?”

“Never speak to me of the Potters.”

The fire guttered low, like it was afraid, too.

“Yes, sir.”

But he couldn’t unhear what Snape had shouted in the Forest, unshackled from dignity, from reason, from the very world around him: You killed her.

Her. Her, he’d said, and he’d been talking about the Potters just before. Her — but it wouldn’t make any sense.

“Draco.”

“Yes, sir?”

“I said that you were dismissed,” said Snape. “If I must resort to more strenuous methods to remove you from my company, I will do so, but we will both regret it.”

Draco rose, gathering what remained of his dignity with him. “Sorry to disturb you, sir. Have a good holiday.”

“You as well,” said Snape quietly. “Tell your mother that I send my regards. And Draco?”

“Yes, sir?”

“If you must insist on lying down with dogs,” he said, “then I entreat you to better protect yourself against infestations of fleas.”

Understanding nothing, he agreed that he would, and let himself out.

The Hogwarts Express left at an awful early hour the next morning. Harry and Ron, exhausted from the night’s celebrations, spent most of the ride napping on each other’s shoulders.

“They’re adorable,” said Draco. “Do you have one of those whatsits? The poillerode?”

“A Polaroid, you mean? No, but where did you hear about one of those?”

“Always the tone of surprise,” he sighed. “I’m a man of depth and mystery, Granger. Perhaps I’ve hit the books early on Muggle Studies, and I intend to give you a run for your money.”

“...Seamus told you?”

“Creevey.”

They talked of that for a while, of muggle cameras and Colin’s moving photographs, and the difference between that and ‘viddiyos,’ which he struggled to grasp. Then she pulled out a paper on the use of the Fidelius Charm, and asked him whether he thought the author’s methodology wasn’t the slightest bit skewed towards his own hypothesis, and he challenged her to come up with any other way of running the experiment, which she did, and the ensuing argument kept them occupied all the way to England.

When Harry woke up, Hermione had gone to change into her muggle clothes. While Draco and Ron chatted about England’s chances in the World Cup that year, Harry trudged out to the bathroom and came back in a ratty gray shirt and denim jeans tied up with string.

“I say,” said Draco. Hermione ducked in beside him, wearing a cheery peach-pink cardigan that matched the pearl clip she was tucking into her hair. She seemed much more comfortable than Harry in muggle clothes, he noticed; Harry wore them like something draped unwillingly around his neck, whereas Hermione appeared to move as easily as she did in robes, if not more. In fairness, muggle clothes for women were fathoms better than for men.

“It’s not like the Dursleys take me shopping,” said Harry defensively.

“Why the devil don’t they let you wear robes, then?”

Harry barked a laugh. “That’s a good joke,” he said. “And let the neighbors see? Petunia would pass out… Dudley might think it was funny, but then he’d try to set them on fire.”

“I remain perplexed by why you tolerate the existence of a Dudley in your domicile,” said Draco primly, as Hermione settled herself beside him. She was fiddling with some muggle device shaped like a rock, only it had buttons on it, and an antenna she could pull out and wave around. “It seems dreadful.”

“Not really my choice,” said Harry, not without humor. “Big problem with having kids. You can’t get rid of them until they’re eighteen.”

Draco stared at him.

“Dudley is a person?”

“I’ve been thinking about the business with the holidays,” said Ron philosophically. “I’ve figured out a strategy. I’m going to get Fred and George onside, first, and then we’re going to blackmail Percy; Mum won’t care about a million N.E.W.T.s if she finds out he was out-of-bed with a girl. And she’ll give him anything he wants, since it’s his graduation. Then we take it to Dad, and he’ll say yes, obviously—”

“Why on earth wouldn’t you say — but it went after my owl! You talk about it like a wild dog! You’re not telling me the ‘Dudley’ is related to you? By blood?”

“—and it’s the World Cup this summer! So you can come with us, and we’ll go and see it! Dad can get tickets from work, probably. What do you say? June tenth?”

The crosstalk had gone over Harry’s head; he was saying to Draco, “I mean, yeah, unless he got switched in the infirmary ward with a mountain troll, which isn’t, you know, entirely out of the question—” But he was cut off when Ron elbowed him.

“June tenth. You reckon?”

“What?”

“That’s when Mum will expect you back at the Burrow. June tenth. Gives you about a week — that should be enough for your weird family blood wards. Tell your aunt and uncle, if they’ve got a problem with that, they can write Molly Weasley, and she’ll send them a letter they won’t soon forget.”

“Oh. I — that’s — but I couldn’t do that to your family.”

“What, we're not good enough for you?” said Ron jokingly. “You’d crap in tents with Sirius Black, but the Burrow isn’t up to snuff?”

“But your mother, your family… I can’t impose…”

“You’re family, you nitwit. C’mon, say yes. You know she’d be thrilled. She’s already plotting all sorts of ways to fatten you up, she wants to have you up a stone by Christmas.”

Harry beamed.

They played several games of Exploding Snap, in which Draco took great pleasure in handing everyone their arses, and when they were all considerably more cheerful, if more sooty, they bought a large lunch from the tea cart, complete with as many cauldron cakes as Draco’s and Harry’s pockets could jointly buy. Crookshanks curled on Hermione’s lap and nosed his head into Draco’s elbow, and he generously overlooked the amount of orange fur that was disgorged onto his robes. He did not think Hermione sufficiently appreciated his selflessness.

It was late afternoon, and the ridges of London were cutting into the horizon, when something flew into their window.

Ron bellowed, upsetting the remainder of his lunch onto the compartment floor.

It was a tiny owl, carrying a letter that was much too big for it. The owl was so small, in fact, that it kept tumbling over end over end in the train's slipstream. Harry whisked down the window and brought it carefully inside.

The owl dropped its letter onto Harry's seat and began zooming around their compartment, apparently very pleased with itself. Harry's snowy owl clicked her beak with a sort of dignified disapproval; Ulysses gave a discerning croak.

"It's from Sirius!"

"Already?" said Ron mildly. "He doesn't waste time, does he?"

Harry passed the letter around.

Dear Harry,

I hope this finds you before you reach your aunt and uncle. I don't know whether they're used to owl post.

Moony and I are in hiding. I won't tell you where, in case this owl falls into the wrong hands. I have some doubts about its reliability, but it is the best I could find, and it did seem eager for the job. I believe the dementors are still searching for me, but they haven't a hope of finding me here. We are planning to allow some Muggles to glimpse us soon, a long way from Hogwarts, so that the security on the castle will be lifted.

We are not living large, but living happier than I think we have either been for a long time, and we look forward eagerly to the next time we can meet. All of our best wishes and fondest hopes go with you. Be safe; be brave; and look after your friends. If they know what's good for them, they'll look after you, too.

Also! Moony reminded me: I am enclosing something else for you, which I think will make your next year at Hogwarts more enjoyable.

If ever you need me, send word. Your owl will find me.

I'll write again soon.

Love,

Beside the signature lay two muddy pawprints.

"Trite," said Draco.

"What'd they send?" said Ron. "If it's not private, I mean."

Harry shook out the envelope. The other piece of parchment was short and somewhat ratty, as if it had been an afterthought.

I, Sirius Black, Harry Potter's godfather, hereby give him permission to visit Hogsmeade on weekends.

"Sweet, but McGonagall's not going to accept a permission form from a convict."

"Nah, she might," said Ron reasonably. "She's got a soft spot for Harry. You remember that thing with the broom?"

"Do I? I have lost sleep over that thing with the broom. I pray only that the forces of cosmic justice, wheresoever they are, are also losing sleep over the incident we now refer to as 'that thing with the broom.'"

“We won the Cup, get over it.”

Ron was probably right. McGonagall, like many, had a soft spot for Harry, whether or not he had earned it by his own charm, or the possession of two brain cells to breed together. Driving soft spots into people’s heads appeared to be his primary survival talent.

“Hang on,” said Harry, “there’s a bit more, on the back. ‘I thought your friend Ron might like to keep this owl, as it’s my fault he no longer has a rat.’ Aww.”

All turned their gaze critically on the owl, which lacked the mass to tip a scale against a squirrel.

“Well,” said Draco, “on the bright side, it’ll keep your letters brief. He won’t carry more than one page at a time.”

“For goodness’ sake, Ron, don’t listen to him. It’s a perfectly wonderful gift. And just think, it’ll be so nice not to rely on Errol,” said Hermione. “All four of us will have our own.”

Ron studied the owl in apparent consternation over its size. Then he held him out for Crookshanks to sniff. “What do you reckon? Definitely an owl?”

Crookshanks rubbed his head against Ron’s hand. Hermione was beaming like he’d given her ten years’ Christmas presents in advance. Draco felt vaguely suspicious of the whole affair. It was very kitsch.

“Good enough for me! He’s mine.”

At King’s Cross, as the train sighed gray clouds over a flushed London evening, the musical echoes of family reunions filled the smoky and thick summer air. Faces familiar and not swelled out of the brickwork, with open arms and cries of names he recognized much better than he had last year — and he had the strangest sense of a second homecoming, a homecoming that was also a going-away.

Near the end of the platform, Sibelius Nott carved a wide radius into the crowd, none of whom dared to press past the aurors that flanked him. Theo, prying himself apart from a scowling Pansy, stepped without any particular eagerness into that radius, where his father's hand came down on his collar like an iron clamp. Then the sight was lost in a gaggle of furiously embracing Hufflepuffs (he didn't know if the student's family were Hufflepuffs, but the insipid squealing merely seemed to suggest it) and he saw Astoria Greengrass and her parents, huddled together around Astoria's wheelchair.

It surprised him as much as them when, instead of descending the stairs, Daphne — who still wore an eyepatch and bandages over most of her face — hurled herself from the window. Upon a perfect landing, she swept her sister out of her wheelchair, spun her around, and threw her so high in the air that her fingers could have brushed the highest tip of the train's smokestack. Whatever noises of horror her parents made were drowned out by Astoria's cry of joy.

Hermione touched his shoulder, staring. "Is that…?"

The corner of his mouth twitched. He shook his head. "Couldn't be," he said. "I had the same thought, but it's surely someone else."

The crowds parted, and he saw Theo again, standing with his father and the Parkinsons. He gave Draco a thin smile and a wave. Draco returned it.

"Harry," said Ron thoughtfully, "what d'you reckon your aunt would say if my dad asked her what a muggle contraceptive was?"

"I don't know, Ron. I think your dad deserves the chance to find out."

"My thoughts exactly."

“Honestly,” sighed Hermione, as fifty percent of their group — ten percent, if you went by intellect — scurried off together. “One of these days, they’re going to actually breach the Statute of Secrecy, and they’re going to have such an ‘I told you so’ coming to them.”

“Which you’ll then undercut by helping them get out of it,” he said absently. He was looking for his mother.

“Obviously I will. You can’t say ‘I told you so’ to someone in Azkaban.”

“Right, of course.”

His mother stood in a candle of sunlight near the platform entrance. Her hair was coiffed like a magnificent bichromatic snail, and she was wearing a suit of verdant green, with black lacquered buttons that matched the strand of dark pearls around her neck. She was not smiling, but had a tightness around her mouth and cheeks that meant pleasure and excitement, commingled, in anticipation of seeing him.

Hermione followed his gaze. “I suppose I’d better go and find my parents,” she said.

“Yes. Rather. If you like.”

Then he added, “My mother’s already seen you. It wouldn’t be out of order, you know, to go and say hello.”

It didn’t mean anything. But there had been a moment under the Whomping Willow, with a werewolf and a murderer and a horde of dementors, where he’d really thought he was going to die beside her, and that had been harrowing enough; and, having done that, it seemed embarrassing to be skittish about introducing her to his mother.

Things were simpler than you thought they’d be, sometimes. Sometimes things were so easy they felt like cheating. You wouldn’t think that good things could be simple, it wasn't intuitive. But it was true. Sometimes good things could simply happen to a person, for no reason at all, like they'd walked into your compartment on a train.

Without waiting for an answer, he took Hermione by the arm and led her, half-pulling, through the crowds to his mother. Hermione tried to fluff out her hair and hissed: "Wait — I'm wearing muggle clothes. Will that matter?"

"Yes, she'll hate you from sight. The muggle bit is fine, but she hates polyester."

"Really! Do you think I should change? She does know I'm a witch, doesn't she?"

"Of course she'll know you're a witch, you're with me. Keep them on, pink's your color."

"What?"

"Draco!"

He submitted to a brief, crushing embrace. His mother smelled the same way she always did. There was something wonderfully constant about that, like a perennial flower.

She was shorter than she'd been when he left, though. Odd.

It took her only a moment to notice Hermione waiting. "Well, hello!" she said. "Aren't you darling? Do you know Draco?"

Hermione, who had gone owlish with fright, was obviously reevaluating her answer.

He felt sort of bad about being amused, but it was a bit funny. He'd thought the only people who intimidated Hermione were teachers and historians.

And, apparently, his mother.

He interjected before the awkwardness became scalding. “Mother, this is Hermione Granger. She’s the one who keeps ruining the class ranks. Dreadful conversationalist, too, I’ve been talking to her for three years and I still can’t get her to see reason on anything.”

Hermione stood up so straight it looked like she was straining for flight.

“It’s perfectly lovely to meet you, Mrs. Malfoy,” she said stonily. She extended her hand at a forty-five degree angle to her body. At the same time, she gave a trembling bob at the knee, like an abortive curtsy. Draco placed a hand tactfully over his mouth.

Narcissa’s face glowed. “You’re a girl,” she said.

Draco felt his own doom flower deep and darkly in his breast.

Hermione blinked. “Of course I’m a girl,” she said. Her intimidation melted seamlessly into indignation. “What do you mean? Is that so surprising?”

Narcissa hurried to take Hermione’s hands. “No! Not at all surprising! But — oh, he never said you were a girl!”

“He mentioned me before?” said Hermione, in frankly injurious tones of surprise.

“Of course he does, only I’d thought — I thought Granger was a boy in his dorm — you spoke about her so—”

“That’s enough,” said Draco immediately.

“He never mentioned I was a girl?” Hermione’s voice was dangerous.

Narcissa heard it, and hesitated. “Perhaps he did, and I only missed it,” she lied. He loved his mother for that lie, even if it was the worst one he’d ever heard. “Don’t be cross with him, you lovely creature, I’m madly delighted and I shouldn’t want to get him in trouble; only he does love to keep secrets from me! Hermione Granger, what a beautiful name. Is that Shakespeare?"

He had mislocated the danger. The danger lay not with his mother. The danger lay in the conspiracy of women everywhere to ruin his life. He should have suspected and avoided this. In fact good things were never simple, nor did they ever happen to him, and he had been a fool for suspecting otherwise.

"Er, yes, actually. My parents thought I'd never have to worry about being the… er, second Hermione."

"Oh, but I'm sure I have a fourth cousin named Hermione, somewhere," said Narcissa blithely. "What does your family do, dear heart?"

There was a silence like a record scratch. His design had been to avoid that bit of the conversation, perhaps permanently, or until he could maneuver his mother into a private place and explain. However—

"They're muggles," said Hermione bluntly, because her idea of 'hedging' was running headfirst at the bush with an ax.

Narcissa's head inclined several querulous degrees on its axis. His stomach flipped. He felt like he were watching gunmen load a cannon, only he hadn't any idea what they were loading it with.

"Ah," she said. "Muggles. Both of them?"

"Yes," said Hermione fiercely.

"And you…" She looked at Draco.

"They're dentists," he said, after a moment. "In London. They like to read. And go to the theater."

"Oh," said Narcissa.

“And they have a cat. Well, Granger does. The younger Granger. My — this one.”

“I see.”

The heat in the platform seemed to rise. Hermione’s hair floated in a shimmery sun-coated radius around her head. Her face was sort of shiny from sweat. He kept glancing at her to see if he was getting something wrong.

Narcissa drew her hands away from Hermione and smiled. It was a slow, gradual coalescence of kindness, as though she had to work up to it.

“I’m sorry,” she said breathily. “I’m afraid I don’t know — what a dentist is.”

Each word might have cost her a thousand galleons. Draco was proud of her.

“That’s alright,” said Hermione, in a very small voice. “They fix teeth.”

Narcissa nodded quickly. “And is… that business… good?” She glanced furtively at Draco. “Do muggle teeth… require much fixing?”

“I… a normal amount, I’d say.”

“But you don’t… I don’t suppose you want to be a dentist, do you?”

“No,” said Hermione firmly. “It’s a good business, but you see, I’m a witch.”

“...Ah. Of course.”

“But I’m interested in a career in Transfiguration,” she blurted. “With a focus on human Transfiguration. And I’m also interested in civil rights issues concerning magical creatures. There’s such a dreadful amount of work to be done.”

“My dear, that sounds terribly strenuous for you,” said Narcissa. She said for you just a bit too emphatically, to Draco’s ear, for the purposes of innocence; there was a more than passing implication that it might not have been quite so strenuous for someone else — but thank God, Hermione, for whom work was the reason to get out of bed in the morning, never even conceived that possibility.

“But it’s only work,” she said, mystified.

Narcissa blinked.

“Granger’s going to be Minister before she’s thirty,” said Draco. “It’s bad luck for us, because she’ll likely have us out on the street, sweeping trash and holding the door for goblins. Nevertheless, I’m getting in with the administration on the ground floor, so perhaps we’ll land one of the kinder goblin overlords as reward for my troubles.”

“He’s joking, really, I swear. I don’t even know if I want to work for the Ministry. There’s an awful lot I have to do before then, and I don’t even have my O.W.L.s yet. And Draco’s more of a bureaucrat than I am, honestly. If either of us will be Minister—”

“It won’t bloody well be me, will it? I’d have you owling my office at all hours of the night nagging me to fix things.”

“It’d never get done, otherwise!”

“Oh, I’m sure, but they invented this thing called sleep, and those of us who indulge find it does wonders for the temperament. You might try it out, see what happens.”

“You’re one to talk about temperament — you nearly bit Harry’s head off for spilling ink on your Potions essay.”

“And he should count himself lucky he didn’t spill it on yours, because there wouldn’t have been any ‘nearly’ about it. Mother, you’re going to let her talk to me like this?”

Narcissa made the surprised sound of one who had not expected to speak. She was watching them — when talking to Hermione it was strategically unsound to pause for breath or interruption, though he realized belatedly that it might be taken as quite rude if you weren't in the rhythm of it, which people usually weren't — and he was embarrassed, though he didn't think his mother was of a mind to scold. Her eyes swept over them and left nothing but a trail of tingling embarrassment in their wake. Her irises were like small gray pearls, smooth and glassy with a composure that did not appear terribly sound.

"What?" he said hotly.

Narcissa frightened him further by not answering. To Hermione, she said stiffly: "I apologize so very much for my lack of manners. You must visit over the summer, so that we might — so as to allow us to offer our hospitality."

"That's entirely alright," said Hermione, deeply embarrassed. "I wouldn't dream of intruding."

"It wouldn't be an intrusion. I could make up a guest room for you. She'd sleep in the east wing, of course, in the girls' suite."

"Mother!"

"I'm only being clear. You're of an age—"

"Oh, look, my parents," cried Hermione. Draco could have embraced her. "They look really impatient, I have to run."

She hauled her trolley into place, and he realized only then that it was the last time he would see her for several months.

"Wait — hang on. Granger."

She turned around expectantly. The evening sun threw a strain of gold through her hair, like a stripe of pure gilt. He sort of stumbled over his next words, which wasn't like himself at all, and he blamed his mother for disarraying him.

"I'll send you that journal," he said.

"I'll write," she said.

"Alright, then."

"Alright."

He did not know quite how one went about the business of starting a hug; he had never initiated one with anyone besides his mother. He did recall holding out his hand, sort of indeliberately, as if to say: If you absolutely must bring yourself into my space, I will not jinx you for it, and she seemed to understand — being brilliant, naturally — what he was trying to do, and, smiling, took the burden of it off his shoulders.

She put her arms around his chest and squeezed him. He lifted his chin clear of her altitudinous hair and closed his eyes, pretending to tolerate it, when in fact he did not mind it really at all. Her grip was like a warm band of sunlight concentrated around his chest, pressing inward.

"Alright. Good. That's enough, then. You'll wrinkle my shirt."

She let go, perhaps hurriedly — he might have been projecting.

"Well," she said awkwardly, "goodbye!"

"Right. Goodbye," he said, and found himself terribly distracted by the idea that he wanted to keep talking to her. Obviously, he quashed this feeling and sniffed and turned his head, to ignore it.

"Yes. Er… have a good summer."

She turned away to leave again. He called out, more or less without thinking: "Race you through the Runes textbook."

Her nose wrinkled when she grinned. It rearranged all the freckles on her face into new constellations.

“You’ll owe me a book when I win.”

“You’ll owe me a new cassette when I do.”

“Joke’s on you — I’ve already done the first hundred pages.”

“Only the first hundred? I’m sorry, I can slow down if you’d like to catch up.”

“I want the first volume of Chroniculus Punnett,” she called, walking backwards. “Or something by Magdalen Manchurian on the goblin revolts! First edition!”

“So? I want something by that one group Finnegan wouldn’t shut up about. The Moving Stones.”

She laughed. He knew what the real name was.

The crowds closed over her while she was laughing, and she vanished into the sunlit peals of smoke.

Narcissa took his arm.

“So,” she began.

“Yes, Mother. Your hair looks splendid, by the way.”

“Don’t even try,” she said absently. “She’s — I mean, she’s… quite something.”

“Muggle-born.”

“Muggle-born,” said Narcissa, like it was an exotic species of plant.

“Yes. Listen, Mother, it’s like this—”

She put her hand on his wrist.

“I don’t suppose you have… many friends, like her, do you?”

He considered.

“No,” he said, for a given interpretation of what the question meant. He didn’t have many friends, full stop, anyway.

“Well,” she said. “Well.” She nodded. Apropos of nothing, she announced, “Your Great-Uncle Ignatius had a pub in Edinburgh that he liked. On vacations, he would go drinking with the local muggles. We thought he was quite odd, but he said that they had better ale in the muggle pubs. I doubt I could ever tell the difference, but it was his own business, and I imagine that he had — people, there, that he was fond of. Even considering his circumstances.”

“...Mother?”

“You know your Great Aunt Cedrella married a Weasley, of course. We couldn’t see her after the disinheritance, naturally, but I was given to understand, as a child, that sometimes my grandfather would — disappear, for an afternoon. And that there were certain offshore accounts, listed under my grandfather’s name, that found themselves routinely depleted, though they weren’t tied to any of the family vaults. It was an open secret.”

“I have no idea what you mean to imply, and frankly doubt that I would like to.”

“My Great Aunt Cassiopeia played gobstones with a muggle-born partner. A woman. She never married, you know. Of course, no one would have suggested anything improper about her, she conducted herself immaculately in public. And so we agreed that what was done privately, out of sight, was her affair.”

“Mother, I really would prefer you cut to the quick and gouge my ears off. This is cruelty.”

“But you understand, darling, don’t you? And you will be careful?”

“I’m always careful,” he said, stung, “and — anyway, I’m a Malfoy. I can do as I like.”

“I’m sure you can,” she said quietly.

This had the effect of a bludger to the back of the head, when he had been expecting one to come from the front.

“What do you mean?”

“Oh, you’re tall,” she said. “I forgot how tall boys get, at your age. We have to get you new robes, your ankles are showing, it’s an affront to the family. I’m sure the tailor is still open. What do you think? A quick run to Diagon Alley, and then dinner in London? We can even catch a show, afterward, if you’d like.”

“I’m flattered that you bother to ask me, as if you didn’t buy out a box last week.”

“Aha! You caught me. I wanted an evening with my special boy. You must escort me to Azkaban, for my terrible crimes.”

He sighed and let her take his arm. “Just the first act.”

She patted his wrist. “Oh, the first two, darling. The first two, surely. Everyone knows the first act is only setting the stage for Act Two.”

“Just two, then, and no more. I’m dead tired from the train, and I haven’t the patience for yodeling men in tights.”

“Yes, two, of course. Goodness gracious, will any of these bellhops deign to take your trolley, or shall I have to Summon one from the States? I hardly recognize this place, it’s so overrun. Hello? Yes, you, there — do you imagine my son ought to carry this himself?”

They would be there through the very last note, for certain, but his mother would manage it slowly, in increments — “Oh, darling, just ten more minutes, until this progression resolves" — and he would be dead on his feet by the time the last one finished. Narcissa could be neither outwitted nor outlasted in a contest of wills. That was alright, though. The intermission would give him time to catch up on Runes. And if he finished that, he could get started on his first letter: Dear Granger. It's a lovely evening, here at the Royal Wizarding Opera, and I regret to inform you of your impending defeat. I will accept tribute by way of praise, tears, and long-form odes to my brilliance, which you may submit by owl post with your next letter…

It was a mild, soft blue evening, and Wizarding London lay under a silver film of smoke and industrial blear. The streetlamps blazed like the flare of Lumos on the rows of a hundred black wand-tips. Somewhere out in that long dark forest of chimneys, there was a girl with her Runes textbook balanced open on her lap, reading furiously. And somewhere in the Scottish highlands, there was a castle waiting for him to come home.

END OF VOLUME ONE

Hey! You! Thank you for reading!

By now, you probably know what's coming: I'll be taking a short hiatus while I finish writing the fourth book. I don't think it'll last too long, because I have a good bank of chapters built up, I just need some time for edits and formatting. Fourth year marks the start of Volume Two, where the books get longer, the plots get darker, and both rating and tags will change. It's also going to be longer than the first three. (For perspective, GoF is about 30% longer than PoA.) Will the difference be that stark for me? I hope not, but if we've learned anything so far, it's that I treat word counts as a pole-vaulting challenge, not a limbo stick.

I can't express how much sincere affection and love I feel for everyone who's stuck with me this far. Every writer has days when they wake up and feel the urge to scrap everything and run away from their project, because they're scared it's not perfect or as brilliant as it was in their head. Those days are the enemy, and if it weren't for your comments, I don't know who'd win. It's such an incredible privilege to be able to go to my inbox and have people there cheering for these characters. If I could, I would thank you all by name.

Love,

Chapter 31: Narcissa

[img: https://i.imgur.com/pz8iefP.png]

Outside in the cold distance

A wildcat did growl

Two riders were approaching

And the wind began to howl.

—Jimi Hendrix, “All Along the Watchtower”

It was always the same dream.

Andy was a poet. Not a very good one, but then, good teenage poets were so rare as to be a contradiction in terms. She told Narcissa about a half-blood American poetess who married a British muggle and written a lot of lovely poetry and a novel, and Narcissa, assuming that this witch was in the way of an aspirational figure to Andy, asked politely how her career was going now; and Andy said that she had gone mad and killed herself. And Narcissa had said, perhaps less sensitively than she could have done, I daresay I should too, if I had to marry a muggle, and Andy had burst into tears — which would have alarmed her more had it not been a daily occurrence — and said she didn’t get it, Cissa, it was about freedom, and Narcissa said what freedom, the bint was mad and then she was dead, and the muggle who killed her is alive and selling her books, do you call that freedom? I call that evil.

I shut my eyes and all the world drops dead.

When she ran away, Andy left them presents. For Bella, she left a copy of Wuthering Heights that Bella touched but once, to deposit it in the fireplace, and Narcissa received a poetry collection. She hid it from Bella to spare it from the flames.

I lift my lids and all is born again.

She had never told this to anyone — not even Severus — but it was always the same dream. She was in Malfoy Manor, and she was holding her son, and the world was falling, her sister and her husband swept away at once in a bath of green lights that shone from every window.

When the dreams began, she recorded them in a little journal in her bedside table, but once Draco was old enough to snoop — which was quite young, he was such a clever boy — she burned them. She screamed when she was asleep, she knew that. She had made Dobby swear to cut out his tongue if he ever told, and she Obliviated the maid. But when it came to her son, there was nothing left for her but denials, and now Draco rejected even those, with the curl of his lip that had once been his father's.

Narcissa woke up and sighed. The sky above her was the phosphorescent darkness of the English country.

She sat up and found her feet were wet. They were sunk ankle-deep in the waters of the lake, and her toes had taken on an undesirable blue pallor. She tried to move them. They did not comply.

She lifted her arm and read from the bars of ink that lanced her forearm.

10 August, 1994. Lucius is dead. Draco is alive. Trust Severus Snape.

When none of these things surprised her, she congratulated herself, and erased them with her wand. Then she rose and made her way home.

She dressed in the dark, without bothering to light a candle, in clothes she could part with willingly: culottes, an old blouse, and a double-breasted overcoat of black satin with only a little silver embroidering around the collar, a thin speckled ruff of fur. A modest showing, for her taste. She tied her hair up with a silver claw and pulled a black glove over her left hand, leaving her wand-hand free and her signet ring uncovered. Her finger brushed over the jewel, a bone-white band of petrified stone studded with a black diamond like a sightless eye.

“A mask is cowardice,” she said.

“You sound like Bella.”

“Bella isn’t as foolish as you thought,” she told him. “She was always smarter than you all gave her credit for.”

She glanced in the vanity mirror. The room was empty.

“I still love you,” she said.

No one answered her.

A silver chain hung by her bedside. When pulled, it made no sound, but a minute later there came a tap on the door.

“Good morning, Lady Malfoy.”

Briselda looked tired. She carried a tray with eggs and coffee, and a small vial of lavender potion.

“Good, you’re awake. I’m going out. Feed that to whatever creature wants it, I don’t.”

She took the potion and uncorked it. It smelled of sulfur and indignity. She drank deeply. It tasted worse.

“You would think,” she said, replacing the vial carefully, “that the greatest potioneer of his age would be able to ensorcel his concoctions so as to delimit the flavor of mouse droppings. Don’t you agree?”

“Surely, m’lady.”

“Or, if the droppings are intractable, might one cut them with a more pleasant flavor, such as chalk? I suppose such trifling ruminations have kept me from being a great potioneer. Thank you, Briselda, that will be all.”

“Does m’lady want her coffee?”

“No, m’lady doesn’t. In fact m’lady is contemplating a finger of bleach.”

“...Does m’lady like for me to fetch some?”

There was much to be said for Briselda, but none of it about her brains.

“No, thank you. Go light the fires. I shan’t be back until this evening, so don’t bother with a place for me.”

The Clarifying Potion worked quickly. The world came into focus as if a grain or tinted lens had been removed, and she could detect much more clearly the note of sourness in Briselda’s tone when she said, “As m’lady likes,” and trudged out of the room.

Getting a bit mouthy, was Briselda. Narcissa wasn’t of a mind to take much of any tone from a witch who hadn’t even finished her O.W.L.s. Andy had finished her O.W.L.s, and Andy hadn’t enough sense to fill a thimble.

It was a quarter-mile walk to the Manor gates.

No one could Apparate onto Malfoy Manor. The enchantments would splinch anyone who tried. That had been Abraxas’ idea, since he’d built the place, and she had to admire the nastiness. Now, there was a man who understood the importance of property.

A vile human being, of course, but vile human beings could be useful in all sorts of ways. Albus Dumbledore had proven himself tremendously.

With the gates secured safely behind her, she Apparated.

The villagers of Little Hangleton still called it “the Riddle House,” though she did not know why, or what the riddle was, if it had ever existed. It stood on a hill overlooking the village, its windows punctured, its roof thinned of shingles, veiled in ivy as if ashamed to show its broken face. The gate hung loose from a twisted hinge and parted at the touch of her boot.

So it went. A family had lived here, once, and then it had died, and no one had come to take care of it. Sic transit gloria mundis.

A wave of her wand revealed nothing in the way of wards or protective charms. He was gone, then.

Movement in the shadows by the door, a rippling of air. She twirled her wand through her fingers, waiting.

A black shape melted out of the shade. It resolved into a ghostly candle-wick of a person, with contemptible hair and the shabby robes of an academic, a high-collared cossack wrinkled from wear and shrouded in patches, which no amount of cruel badgering had ever convinced him to part with. He dressed like a poor boy who was ashamed of it, and rather than ever dressing differently, he persisted in it with pathological stubbornness, as if he could bully the world into not caring.

“Severus.”

“Narcissa,” he said, and bowed, slightly.

What she felt was not comfort — it would be inappropriate for the sight of any man not her husband to bring her comfort — but she would admit to a certain relief at the sight of her son's godfather, in the same way she was relieved to close the deadbolt on a door, and relieved to watch a man collapse at the end of her wand. Somehow that ghostly little man, with his homely sneer and his middle-class frocks, had become the only sincere assurance in the world that danger had passed.

Another sound came from the shadows, this time a honking sneeze. Something small and dark moved in the grass by her foot.

She pointed her wand at it. Electricity crackled over the tip.

The rat scurried out of her way and transformed into a balding man in brown rags.

"Merlin's sake, Wormtail. I nearly cursed you."

"Sorry," said Pettigrew, who was clearly not. "I've been hiding out in the gamekeeper's house."

"Why."

He kneaded his own fleshy hands like dough. "D-D-Dumbledore is after me. He wants me dead, I know it. I think he's sent s-spies to follow me…"

Narcissa glanced at Severus, who did not find this nearly amusing as she did.

She pressed her lips together and folded her hands behind her back.

"...I overheard one asking about rat catchers at the Hanged Man…"

"Albus Dumbledore has far more important concerns than the whereabouts of an impotent coward," said Severus. "It is humiliating to hear you ideate your own significance. I am far more likely to kill you than he."

“Yes, I know that,” said Pettigrew peevishly. “You’ve only offered half a dozen times since you came back. Though I never thought you’d have the nerve to call me a coward, Snivellus.”

Severus’ wand was flush against his throat before he could so much as twitch. The lines in Severus’ neck were white and rigid as bone, sculpted by the sort of rage that burned so hot it crossed back into cool serenity.

Narcissa twitched. They were useless. Children. She could have killed them both, and done the job her bloody self, if the madman only trusted her.

“I beg your pardon, gentlemen. Shall I return home? I can pop back in when you’re ready to work, if time is what you require. I don’t mean to be rude, but schoolboy quibbling bores me tremendously, and if neither of you are going to kill each other, then this is a waste of my time.”

Severus’ glare could have flayed a layer of skin off an animal; but Narcissa had stared down Walburga Black and lied about her son’s smoking habit. Twice. She lifted her eyebrows.

He lowered his wand. They stepped apart.

Pettigrew, massaging his neck resentfully, spat: “We should have let Remus have you.”

“Pettigrew, find your dignity, if you can’t find your sense,” she said.

“What? I don’t know where he gets off blaming me — I got tortured because of him, you know.”

“For nine minutes,” said Severus quietly.

“Yes! So what, nine minutes? Under the Cruciatus Curse? I should have been welcomed as a conquering hero for five! And he didn’t have to torture you at all.” Pettigrew’s leer was remarkably nasty. “You ran your mouth like you were paid to.”

“Pettigrew, honestly.”

“I mean, here’s a thought, you miserable greasetrap: if I was in love with a girl, and I knew she had a baby, I wouldn’t go nattering to the Dark Lord about any newborns, prophesied or otherwise! D’you wonder how he even knew the Potters had a kid? I don’t see how he would, unless one of his dear lieutenants happened to be obsessed with Lil—”

Severus lunged, and Narcissa didn’t stop him. At that point, he had a right to it.

His wand lashed a line across Pettigrew’s mouth. Nothing changed, but Pettigrew staggered as though he had taken a heavyweight’s knuckles to the nose. He choked, clamped a hand over his mouth, and dropped to his knees. Several convulsions rocked him, and then he vomited a string of teeth into the lawn, pattering like pearls into the earth. When he was finished he sat down hard, and gagged around a soft, bloody maw of a mouth.

His tongue slipped ineffectually against his gums, and he let out panicked grunts and squeals as he realized that he could not speak.

She lifted her eyebrow. “Is that a new one?”

Severus held his wand tightly enough to snap it, breathing hard. Pettigrew wailed, dribbling blood down his chin.

“Well, either way, kill him or fix it. I’m not going to look at that while we work.”

Severus gave an inarticulate snarl — “Eloquent,” she said — and stabbed his wand at Pettigrew. The man hunched over, groaning, and when he rose again he sported a row of fresh, if bloody, incisors.

“I hate you,” he wailed.

Severus turned to Narcissa. “It is inside,” he said.

Neither of them spared a glance for Pettigrew as they went in.

The smell of decay laid thick as the snowfall of dust on each surface. A row of mullioned windows on either side of the front cast the sickly gray light of morning through a cosmos of spiderwebs. The door to the kitchen was unlocked and un-warded. It must have been a muggle house, then — but she could not imagine what the Dark Lord would want with a muggle house.

On the landing, at the end of a dim passage, a dim light poked its finger under the far door. From behind it came the sounds of a crackling fire, the first evidence of life to be found in the old place. She hesitated, and let Severus move first into the room, but he pushed open the door and revealed it empty.

Perhaps it had once been a very nice room, but such a time, if it ever existed, could not be recalled by looking. A deep stone fireplace sat into a wall of dark bookshelves, and floors of black wood scraped clean of lacquer now chipped and threaded splinters through threadbare carpets. The ashes in the grate had cooled from gold to dead white, and the room smelled foul. The reason for the room’s smell was in part its want of cleaning, and in part the dead body on the floor.

The corpse had been a plump woman with sandy hair, dressed in a frilly peasant frock of camel brown, a garment which could hardly look worse for being torn open at the neck. Two puncture marks drove deep into her throat, perfectly symmetrical.

She rolled the woman onto her back with a shove from her boot. “Vampirism?”

It was one way of staying alive, though not one the Dark Lord would favor. He loathed half-breeds. They’d cleaned out a nest of them from Transylvania, back in the good days of the war; Constance lost her husband in the fight.

“His familiar,” said Severus quietly. “A snake.”

“The Dark Lord doesn’t have a familiar.”

“Now he does.”

He had very dark irises — so deep brown they were black in all but the keenest lights. It made it easy for him to hide what he was feeling. Fear, however, had a way of making itself known.

Perhaps she was only projecting.

“You’ve seen him, then?” she said quietly.

“No.”

“Then how do you know? Because we’ve seen hoaxes before.”

He nodded towards Pettigrew, who was sulking by the door.

She rounded on him.

“You’re his new handservant?”

“Oh, you’re surprised? Did you think it would be either of you?” he snapped. “After you’d forsaken him? The only people he can trust are in Azkaban. I’m the only one who’s free and alive—”

“For now,” said Severus stonily.

Pettigrew swallowed. “I will be rewarded for my loyalty in this, his time of need.”

“The same promise was made to you fourteen years ago. Have you been rewarded?”

“The first time, you mucked it up! You squealed! And now you’ll come crawling for forgiveness, and I — I will receive boons. He promised.”

“You poor, insipid wretch.” She wondered what would be left of his dull mind, after the Dark Lord finished with him. Death first to cowards and traitors. “You will never be a Death Eater.”

“Oh? Oh, I won’t, will I?” He wrenched back his sleeve. “What’s this, then?”

A knot of black scarring marred his forearm. Her breath was driven out of her lungs in one cold blow.

His head swung between them, grinning savagely — courting horror, shock, impressment. Like it was another one of his old boys’ club’s pranks. Peter Pettigrew had never taken himself seriously; even when his friends became men and then soldiers, he remained a boy, desperate for a safe harbor, incapable of looking darkness in the face. Narcissa turned back to the body on the floor.

Did he think he was the first stupid boy to wear a death sentence on his arm? Did he think he would impress her, waving it around, like a flag?

“Bury it in the garden, do you think?” she said, twitching up her sleeves.

“It must be unrecognizable,” said Severus. “She cannot be found.”

“Burn it first, then.”

“Quite.”

A sweep of her wand lifted the corpse into the air. It floated along beside her like it was buoyed on a stretcher, and in this way she carried it back down the stairs, out to the garden, where the first rays of sunlight were splintering over the hills.

Severus gouged a small dirt pit from the lawn with his wand. She lowered the body into it.

“I don’t suppose she has a wand to dispose of,” she said. When Severus had no answer, she turned to Pettigrew, who hunkered down on the porch steps. “Do you know?”

“The Dark Lord took it,” muttered Pettigrew.

“She’s not a muggle?”

Pettigrew shrugged.

“Answer me.”

“Some stupid bint named Bertha Jorkins. Ran into her in a pub. She almost hexed my nose off before I knocked her out. I was sneezing blood for weeks.”

“A crime for which she surely deserved to die,” said Severus.

“Where you get your piety, I certainly don’t know,” said Pettigrew. “Talked to Barty lately?”

“Barty’s dead,” Narcissa interrupted, relishing the flicker of shock on his piglike face. Severus did not even have the decency to look grateful for the change of subject, and it was his fault the bastard had been in Azkaban. “So is Evan. You’ve been gone a long time. You’d do well to remember.”

She snapped her wrist and tossed a jet of blue flames into the pit. They caught the edge of the witch’s dress and licked hungrily up her body, twining around her neck, and erupting in a crackling fire when they touched her hair. Rancid smoke guttered from the fire pit in thick black gnarls of miasma.

She pressed her hand over her mouth. The smell of fire reminded her of Draco’s birth.

A son was a terrible thing. She had wanted a daughter; she would have liked a daughter more, but loved her less. A daughter would betray her. She couldn't help it. She would grow up clever and beautiful and hungry, and when the time came, she would forsake her family, and leap into the arms of the first passing man who promised her the galaxy. That was what the Black daughters did: they lied and dreamed and betrayed each other and moved on. It was easy to love one; they were loving, too, in their own way.

But sons— no one wise ever loved a son of the House of Black. It wasn't because they were unworthy. With few exceptions, the Black sons were noble as they came, and every bit as beautiful as their sisters. But the Black boys had stars for names and they lived like it, high and bright and best worshiped at a distance, for they broke every heart they ever touched, whether they meant to or not.

So she would have preferred a girl. But Narcissa Black would never bear a daughter.

What she bore instead was nine pounds and two ounces of the only thing she had ever done that was good: a tiny Lucius with her nose and her smirk and hair like snow, and that fine proud conqueror's laugh that had been Bella's before it was his, the Black laugh, the vixen's laugh, that enchanting, deathless sound. Nobody heard that laugh without falling in love, just a little, even if only while it lasted. She could see it in the way people listened, when Draco spoke to them — attentive, mindful, as they should be — and when he laughed, the world held its breath. He was so beautiful when he was laughing he was hardly human, like something made from marble wandered off its plinth.

When enough time had passed that the corpse was charred beyond recognition, Severus rolled his wand over the pit in a slow arc. The earth folded over itself like a coverlet, cloaking the body in a thick tongue of dirt, and suffocated the fire. Black coils billowed from the earth and stung at her eyes, turning the air sour.

“Finally,” grunted Pettigrew, lumbering to his feet. “Well. Toodle-oo, you twats. I have to go see a man about a wand.”

He raked up his sleeve.

“Severus,” she warned, but Severus didn’t need prompting: his hand had flickered as soon as Pettigrew stood, and a red bolt caught him in the chest. He toppled over.

Once he fell still, she stepped over him and snatched up his wrist.

“It’s real. That horrid fool,” she said. “I thought perhaps he’d done it himself.” She threw down his wrist with a disgusted noise and rose to her feet. “He should have stayed dead.”

“And so he would have, if not for Sirius Black.”

“Don’t say that name to me.”

“I shall say whatever pleases me, for one, I am not a Black, and for two, if I were, your practice of familial shunning still strikes me as jejune.”

“You wouldn’t understand it.”

“Forgive my presumption, Lady Malfoy,” he murmured. “When one’s blood bears such an indelible taint—”

“No one cares about your father, Severus.”

“So you say.”

The house creaked riotously, resettling on its foundations.

Severus drew his wand casually over the smoking grave, casting a Siphoning Charm on some of the smoke. “Is my godson alive?”

“Draco is quite well, thank you for asking. He’s read his way through half the summer and flown the rest. I’m pleased to say he got his father’s taste for academia, not mine.”

“A house-elf could say as much.”

“I detest whoever allowed you to believe yourself funny,” she said. “For the record, I was a prefect.”

“How the years have matured you. Has Draco liberated any more of the staff?”

The upturned lilt in the end of the sentence was Severus’ version of a smile.

“We’ve had words about that,” she said.

“I expect so. What would Lucius have said, I wonder?”

Lucius would never have allowed it. But Lucius had never raised a son alone, and never had to worry about losing his trust.

There were things more important than one helpful vermin.

“One of my aunts made a hobby of hunting house-elves on horseback in her teenage years,” she said. “Her parents had to borrow help from the neighboring barons. Freeing one elf is hardly the end of the world.”

“Does he know of your activities?”

“No. He’s away for the rest of August.”

“The Cup?”

“With the Weasleys.”

Severus’s cheek twitched.

“You listen to me.”

“I don’t care.”

“At least they’re wizards. One of his friends doesn’t even come from wizardry.”

“It is astonishing,” said Severus, mostly to himself, “how many things people presume I care about.”

“I’m sure you’ve seen her. Uppity little thing she is, too — and would you care to tell me why I had to hear about that development three years late? Were you ever planning to inform me, or did you intend to wait until he turned seventeen, snapped his wand, and ran off to muggle London? Don’t answer that. I’m furious with you.”

“As if I have nothing better to do. Do I seem like a man of leisure? I have never thought to ask.”

“Why am I here?” she demanded. “You’re more than capable of burying a body.”

He finished siphoning smoke, and the last trails dissipated into the lusterless morning.

“I am a messenger.”

“Obviously,” she said impatiently.

“He wants to know if you will still honor the terms of the agreement.”

Sometimes she wondered if it was too long since she’d last hexed him. His hesitation rankled even more than his audacity. “Then you’ve wasted my time,” she said coldly. “Our accord remains in force. So long as he understands—”

“It is perfectly understood.”

“Good. What on earth does he want, then?” She tried not to sound plaintive. “A mark on my arm?”

“Harry Potter is in danger.”

Personally, she did not think this was any sort of revelation. But it seemed to trouble him, and she understood why.

She’d known Lily Evans only a little. For a mudblood, she was clever enough. Like most of her cohort, she’d been brave and stupid from it, quick to ask questions, furious about all the wrong things, and never smart enough to keep her mouth shut when it mattered. A remarkable talent at Runes, it was said, though Narcissa had never bothered with all that. For a while she had lurked around in the Slytherin common room, where Severus trailed her like a lost niffler, until one day she stopped, and that was the end of that.

It had given her a minor heart attack to see her spawn at King’s Cross, grinning at Draco and Molly Prewett’s umpteenth brat — the very grin that James Potter had worn the last time she ever saw his face. The one they plastered on every newspaper in Britain, the night he died.

The grin for which Severus’s life had been ruined.

She didn’t understand most things about her son’s godfather. How you could love anyone who didn’t love you back, for instance, even for a moment, let alone thirteen years.

A brisk wind raked up from the valley. They were far from Wiltshire, and even the encroachment of daybreak failed to shed any warmth on the cold shadow of Riddle House. She folded her arms against the chill. “Does he have a plan?” she asked.

“Doubtlessly. He intends to infiltrate Hogwarts. Pettigrew claims there is a rat in the Ministry, and after what happened to the Greengrass girl, Dumbledore has been forced to make compromises with the Board to retain control of the school. Events are happening this year which he would not otherwise permit. The wheels are turning far faster than we anticipated.”

It had happened this way in the first war, too: there was a moment before everything broke open, when everyone knew what was coming, but nobody knew what it would look like. And life moved on, in its slow, normal way, full of its trivial pleasures, as they frittered away the little time they knew they had left. Dark Marks went up in the news, parents went missing, aurors disappeared, and still, the seventeen-year-old braves of Slytherin House drank martinis in broom cabinets and smoked the overpriced cigarettes Sirius smuggled in, as if no one would ever die, and as if nothing could ever fall.

That was the world she came of age in. She felt as though the past thirteen years had been merely a long summer abroad, and now, as the winds turned, she was finally coming home.

“I didn’t mean him, Severus. Tell me what Albus Dumbledore wants from me.”

The Burrow

Chapter 32: The Burrow

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

Draco stood alone at the gate to Malfoy Manor. He held his trunk. He knew he would regret this.

He checked his wristwatch, sighed, rubbed his eyes, and checked it again. It was dawn. He really should have just thrown etiquette to the wind and Flooed.

Moments later, a house-elf popped into existence beside him. A floral bucket hat balanced on his wide ears.

“Mister Draco! Dobby is so glad to be seeing you! Dobby has been to such places!”

For Dobby, such places could mean the Hogwarts wine cellars, or the moon.

“He has been to wizard cities! Poorto! And Barceloona! His friends are going on without him today to Majorca. He will join them tonight! But Dobby is sorry for rambling and for being late also. If Mister Draco is not needing anything else, is he ready?”

“I’m not sure Mister Draco gets a say in the matter.”

“Sir?”

“Never mind,” he said. “Geronimo, or what-have-you.”

He permitted Dobby to take his hand. With a crack, the house-elf Apparated, and they appeared in a broad field of golden grass, tinged pink by the growing light of dawn.

A forested valley opened up on either side of them like a rose of crumpled green velvet. Full-bodied trees, pussywillows and elm and birch, feathered the horizon, while a yellow ribbon of country rode ribboned back and forth through the verdant hills and embroidered the hem of a gleaming white river. On a bit of wood hammered up clumsily to a post, there was a sign that read: THE BURROW.

“This is most charming!” said Dobby, who would have said as much of a tar pit.

It was not an utter circle of hell, but he reserved judgment until he saw the house. He hefted his wand to cast a Levitating Charm on his trunk — stopped himself — and sighed. Rolling out an ache in his shoulder, he hauled it up the uneven dirt path. He thought longingly of the porters at the Ritz-Carlton.

A quarter-mile down the drive, they came upon a house. He had never seen a house sustaining so much weight on so little structural integrity. It looked like someone had taken a perfectly good Tudor cottage and squashed it under a stack of several other, smaller Tudor cottages, smelted them together with some stilts and bulging brickwork, and peppered some chimneys on top as a garnish. It lay in the nestled arm of the riverbank, a towering patch job of timber and whitewash, whistling smoke from one of its flotilla of chimneys.

It was actually not an unpleasant place, until you remembered that nine people lived in it, and then it became downright terrifying.

One of the upper-level windows swung open, and a crop of bright red hair sprouted from it like a fast-blooming carnation. “Oi! It’s Malfoy! Least, I think it is,” he added. “The last weaselly blond git who came around wanted to sell insurance.”

“That you, Weasley?”

“You’re gonna have to be more specific! There’s more than one of us!”

“Lord help me. It’s like I’m back in Gryffindor.”

“Worse!” said another voice brightly. A second window on the floor above Ron’s popped open, and out came another redheaded young man with long thick ringlets bound up in a ponytail, wearing a leather duster. “We’ve got a full house! Hello, there. Ignore my brother’s manners.”

“Two Wheezys!” said Dobby, greatly pleased.

“If only,” muttered Draco. He raised his voice. “Easily done, I’ve had years of practice. Introduce yourself, ginger ruffian.”

“Ha! I’m Bill! Hang for just a second, there, we’ll nip down and help.”

“Wot?” said Ron indignantly, but then something yanked him back from the window, and the shutters snapped closed. There was a small commotion inside the house, and then the front door burst open, and the pair of Weasley boys raced each other up the footpath. They were neck and neck until a Jelly-Legs Jinx snared Ron’s ankles, and he went pirouetting into a hedge.

“Bill! No fair! I can’t do magic!”

“Tough beat. Should’ve been born sooner.” Bill flicked his long hair out of his eyes and grinned at Draco. Upon closer inspection, the boy was built like his brothers — a frame like a stringbean with biceps — but he carried himself with all the confidence of his height and struck an impressive silhouette, besides. He wore an earring with a fang pendant and faded, washed-out denim pants in the muggle style, with rips slitting through the legs (were his parents in such dire straits they couldn’t afford thread?) and a pair of dragon-hide boots that lifted him another three inches off the ground. He looked like a fashion spread Katie Bell would hide in her nightstand.

“You’re the Malfoy kid,” he said.

“Was it the hair?”

“And the sneer,” he said, still grinning. “Ron says nice things about you, sometimes. Not often, but sometimes. Ow, kid.”

“He’s lying,” Ron said to Draco. “I’d never.”

He reached out as if to give him a hug, and then, perhaps seeing the hesitation on Draco’s face, lowered his arm for a handshake instead. They shook hands, and Ron slapped him on the back.

“Thank Merlin,” said Draco. “I should have gone straight home. Now, Weasley Senior, could I trouble you for a Levitation Charm? Any longer with this trunk, and I’m likely to lose an arm.”

“Anything for a guest. Also, hello,” he said to Dobby. “You’re not his, are you?”

“No, sir! Dobby is a free elf! Dobby is only here as a favor to Mister Draco! Hello, Wheezy!”

“Hullo, Dobby,” said Ron. “Nice hat.”

“Good,” said Bill. He jerked his thumb at the Burrow. “Either of you want some coffee or sausages? Mum’s cooking fit to feed the RAF.”

“Dobby must be going,” said Dobby reluctantly, as though the loss of sausages would cause him anguish in the nights to come. “Dobby has promised his friends he is to join them again, and Dobby is only seeing Draco as far as the Wheezy’s house. But he is ever so happy to see Mister Draco’s friends, and to make your acquaintance, Mister Wizard!”

Bill bit his lip, his eyes twinkling. “Yeah, for sure,” he said. “Nice meeting you, little man. Safe travels.”

“Thank you, Dobby,” said Draco.

It wasn’t quite a dismissal, but it wasn’t not, either. Some habits died slow.

Dobby seemed not to notice. He cradled Draco's shinbone in a loving embrace, and then performed the same on Ron's kneecaps, and Bill's. Then he snapped his fingers, and disappeared.

"Alright, Mister Wizard," said Ron. He pointed at Draco's trunk. "Chop chop."

The entrance to the Burrow did not inspire confidence. Above the doorframe the wall had sagged under the weight of the brick atop it, and been reinforced with a hastily applied listing pillar. A pigpen was tucked under one gabled window, and a herd of swine grunted contentedly in the sun-baked mud. A clamor of voices cut through the clear August morning.

"Mum's in good form today," yawned Bill. "Fair warning, if she yells, it means she likes you. Could mean she doesn't like you, of course, but that's not as common. She likes most people, does Mum."

"Grand," said Draco tightly. He wondered, not for the first time, why the hell his mother couldn't have delayed her trip until he was at school. "Just how I'd like to start my vacation. Are those your animals?"

"Nah, they're our neighbors," said Ron carelessly. He slung open the door. "Came around at the wrong time, caught Mum in a bad mood, you know how it is. But I think we've got enough for Christmas hams, so I wouldn't worry about it, if I was you."

"Though she was complaining about not having enough chickens," said Bill thoughtfully.

Then the two bastions of mirth, pleased with their own hilarity, laughed their way into the house.

The inside of the Burrow was bigger than the outside. This shouldn't have surprised him, but it did, perhaps because it still wasn't all that large anyway, considering the number of people trying to fit inside it. The first floor was composed of a tiny wood kitchen, most surfaces of which were covered in bubbling cast-iron pots and pans, emitting the wonderful smell of fresh bread and bacon grease. There was a scrubbed-wood dining table, a small cast-iron stove in lieu of a fireplace, and enough clutter to fill several collectors' homes: secondhand books, old magazines, frayed ragdolls and chipped wooden toys, houseplants, photographs, and post that spilled over the side table and into the nearby wastebasket, which overflowed. An owl roosted on one of the upper shelves, above an old grandfather clock that had not two but seven hands, each crowned with a freckled face. Draco did not get to inspect it any further, however, because he was accosted by a howl that made him reach for his wand.

"GEORGE AND FREDERICK WEASLEY! "

One of the twins — moving too quickly to say which — skidded around the corner and vaulted the table in a practiced leap. "Sorry, Mum!"

His counterpart was right behind him, clearing the table with an identical jump. He grasped a fistful of white papers. "Yeah, sorry, Mum! Gonna just go take care of these—"

"YOU COME BACK THERE THIS INSTANT—"

A spell came arcing out of the kitchen; the twins seized each other and dropped behind the chairs, where it sailed over their heads. It was here that they caught sight of Draco.

"Well, if it isn't Blondie!"

"A houseguest! What timing! What serendipity!"

"What a perfect occasion to welcome this upstanding young man into our house!"

"Now don't be disturbed by the ruckus, Malfoy—"

“—it’s about to die down rather quickly, if I’m not mistaken—”

“Bit of a domestic, you know how it is—”

“—suppose he doesn’t, though, Freddie, you think his mum ever yells at him?”

“Why, no, Georgie, I don’t,” said Fred, ecstatically. “I think his mum never gets mad at all.”

“Quite right, quite right. Together, then?”

“There’s no other way.”

They shouted together: “Hey, Mum!”

“WHAT!”

Molly Weasley swung around the corner, her face red and shiny from the understandable exertion of breaking the sound barrier, clenching a wooden spoon in one hand and her wand in the other.

There was a long, meaningful beat.

“Good morning, Mrs. Weasley,” said Draco politely. George kissed his fingertips. Fred was miming a round of opera applause.

“Hello, Draco, dear,” she said, breaking into a beatific smile. “Welcome to the Burrow. Would you like some coffee?”

“Who is that? Molly?” Arthur Weasley poked his head around the corner, spotted Draco, and gave a cheerful wave. “Oh, hello, there! Glad you got in alright! No trouble?”

“None at all.”

“That’s splendid. Ron, why don’t you show Draco where he’s sleeping?”

“Great,” said Ron. “Sure. Where is he sleeping?”

Molly huffed. “For the hundredth time, we’re putting the younger boys in Ron’s room, with Fred and George, and the older boys are in the twins’ room, and Hermione is with Ginny. It’s perfectly simple.”

“Except for the part where we don’t keep our room,” piped up Fred.

“Never was too clear on that part,” added George.

Molly turned her head slowly to look at them. They fell silent.

“Right, up we go, then,” said Ron quickly. “You can manage your bags, can’t you, Ma—”

The spoon swung around to accuse him. “Ronald! He is a guest!”

“George and I can carry it,” Fred piped up. “We’re bigger than Ron is —”

“You stay where you are.”

The twins slumped, rooted to the spot. Bill gave a soft laugh and slipped past his mother, dropping a kiss on her temple as he sidled into the kitchen. On the way, he traded places with Ginny, who was wearing an oversized Chudley cannons t-shirt and the whitewashed muggle denim pants that the whole clan of them seemed to favor.

“Let me at it, why don’tcha,” she said cheerfully to Draco. “Today’s bicep day.” Her t-shirt laid bare the best muscles a thirteen-year-old could ask for, i.e., none, albeit with the promise of impending volume once she could tip a scale at five stone.

Together with Draco and Ron, she edged out of the kitchen and climbed a rickety staircase that zigzagged through the house to the upper stories. Ladders lanced together platforms that didn’t gel right onto the stairs, and narrow passageways cut off to thin doors. The Weasleys scampered up and down these many ladders and staircases like lemurs, which helped to abate the fear that one wrong step would send him plummeting through the plywood floor.

“Their O.W.L.s came in today,” confided Ron. He rounded the banister and hopped over a jagged hole in the stairs. Draco warily circumnavigated it. “Bad news.”

“They’ve been having this one out for an hour already,” said Ginny. “Mum wants them to go into the Ministry of Magic like Dad, and all they want to do is open a joke shop. Which, with their grades, might be about the best they can ask for.”

“She was expecting more?” For the mother of Fred and George Weasley to have any ambitions beyond their immediate short-term survival struck Draco as rank delusion. He was personally impressed that they had given thought to anything past graduation.

“Nah, not really,” said Ron, “but it stings a bit, since Percy went and got seven. Lucky me, though, they’ve set the bar nice and low. Oh, speak of the boggart.”

They rounded the second landing, and at the top of the staircase above them stood two people locked in a passionate conversation about cauldron thickness. One of them was a stocky redhead with horn-rimmed glasses and the fuzzy threatenings of a deeply ill-advised mustache. The other was a girl with voluminous brown hair in natty curls and a heart-shaped face that was just starting to lose its babyish shape: the cheeks thinning out, the chin forming a delicate sharp point atop a thin neck. She was wearing a pair of muggle jeans, these ones much tighter than their school trousers, and the thin fabric of her white tee shirt stretched taut across her shoulders. The neat triangles of her shoulder blades pressed shadows into the cotton. It looked very soft.

“Draco! We didn’t hear you come in!”

Summer always turned Hermione’s hair lighter, and this was no exception. A number of sandy gold strands laced her normal curtain of fringe, though she'd grown it out. When she smiled, her teeth were white and clear of metal.

He opened his mouth to say something snide about Molly Weasley's crusade, but what came out was: "You got your bracers off."

Her smile grew wider. "Braces, and yes, I did! Isn't it so much better?"

"I'm not falling for this again."

She laughed, tripped down the stairs, and hugged him. He rocked back precariously from the sudden weight.

Her shirt smelled of fresh sterile detergent. Underneath that was sweat and salt from her skin, and her shampoo. It reminded him of Hogwarts, in the odd way that certain smells always could. Her hair buried his face in soft warm curls, and she was hot — physically, filmed with sweat, like she'd been working outside, searing in all the places she touched him — but soft, too, softer than she'd been the last time he'd hugged her. Two months was a long time.

He had thought about doing this.

When she drew back his hand lingered on her waist, for balance. Under the thin shirt he could feel the V-shaped place where her ribcage met her hip. The fabric was as soft as it looked.

He removed his hands and buried them in his pockets.

"Oh, Draco," said Percy. "This might interest you. Hermione and I were just discussing a report I've got to finish for the office — we're trying to standardize cauldron thickness. Some of these foreign imports are just a shade too thin — leakages have been increasing at a rate of almost three percent a year."

"Three percent!" gasped Ron. "Does the Minister know about this?"

“I was telling him that we should be brewing with silver, instead,” said Hermione seriously. “But pewter is much more common, and it encourages people to cut all sorts of corners.”

He frowned. “The issue with silver isn’t that it’s not preferred, it's too expensive. The market favors pewter, except in cases with exacting purity requirements, but then you’re dealing with niche sales for specialists.”

Percy was nodding with his whole body. “Which is just what I was saying to Mr. Crouch,” he insisted. “Exactly. Which is why people like us have to intervene and create quality regulations in order to prevent shoddy products from endangering witches and wizards everywhere. Really, when you think about it, we’re saving lives—”

“None of you deserve a summer vacation,” said Ron doggedly, and with Ginny nodding in agreement, they peeled off upstairs. Draco touched Hermione’s arm, and she followed them, after promising Percy that they would circle back to the question of tariff regulations later.

The room at the top of the house obviously belonged to a teenage boy. Under a miasmic carpet of dirty laundry, a twin bed lay, sloppily made, the bed sheets patterned with Cleansweeps. The room itself was a gabled wood attic, its slanted roof plastered with ruddy orange Chudley Cannons posters that moved and whirled across the walls, the players weaving in between canvases. A fish tank on the windowsill held an extremely robust frog, which ribbited with dignity as they entered, and its fellow pet, a small gray owl with yellow eyes, fluttered around a small steel cage beside it, bleating loudly.

The whole place smelled of Ronald, which was not a compliment.

Two sets of bunk beds had been wedged into the corners. When Ginny dumped his trunk on one of them, Draco realized with grave foreboding that it was his.

Ron hopped onto his bed, dislodging a flurry of pillows. “That bed’s Harry’s,” he said. “He’s coming later this week.”

“Wasn’t he staying with you for the summer?”

“Oh, he is. But he and Charlie went to watch the quidditch semifinal. Ireland versus Peru. Peru got demolished.”

“Of course they did, have you seen Ireland’s chasers?” said Ginny eagerly. “Moran’s got biceps the size of quaffles. She’s hardcore.”

She said it as if it were the finest compliment it lay in her power to bestow.

“No, but I wish I had. Charlie said they pure savaged them.”

“Unsurprising, for Peru,” sighed Draco, “but the Irish seeker is still mediocre at best. If they can’t get a hundred and fifty up before Krum —”

Ron shook his head. “See, there you go again, mate, overvaluing the seeker—”

Hermione cleared her throat. “About Harry,” she said pointedly. Her fatal flaw was, of course, a total disinterest in quidditch. “Has he heard from Padfoot?”

“Who’s Padfoot?” said Ginny.

“This weird bloke at school,” said Ron, waving his hand. “Bit of a recluse, you wouldn’t know him. I think he wrote once or twice, but he’s gone quiet since Harry’s birthday. Same for Moony.”

Draco, who was habitually suspicious of overfamiliar vagrants and Sirius Black in particular, put a mental flag on the subject.

Harry Potter was a case study in what would happen if you took just about the quietest, politest, most innocent child you could possibly imagine and dropped him to simmer with three or four of the least qualified parental figures you could find on short notice, let steep for fourteen years, and give him a quidditch habit. He treated Remus Lupin and Sirius Black like demigods because they honored him with even a scrap of paternal affection. Being abandoned or forgotten by them probably wouldn't surprise Harry, but it would probably kill something inside him stone dead, and for that crime Draco would have very little mercy or forgiveness, if the time came.

"They're busy, I expect," said Hermione carefully. "It's possible they haven't had a moment to sit down and write. Unless—"

Draco cleared his throat subtly. What she meant was obvious — unless they've been caught — but Ginny was still in the room, and increasingly indignant at being cut out of the conversation. Besides, they'd have heard something if the two were arrested. The Ministry would plaster it on every flat surface in Britain.

Speaking of which. "Weasley, what the devil is your brother doing working for the Ministry?"

Ron groaned. "Oh, Percy? Don't get me started. I don't reckon he'd come home if Dad didn't make him. He got a job with Crouch in the DIMC, and he's not shut up about it since."

"According to Mr. Crouch, Ginevra," singsonged Ginny. "As I was saying to Mr. Crouch, Ginevra… Mr. Crouch is of the opinion, Ginevra, that I should lodge a meter of birchwood directly up my saggy white arse. And he's quite right, too…"

"Obviously I know that," said Draco shortly. "What's he doing working for Crouch?"

"What do you mean?" Ron rolled himself upright. "He's in the Pops party, like Dad. Dad says they might even run him for Minister in '97, if they can get the votes."

"First of all, if your party's best candidate is the disgraced Bartemius Crouch, you might as well just hand Runcorn the pulpit with a red bow on top. Second of all, International Magical Cooperation was overhauled after the last election, it's teeming with Cavs. You can't spit in that department without hitting a conservative. Crouch only kept his position by the skin of his teeth."

Ginny gave a pointed yawn. "If I have to hear any more about Fart-y Crouch, I'll puke," she said. "Anyone feeling brave enough to check on breakfast? Hope she hasn't burnt anything, the last time she cooked angry I had to get out a chisel for the pancakes."

"Oh, we should help," said Hemione, and sprang up. "Cooking for eleven must be terrible."

Draco raised his eyebrows. His idea of 'helping' in the kitchen consisted of drinking a freshly squeezed glass of grapefruit juice and describing what consistency he'd like his eggs.

Hermione gave an entreating pout — which failed to compel him at all, but to avoid embarrassing both of them, he jerked his head in assent. They clambered down the stairs, causing a small thunder on the creaky floorboards.

Mrs. Weasley was alone in the kitchen, muttering to herself.

"...though they haven't got brains… be in real trouble. I've had more owls… carry on… Improper Use of Magic Office..."

A vigorous jab of her wand sent a pile of potatoes whirling out of their skins. She flicked it again at the fire under a saucepan, lit it, and gave the vegetables inside a judicious shake, billowing flame.

"Hey, Mum," said Ginny cheerfully, reaching past her to snag a piece of bacon. "We're here to help, or whatever — whoa!"

Molly had flicked her wand at the cutlery drawer, and knives and forks exploded from it like a swarm of silver insects. Ron hauled Draco down in time to spare him an impromptu haircut by way of an expeditious airborne steak knife. Instead, it buried itself safely in the pile of potatoes by the sink, and began chopping.

“...know where we went wrong… same for years, one thing after… listen to — FRED!”

She had picked up a fake wand, and it had turned into a rubber mouse, which squeaked and scampered into a hole beneath the cupboards.

“Think that one’s George’s, actually,” Ron mumbled. “Fred’s are smaller.” He started unstacking plates along the table, while Hermione followed him, distributing forks. Ginny ferried heaping platters of pancakes and roast potatoes out of the kitchen, assisted by her mother’s floating saucepans.

Draco lingered in the stairwell with his hands in his pockets, stalled not so much by the feeling that such work was beneath him — which it was, though he considered it also beneath anyone with, well, wizards in the house — but because he lacked an understanding of how it worked. He had never been in a household without help before, and was unsettled by the way everyone else seemed to understand what to do.

Fred and George came thumping down the stairs and snagged plates from a floating stack over the stove. “Oh, yum, pancakes,” said George loudly. “I love pancakes. My favorite.”

“I’m ever so grateful to mum for making them,” said Fred, even more loudly.

If they had hoped their mother would be softened with praise, they were mistaken. Mrs. Weasley came veering out of the kitchen like a vengeful hawk, orbited by a small solar system of saucepans. “Why don’t you make yourselves useful, for once, and go find your father?” she snapped. “And your brothers, too. I don’t know where everyone in this house gets off to the minute there’s work to be done.”

On cue, Bill and his father bustled in from the garden. “Sorry we’re late, Mum,” said Bill breathlessly. “Just fixing some stuff in the shed.”

“Arthur Weasley, I swear, if it’s that car—”

“What car?” said Arthur, with deeply unconvincing innocence. “Bill and I were getting some patches for the roof.”

Molly made a sound of supreme un-convincement, and pointed to the table. They sat.

Draco discreetly deposited himself in a seat between Hermione and Bill, where he seemed safely buttressed from Mrs. Weasley’s line of fire.

Breakfast was served melee style, a violent clash of venturing spoons for the high-ticket items on the table. Bowls of crisp roast potatoes and fragrant sauteéd mushrooms made quick rounds, often snatched or Summoned out of slow hands, while a mountain of glistening beef sausages vanished under rapid-fire erosion. George and Ginny formed a quick allegiance and raided the platter of ham steaks, piling up fat ziggurats of glazed pork under a burnished crust of brown sugar, while Bill and Fred had a spirited bout of fork-fencing when both grasped the ladle to the baked beans. Ron stuffed two wedges of white toast in his mouth and piled four more onto his plate before Mrs. Weasley noticed, and shrilled at him to save some for Hermione, who had nearly lost a hand when reaching for the pumpkin juice; Percy wandered in late, made himself a cup of coffee, and went back upstairs after complaining about the noise.

But after five minutes of pure combat, the table settled, and the clamor settled into a cheerful burble of conversation, undercut by the sound of vigorous eating. Draco tentatively speared a pancake and, when no retribution was forthcoming, snatched it onto his plate. He sectioned off a triangle, swiped it in whipped cream, and lowered it timidly into his mouth.

It was heartbreakingly good: fluffy and chewy and sweet with a salty finish, like eating a pan-fried cloud. He had assumed, based on Ron's eating habits, that the food in his house would be so scant or so inedible as to render him desperate for nourishment by the time he got to Hogwarts. But Mrs. Weasley's talent was undeniable. He cut off a larger piece and felt much less miserable about his living prospects for the next two weeks.

"Coffee, Draco?" said Mr. Weasley jovially, hefting a tall silver pot. "There's plenty."

"Arthur! He's fourteen!"

"Oh! Er, never mind, my boy! Tea?"

"Please, and thank you," said Draco stiffly, and a chipped brown mug levitated down the table at him. He sniffed it surreptitiously before drinking it. It was dense, black, and so over-brewed it made his eyes water. He schooled his expression into perfect neutrality before setting it down.

"Now, Hermione," said Mr. Weasley, sawing into his black pudding with vigor. "You promised to tell me how your father's fruit canal went."

"...Root canal?"

"Yes! That's the one!"

"He'll be pleased you remembered," said Hermione, a bit surprised. "It went well, I suppose, though he hasn't written to me yet. I'm not sure they feel altogether comfortable with owl post."

Draco snorted.

"Oh! Draco, you mightn't know — Hermione's parents do the most marvelously complex Healer work imaginable," said Mr. Weasley earnestly, gesturing at Hermione with his knife. "I had the privilege to speak to Dr. Granger about it briefly, and my goodness! The education of a lifetime. Do you know that muggle Healers have to go to school for eight years just to get a license for teeth?"

He didn't, nor, for that matter, that muggles had special schools for any kind of work at all. He simply hadn't given muggle professions altogether that much thought. In his mind Hermione's parents were blurry, bumbling, kindly figures in the background of their daughter's life, benignly ignorant, guilty of nothing better or worse than holding her back from the world to which she belonged.

He had not, admittedly, considered the possibility that they were as smart as she was, which in hindsight might have been an error.

"My dad really liked talking to you," said Hermione. "If you can get that telephone working, I can give you his number."

Mr. Weasley was ecstatic. "Really! Hermione, would you?"

"Don't threaten him with a good time," warned Ron, who was engineering an intricate forkful of sausage and beans on a plinth of pancake. "Keep talking that way, and your folks will wind up at the family reunion. That's what happened to the Jordans."

"I think they would like that very much," said Hermione shyly. Draco glanced sideways at her, and she was beaming. "Thank you, Mr. Weasley. They'd love to feel — included."

"Well, they're welcome at the Burrow just any old time, dear," said Mrs. Weasley briskly, liberating the fried tomatoes from Fred's grasp. "Just like their daughter. Aren't they, Ron?"

"Yersh," warbled Ron. He swallowed hard and grinned at Hermione. "Practically family, they are, anyway."

Hermione smiled back, radiant. Draco narrowed his eyes. Nothing was more embarrassing than undisguised pandering, and it wasn't as though any of the Weasleys would know subtlety if it performed a highly ironic burlesque on the breakfast table.

He avoided the sickening, moon-eyed ogling taking place between Hermione and Ron's parents by reaching for the coffee pot, which bequeathed a stream of jet-black liquid, bitter as coal, but more tolerable than bad tea. His cup frothed beige when he doused it in cream, and he drank half of it at once.

The earthy smell of coffee rolled up from the mug in his hands, and sent him sliding back into memory: a year ago now, he had been at the summer house in France, with Theo and Pansy. Theo had boasted that he drank black coffee every morning when he was at home, and Pansy had called him a ridiculous liar, so he'd dug an old coffee press out of the pantry and proceeded to ravage the crimeless kitchen in his quest for validation. Somehow he had spilled the bag of grounds, discharging a waterfall of black grains on the white marble, and Draco and Pansy, after laughing themselves just about hoarse, had played Tag the Erkling to see who had to get the mop. Narcissa found them huddled over the sink, attempting in vain to extricate a gelatinous tar-like substance from the press. The kitchen had smelled like dark roast for weeks.

But that was a year distant, and leagues away. This place was too loud and far too crowded for him to mistake it for that quiet, airy house on the beach. He hadn't seen Theo or Pansy since June. They had traded letters — short, polite little things that never seemed to say all they could — but neither had come to visit, and in July, Theo had stopped answering. Pansy said he had gone on a business trip with his father. Draco wasn't sure if he would feel better if she was lying.

"Draco?"

He looked up, and found Hermione staring at him.

"What"

“I asked after your mother.”

“Oh. She’s quite well, thank you. Vacationing in Romania.”

“...with a horrible great fang on it,” Mrs. Weasley was insisting. “Really, Bill, what do they say at the bank?”

“...would be Ludo Bagman,” Mr. Weasley was saying to Fred, in crosstalk. “The official gambling ring always runs out of Magical Games and Sports. He was the one who got us such good tickets for the Cup, in fact. I did him a bit of a favor: His brother, Otto, got into a spot of trouble with a lawnmower with unnatural powers, and I smoothed the whole thing over. That family…”

“Charlie works in Romania,” said Ron brightly, to Draco. “There’s a dragon sanctuary there. He loves it. Says it’s the most powerfully magical place in Europe.”

“Charming, but I doubt she’ll have the chance to visit,” Draco said thinly. He dropped his silverware and pushed back his chair. “Excuse me.”

It was simply too much. Too many people doing too much at once, and all of it irritating. Why on earth hadn’t they eaten outside? At least there would be some fresh air.

He ferried his plate into the kitchen and dumped it in the sink. It didn’t take long for footsteps to follow him.

“That tea was inedible,” he said, by way of explanation. She ignored him. She was a wise girl.

Hermione dipped her plate in the sink beside his and ran the water. The babble of the faucet almost drowned out her murmur. “You left in a hurry.”

“I needed some air.”

She nodded. “It takes some getting used to,” she admitted. “When Harry and Charlie come back, it’s even worse. But you get used to it quickly, and then there’s something downright lovely about it. Having so many people in the house.”

“It explains a good deal about Ronald,” he said. Anyone who grew up knee-deep in people bigger and louder and stronger than oneself had to develop certain ways of coping. Perhaps for that reason, he found Ron was by far the most likable of the pack; he possessed a certain quiet and dignified sensitivity to other people’s feelings which even his nicer family members seemed to forget.

Hermione paused, revolving the dish this way and that, as if contemplating which way to attack it. “Ron is a good sport,” she said, barely moving her lips. “He puts up with a lot. I don’t think I gave him much credit for having such a good temper, until now.”

“Certainly he tolerates more than I would.”

Abruptly, he remembered something, a soggy vignette of memory, blurred by the years:

Bet you wish you had her brains. Then maybe your mummy would pay attention to you.

He closed his eyes.

When he opened them, the memory was gone, and he was back in the kitchen. There it was easier to breathe, and it smelled of dish soap instead of woodsmoke, with a verdant tendril of fresh air wafting in from the open window. Hermione’s arm brushed against his as she rinsed her dish and hung it up to drip-dry on some sort of metal rack.

“I don’t think I’ve ever heard you call him Ronald, before,” she said, half-teasing.

“And for preference, I should never do so again. But if I shout Weasley in here, I’ll bring down half the house on top of me.” He leaned his hip against the sink while she scrubbed out the inside of her glass with a dishcloth. “So. How was your summer?”

“Terribly unproductive, actually! I didn’t finish half the things I wanted to do. My mum and my uncle dragged the family on a big vacation to Lisbon, and I can’t read on planes or cars without getting sick. Then we toured these old monasteries and I kept wanting to ask the guide about the runic inscriptions, but my cousins were there, so I couldn’t mention it without sounding barmy.”

“I knew you had cousins,” he said, pleased. “One of them fancied a muggle rockstar.”

“Who? Oh, yes, that was ages ago, though. She’s got a boyfriend now, and she’s very mature.” Hermione rolled her eyes. “I think she writes to him daily.”

“You didn’t write to me daily, that’s for certain. The owls can find you in Portugal, you know.”

“Yes, but I can’t very well explain to my aunt and uncle why I’m mailing a letter by owl, can I? It was hard enough explaining why my parents let me keep one for a pet. They already think I’m some sort of nutter.”

He did not miss the way she tossed her hair back, shoulders steel-stiff, full of a defiant indifference. That was a fresh bruise, then.

He clucked his tongue and nudged her foot with his. Hermione always came back from her summers a little bit brittle, a little bit antsy, a little bit hungrier to prove herself. It wasn’t fair, and he could think of better ways for her to spend her summer than being dragged around and treated like the family loon — but it would probably offend her if he suggested them. He was careful with what he said about her muggles. He was never sure where the lines were. Hermione herself didn’t always seem to know.

“Pity them, that don’t know the half of it,” he said.

She gave a sideways smile. “I left some of my Astronomy homework out,” she whispered, conspiratorial. “I pretended I’d forgotten it. Nicole thought it was calculus, and she told her mum I was in advanced maths.”

“You madwoman. The Ministry will be at the door any minute. Also, what Astronomy homework, Sinestra doesn’t assign summer reading.”

“The back of the book has practice tests! You did finish the book, didn’t you?”

“Of course I finished the book,” he said, lying, “but—”

Ron poked his head in the kitchen door and rapped his knuckles on the doorframe. “What are you two whispering about?”

“Nothing,” said Draco.

“Homework,” said Hermione, promptly. “Speaking of which, Ron, have you done your essay for History of Magic? I thought the prompt this year was rather vague, so I’d like the three of us to compare our work, to see that we’ve all understood it correctly—”

“Blimey, never mind,” Ron said mildly, sauntering between them to drop his plates in the sink. “Teach me to interrupt a bloody meeting of the minds. Both of you should follow up with Percy, if you can stomach it, by the way; no one’s wanted to talk to him about cauldron bottoms all summer, and I think he’s depressed.”

“He’s not wrong, you know,” said Draco, who was more dismayed than anyone to find himself coming to Percy’s defense. “Cauldron thickness is highly relevant in advanced potion-making. If you read Alchemy magazine—”

“Oh, that’s bedtime reading, innit, keep a stack of them on my nightstand,” said Ron. “Really takes the edge off a long day, a copy of Alchemy magazine.”

“You’ve made your point.”

Ron clattered his dish into the rack and wiped his hands on a yellowing, highly-questionable towel. “House is a bit unbearable, when it’s this full,” he said frankly, surprising Draco. He had assumed the natives were immune to the Burrow’s tribulations. “Most of the time it’s roomier. Bill floats around, and Percy’s due to move out at the end of the summer, once he finds a flat. And Mum always gets stressed when there’s company over. She’ll calm down once she gets used to you. Best thing to do in the meantime is get out of the house.” He jerked his head at the door. “Fancy seeing the shed? Dad’s working on a car.”

“Does it drive?” said Hermione curiously.

Ron grinned. “No,” he said.

Admittedly, when his mother had told him to take a vacation, he had not given much thought as to what a week at the Burrow would exactly entail. Vaguely, he envisioned Ron’s routine at home to be the same as Draco’s, only in shabbier rooms: breakfast in bed, four hours of quidditch practice at the top of the morning, followed by several more hours of reading in the library, or perhaps brewing practice in the alchemy room, preferably scored by Hermione’s cassettes; then a three-course tea setting, served by Briselda; an afternoon constitutional around the lake; a game of tennis or chess with his mother; and dinner on the veranda, with a nightcap waiting in the drawing room. Finish with nine hours of blissful sleep in a king-sized bed, wake, and repeat, for results exceptional in health and mental fitness.

The delusion that this would continue at the Burrow was dragged out behind the shed and butchered within mere hours.

For one, summers at the Burrow appeared to involve a diabolical amount of work. The consequence of having no hired help, Draco realized in horror, was that one's children became the only local source of free labor; and Mrs. Weasley showed no compunction about treating them as such. Moreover, he began to understand why she had so many, for there was a seemingly inexhaustible amount of work to be done: the massif of soiled dishware erected by each meal had to be scrubbed, dried, and put away, thrice daily, or else the kitchen would disappear into filth; no sooner had the last of these been dealt with than Mrs. Weasley would start cooking again, hauling out the same pots and pans and cutting-boards they had just painstakingly wiped clean, and someone was required to chop vegetables or peel potatoes or monitor simmering saucepans; meanwhile, the meal scraps would be carted out to feed the livestock, leaden bagfuls of fruit rinds and potato skins to be hauled into the pigs' trough, or handfuls of corn and wheat scattered around the chicken coop, while jogging at a steady clip, lest the battle-hardened hens identify one's fingers as a more promising source of nutrients (a fact that one's hosts were happy to let one discover, quite meanly, without any prior warning); and, at the very moment the sun reached its blistering zenith, one could be dispatched to climb up on a molten-hot tin roof and fix a drainpipe: an exercise in endurance that meant hauling around an toolbox of ungodly size while clinging to the sun-baked wall and sweating out half his body weight in fluids, while Ron stripped off his shirt and scampered up and down the roof, hammering things, his back brilliantly white with sweat, like an albino primate.

"At the risk of rudeness," said Draco through gritted teeth, "your parents are wizards, aren't they, Ronald?"

Ron caught a splinter in his finger, swore, and popped it in his mouth. "Course they are," he agreed, too distracted by his injury to take offense. "What's your point?"

"That I have been made to execute at least six tasks today, not including this one, which would have been faster and better-suited to magical means."

"Oh, yeah," said Ron easily. "I'm sure they could do most of this stuff, if they had the time. But Dad's got to work, and Mum's only one woman." He swung the hammer down hard on the nail, missed it, and Draco's reflexes alone prevented him from rendering Draco's thumb two-dimensional.

"Watch it. What about ancestral magic?"

"Sorry, sorry. What d'you mean?" Ron lined up another strike of the hammer.

"The Laws of Blood. Your parents are both of-age, and this is your family seat. Don't they have any sort of sway over the house?"

"Eh, maybe a little. We haven't lived here that long," he said. "The Burrow's not some old Wiltshire castle with generations of magic buildup. The best Dad can do is nudge the foundations around a little, prop up some walls, keep it from toppling over."

"It's a manor, not a castle."

"Mate, you can't just say stuff like that when I'm holding a hammer. It's too much temptation."

Against the odds, Ron seemed at peace in a way he never was at school. He was competent, cool-headed, and he knew things like which cupboard the teacups went in and how to replace a mortar joint, when it was safe to ask Mrs. Weasley for something, and when it was best to clean out for a while. Sometimes he would stop in the middle of whatever they were doing, cock one ear to the wind, and then say, "Come on," and lead Draco and Hermione down to the living room, where they would discover a burgeoning game of Exploding Snap, or a fresh batch of doughnuts, or a group about to depart for the local village of Ottery St. Catchpole; and though he couldn't explain how he knew these things were happening, he was so rarely wrong about them it soon became clear he had a sixth sense for it — as if there was an invisible cord running all throughout the Burrow and its residents, vibrating at an inaudible frequency to which Ron had a special and private attunement. He was adept in the ways of this hardscrabble life, and whether it was practice or instinct or something magical, the effect was the same: for once in his life, Ron emerged as the captain of their little group, and Draco and Hermione found themselves following his instructions, not the other way around.

“I’m not used to it, either,” she confided to Draco quietly, when they were pinning up laundry on clotheslines in the garden. (Draco had conscripted her, out of a point-blank refusal to place his digits anywhere near Ginevra Weasley’s bloomers, and she had gladly taken refuge from a third hour of chopping carrots.) “At home, we use technology to do most of this — we have a washer and dryer for laundry, and a dishwasher, a lawnmower, et cetera.”

He gingerly lifted a sodden blue dress shirt between two fingers. “They live even rougher than muggles do, is that what you’re saying?”

“Not all muggles. There’s a variety.”

“If that’s supposed to make me feel better, it doesn’t.”

She pursed her lips. “I thought for wizards, having money wouldn’t make so much of a difference,” she said. “There’s so much you can do for free with magic—”

“My thoughts exactly.”

“I just assumed — when he said his family was poor, I thought he meant compared to you. But earlier I walked in on Arthur and Molly talking about where they’ll get the money for textbooks this year— I don’t know how they manage.”

This made him vaguely uncomfortable. “Why the devil does Arthur stay at the Ministry, then? Clearly it doesn’t pay enough.”

“I don’t know. He seems to love the work.”

He snorted. “In Muggle Artifacts?”

“He does,” she said, warningly, and he rolled his eyes but dropped the point. Virtually nothing was said about muggles in the Burrow unless it was adulation. It was a bizarre inversion on the rest of the world, where even in the depths of an ill mood, Draco could take comfort in the fact that he had magic, while some people did not. Here, it was hard to feel like a wizard at all.

In the evening, they played a quidditch skirmish in the makeshift pitch behind the shed, with the sun low and orange in the sky. With six players they broke into teams of three — Draco, Ginny, and George against Ron, Fred, and Bill — and rotated players every point, a fast and surprisingly brutal workout that wore him out far more quickly than flying drills at home. Draco had the best broom-handling of anyone, and a better touch on the quaffle, all hairpin turns and elegant underhand passes; but the Weasleys played hard and reckless, and he lost the ball more than once to a dive-bomb from someone who didn’t appear to care whether or not either of them stayed on their broomstick. Ginny in particular played with naked aggression, elbows and headers and last-minute swerves, and she laughed when he knocked her off her broom. She flew like she’d never played with a ref before, which he supposed she hadn’t.

Bill hadn’t played quidditch in school, and he flew like it: slow underhand passes that were intercepted more often than not, and shots on goal that bounced off the wicker goalposts as often as not. He was bad, but good-natured about it, and was the first to laugh when he scored accidentally on his own hoop.

Ron flew keeper, and was strikingly good at it, for someone Draco had never seen on a broom. He kept his eye on the quaffle and both hands loose for a catch, steering with his knees. Years of being forced to play keeper for his brothers’ games had built up his skills, and in another world, Draco would have liked to see Ron try for the team.

After the game they lay in the shade of the elm trees, sweaty and winded and trading trash talk lazily in the warm evening light, until Hermione came out to gather them for dinner.

When they had cleared the table of fried fish and fresh lemonade, they hiked down to the river. Draco at first feared this meant more work, but he was relieved to discover it did not.

At the foot of the garden the river bent into a small bowl in the earth became a shallow, domesticated thing, lapping over a bed of muddy pebbles, trussed with cattails and feathery branches of weeping willows. A small wooden dock listed into the water like a ramp, and when the sun went down a caravan of fireflies moved over the water like a river of airborne stars, their reflection doubled in the water. Said water was cold as hag's blood, not to mention, which didn't stop any of the boys from whipping off their shirts and stampeding in. Ginny, only a heartbeat behind them, wriggled out of her shirt and trousers in an instant — ignoring Mrs. Weasley's screech of dismay — and streaked after her brothers, a slip of pale skin cutting through the froth like a white eel. Hermione rolled up her pants to her knees and sat on the end of the dock, her legs trailing in the water. Mr. and Mrs. Weasley shucked their socks and shoes and waded up to their ankles, holding hands. Every so often Mrs. Weasley tugged on her husband's arm, and he bent down to give her a kiss. It could give a man a toothache, it really could.

Draco leaned against the willow trunk, watching from a safe and waterproof distance. Ginny and Bill got into a chicken fight between Fred and George, slapping at each other until they toppled into the water with great rowdy splashes and squawking. Ron, after lapping a neat circuit around the swimming hole, swam up to the dock and rested his folded arms on the wood, chatting to Hermione. They were both smiling, cast in ethereal light from the moon and the fireflies; something he said made Hermione throw back her head and laugh with her whole chest. Ron beamed like she'd given him a new house or something.

There was something cozy and balanced about the picture: everyone paired up, two by two. He scowled.

His footsteps creaked on the dock, and Hermione and Ron both looked up.

“About time, mate,” said Ron genially. If being interrupted bothered him, he didn’t show it. “Wondered when you’d get tired of creeping around back there.”

Draco slipped off his shoes and socks and arranged them neatly beside Hermione’s. Gingerly, he lowered himself onto the dock beside her, dipping his feet into the frigid waters.

“You’re not coming in?”

“No, thank you.”

“That’s alright, I’m no good at it, either,” Hermione reassured him.

He sniffed. “I’ll have you know I’m a champion swimmer, Granger. But I only indulge in water that’s been cleaned.”

“It’s moving freshwater,” said Ron reasonably. “We’ve been swimming here for ages, and nothing’s happened.”

“I rest my case.”

Ignoring this, Ron flopped belly-up and drifted into a starfish float. “I wish Harry were here,” he said. “Then everything would be perfect.”

Draco blinked. He had not remotely conflated any of the day’s activities with perfection. A glance at Hermione was expected to reveal similar confusion, but her expression was soft with affection for Ron, which was no less disconcerting.

“You’ve got a really beautiful home, Ron,” she said — which rankled Draco even more. Hadn’t she been saying to him just earlier that her own home was much nicer? Was she lying to make Ron feel better? That wasn't at all like Hermione.

Ron flushed and rolled onto his front, hiding a blush that crept all the way down his chest. "S' not bad, I guess," he said, with obvious pleasure. "I know it's not, you know, as fancy as you two probably like."

"No, it's really lovely," said Hermione earnestly, while Draco ogled her in disgruntlement. "It is. It feels so homey, and welcoming, and your whole family works together. I always — I always wished I had a bigger family."

"You did?" said Draco, blindsided. He couldn't imagine having to share the Manor with someone else.

Ron nodded, like he understood. "They're annoying buggers, each to each," he said, "but if I had to take all or none, I guess I'd take them."

One of his brothers hollered his name.

"Ah, gotta go. We're gonna play sharks and grindylows. Mione, you can always join, if you want to swim in your clothes. Ginny's got spares up at the house. You, too, Malfoy."

Hermione demurred.

"Just jump, if you change your mind," said Ron, and then struck out to join his brothers.

A trifecta of tiny red fish swarmed Draco's foot. He flinched and kicked at them.

"Mione is an insipid name," he said, apropos of nothing.

"I don't think nicknames are meant to be serious," she said. "And you still call me 'Granger.'"

"Yes, because it's your name."

“It’s my last name,” she amended, not without amusement. “You have to admit it’s a little odd, isn’t it? We’ve known each other for years.”

That, he felt, was altogether beside the point. He didn’t remember choosing consciously to call her one thing or another; he’d just started off that way, stuck to it, and after a while it was awkward to stop. Anyway, it was useful: if he needed to get her attention, especially across a crowded Gryffindor common room, a full-throated Granger would make it immediately clear who was calling, i.e., why she should drop what she was doing and attend.

He doubted she would find this compelling, however.

“Would you prefer Mione?”

“Oh, don’t do that, you sound affected.”

A doe and her fawn tiptoed out of the shaded underbrush on the other side of the river, dipping their long necks low to drink from the freshwater. In the crepuscular light, they were almost invisible, and when they finished, they slipped silently back into the woods.

“Do you want me to call you Hermione?” he said suddenly.

She gave a little twitch, as if she’d brushed a hot pan. “No,” she said. “I don’t know. You can. But I feel as if you’re about to give me terrible news. You really can use Granger if you want, I didn’t mean to complain.”

“You never said it bothered you.”

“It doesn’t. You still call Harry ‘Potter,’ even though you’ve nearly died for him at least twice. I know it doesn’t mean anything.”

“That’s different,” he said. “It’s Potter. I’m not going to call him ‘Harry,’ that would be outrageous.”

“It would probably level a city,” she agreed.

“You’re joking, I’m not. But you could have said something earlier, if you minded. I don’t have to call you Granger, it’s not a compunction. I’m perfectly capable of pronouncing ‘Hermione.’”

“Evidently so,” she said, wryly. She kicked some water at him, and he skittered out of the way, giving an involuntary yelp. “I told you, I don’t care. Ron calls me one thing, and you call me another. They're just nicknames.”

“It’s not the same,” he insisted, though he could not articulate what the difference was, when pressed; and then Mrs. Weasley made a loud health proclamation about the sleep needs of growing boys, and the whole troupe lumbered dripping back up the hill. The Burrow filled with the thunder of footsteps on the staircase; doors slammed, goodnights were shouted, and spare pillows were distributed among the guests; and at last, Draco folded himself warily into his tiny barrack in Ron’s bedroom, while Fred and George whispered to each other in the double-bunk, and Ron issued peal after peal of glass-shattering snores.

In any other place, after any other kind of day, such a cacophony would have kept him awake for hours, and left him murderously bad-tempered in the morning. But the vigorous routine of work and sport had left his whole body achy and limp and unfathomably exhausted, and before his head touched the pillow he had plummeted into a deep, perfect sleep.

Thank you for hanging with me through the hiatus! I appreciate your enthusiasm for this next volume! Here's a double-chapter post to celebrate the beginning of Year 4 and Volume 2. As always, let me know what you think, and with my absolute love to everyone who's commented so far.

A Boot on Stoatshead Hill

Chapter 33: A Boot on Stoatshead Hill

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

He woke to something heavy colliding with his stomach.

He shot upright and lashed out with his foot, connected with something warm and moving, and kicked it again. There was a shout, a thump, and an explosion of laughter as the thing fell off him. Draco tore out of bed, whipped out his wand, and when he blinked the dizziness out of his eyes, he found himself staring down the line of his wand at Harry Potter, who was sprawled on the floor in his pajamas, cackling like a goddamn hyena.

“For God’s sake! What was that for?”

Ron, Fred, and George were clutching each other to stay upright. Harry was chortling. “Blame Ron,” he said, a bit hoarsely. “Bet me five galleons I wouldn’t. Hullo, Draco.”

“I could have cursed you!”

“Yeah, but you’d feel real sorry afterwards,” said Harry with a grin, and he held up his hand. Draco huffed and hauled him to his feet, refusing to feel even an ounce of sympathy when Harry winced.

“When did you get here, then?”

“Just now. We were due yesterday, but we decided to fly back instead of Apparating, and we got to see the whole countryside. Camped in the woods last night, got in about an hour ago. You’ve got to try flying cross-country, Draco, it’s brilliant.”

“You lost me at ‘camped.’”

Harry ignored this. He was wearing an oversized Bulgaria jersey with Ron's old jeans, the cuffs rolled up, and his hair had grown nearly to his neck. If he had brushed it once since Draco had last seen him, it gave no evidence of it. "Charlie is wicked cool," he breathed. "You've got to meet him, Draco. We talked the whole way back — he told me about dragon-taming in Romania and magizoological expeditions in Albania and Turkey, and he knew more about creatures than even Hagrid—"

"As does anyone who can tell the difference between a kitten and a cockatrice, continue."

"He said he'd ridden on the back of a dragon, once!"

"And won a staring contest with a basilisk, I imagine?"

"I kind of thought he was telling the truth, though," said Harry, the lovable naif, "because he had all these tips for how to steer it. Anyway, get dressed, lazy bum, I want to say hello to Hermione. Mrs. Weasley says she's going to let us de-gnome the garden!"

"Let us?"

"Right? If we get the dishes done quick enough, that is. C'mon! It's already seven thirty!"

"Yeah, the day's basically over," managed Ron, wiping tears. "Oh, Merlin, look at his face. Harry, I love you. I really, really do."

"Which makes one of us!" said Draco sharply, and stalked off to dress.

Days at the Burrow were somehow both endless and breathlessly fast, as if time there spun on a quick closed circuit. Each day started to the rooster's cry and the groan of water through old pipes as Percy claimed the first shower, followed by breakfast, served in buffet while people trickled down with drowsy eyes and messy hair, half of them still in pajamas. Then dishes, chores, and more chores, working merciless hours under the August sun, until his hands were calloused like sandpaper and new ridges of muscle sprouted along his arms and legs in the places quidditch had never touched. His skin darkened from near translucence to a warm shade of tallow, and he wore his shirtsleeves rolled up, the top buttons open, for fear of heatstroke. He had never dressed this casually in his life. He was still mocked for wearing oxfords around the house, but some things he refused to let slide.

The evenings, too, had a breathless rhythm. There were games of Wands and Exploding Snap and exhibitions of Percy's fiendish talent at Euchre, and drinking games — minors played with butterbeer — designed to unearth every kind of disreputable secret known to man, which left Draco with far more knowledge of Bill Weasley's nocturnal exploits than he had ever desired. There were quidditch matches nightly, four on four, three on five, four teams of two, or just Draco and Harry flying head to head in a battle of the seekers, playing until someone's arms gave out, while Hermione read her way through the complete works of Henry James in the garden below. Sometimes she would laugh at something in the book, irritatingly, because at least once Draco's resulting distraction caught him a bludger in the head.

He pitched a fit and had the score reset, but then Hermione left to help Arthur with the car, and then it wasn't as fun to show off anymore, either.

Hermione was an ideal houseguest — Draco quite consciously was not — but Harry was hardly a guest at all. If it weren't for the hair, he could have been a Weasley. In that tower of tiny rooms, the Boy Who Lived scrubbed dishes and sawed lumber and caked dirt up to his wrists weeding vegetables, happy as a house-elf. He helped untangle Molly's knitting yarn and taught Arthur how to use a vacuum cleaner. Sometimes, while he was busy at some chore or activity in her proximity, Molly would reach out absently and kiss him on the head, as she did with all her children; though she never seemed to notice the slip-up until Harry looked at her and smiled.

He and Ron erected a baroque pillow fort over Ron's bed and retreated to it for whispered conferences long into the night, until Draco hurled a pillow at them or stomped down to sleep on the couch. Once or twice he woke up and found they'd fallen asleep that way, sprawled side by side in the fort, like a pair of littermates curled against their mother's belly.

The worst thing was the lack of space, not physically, but emotionally. It was impossible to stay out of anyone's business. The day began with a great sardine press in one of the house's two bathrooms, a hydra of six heads and at least forty elbows, all wrestling for not enough toothpaste and hair gel, Charlie whining whenever someone jostled his eyeliner, Ginny and Bill bickering over who left the hairball in the shower, and Ron bellowing for everyone to get out before he peed himself. And yet this kind of forced intimacy was still quite dignified compared to, for example, the cataclysm of hearing Percy dictate a breakup letter to Penelope Clearwater through the wall; walking in on Arthur Weasley's excruciatingly earnest kitchen table heart-to-heart with the twins about their O.W.L.s; or opening a broom cabinet in search of window cleaning fluid and instead finding Ginny, crying, because Ron had snapped at her when she tried to join his game of draughts with Bill. Because in a house so small, people grew crabby and sharp-tongued and thoughtless at least a dozen times a day, and there was nothing to do except retreat as far as you could, which was never very far, until someone found you, which was never very long.

He never knew what to do when that happened, except to close the door and flee as fast as he could, his face burning.

Once the humiliation of it all receded, it was astonishing how easy it was to live with. True, he was lucky to get a five-minute shower without someone hammering on the bathroom door; true, no matter how early he woke up, he was always too late for the hot water; true, he saw more naked gingers in a week than an Irish nude beach; but trespasses were quickly forgiven, bruises soon faded, and quarrels at breakfast were forgotten by lunch. Malfoy meant nothing here; he wasn’t heir to anything in particular, just the poor cosseted lout who didn’t know what a pipe wrench was, and had to be shown how to peel a potato.

He was aware of things happening that appalled him, but some internal sensor for dismay appeared to have broken under strain. The stakes were too low. Slights that would have purebloods reaching for dueling gloves could be defused with a punchline. So at any rate, just as often as not, when Fred hip-checked him on the way out of the kitchen, or Ron stole a dinner roll from his plate, he threw an elbow and a lazy insult and forgot about it.

He was usually too tired to be fussy, anyway. Sometimes he went to sleep suspecting the Weasleys were wringing the piss and vinegar out of him like bilge from a wet sponge.

“Have you heard anything from Daphne, then?” said Ron one day.

They were in the garden, he and Draco and Harry, de-gnoming the peonies. It was dull work, one of those chores — Draco had only recently started recognizing them — meant mostly to get them out of the house, which was a dispiriting thing to think about when a leathery little creature had its teeth two inches deep in your fingers. He didn’t realize at first that Ron was speaking to him, and had to extricate the gnome from his hand before he remembered.

“No,” he said, “and I didn’t hold my breath, either. Nott says he lives in hope for the day she figures out you’ve got to attach the letter to the owl.” He peered at Ron. “Why do you ask?”

“No reason. I just hadn’t heard anything.”

“Why would you?” This seemed uncharacteristically audacious. “You don’t know her.”

Ron’s forefinger delayed a verdict. “One, we went to a party together. Two, I watched her whole situation get torn up by a werewolf, which is pretty damn personal. And three—”

“Shh,” whispered Harry, nodding back up at the house. Voices carried from the garden.

Ron lowered his voice. “And three, she told me about her secret you-know-what thing. And she said she liked my hair.”

“Which casts into question her eyesight, if not her judgment, but doesn’t—”

“Come off it, I just wanted to know if you’d heard anything about the W-O-L-F situation.”

Draco stared at him.

“I understand having doubts,” he said, “but I assure you, all of your siblings can spell.”

“No news is good news, though, right?” said Harry hopefully, speaking over the whispered squabble that broke out between Draco and Ron. “We’d know something about it if she got sicker, or wasn’t going to come back to school. Remember that letter McGonagall sent when Petrovsky transferred?”

Draco did not want to backslide into a conversation about Daphne Greengrass, her various maladies, or the likelihood that one of them would remove her from their lives forever. In fact he hadn’t heard anything from her, and he had worried about it more than he liked to say. On full moons, he found himself thinking about her, and wondering how difficult it would be to make a Wolfsbane Potion.

They were interrupted by Arthur Weasley coming out of the house with a tray of lemonade, bearing a porkpie hat and a grin.

“Hello, boys!” he called. “Molly had me bring this out! Said you could use a break.”

“Quite,” said Draco emphatically, and seized the opportunity to vault his gnome carelessly into the grasses. Harry and Ron punted theirs far over the hedge and shuffled in to take tall frosted glasses of lemonade so sweet it stung.

“Not working too hard, are you?” chirped Arthur. “It’s summer, after all! I’m nipping into the shops later today, if you fancy a change of scenery.”

“I’d love to, Mr. Weasley,” said Harry at once.

Ron shrugged. “Might as well,” he said to Draco. “Best shot to get out of chores. Dad, can we invite Hermione? I think she wanted to buy muggle sunblocker, or something.”

“Certainly! But fair warning: I will insist she explain what it is,” said Arthur. “Sunblocker! Cavities! Light bolbos! She’s invaluable. I may ask her to come in to the office.”

“Surely there are muggle-borns in the Muggle Artifacts office,” said Draco, with a slight curl to his lip.

“Not as many as you’d think! In fact most of them don’t find it all that interesting, so they end up elsewhere. Or they haven’t a clue what we’re talking about — they’ll be the first to tell you that being muggle-born doesn’t mean you understand muggle technology. Not many of them know as much as Hermione.”

“Understatement of your life.”

“Anyway,” he said, rubbing his hands together, “how’s this sound: we’ll nip round to the grocer’s, get some staples — pop in at the auto shop, of course, just to look — then what say we get ice creams on the way back? My treat? And, er — there’s no need for your mother to know about this.”

Draco, who enjoyed a good bribe as much as the next Malfoy, agreed. Molly had forbade them all from any visits the auto shop, that den of autovehicular temptations, but there had been no promises of ice cream with her orders.

“Know about what, Mr. Weasley?” said Harry, a perfect cherub. “We’re only getting groceries.”

“Good lads!” Arthur ruffled Harry’s and Ron’s hair. Draco frayed half the nerves in his body with fear he would try the same with Draco, but what happened was far worse: he turned to Draco, put a hand on his shoulder, and said, “You’ve done some fine work today, too, son,” and whatever happened in Draco’s chest fell somewhere between a gag reflex and a stroke.

By the thinnest skin of his teeth he did not flinch away, never mind if he cracked a molar, and when Arthur’s mind caught up to whatever was happening on Draco’s face, his obvious disappointment was enough to make him crack another.

“Oh,” he said. “I’m sorry about that, Draco. That was… careless phrasing.”

And that, of all things, was what choked him — not the days of hard labor and exhaustion, the probable influence of heatstroke, and the mind-wrenching desire to shuck his own skin like a cornhusk and run away — but the fact that an adult man had recognized his discomfort, and tried, however fumblingly, to make it better.

“I don’t know what you’re talking about,” he said, “and I don’t care. One of you go tell Granger we’re going, if she’s still alive; she started a load of laundry two days ago and hasn’t been heard from since.”

The afternoon melted into a clear summer’s night, with a floral breeze, and the slim claw of the moon cutting open its wide bed of blue satin. Mrs. Weasley served dinner in the garden. Bill and Charlie levitated the chairs out of the house, letting Ginny and Ron and Harry cling to the seats while they wheeled them wildly through the air — Hermione hovered by the door, nearly levitating herself with anxiety — and Percy shouted out his window to complain of the noise. Molly produced deep platters of chicken cacciatore and salted potato wedges and garden salad with cucumbers and peas, laid up the table, and they ate all twelve of them together, passing plates in the same game of strategy and reflexes that all mealtimes became.

“Of course, I’ll have to work while we’re there,” Percy was saying, gesturing more emphatically than usual with his elderflower wine. “It’ll be my first chance to see Mr. Crouch since June. As you know, we’ve got another big event to organize right after the World Cup — you know the one I’m talking about, Father? The top-secret one?”

Ron muttered to Draco, “He’s desperate for us to ask what that is. Probably an exhibition of thick-bottomed cauldrons.”

In the middle of the table, Molly was interrogating a fidgeting Charlie about his work. Charlie was a loud, belligerently optimistic man of twenty-one, who took after his father both in build (spindly) and cadence (enthusiastic). He wore a double-ring of eyeliner and purple shading around his eyes, and enough bangles on his black jacket that he could hardly reach for the wine without jingling. Despite the gothic affect, he was rather pleasant to talk to, or would have been, had he not been undergoing an inquest.

“...do keep a safe distance from them, don’t you?”

“Can't keep ’em tame from a safe distance, Mum!” he said cheerfully. “Wouldn’t be paying me for much, if I did! Anyway, s’ not so bad — only been chomped two or three times—”

"Two or three!"

“Besides, I’m skipping the hardest job all year! Ministry just placed a he-yuge order into Britain. Feel a bit bad about it, to be honest, I left Witty and Midge to handle Berta all on their own, even though I'm the only one who can get her to take her nighty-time potion—”

“And the, er… makeup, dear? Do any of the other men do that?”

“Mum, don’t be prejudiced,” said Ginny at once. “You offered to buy me makeup last year.”

“It’s different with girls,” said Molly primly. “I’m not telling Charlie not to, I’m only asking whether a lot of other men do it. It’s been a while since I was your age.”

“Sure, loads of boys wear it,” interrupted Bill, reaching for the peas. “My flatmate does a full face every night.”

“He does! But why—?”

“Who cares? It’s none of my business,” said Bill firmly, in a way that meant he did know, but thought it was none of hers. Then he ruffled Charlie’s hair and gave him another helping of peas.

Dessert was homemade strawberry ice cream, with fresh blackberries and whipped cream. By the time they had finished, there was a host of moths congregated around the candles, and the air sparkled with fireflies. Crookshanks darted underfoot, chasing gnomes, happier than Draco had ever seen him. Draco had eaten more than he meant to and felt warm and sluggish, ready to keel over and sleep for a month, but instead he was bullied to his feet to help clear plates.

Ron caught him and Hermione on their way inside. “Me and Harry are going to check out the shed,” he muttered. “C’mon.”

“It’s just a car,” said Draco, mostly to prove he knew what a car was, but they still followed Ron into the whitewashed old barn.

Ron hauled the door open, and it ratcheted back on rusty tracks, groaning. A single round light blazed to life overhead, illuminating a thatched floor and an old baby blue car. Car parts were scattered around it like a sacrificial ring, most of them defunct or broken, some of them menacing. It smelled of dead grass and wood.

He shut the door and slid the deadbolt into place with a grunt. “There,” said Ron. “Figure we’ve got about five minutes before Ginny comes nosing, but that’ll have to do.”

“Your dad’s got a Ford Anglia?” said Harry curiously, circling the car. “My Aunt Marge has one of these. This is in better condition than hers, though.”

“What? Oh, yeah. Who cares?” said Ron. “I wanted to ask if you’d heard from Sirius.”

Hermione stood at attention. It was the first time they’d brought up Sirius or Lupin since Draco arrived, and he was curious, too: even more curious when Harry folded his arms around his chest, quickly, like there was a bird in his chest he didn’t want to set free.

“Yeah,” he said softly, “twice. He sounds okay. I wrote to him yesterday.”

“That’s great! What’s he say?”

“Er. Not much,” said Harry. “They’re somewhere far south, way out of the country. Somewhere warm. Hard for the dementors to travel. They’re camping a lot, since they can’t get too close to any towns.”

“Why not?”

“Because they haven’t got any Wolfsbane Potion, obviously,” said Draco. Hermione nodded silently, chewing her thumbnail.

Ron shuddered. “So he’s hacking it raw every full moon?”

Harry shifted uncomfortably. “Sirius says he helps him through it, some, the way they did when they were kids, but it’s not easy… makes it hard to hide, too. They can’t stay anywhere, too long.”

Hermione had abandoned her thumbnail to start fussing at her sleeves, whaling on a loose thread as if it had done something to her.

“What’s wrong?” said Ron, noticing it.

“No — nothing, nothing.”

“Nah, c’mon, let’s have it.”

She cringed. “I don’t want to sound insensitive,” she said, a phrase usually belied by what followed it, “but is it really wise for him to be traveling abroad without any potion? He could run into someone. And there’s no way of being sure—”

“It’s not his fault,” Harry said hotly. “It’s not like he can pick some up at the grocer’s—”

“I know that! I do!” Her hands flew up. “I don’t think it’s his fault! He needs help, but we can’t just say that, ‘It’s not his fault,’ like that makes it less dangerous—”

Harry’s hackles sprang up so quickly they ought to have achieved liftoff. “What do you suggest, Hermione? You want to call the Ministry? Ring up Macnair, tell him to get cracking?”

“No!”

“Heel, Potter,” snapped Draco. “She’s the reason your godfather’s not gathering mold in Azkaban.”

“Oi—”

“And another thing. If you’re going to jump down somebody’s throat for the revolutionary suggestion that a werewolf is a creature we should treat carefully, then for God’s sake, jump down mine, because I happen to agree with her.”

Harry was still bristling, as if he had a few more insults in him to trade; Draco, feeling unusually sharp, was more than glad to barter with him. But Ron raised his voice over them all.

“All of you, shut up, would you please,” he said. “Hermione, Lupin went thirteen years without Wolfsbane Potion, and he didn’t hurt anybody—”

“That we know of,” muttered Draco.

“—and Harry, Hermione’s only being cautious. You can’t honestly say he’s not dangerous, alright? Lupin’s a mate, and I like him, but what happened to Daphne was the worst thing I’d ever seen.” He folded his arms. “I still get nightmares, sometimes.”

“So do I,” Hermione said quietly.

Draco stepped forward from instinct, realized that he had no idea what to do, and stopped.

He had nightmares, too. None that he’d ever uttered a word about to anybody. But for a long time after the end of third year, he had taken fright of dreaming, because he knew it would take him back to the Whomping Willow, dementors above and werewolf ahead, only in his dreams, his godfather never came, and the Patronus never worked, and he woke expecting to find a pair of jaws to clamp around his throat.

He hadn’t had the dream since coming to the Burrow. Perhaps his subconscious was so exhausted it had no room left for nightmares, and that was a kind of bliss in itself, because he didn’t know how he would explain cold sweat and tear tracks to the boys he shared a room with.

Hermione was looking at him, waiting for him to say the same, but he couldn’t find the words to admit it. He didn’t want to keep it from her. But he couldn’t make himself say it. The words grew cold on his tongue.

What could he say, anyway? I had a nightmare? Like a child confessing to bedwetting? Ridiculous.

Harry’s anger snuffed out at once, suffocated by concern. “I’m — I’m really sorry. I didn’t think — I didn’t know,” he said. “I didn’t think. I’m sorry. How long? All summer?”

“It’s alright,” she said stiffly. “I had trouble sleeping for a while, but my parents got me some sleeping medication. I can mostly do without it,

now.”

“Wish I’d had some of that,” said Ron. “I don’t think I slept a wink, that first full moon at home.”

“You, too?” said Hermione softly.

He ground his heel into the hay. “Some.”

Harry became a blur of motion. Before anyone could react he had flung his arms around Hermione and hauled her into a rib-cracking hug. She stifled a squeak into his shoulder and then relaxed, her face squashed into his chest, while he held on as if she was about to float into space without him.

“I’m sorry,” he said miserably. “Ron, Draco, you too — I never wanted — it’s my fault, I’m sorry—”

“If you don’t shut up, I’ll wallop you so hard it’ll make the Willow look like a pat on the bum,” said Ron. “How many times have we got to tell you we’re here because we want to be? It’s been three years. You think any of us would have stuck around if we didn’t think you were worth all the rubbish?”

Harry took a sharp breath.

“Ron,” said Hermione, tremulous with emotion — but tremulous was nothing compared to Harry, who made a sound like a wounded hippogriff, and let go of Hermione to reach for Ron. Ron grabbed him and knocked their heads together, hard, like he was trying to impress the idea through Harry’s stubborn skull with telepathy.

Hermione stepped away from them, blinking suspiciously, and Draco offered his handkerchief. He was not displeased that Harry had seen fit to let go of her; the embrace had been thoughtlessly tight and possibly risked asphyxiation.

“I’m fine,” she said fiercely. “I’ve got terrible allergies.”

“To sentimentality?”

“Yes.”

“One we share,” he said. Then, “While you’ve been at the Burrow—”

“I haven’t had any.” She folded the handkerchief carefully. “Not here. It’s only when I’m alone, that I… and Ginny snores.”

“Yes. Rather.” He paused. “I have some Dreamless Sleep with my effects,” he said. “If you need it, you know where Ronald’s room is.” He didn’t know how else to help. But he was good at potion-making. It was one of the things he could do well, and one of the precious few he could do better than her.

“Thank you,” she said, so softly that it made his stomach curdle nearly inside-out with discomfort, and he ducked his head, muttering that it was only a potion, not a vault of gold.

Then she blew her nose horribly into his handkerchief, and the moment was thankfully over.

When they emerged from the shed, the Weasleys were packing up the tables and chairs and putting out the lights. Tables and chairs drifted through the air like a strange flock of chestnut birds. Molly extinguished all the lanterns in the garden with one swish of her wand, plunging the paddock into soft darkness. Percy and Arthur sat on deck chairs near the stoop, smoking pipes and talking in low voices. The throaty croons of frogs breathed life into the still night air.

“There you are,” cried Molly, catching sight of them. “You really should be in bed, the whole lot of you — you’ll be up at the crack of dawn. Goodness, are any of you packed?”

“I told you we’d do it in the morning,” groused Ron.

“I’ve heard that before,” she said, with exhausted fondness. She ushered them inside, one hand apiece on Ron and Harry’s backs.

As they ducked back into the house, Harry gasped and smacked his hand to his forehead. At first Draco thought he had hit his head on the doorframe, and he snickered at him, but when he saw Harry's face it was crumpled like a wet dishcloth.

"What, Potter?"

"No bloody idea," Harry muttered. "It's been happening all summer, it's really annoying. I'll be standing around doing nothing, and suddenly my scar will hurt like hell."

Which would have tripped something in the back of Draco's mind, if he had a moment to think about it; but then Molly clucked at them again, and they were being herded upstairs, into that dark warm attic where nothing, from headaches to werewolves, seemed capable of reaching them.

Draco could have sworn he had only been asleep for five minutes when he woke to a soft chime in his ear.

He lifted his head, scrubbing his knuckles into his eyes, and found himself staring into the kindly face of Molly Weasley. The window was dark, and she was lit only by her glowing wand-tip.

"I didn't want to shake you awake, dear," she whispered, "since Ron said it gave you a bad reaction."

Appreciative, embarrassed, and still half-asleep, he coughed and swung his feet off the bed. "I'm up," he said gruffly.

Around them, dark shapes fumbled around for their clothes. Fred had fallen asleep on George's shoulder while the other tied his shoes. Harry had his glasses on upside-down.

"Never does that for me," muttered Ron. "No one asks if I have a bad reaction."

“That’s because you don’t, Ron, dear. Don’t forget your wellies.”

Downstairs, Mr. Weasley stirred a pot of porridge the size of his ribcage, while Bill pored over a sheaf of parchment tickets at the kitchen table. He was wearing a leather jacket and a brown flannel tied around his waist. He smiled lazily and absently used his wand to stir his coffee-cup as the others stomped in; he shared his father’s remarkable talent for retaining a good temper even in uncomfortable circumstances, e.g., hauling out of bed at the very perineum of dawn.

“Where’re Perce and Ch-a-a-arlie?” said George, failing to stifle a yawn.

“Apparating later today,” said Bill. “All the big kids are.”

“So what are you doing up, then?”

“There’s an all-hands for the Curse Breaking Unit at seven,” he said. “A flag came in last night on a frozen account. Probably nothing. I’m popping in, then Apparating to the campgrounds.”

There were footsteps down the stairs and Hermione and Ginny came into the kitchen, pale and drowsy.

“Sleep well, all of you?” said Arthur, with offensive good cheer, despite the hour. “Ready for a walk? Only a short one — just two miles. Well, two and a half miles, maybe. Between two and three. Four miles, at most.”

“Over-under on six?” Fred mumbled to George.

“Over.”

“Done.”

“Are we going to use that muggle thing in the shed?” Draco said hopefully. “The car?”

“No,” said Arthur hurriedly.

“No,” said Molly, making Arthur jump. She repossessed the spoon and ladled porridge with a dictatorial bent. “All of you, eat quickly. You’ll miss the Portkey.”

Excellent. How he had longed to start his morning off with a crippling bent of nausea.

They scarfed down scalding bowls of porridge and set off through the dark chilly morning. Molly and Bill waved them goodbye from the stoop. Daybreak was a distant blush of green on the horizon.

“So how does everyone get there without muggles noticing?” Hermione wondered, her voice cushioned by the velvety silence of the bullfrogs.

Arthur rubbed his hands. “Good question!” he said, and though Hermione must have heard this at least a dozen times a day, it still made her smirk, a little, in a way that made Draco roll his eyes. “The trouble is, about a hundred thousand wizards turn up at the World Cup. Which is far too many for muggles not to notice! So we have to stagger the arrivals. The tickets come with time gateways and rendezvous points. Some Apparate, of course, but for those who don’t want to, or can’t — that’s you lot — we use Portkeys. There’s about, oh, two hundred of them placed at strategic points around Britain, and ours is on Stoatshead Hill.”

“Why couldn’t we Apparate, too?” complained Ron.

“Side-along! With six people!” Arthur chuckled. “I’d be lucky if I didn’t splinch myself through a wall.”

They trudged down the dark cobbled lane through the village, under the dusty glow of gas lamps. The sky flushed from the color of bottled blue ink to a jeweled indigo, still dusted with stars. Draco kneaded his hands like dough to keep them warm.

Hermione fell back to walk with him. “What goes into making a Portkey?” she whispered.

“No idea, but hang back a moment, I’ll get out my pocket encyclopedia and check — ah, no, it doesn’t say. How the devil should I know?”

“Because you pretend to know everything, up until someone actually asks! You’ll make fun of me for not knowing what a ‘snidgeon’ is, like St. Mungo’s gives you a pamphlet at birth, but other times you’ll act like I’m Merlin's cursed idiot for supposing an oh-so-superior pureblood wizard would know his way around the world—”

“Alright, alright,” he said, because it was that or break out laughing, and he couldn’t afford to lose the body heat. “Ask your questions, inquisitrix.”

“I just don’t understand what a Portkey is for,” she said in breathy bursts, as they started to climb a long, sloping hill. “If it’s easy as Apparating, why use the Hogwarts Express?”

“Apart from comfort, atmosphere, tradition, and the miscellaneous advantages of not introducing a score of eleven-year-olds to their magical education with a crippling bout of nausea?”

“Quite.”

“The same reason they don’t use Floo powder. Because of you.” He poked her arm, a little meanly.

“Wh— you mean muggle-borns.”

“Yes. You’ve got to have a rendezvous point that muggle parents can find, and you can hardly do better than a big train station smack in the middle of London.”

“That’s… thoughtful.”

“Don’t sound so surprised. I suspect it predates the use of Portkeys, anyway.”

“Is it hard to make a Portkey?” she said thoughtfully. Her head was tipped at the precise angle that meant maximum cognitive activity was taking place; by now, he could have plotted it with a sextant. “Are they very common?”

Any irritation at being treated like an appendix was quelled by a twinge of pleasure that she wanted to ask him instead of anyone else, and in particular Mr. Weasley, who by all rights stood a better chance of knowing. “They’re a poor man’s way to travel,” he said, in a low voice. “They’re one-use objects, cheap to make — how couldn’t they be, it’s only the cost of the object and an enchantment — but not terribly useful, and it takes about an age to set them up. Floo powder is miles better, but it’s expensive.”

“So your family travels by Floo?”

“I side-along Apparate with my mother, seeing as there’s only two of us. But no, we wouldn’t use Portkeys unless there were truly no other options. Dashed uncomfortable things.”

Someone cleared his throat aggressively behind them. Before either could look, Ron brushed past, taking a bruising pace up the steep hill, scowling like someone had canceled his birthday.

“Oh, drat,” sighed Hermione. “I should have thought—”

“Don’t feel badly. I was the one who said it, not you,” said Draco, who was trying not to feel badly about it, either, and finding little success. Which was a damned perplexing feeling, because he’d only said what was true.

All the same, he would have felt more comfortable saying it had he not been living on the Weasleys’ generosity for a week.

At the top of the hill, two tall figures stood silhouetted against the rising sun.

“Amos!” called Arthur gladly. He clasped hands with the older of the two, a ruddy-faced wizard with a receding hairline of brown curls, who was wearing a Hufflepuff varsity jacket.

“Arty! My God, you’ve gotten fat!” This pot, having heartily observed the kettle’s color, proceeded to hug him.

“Easier to do when you’re not eating from the Ministry cafeteria! Children, this is Amos Diggory. Worst chaser Hufflepuff ever had—”

“Least I was a chaser, Arthur ‘Four Strikes’ Weasley—”

“—and my old coworker, used to run with me in Muggle Artifacts. Now he’s in Control of Magical Creatures. And I think you know his son, Cedric?”

“Yes,” said Ginny, at once. Fred smacked her.

Cedric Diggory was the Hufflepuff seeker, several years older, and a pureblood, though his family didn’t run in the Malfoy circles. Up close, he was six feet of lanky quidditch muscle, one of those boys who had shot up so fast he was still growing into his height, with a square face and jaw, waves of tousled toffee-brown hair, and soft brown eyes ringed in long lashes. When he smiled his eyes crinkled and friendly dimples split open his whole face, and it gave the impression that there was no one he would rather be smiling at.

“Hello,” said Ginny, tucking her hair behind her ear.

“Hi,” said Cedric, smiling back. Draco, who had been beginning to think Ginny’s taste in boys was an intricate mechanism of self-sabotage, begrudgingly admitted this was improvement.

Amos Diggory peered around at the assembled children: three Weasley boys, Draco, Harry, Hermione, and Ginny. “Great Scott!” he cried, adjusting his glasses. “And you’re still missing some from the Christmas card! You might leave Molly alone, one of these nights, Artie!”

“No, no! Just these ones.” Arthur gestured at Fred, George, and Ron. Draco did not fail to notice that his gesture could have plausibly swept Harry, who was beside Ron, into its ambit. “This is Hermione Granger, friend of Ron’s; Draco Malfoy, another friend; and this is Harry Potter.”

“Harry Potter?” Mr. Diggory’s mouth fell open. “It’s really you?”

“Yeah,” said Harry, reluctantly, “I am. It’s… me.”

“Why, you’re the Gryffindor seeker!”

Harry blinked. “Yeah, I am,” he said, much more eagerly.

“Ced’s told me all about you! He said you were the best seeker in a century! Now, Hufflepuff did beat you last year, I’ll not forget—”

Cedric glanced away, scratching his neck. “Harry was in the Hospital Wing for that match, Dad,” he mumbled. “I told you that.”

“Yes, but you were the man on the broomstick! That’s life, isn’t it, Artie? Just showing up, being there, that’s ninety percent of everything. Ced’s too modest, he takes after his mother — so I’ve got to brag for all three of us!”

“Must be nearly time,” said Arthur quickly. “We’d better get ready… oh. Harry. Hermione. You just need to touch the Portkey, that’s all, a finger will do—”

“Yes, but what is it?” said Draco peevishly. He wasn’t inclined to do much of anything with Amos Diggory, just now, at least until he heard the half-dozen other stories where Gryffindor whomped Hufflepuff flat.

Grinning, Mr. Diggory held out a moldy boot.

Draco sighed. These sorts of developments were starting not to surprise him.

The ten of them crowded around the boot, backpacks jostling. Draco eased out a hand and hooked his pinky around one soggy shoelace.

“Three…” muttered Mr. Weasley, one eye still on his watch.

Draco leaned into Hermione’s ear. “You’re going to want to keep your feet under you, if you can,” he said. “These things generally dump you a few feet in the air.”

She shivered. Any reference to heights or flying was a Granger sleeper-phrase, and triggered her voice to pitch up an octave. “In the air? Why?”

“Two…”

“So you don’t end up teleporting your ankle four feet into solid rock, if their calculations are off.”

She seized his arm. “How far is a few?”

“You’ll soon find out.”

“Draco!”

“One!”

A hook behind his navel wrenched forward, and Draco was moving. Traveling by Portkey was like getting strapped to a giant’s fist and whirled around in a shotput. The boot whirled though a flickering liminal space of flashing colors, moving too fast for him to breathe, centrifugal force straining his arm to its very limit— and then it was over.

He dropped to the ground and landed in a crouch, rolling fluidly to his feet. Harry did the same, looked much cheered by it, and promptly hit the ground when Ron landed on top of him. Hermione dropped out of the air and immediately lurched over, burying her unreasonably sharp nails in Draco’s arm.

“Ow. I said ow, witch. Hello?”

Giving up, he took stock of the other travelers. Mr. Weasley, Mr. Diggory, and Cedric had all landed easily. Fred and George lay in starfish position on the grass.

“Seven past five from Stoatshead Hill,” said a cool, amplified voice. “Welcome to the Quidditch World Cup.”

-Happy St. Patrick's Day! And just in time to tee up the Cup final. A big quidditch-heavy chapter up next, naturally. Fun fact: I actually did some reading-up on sports journalism to try and nail the writing of the Cup.

-Poor Harry. Also, poor Hermione. I think of Book 4 as the emotional hinge of the series, as conflicts start to flare up — puberty will do that for you, eh — and Feelings become more complicated. (The author wrote, eagerly.)

-BIGGEST shoutout to the comments on the debut chapters, oh my God! Thank you terribly for the warmest of warm welcomes. I can't wait to share what's coming.

-Next chapter title: "Ireland vs. Bulgaria."

Ireland vs. Bulgaria

Chapter 34: Ireland vs. Bulgaria

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

The valley below them sloped gently into a plateau at the middle, like a massive sculptor had pressed her palm into a loaf of emerald clay. Purple flowers spilled across the slope in a crust of amethyst, waving in the salty breeze that wafted off the shell-white cliffs behind them. The most populous foliage in the valley, however, was not flowers but tents: big tents, small tents, square tents, round tents, tents the size of houses, tents the size of tables, neon tents, pastel tents, tents in city blocks and tents in tangled circles like pages of runes, tents with chimneys and bellpulls and weather vanes, tents with gardens and wells and wisteria running up the sides, two-story, three-story, four-story tents, and tents which, one finally had to admit, were not really tents at all.

“Looks like we’re Section T-394,” exclaimed Arthur, brandishing an enormous foldable map. “Think that’s just down there, by that charming fellow with the alligator moat.”

“Shame, we’re T-611,” said Amos. “That’s us. Well! Pleasure to see you, Artie; you and your boys come over any time you’d like your arse handed to you on a broomstick!”

“Or just tea,” said Cedric, pained. “Like normal people, Dad.”

“Ha!” bellowed Amos, and with an arm around his son’s shoulders, they parted ways.

They waded down through the early-morning mist. They passed a tent with a garden of pink puffball mushrooms the size of sunflowers, a tent surrounded by eight-foot lavender peacocks that made Draco miss the Manor terribly, and a tent with a lopsided stone turret covered in ivy.

“That’s the Lovegoods,” said Arthur, “it has Xenophilius written all over it. I wonder if they’ve come alone…? Ah, here we are.”

Their space, marked with a sign that read WEEZLY, was the size of a carpet. And not a big carpet.

Arthur emptied a bag of poles and pegs onto the ground and proudly announced that they were going to do it the muggle way. (Draco started to walk away in protest, only for Hermione to tug him back.) Practically, this meant Arthur fumbled away with the mallet and ropes while Hermione (the only one there who had ever actually been camping), ordered everyone around, an arrangement that left them both happy, and nobody else.

By the end of an hour, they had two shabby but serviceable tents, and only two posts had been hammered in upside down.

Hermione wiped some sweat from her forehead and put her hands on her hips. “There,” she said. “That’ll do for… er… the gnomes, I suppose.”

“Well, it’s no palace, but after the Burrow, it’s hardly unlivable,” said Draco, puzzled by her not unwelcome bout of snobbishness.

She glanced at him, then surreptitiously crooked her finger, and he ducked his ear.

It was getting harder and harder to do that. She seemed to be shrinking every summer.

“We can barely fit four people in there,” she whispered.

“Four? This will fit twelve. Unless you need your own bedroom.”

She opened her mouth, and then pressed her finger to her lips.

“Magic,” she said, after a moment.

“I always like watching you remember you’re a witch,” he said. “It must be such a relief.”

Arthur drew back the tent flap grandly. “Ah! Paradise!” he declared. “Come have a look.”

Draco ducked under the flap, and was pleasantly un-disappointed. Paradise, it was not, but it was an airy cabin, with a kitchenette finished in cherry wood, a small living room stuffed full of musty antique furniture in atrocious florals, and a spiral staircase that led up to the loft, where all the cots were. The whole place smelled musty and sweet, like mothballs and wood varnish.

“Is this yours?” he said curiously. It was almost as big as the Weasleys’ real living room. He’d have thought it was out of their price range.

“Not for long. Borrowed it from Perkins at the office. Doesn’t camp much anymore, poor fellow, he’s got lumbago — how shall we do it, then? Girls in one tent, boys in another?”

“That’s not fair,” said Ron indignantly, “there’s only two of them!”

“And one of them’s Ginny,” added Fred. “She doesn’t count. OW!”

Ginny had punched his arm.

“It’s up to you, dear,” Arthur reassured Hermione, ignoring his sons. Draco imagined he must be rather practiced at it by now. “Whatever makes you comfortable. If you need your own bathroom…”

“Thank you, Mr. Weasley, but I don’t mind sharing. Maybe we could break it up by age? That would keep the four of us together, since we’re here as Ron’s guests.”

“I want to stay with Ron,” said Ginny.

“With Harry, you mean,” said Ron, and snickered when she tried to punch him, too. Harry rubbed his arm uncomfortably.

“Let’s put you with Fred and George,” decided Mr. Weasley. “The four of you go in the other tent — I’ll put Bill in with you, so you’ve got an adult — Ginny and the other boys will stay with me.”

“Why’ve we got to share with Perce?” said George. “He snores like he’s trying for the opera.”

“It’s not bad as all that,” said Arthur, lying valiantly. “You’ll sleep well after the match. Now! Time to make camp. Ron, why don’t you take your friends and fetch us some water? The rest of us will chop firewood.”

“With an ax?” said Ginny, eager at the prospect to hone her young biceps.

“We’ve got an oven,” whined Fred, who was not.

“Authenticity, boys!” said Arthur, with relish. “Muggles camp around outdoor fires, don’t they, Hermione?”

Hermione found herself the sudden target of a few resentful stares. “Yes, but I suppose they only do it because they can’t make their own,” she said haltingly, “so there’s really no need…”

“Nonsense! You heard the girl! Off, off! Now, where did I put the tools…?”

“You should’ve kept your mouth shut,” mumbled Ron. “Hope the twins don’t distract him, or he’ll lop off his own toes.”

The sun had come soaring over the sea-cliffs and peeled back the curtains of mist. Their path through the tent city was circuitous, doing zigzags and loops that doubled back or terminated entirely, forcing them to hop gates or duck under archways, a route defying space and reason in ways that made perfect sense to Draco and Ron, and utterly distressed Harry and Hermione. Campers had crept out and were starting to make breakfast over tiny cookstoves. The smell of sizzling fry-up filled the air, but for every British wizard shaking a pan of sausages, there were a dozen others making breakfast quite differently: a witch in a blue yukata with white flowers and a pixie cut spooned dollops of something pungent and sticky onto her childrens' bowls of rice; a man in an embroidered red skirt and beaded locs was frying some kind of flat square doughnuts, with some difficulty, as his young daughter levitated one into her mouth whenever his back was turned; a woman in a queenly full-body covering of scarlet red and gilt nibbled from a platter of olives and herbed butter with flatbread, while her husband read to her from a newspaper in Arabic. Two little girls in festive green-and-pink shawls shot past, riding tandem on a toy broom, while their older sister hurtled after them on foot, crying: "Basta! Basta!"

Closer to the pitch, there were booths for tabling: one for the Salem Witches' Institute, decked out with so much red, white, and blue you'd think the Americans were playing in the final; the Ministry of Magic Wizarding Union had a considerable crowd, and several bedraggled interns were handing out flyers; the Divinus Haruspex Association of Clairvoyants sat under a glittering fringed canopy, surrounded by floating candles and wreathed in blue smoke; even the Snallygaster Protection League had a little table of its own. They had brought biscuits.

They lost Hermione somewhere in the crowd, and spent a harrowing twenty minutes searching only to find her, predictably, glued to the table for the Allegiance of Muggle-Born Wizards. She had cornered one of the frazzled representatives, talking like they were about to outlaw the practice of English, and got in one last cry of: "—send a reading list — I'll owl you!" before Draco hauled her away.

"Wait, wait, I didn't give them my address!"

"Good. They can thank me later."

The grass under their feet gave way to shamrocks, and into a pocket of the city where every tent was green from ground to roof. All the wizards here wore green robes, or scarves, or jerseys, and some had even dyed their hair and faces green, too.

“Hey, you lot! Harry! Ron!”

It was Seamus Finnigan, waving them over. Beside him sat a sandy-haired woman and Dean Thomas, who was wearing an Ireland jersey and a knit-wool cap. Muggle rock music pounded from a speaker he’d affixed over the door of his green tent, a snarl of gritty, gloating guitars and smugly nasal vocals: he recognized a few, like “Sabotage,” from the Gryffindor end-of-year party.

“Great to see you!” he said, pumping Harry’s hand. “Ready to watch us punt those manky Slavs back to the Black Sea?”

“Pure keen on it,” said Harry, grinning. “Good summer?”

“Corking. Oh, Ron, by the way, are Fred and George ever coming out with those order forms? Wouldn’t bother you over it, mate,” he said, with a glance at his mother, “but I asked them to hold some of the fireworks for me, and they never wrote back, so I dunno if they got the message.”

After assuring Seamus they would pass it on, and declaring vocally in support of Ireland, they set off again. Occasionally someone stopped them and offered them a free shamrock, or an Ireland flag pin, which Hermione took and almost put on, before Draco summarily removed it.

“What’s wrong with it? I like Ireland,” she defended.

“Yes, but we’re about to go into the Bulgarian tents, and I’d prefer you didn’t get us mugged.”

The Bulgarians had not the decorative eye that the Irish did, but lacked nothing in spirit. Tall banners in red and black fluttered over the rows of dark tents, each one bearing a surly, muscular young man with a sour mouth and hirsute eyebrows. He folded his arms and scowled at them as they passed.

“Krum,” murmured Ron, like it was the name of a saint.

“Who’s Crumb?” said Hermione.

Ron and Harry chorused in sighs of pain.

“Viktor Krum is the Bulgarian seeker,” said Harry. “He’s a genius.”

“An artist,” said Ron.

“He’s already being called the greatest seeker of all time. And he’s only seventeen!”

Hermione squinted at the poster. The poster squinted back. “Why does he look like he’s got a cramp?”

“Who cares? He’s a prodigy!” Ron’s hands implored the heavens for patience. “He’s got the world record for fastest snitch-catch in a World Cup game! He’s been on the cover of every quidditch magazine in print! He can scowl as much as he wants.”

“Maybe so,” she said primly, “but I wouldn’t like to be stuck at a dinner table with him.”

“Well, call me to swap, if you ever get the chance,” said Ron incredulously.

They had to wait in a queue to pump water. Several other familiar faces swam out of the crowd to greet them: Oliver Wood, who had graduated that spring, came galloping up in a Bulgaria jersey. Draco hadn’t seen him stop smiling since they’d won the Quidditch Cup.

“Potter! Malfoy! Good show, isn’t it?” He planted his hands on his hips, beaming. “You’ll never guess who I just spoke to.”

“Don’t tell me. It’s Ireland,” said Draco. “They want you to sub in.”

The irony floated harmlessly over Oliver’s dreamlike face. “Better! I just spoke to Eggers Eccleston! Of Puddlemere United! He wants to sign me!”

“Oliver, that’s wicked!” cried Harry. Draco, being much cheered about Puddlemere’s prospects in the League, told him so, and Oliver pumped all their hands.

“If you want to know another thing, the seeker’s getting old,” he said confidentially. “She’s nearly thirty-four, and expected to retire after next season. If you want a tryout, Harry, all you need to do is call…”

“He’s fourteen!” said Hermione, appalled, but Harry took Oliver’s card when she wasn’t looking.

Further down, getting her own water at the pump, was Cho Chang, her long hair pinned up in its usual ponytail, wearing an Ireland bomber jacket and black jeans. When she saw the four of them, she stood up and waved; when she saw Harry, she waved harder.

Harry fumbled about half the kettle of water down his shirt waving back.

“Good Lord,” snapped Draco, stepping clear of the splash. It was a good thing Ginny hadn’t come.

As the sun edged closer to a blinding peak, salesmen prowled up and down the lanes of tents, pushing carts and yowling their wares. Harry gasped and dragged them all over at the sight of a tiny Firebolt replica that flew wherever you threw it and returned, and bought two, even as Draco’s groused that it was overpriced junk. There were a forest of Christmas-colored rosettes that pumped sparks when spun, stovepipe hats that opened up to issue green smoke, sparklers that spelled ‘IRELAND’ or ‘BULGARIA’ when lit, shirts and jerseys of every conceivable design, including one that represented Krum merely with a blank face and eyebrows — Hermione thought that one was funny, and bought it — and a special-edition Quidditch World Cup chess set, where the pieces were all represented by real players. When he saw it, Ron gasped in longing.

“Fan of chess, are you?” said the saleswizard, with a glint in his eye. “Lucky you, it’s on sale. Only five hundred galleons! Special price! What? No, where are you going? Hey — alright, four fifty! I’ll throw in a Krum jersey, too!”

Draco had dragged them all away from the vendor. “Don’t stare like that if you want to buy it,” he muttered to Ron. “It was probably two hundred before we showed up.”

“Yeah, and that would’ve been a real steal, at two hundred,” said Ron, rolling his eyes.

They stopped in at a different cart, where the vendors were less pushy, and where Draco relented to let Ron buy a green rosette for a galleon. He refused, however, to let Ron pay the fifteen sickles the vendor wanted for a dancing shamrock hat, and haggled him expertly down to six and a half, along with a free Bulgaria poster and a set of commemorative 1994 World Cup pins.

“I’ll be expecting a splendid Christmas present this year,” Draco informed him, as Ron happily mashed the shamrock hat on his head. “And I want to see you wearing that, since you were so desperate for it. Your father didn’t bring omnioculars, by chance…? What am I saying? Never mind. Wait here.” He stepped over to the nearest cart.

“What will a pair of omnioculars cost me?” he said boredly.

“Our omnioculars aren’t like any omnioculars,” said the saleswizard. “Ours have rapid replay and a built-in autofocus— I couldn’t part with them for less than fifteen galleons.”

“The fellow down the block said nine.”

“Well maybe his omnioculars don’t have built-in autofocus,” said the saleswizard haughtily. “But I might be able to part with them for twelve.”

“It’s a short block,” said Draco.

“I can’t do less than twelve, really, I can’t. I have to make a profit somehow.”

“Of course. And so does the fellow down the block.”

“You might as well rob me. Eleven.”

“Ten,” he said, “and I’ll take four.”

Ron said nothing when he got his pair. His cheeks were distinctly red. Harry, however, chirped “Thanks!” and bought them all cinnamon fritters.

Down the lane, a witch sold books, maps, and pamphlets from a newsstand on the corner, and Hermione predictably dragged them into its orbit. Draco waited indulgently while she inspected the offerings, leaning against the wall. Harry stole and ate her fritter while she was distracted.

“See, this is actually useful,” she crowed, flipping through a pocket-sized English-Bulgarian dictionary. “I’ve seen at least three Bulgarian food carts where I can’t read a thing.”

“Get it, then.”

“I would, but I spent the last of my galleons on that shirt. I have money, but the rest is in pounds—”

“I’ll buy it for you,” said Ron abruptly. He held out his hand. “How much is it?”

Draco’s head twitched up. He eyed Ron, who had just earlier balked at buying a bag of popcorn because of the price.

There was something not altogether wholesome in his eagerness, he thought. He didn’t like it. Of course, Ron could be generous, if he wanted to; but he hadn’t been generous to Harry, or Draco, when they’d passed the snack carts, and he hadn’t offered to buy anything for them.

He didn’t know what to make of it, except that it made him uneasy. Hermione didn’t seem to know what to make of it, either, because she stuttered: “Oh — er, thanks. I’ll pay you back when I get to Gringotts. It’s eleven sickles."

Ron plumbed his pockets for change and came up with not half that. “Here,” he said awkwardly, “I’m pretty sure I’ve got more in my bag, I’ll just run back to the tent—”

Draco stepped forward and dropped a galleon in front of the saleswitch.

What followed was a beat of silence as ugly and naked as a newborn rat. Hermione handled it the worst, swinging her head between them as if she were following a very fast, very heated telepathic exchange; Ron turned the color of bruised beets, and Draco said nothing, refusing to speak first.

“Nice of you, mate,” said Ron neutrally.

“Don’t fret, I’m sure you’ll get your good deed for the day elsewhere,” said Draco.

Hermione shoved the contentious article into her pack and buried it under her teeshirt. “Lunch!” she declared. “Lunch? Anyone? I think we should all have lunch. I think we’re all hungry. Aren’t you hungry? I’m starving. It’s almost two, we haven’t eaten anything but doughnuts in seven hours. And someone should really convince Mr. Weasley to use magic for the firewood — oh, I hope he didn’t try to use the ax without us, I don’t know hardly any first aid.”

As the afternoon trailed into dusk, the volume of activity in the campsite had risen from a buzz to a clamor. The saleswizards made a last desperate press to empty their stores. Lanterns in green and red spread like twin rows of vertebrae towards the distant crown of the stadium, where searchlights swayed drunkenly across the lavender carpet of the sky. They ate cheese toasties and Mrs. Weasley's homemade tomato soup around the campfire, and as Bill and Charlie put out the embers with jets from their wand, a deep gong boomed over the campsite. The lanterns blazed white.

"Quarter past seven at Atherfield Green. Please proceed to the stadium."

Mr. Weasley sprang up and clapped his hands. "It's time! That's it! Alright, everyone, find a buddy — this crowd's about to be pure madness, don't want anyone getting separated — hold on to your buddy, let's go!"

Harry slung an arm around Ron's shoulders, and Ginny leapt piggyback onto Bill's back. Draco understood at once what Mr. Weasley had been afraid of. Amidst a feverish crowd of thousands, they were packed shoulder to shoulder in a mass of people that moved like a body of water, rippling this way and that, with cross-currents that threatened to wrench a distracted sod away from their group and drop them three blocks down. Magic crackled overhead, noise-making spells and showers of sparks, and the occasional flash-crack of a firework that left all those under it blinking away blindness. A crowd surge at his back nearly shoved him to the ground, to be trampled underfoot, but Hermione caught him at the last moment and hauled him up in no small show of strength. He clung to her shoulders and caught his breath, trying to ignore the lingering fear of being stomped to death.

In a heartbeat, the other Weasleys were swept away into the crowd.

"Stay together," Hermione shouted, hardly audible above the din. Then she grabbed his hand and laced their fingers tightly. "Doh— ge — parated."

“What?”

She lifted their joined hands and pointed at them. Then she turned and plunged into the crowd, steering him by the arm.

If you took Notre-Dame de Paris, stacked it on top of two other Notre-Dames, glued another pair of Notre-Dames on either side of it, and then gilded the whole goddamn thing, you would end up with an approximately 1:3 scale model of the Quidditch World Cup stadium. Stairs trailed up in dizzying flights up dozens of floors, and elevators wheeled up and down in constant motion, ferrying groups up and down the stands. Ministry ticketmasters in purple robes stood at each gate, checking tickets.

“I’m sorry,” shouted Hermione. “The person with our tickets went in already — our group’s on the other side—”

The witch shook her head. “No tickets, no entrance! Next, please!”

“No, we have them! We got separated, but if you let us in, we’ll come back—”

“Next, please,” shouted the witch, pretending not to see her.

Draco shouldered in front of Hermione. “Our names are in the registry,” he snapped. “Draco Malfoy. Hermione Granger. Look us up.” He flashed his signet ring.

The witch suddenly rediscovered her ability to see both of them.

“Malfoy, you said?” she squeaked. “The tickets are… they’re under Malfoy?”

“Will that get us out of this godforsaken line any faster?”

“I… well, I, er… maybe you can just… come back,” said the witch weakly. “When you do have them.”

She waved them through.

“That was absurd,” Hermione said, inexplicably irritated that things had worked out for them, while Draco towed her along into their good fortune. “You didn’t do anything. I bet there are loads of people in this line who don’t really have tickets—”

“And we do, so what’s your issue?”

“Because she didn’t know that! All she knew was that you had a famous name, and she let you break the rules!” Hermione sounded torn between finding their seats and turning back to give the witch a piece of her mind. “She’s not supposed to do that. In fact, not doing that is the one thing she’s there to do. I honestly can’t think of any way she could have failed further.”

“You’re right. You know what, you should file a complaint once the match is over. I won’t sleep so long as there’s a person like that working in government.”

“I just might!”

He laughed at her. She dropped her eyes to the floor, muttering something mutinous.

“Draco! Hermione! There you are!”

Arthur came hurtling down the stairs and wrestled through the crowds. “We thought we’d lost you!” he hollered. “Merlin’s bones, I had a heart attack!”

“Had a bit of trouble at the ticketstand,” said Draco. “I smoothed it over.”

“Yes, well! Glad you made it! Come on! Top box, straight up!”

They really weren’t good seats. The top box was so far up the nosebleed section that if your nose did indeed start dripping, it would reach terminal velocity before it hit anything. The others were already packed in, their faces painted with the glow of the giant crystal ball that hung suspended over the field, where advertisements flickered: Gladrags WizardWear… Sleekeazy's Hair Potion and Scalp Treatment… The Bluebottle: A Broom for the Family…

Two seats were left near the back of the box. Hermione slipped her fingers free of his, which was obviously appropriate, since they were in no danger of getting lost anymore, and there was a moment of tingling sensitivity in his fingers as blood flow returned. He shook his hand out and put it in his pocket and sat down without looking at anyone.

“POPCORN! LEMON POPS! MEAT PIES!” A vendor staggered down the stairs, almost crushed by the weight of his own wares. He roared: “POPCORN! LEMON POPS! MEAT PIES!”

“Can I have a lemon pop, Dad?” said Ginny at once, twisting around in her seat. “They’ve got the ones that turn your tongue green! Have you ever had one, Harry?”

“Yeah, and I want popcorn,” said Fred. He and George were the only ones not wearing any gear; Draco had a suspicion as to where their galleons went. “Georgie and I can split a bag, we’re not greedy.”

“We’ll all have a lemon po,” said Mr. Weasley grandly. “How much will that be?”

The vendor told him. Mr. Weasley balked.

Draco, who still wanted a water in any case, reached for his pocket to buy his own; but hesitated. Fortunately, Harry shot up. “I’ve got it, Mr. Weasley,” he said hastily, scrambling over Ron and Charlie’s legs. “Here — I lost a bet with Ron.” He shoved a handful of galleons at the vendor before Mr. Weasley could call this falsehood what it was, and there were rounds of ice cream and embarrassed mumbling for all.

“Have we got everyone?” gasped Arthur, mopping his brow with a tattered handkerchief. “Are we ready? Oh, hell — where’s Percy?”

The redheads consulted each other, and it was determined that none of them were hiding Percy in their pockets.

“Damn. I told him to stay — alright. All of you stay here, I’ll go find him.”

“Dad! The anthems are about to start!”

A hundred-piece brass orchestra was marching onto the field, accompanied by scores of leaping and whirling colorguard.

“I’ll go,” said Hermione, standing up. “I don’t mind if I miss something — it’s only a bit of quidditch—”

The reaction was immediate.

“Not HERE!” roared Ron.

“Take it back!”

“Come on, Hermione—”

“Turn around three times and spit!”

“FINE! It’s only the noble and very serious game of quidditch, which so important it’s worth the hundreds of thousands of pounds the Ministry spent on a stadium that’s going to be abandoned in twenty-four hours, and obviously worth the tens of thousands of injuries it causes a year—”

“Yes it is, thank you,” said Draco. “Speaking as one of them.”

“—so I’ll be just heartbroken to miss even a minute of it!” said Hermione. Her hair, whose volume could be relied on to gauge her level of fury, clocked in at a Cat 3. It was both impressive and harrowing.

“Well, someone’s got to go with her,” said Arthur, who was in the fight of his life not to laugh. “She can’t go alone.”

Hermione looked at Draco. Draco looked at Hermione. She looked back, harder.

“They’re about to do the anthems.”

“Fine!” she said. “God forbid you miss your stupid anthems. Ron, how about you?”

“I didn’t say I wasn’t going. Give me a minute to stand up, witch, my legs are still numb from those stairs.”

“I can go,” mumbled Ron, but he was still watching the band. Harry shook his head subtly at him, warning him away from temptation.

“No,” said Draco, tragically. “I’ve already put my head to the sword. I’m a man of my word. Just remember me, when the match starts, and say a word in my honor: ‘In Adulating Memory of Draco Malfoy, who walked so that we might sit—’”

“Hurry up!” called Hermione, who was already two flights down the stairs. He dropped into a dignified soliloquy of muttering and slid down the railing after her.

Under the stands was a maze of narrow wooden scaffolding. Sawdust rained from above them whenever the stands cheered or thumped their feet, which was every few seconds, and the sounds of the stadium came to them muffled. The Bulgarian national anthem began with a thunderclap of fanfare and mournful brass, followed by an overture that sounded like it was written for a planet’s funeral.

“I don’t know how we’re supposed to find Weasley in all this,” he called, fighting to be heard over the rhythmic explosions of cymbals. “There’s a hundred thousand people here.”

“That’s easy, we’ll check the Ministry box,” she shouted back. There was a seizure of horns, and the stands swayed as the Bulgarians leapt to their feet, sending them both listing onto the rickety metal railing: Hermione’s rosette went spinning into the vertiginous floors below them. She yelped and jumped back into his chest, and he steadied her with a hand at her back.

“Easy.”

“I don’t know what it is with wizards and heights,” she breathed. Her head knocked against his collarbone, which was probably an accident; he didn’t think she realized he’d caught her. “Or self-preservation. Limitless magical power, and what do they do? Find a million different ways to break their neck, that’s what.”

“You lost any right to complain about that the day you told me about airplanes.”

“Airplanes are actually quite safe, thank y— oh, wait! Look!”

She crouched and pointed through the railing at the scaffolding below them, where a group of wizards in purple robes were talking. One of them was a stiff-backed old man with hair that could have been parted with a straight razor, and a walrus mustache the color and texture of steel wool. He reminded Draco slightly of his father, or at least pictures of him.

He took a knee and nudged Hermione. “That’s Bartemius Crouch.”

“I know,” she whispered, distracted, “Percy showed me a picture.”

“He did?”

“The Bulgarians want another twelve seats in the Top Box,” said Crouch. He spoke as though any movement of his lips was energy wasted.

“Oh is that what they’re after?” said someone cheerfully, out of sight. “Thought he wanted a pair of tweezers. Well, tell them they can bring their own chairs, and we’ll squeeze in as many as can fit.”

“Respectfully, Mr. Bagman, I think we ought to turn them down,” said a breathy voice. It was Percy’s. “We’ve already made quite enough concessions, and they are guests—”

“Thank you, Weatherby. Ludo, while you’re at it, ask Karkaroff if there’s been any movement on the visas. I spoke to Babanin in International Affairs, and he says there’s a standstill.”

“Karkaroff?” whispered Hermione.

“Durmstrang headmaster,” he murmured back.

“Isn’t Durmstrang the one where Neville’s grandmother is always threatening to send him? Don’t they treat their students horribly?”

“That’s a rumor. They beat us in test scores, we’ve got to make them look bad somehow. But it doesn’t make sense — Durmstrang’s under Russian jurisdiction, not Bulgarian, and Bagman is in Games and Sports. He hasn’t any business with Karkaroff.”

“I will,” said Bagman, “if I see him. You know, he is all the way down in the diplomats’ box—”

Crouch interrupted him. “Be sure to tell him that Scottish immigration services will expect EU passports from all of his students, quidditch stars or no.”

Bagman sighed and Disapparated. Percy said, “Masterfully done, sir,” but Crouch didn’t hear him. He had gone tense at the sight of someone down the stairwell.

“Minister,” he said. “Good evening.”

Percy spasmed and nearly dropped the clipboard he was holding.

The Minister of Magic wore clean gray pinstripes, and tied his black hair in a purple velvet bow. He stood with his hands in his pockets, his posture genial, and leaned against the railing.

“A great success, Barty,” he said kindly. “It was what, five hundred Portkeys? Six?”

“Five hundred and forty-four,” said Crouch stiffly.

“No small feat.” Runcorn turned to Percy, who whimpered. “Did you help him, lad?”

There was a moment of confused disconnect before Crouch remembered that Percy existed. “Hm? Oh. Yes. Percival Weatherby. Helpful chap.”

“Wsslee,” croaked Percy inaudibly.

“What?”

“Nothing, sir.”

“Nice to meet you, Percival,” said Runcorn, shaking his hand warmly. “There’s always a need for enterprising young men at the Ministry. What draws you to the work?”

Percy mouthed wordlessly. “Law and order,” he said hoarsely, at last. “I like — rules. Sir.”

“That’s very good,” said Runcorn easily. “There aren’t many young people who appreciate them. Everyone in my administration has an interest in the careers of promising young men. I’m sure you remember what that’s like, Barty?”

Whatever Runcorn had meant by that, it was obviously not praise, for Crouch’s shoulders crept up like a boxer’s.

“It appears we both do.”

“I like to keep tabs on my people,” said Runcorn pleasantly. “Speaking of which. If you catch any pickpockets, point them in my direction, would you? Nott’s wand’s gone missing, and it’s been a nightmare trying to make do without him. Like riding a broomstick without my own left hand.” He made a silly little gesture with his right, to illustrate. The whole effect was quite disarming, agreeable, and clever. He reminded Draco of some cheerful pureblood great-uncle who gave nice presents and thought he was funnier than he had any right to.

“Perhaps not a very dextrous one, if it has a tendency to misplace vital objects,” said Crouch.

Runcorn laughed. “Misplaced?” he said. “If you think so… of course, Nott thinks it’s stolen, but then, he is a suspicious old miser… that’s why I like him. It means I don’t have to be.”

“If only we all had such enterprising lieutenants.”

“Don’t fret. I’m sure young Percival here will be quite the bulldog, if you give him the opportunity. Isn’t that right, Percy — may I call you Percy?”

Percy did not reply: he had caught sight of Draco and Hermione, crouched on the railing above him, and was trying to shoo them away with tiny jerks of his jaw, which made him look like he had St. Vitus’s. Hermione shook her head and beckoned him furiously.

“No, sir. I mean yes! Sir! I’m sorry! I’m afraid I have to — you’ll excuse me, Mr. Crouch?”

“If you like,” said Crouch, still locked in a queerly charged stare-off with the Minister.

Percy grimaced, bowed to both of them, and scurried up the stairs to Draco and Hermione, where he swept them away from the railing with an ungentle hand on their collars.

“What are you two doing?” he snarled. “How long were you eavesdropping?”

“Take your hands off me, you wretched ingrate, or I’ll jinx your tongue into a tapeworm, and see how long it takes your Mr. Crouch to notice you can’t talk,” snapped Draco, wrenching himself free. “We came to get you. Your father was missing you.”

“Oh,” said Percy, deflating somewhat.

Hermione, trampling breezily over all pretenses of subtlety or discretion, demanded: “Percy, what did Mr. Crouch want with Karkaroff?”

“That’s none of your business, and I’ll thank you to pretend you didn’t hear it. You’ll find out soon enough.”

The words ‘none of your business’ were the only four not included in Hermione’s vocabulary. “Is it to do with that secret thing you were telling your father about? The one at Hogwarts? It is, isn’t it? It’s something to do with Mr. Crouch and Mr. Bagman, and there’s another school involved — is there a new exchange program?”

“I don’t know whether the Hogwarts curriculum has changed since I went through it,” said Percy, “but when I was there, I was taught that none of your business means none of your nosy business, and nothing more! Both of you, back to the box, and if you want to know anything more, you should go spy on someone else!”

“With pleasure, Weatherby,” said Draco coolly.

At that, Percy fumed in silence all the way to their seats.

The Irish anthem had tapered off, and they slipped back into the box just as Ludo Bagman’s amplified voice boomed out a loud welcome. Their entrance was swallowed by a rash of roars, but Harry noticed them, and waved. “You made it!” he shouted. “Corking! They’re about to do the mascots!”

“It hasn’t even started?”

“Not yet! They’ve got to get everyone excited!”

“I can barely hear myself think,” she said flatly. “How much more excited can they possibly be?”

“AND NOW — WITHOUT FURTHER ADO — ALLOW ME TO INTRODUCE THE BULGARIAN NATIONAL TEAM MASCOTS — THE VEELA!”

“Oh, great,” muttered Ginny. She slumped low in her seat, arms folded, while her brothers erupted in cheers.

A hundred veela glided onto the field, their feet almost floating over the grass. They were in human form, which meant each had long, feathery white hair, spilling down their back like a crest of gilt, and legs so long it was almost unsettling. From a distance it was hard to see, but they were all between six and seven feet tall, and wore tutus of voluminous white tulle that fanned from their hips like a calla lilies. The male veela, of whom there were only two or three, wore silk tunics with low necklines instead.

“What’s a veela?” shouted Hermione.

“Dark creature,” said Bill, leaning over the back of her seat. “They’re from the same family as sirens. Nasty customers, I had to deal with a nest of them once. You wouldn’t believe how hard it is to fight something that wants to snog you and eat you at the same time.”

Draco shuddered.

“So they seduce men in order to kill them?”

“And women, to be fair,” said Bill. “They’ll be just as glad to eat you as Draco, here.”

He might have winked; it was hard to tell.

The music had started. A plaintive wail of strings melted into an exquisite fourteen-part harmony, and the veela swept into a breathless dance of hands and fluttering footwork. Their tutus spun out like blooming flowers, and a silvery glow began to radiate from the field. Everything else seemed to dim in comparison to that glow, from the stands to the floodlights, as if the rest of the world were softening into nothingness; there was only the music, and the exquisite dance… it was Tchaikovsky, he thought, something from Romeo and Juliet, but he couldn't concentrate on it. His mind drifted through a thick and gentle fog.

People were rising. Harry had wedged his foot on the railing. Ron was half risen from his chair, and Ginny, transfixed, had to be hauled back into her seat by a chuckling Bill. Hermione was staring at the field, her mouth parted, blinking very quickly, as if trying to wake up.

"They should… stop," she said, with palpable effort.

"What?" he said numbly. It was hard to focus on anything. He was very warm.

"They should… look at Harry… Ron… people are going to…"

There was a scream: someone in another box had actually jumped. The wizard went hurtling down the rows of boxes, and was caught in midair by someone's quick-handed Levitation Charm, where he thrashed fruitlessly, trying to swim toward the veela. He was reeled back into the stands and hustled away by security.

The veela's dance ended, to cries of disappointment. Hermione, her spell broken, leapt out of her chair and hauled Harry back from the railing, hissing at him. Ron eased himself into his seat, shell-shocked.

Draco, blinking the fog away, felt first embarrassed and then deeply wrathful: he hated mind magic. And he loathed being made a fool of.

“That was something,” breathed Hermione, flopping back into her seat. “Bill was right. I can see why they’re Dark creatures.”

“Whoever approved that should be sacked.”

“You really didn’t like it?”

“I can’t stand mind tricks,” he said stiffly.

“AND NOW, THE IRISH NATIONAL TEAM MASCOTS: THE LEPRECHAUNS!”

“Thank God,” muttered Draco. At this rate he’d take dementors, as long as it wasn’t anything else that would mess with his head.

A firework in the shape of a shamrock exploded in the air over the pitch, showering sparks that turned into twinkling trails of gold. The crowd surged to its feet, two hundred thousand hands extended in a vaguely religious show of supplication, to collect the bounty as it fell.

Ron let out a cry of delight and scraped up as many handfuls of the gold as he could, but when Hermione reached to pick up a piece under her seat, Draco caught her hand.

“Don’t bother. It’s leprechaun gold, it disappears.”

“...Does everyone else know that?”

A fistfight had broken out in the box behind them, and someone’s glasses went flying. Draco caught them before they jabbed her in the eye.

“No. Don’t tell them, though, it’s funnier to watch — see, there, Box Fourteen. I think that woman just got her wig pulled off at the scalp.”

“Horrible!”

“Very,” he said, peering through his omnioculars. “Excellent Bat-Bogey Hex on her though, goddamn.”

The leprechauns left the field, leaving the audience squabbling for the last of the gold. Bagman cleared his throat.

“IT IS TIME! GENTLEWITCHES AND GENTLEWIZARDS! FOR! THE MAIN! EVENT! KINDLY WELCOME THE IRISH NATIONAL QUIDDITCH TEAM! I GIVE YOU — CONNOLLY! MORAN! TROY! QUIGLEY!…”

Emerald blurs spat from the Irish box. The green half of the stands became irrepressibly loud.

“They’re flying so fast!”

“That’s the point, Granger.”

“AND NOW, GENTLEFOLK, KINDLY WELCOME — THE BULGARIAN NATIONAL QUIDDITCH TEAM! I GIVE YOU — DIMITROV! IVANOVA! ZOGRAF! LEVSKI…”

Viktor Krum erupted from the field in a blur of red and white. The camera clung to him as though it knew no other: a serious, sallow block of muscles and frown, dark hair buzzed low to his scalp, a short beard sprouting along his square jaw. He was nothing much to look at. But he flew like poetry.

The referee piped a short blast on her whistle. The keepers assumed their positions. The game began.

It was hard to describe, unless you had flown a broomstick, what Krum was doing, in part because he was doing things that didn’t have names before he thought of them. His barrel roll was a liquid swirl, his turn a snapped hairpin, his dive a clean drop — a drop he could finish with such grace that gravity appeared to avert its eyes in politeness. He had world-class broom handling and an understanding of space and balance that no one else on the field nearly approached; during one of the warmups he slipped his leg free of its foothold and leaned down to fix his bootstrap in midair, flying with just one hand and one leg, perfectly stable. His anticipation and spacial awareness were nigh-prophetic — at one point he flew straight at a bludger, eliciting screams from the stands, only for the bludger itself to swerve away — and all of this was mere technique. What was incredible about Krum was that his flawless technique obscured what was actually impressive about him: his strategy. It wasn't even clear that he was executing moves, any more than he was channeling a deeper, more profound form of art into practice. Watching him gave you the feeling you were witnessing the invention of something new.

"TROY SCORES!" roared Bagman. "Ten zero to Ireland!"

Draco tore his omnioculars away from Krum and squinted at the crystal ball. It showed an Irish chaser pumping his fist in the air.

"Troy to Mullet! Mullet to Moran! Great Scott, they're flawless!"

Ireland wove the quaffle across the pitch with ease. It wasn't even that the Bulgarian chasers weren't playing well — they just couldn't lay a hand on the ball. Mullet and Moran found gaps for passes in the Bulgarians' guard where Draco would have sworn none existed.

"TWENTY ZERO TO IRELAND! Five minutes in and they're up two goals already, now, that's what I call luck of the Irish, everyone! Classy bit of ball-handling on Moran's part — OH? WHAT'S THIS? IT'S TROY COMING BACK FOR A REBOUND SHOT — NO, HE CAN'T — YES, HE CAN! IRELAND SCORES AGAIN!"

The Weasleys were on their feet. Draco applauded too, from his seat, because it had been damn near the neatest rebound he'd ever seen.

"This isn't much of a contest," shouted Hermione. "Why does anyone think Bulgaria's going to win?"

"Because Krum's only lost four matches in his life," said Draco. "Now, most of those matches have been snitch-forward, so he's been able to cut the lights before his chasers get mauled too badly —”

“But that won’t help him here!” shouted Ron, leaning across Hermione. She sat back with a nonplussed expression. “Cup games are always quaffle-forward, snitch won’t be out before halftime at least. They need a show. Plus, Lynch is on a Firebolt this game, instead of his old Comet.”

“So? Krum disemboweled Mustafa in the semifinal, and he was on a Firebolt Two.”

“Mustafa? C’mon! In Mustafa’s dreams is he pulling some of the moves on Lynch! Besides, he’s hungry for it. Krum’s old news. It’s regicide, mate, he’s coming for the crown.”

“‘Hungry for it,’ are you joking? Look at him fly. Lynch will be prying the crown off his worm-eaten skull.”

Hermione, trapped uncomprehending between them, rolled her eyes and turned around to say something to Ginny, but Ginny was busy screaming at one of the chasers to pass.

The Bulgarian beaters managed to scatter the next Irish formation, and Bulgaria took possession for the first time in the game. “DIMITROV TO LEVSKI, intercepted by MORAN, Moran had a great semifinal, sure she’s hoping to carry that energy into today’s match, MORAN TO TROY, and — say, what’s Krum doing?”

Krum had entered the fray. Bent gracefully over his broomstick, steering with one hand, he was flanking Moran, who was swinging her arm ineffectually to shoo him away. This sandwiched Moran between Krum and Dimitrov, her guard, leaving Mullet unable to pass except to the double-guarded Troy. Moran leaned off her broomstick, shouting something angrily at Krum.

“Looks like a Scotch Pincer,” said Bagman doubtfully, “although to do it with the seeker is pretty unorthodox — not sure I’ve ever seen that before — but if there's one thing about Krum, it's that he's always up to something… WAIT — look out look out LOOK OUT!"

Krum shot back, braking hard, and left Moran's side free — she turned around, surprised, to see where he had gone — and a bludger crashed into her face. Krum had been obscuring Volkov's approach on her left side.

Moran spun clumsily through the air, clutching her face. It was hard to see what happened, but when she pulled away one of her hands, it was dark red. Hermione cried out and grabbed Draco's arm. He was so sickly fascinated that he didn't even complain of her nails digging into his wrist.

"TIME OUT! That's a broken nose if I've ever seen one, and I have seen one," said Bagman, with jolly sympathy. "Mediwizards coming out… of course, they'll have her nose fixed in a heartbeat, but if she's got an eye injury, her game is toast… that was very nasty, head injuries at this level of play are incredibly rare…"

Hermione had found a reason to be invested in the game: she was screaming herself hoarse for a penalty. Several of the words she used he knew for a fact to be verboten in the Granger household; he grinned at her.

"Starting to enjoy yourself, Granger?"

"No! That wasn't fun! It was sneaky and duplicitous and reprehensible and wrong—"

"Keep going, maybe you can synonym them to death—"

"And Krum should be pulled out!" The holy flames of justice were burning in her cheeks. It was quite something. "She could have lost an eye!"

"That's what beaters are there for!" called Ron. "Anyway, she's been running a train through Zograf, they had to do something about her!"

“They didn’t have to pummel her!” she said, sounding genuinely upset. Draco elbowed her.

“She’s alright, look. They got her some health potion, and she’s back in the air. She’s probably cross she didn’t get to score.”

“TWO PENALTIES FOR IRELAND,” bellowed Bagman. “Ooh, Volkov and Vulchanov have landed — take it from me, boys, arguing with the ref is never a good idea… that’s right, back up you go, and take a scolding for your trouble! Ireland’s conferring over who’ll take the penalty shot… looks like it’s Troy, champion of the midfield punt, best arm on the pitch, maybe not my choice for a penalty though, I think you want Mullet’s backspin in a shootout with the keeper — oh, well, doesn’t matter — HE SCORES! And the next…”

Draco’s attention drifted, searching for Krum. He found him floating near the top of the stands, surveilling the violent skirmish beneath him with a blank expression. One of the Irish beaters noticed him, too.

But Krum saw the bludger coming, turned, and swept in an astonishingly slow bank towards the ground; the bludger, as bludgers tended to do, locked onto his tail and followed him. He arced a beautiful helix across centerfield, almost dragging the bludger along, and then flicked into a dive so sharp it couldn’t follow, sending it hurtling straight into the back of the beater who’d hit it at him.

Quigley, the beater, toppled forward and almost fell off his broom. The Bulgarian stands thundered in laughter and cheers.

“Did you see that?” Harry was jumping. “Did you see that? He’s the seeker, but he plays—”

“And he’s not even trying,” said Ron. “Look at him, he’s bloody bored. Bet he hasn’t even broken a sweat.”

“I still think they should card him,” said Hermione fiercely.

The Irish were up sixteen and in possession at the start of the third quarter. The clock drove Bulgaria to take more risks. Levski floated a soft pass high from midfield that landed only because it crossed Moran's blind side. Dimitrov shot a characteristic overhand whirling through Moran's legs, blurry with topspin, and Ivanova caught it, raced it twenty yards downfield, feinted, and flipped it back to Dimitrov.

Against anyone else, they would have taken the shot by now, but Ireland's keeper, Ryan, had arms like a baboon, and the only way he ever missed a shot was when he got psyched out; the Bulgarians had learned to toy with him first, winding him up for minutes on end, until he did something stupid, like try to dart out and take possession.

No such luck, this time. Ryan sat on his line like he meant to die there, stone-faced, while Dimitrov and Ivanova traded a flurry of taunting, lightning-quick passes practically in front of his face. The Irish chasers were caught in a battle with the Bulgarian beaters, who were slicing the bludgers back and forth with the Irish beaters as if it were a game of tennis, with Mullet and Troy trapped in the service boxes.

"Come on, Ryan," said Ron desperately, "stay put..."

"Why's everyone so quiet?" said Hermione, not quietly at all.

"If they get this point, the snitch will break the tie," breathed Ginny. "Bet you anything if that quaffle goes in, Krum's gonna do something wicked."

Dimitrov sent a hard, fast topspin pass, the kind that whistled, into Ivanova's left hand, and she feigned a shot on the goalhoop. Ryan twitched toward her, but didn't break his line. Then she passed it underhand to Dimitrov, and he surged forward with unmistakable intent, and Ryan, seeing it, surged towards him with arms outstretched, but at the last moment Dimitrov punched the quaffle backward and Ivanova caught it from the corner of the goalie box, and there was a collective gasp as Ryan scrambled to get back to center as she lined up a shot for the nearest goal, but Ryan was fast, and he got there, skating into place in front of the leftmost hoop, and she dropped her arm and tossed it lightly in what Bagman identified, with impatience, as yet another underhand pass — until it slotted through the right goal-hoop.

Roars, cheers, and a host of Bulgarian yelling took several minutes to calm down. Fred and George were clinging to their seats with white knuckles.

“WHAT A POINT! 170-20 to Ireland, and that’s Ivanova and Dimitrov, from the same town if you can believe it, used to play together on their school team, and don’t they just show it, with that beautiful assist — they were setting up that goal four passes back, and with not a word to each other either, that’s real synchrony — WHAT’S HE DOING?”

Krum had taken a dive. Lynch followed right on his tail, so close they would have felt each other’s breathing if not for the wind that ripped back their robes. Hermione’s nails drove so deep into Draco’s arm they would soon fuse to it. Straight to the ground, they were jostling each other so hard that they started to bend the line of their dive, canting to the left in a perpetual spin, a deadly pas de deux. If it was a feint, it was a terrible one, because they were locked too close together to pull out. Any attempt to pull up might break their necks, but so would hitting the ground.

“Krum’s on it,” said Bagman, “but Lynch isn’t letting up… it’s either man’s game… oh! Oh, watch out for… they’d really better pull— OOH!”

A bludger crunched into Krum’s shoulder and sent both seekers whirling. Lynch was not unhurt, either: the momentum hurled him into the stands, narrowly avoiding a collision with a very excited group of fans. Krum swerved hard, clutching something in his neck, but steered back into his line. The crystal ball zoomed into his face: it was set and rigid with pain.

“I think the mediwizards are calling for him to land,” said Bagman nervously, “and I don’t blame him, that shoulder really doesn’t look right… oh, but there he goes again, right back into the dive! It’s Krum, all Krum, if he can just keep it together—”

Another bludger careened at Krum: he flipped under his broomstick and dodged it. The other beater smacked it right back at him, and but he was untouchable: another spin swept him effortlessly out of its path. His right hand spasmed where he cradled it to his chest, but steering with his knees, he reached out his left instead. Flecks of blood and sweat decorated his furrowed brow.

“No, no, no,” Fred moaned.

“Yes!” shouted Harry, his Ireland rosette forgotten. He was hanging off the railing. “He’s going to make it! He’s going to win anyway!”

But while the stadium had been absorbed in Krum’s two-on-one with the Irish beaters, the Irish chasers had repossessed the quaffle, and were descending on Zograf in a deadly arrow formation. Everyone had forgotten the other side of the game. Someone must have prodded Bagman about it, because he roared without preamble: “GREAT SCOTT! BUT IT’S MORAN TO MULLET, MULLET TO TROY, TROY TO MULLET, who takes it past Dimitrov, and sends it straight Tr— TO MORAN??”

It was the wrong pass. An amateur could have said so. Troy was in position for an overhand to the keeper’s left hoop, his Achilles’ heel, whereas Moran was floating out by the corner, and still had a bad eye, besides. But the quaffle dropped into her outstretched hands, and Mullet pulled back, driving hard into Levski, her guard. Moran took the shot.

But she couldn’t beat the angle. The quaffle sailed parallel to the end line, even curving out slightly away from the hoop. George wheezed like he’d been punched. Krum, who had slowed to watch the exchange, turned away and plunged back into his dive.

“That’s it,” said Ron, stunned. “Mullet just lost them the World Cup.”

Krum and Lynch had sunk into another racing dive, but Krum was so far ahead it might as well have been miles, his hand outstretched, his robes a bloody flag upon the wind.

But Moran’s shot hadn’t stopped moving. It slowed in midair, and Draco realized that what everyone had mistaken for a weak, slow shot was actually an incredible amount of backspin. And so he was the first one on his feet when the quaffle — unknown to Zograf, who was already cheering for Krum — bent back towards the goalpost.

It knocked against the side, spun for a heartrending second on the rim, and tipped through.

Krum lunged.

There was a moment, Draco thought, where exceptionally good quidditch trespassed into real aesthetic beauty. In the last moment of the Cup, Krum crossed that precipice. He had both hands free of the broom, hanging in midair like the descending divine in Michelangelo’s Creation of Adam. The snitch sat on the tip of his finger.

Then it didn’t, and the game was over.

The noise was so great Draco’s ears went deaf for a moment, and when they came back, the stands were still shuddering with aftershocks. An actual earthquake could not have drawn the audience’s attention away from the pitch, where Ireland had cast off their broomsticks and thronged together in a green knot of teary bellowing, lifting Moran atop their shoulders; the leprechauns stormed the field, pumping out shamrock after shamrock of fireworks. “IRELAND WINS!” roared Bagman. “IT’S IRELAND, 180-170, KRUM GETS THE SNITCH — BUT IRELAND WINS THE WORLD CUP!”

Another wave of cheering broke out. Harry toppled over the railing, and Ron had to reel him back by his shirt.

“What did he catch the snitch for?” he bellowed. “He sealed the game for Ireland! If he’d waited for Dimitrov to score again, he would’ve won!”

“Or Ireland could’ve got its lead back and thrashed them!” Harry shouted. “Or Lynch could’ve snatched it! He knew he had to act fast!”

“And think of it from his perspective,” added Draco. “Krum’s barely gotten started. He’s got at least ten more Cups in his career, and he’s sure to win some of them; but now, even if he doesn’t, he’ll always be the youngest seeker to ever catch the snitch in a World Cup Final.”

“He was very brave,” Hermione said softly. Krum had landed apart from his teammates and shrugged off the plying fingers of mediwizards, who were trying to see to his arm. “I think he dislocated his arm.”

“If he didn’t break his collarbone,” said Draco, faintly impressed. After some arguing, Krum allowed the mediwizards to pop his arm back in, but refused the healing potion that would have relieved him of pain.

The Irish players, meanwhile, were dancing a reel under a shower of gold coins and green streamers. Stovepipe hats and paper shamrocks showered down from the stands, and in a fit of spirit, Ron ripped his own off his head and tossed it, too. The orchestra kicked up, and the Irish team leapt on their brooms to lead a rendition of “Come Out, Ye Black and Tans,” in which no one sang louder than the soundly non-Irish Fred and George Weasley, who had formed a can-can line with Bill and Ginny in the back of the box.

A podium was hastily assembled by Ministry aides, and one by one, the Bulgarians clambered onto the second-place plinth. Krum, standing last in line, was in a bad way. He was holding his shoulder as if to keep the bones still, and the crest of what must have been a massive bruise had sprouted up his neck. He still clutched the Snitch. Draco noticed that he seemed much less coordinated on the ground. He had round shoulders and had a shambling gait. But when Bagman called his name, the whole stadium answered with roaring approval, green or red or neither.

He tapped Hermione’s hand, politely, and with a gasp she unearthed her nails from his wrist.

“I’m so sorry! I didn’t realize! Did I hurt you?”

“No,” he lied. She fussed at his arm, the whole celebration forgotten, which was honestly a very nice feeling; there was a certain warmth to being the center of anyone’s attention, especially when the rest of the world was deaf and blind to it. He flexed his fingers while she rubbed at the dark indents in his wrist, massaging the blood back into the muscles. It might’ve felt good, if his flesh hadn’t been still numb from Granger’s Tourniquet. “I hardly noticed.”

-fun fact: the bulgarian national anthem goes so much harder than it needs to that i became a bulgarian patriot listening to it

-Official Author's Note on the Bulgarian language, airing it out here, because it becomes a plot point later: Bulgarian is the national language of Bulgaria, so Krum speaks it, but Durmstrang supposedly exists in the far north of eastern Europe, and Bulgaria — in case you're a geographically challenged individual like myself, who did not realize this the first time I read the books — shares a border with Greece. In related problems, the block of countries that Durmstrang serves includes huge parts of the (as of 3 years ago, in this universe) post-Soviet bloc — also implies some fascinating wizard politics must have gone down during the Soviet Era, considering Koldovstoretz is the "Russian school," so, at what point did the block split? Did the Soviet Union's magical counterpart try to exert some sort of control over the movement of Soviet wizards, like the Soviets did? Did Durmstrang just start accepting post-Soviet states again three years ago? What the hell happened to it during the invasion of Poland? Was everyone just fine with German students continuing to attend, even when All That Shit was going on in Europe?

-None of this matters to Lionheart, but I've been thinking about it, because it relates to what language Durmstrang uses. Because "eastern Europe" is a block that covers a huge number of different languages, none of which really predominate each other, and many of which are not mutually intelligible. (Sidebar: this is part of the Doylist reason that purebloods in Wizarding Europe take French as a mandatory second language — it solves this problem for Beauxbatons.) I guess you could just say it's the native language of the country where the school resides, which means Durmstrang is probably taught in... Norwegian? Swedish? At any rate, it's probably not taught in Bulgarian if the school's in Scandinavia, so Krum has to be trilingual at least just in order to communicate at the basic level we read in the books. No wonder he has trouble with pronunciation. We don't even know that he's taught English before he comes to Hogwarts, and Hogwarts doesn't provide translators for any of the tasks. Kind of starts to make you wonder about the motivations of the administrators, doesn't it.

-long-winded way of saying I'm putting Durmstrang in Norway and sticking to it. In fairness, I don't think it's too far to assume there might be some magical fix to the language barrier, like a Babel fish type of situation, or possibly an enchantment of mutual intelligibility on the castle itself. It's Harry Potter worldbuilding. "Magic does what the author (me) wants it to do" is like, a rule of physics.

Chapter 35: The Herald

CW for depictions of torture (non-graphic, physical).

(See the end of the chapter for more notes.)

Celebrations raged past midnight. Fireworks thundered overhead like they were camped on the beaches of Normandy. Music swelled from every tent, accompanied by roaming parties of witches and wizards, most of whom hardly knew each other at all, drinking and firing spells into the air. Ministry wizards raced after them with torches and haggard expressions. They had to fight their way through a conga line of step-dancing leprechauns that stretched across half the tent city, and Draco came close to an act of anti-Irish aggression.

“Well,” said Mr. Weasley, when they reached the tent, “if you can sleep in this, please do; but as for me, I’m going to make some hot cocoa.”

They piled onto the moth-eaten sofas, nursing cups of thick fragrant cocoa in chipped white mugs. The chocolate was so good it could have nominated him for sainthood and Draco had to wage a guerrilla war to keep Hermione from stealing his, which distracted him from Charlie and Ron’s argument about the Scotch Pincer, and Bill’s rhapsody on Moran’s final goal; Ginny sat between Fred and George, and after she had been silent for a while, Draco looked over and found her passed out on Fred’s lap. Then Fred picked her up and carried her to bed, which was a cue for the four of them to retreat to their own tent with Bill.

In the dull light of the camping lantern, he changed into pajamas and set about the business of falling asleep. It was hard going. He was on the bottom bunk, under Hermione, and lay staring at the bed frame above him as the music thumped from their neighbor's tent. Irritation at his inability to sleep kept him prickly and alert and uniquely ill-suited to sleeping, a compounding spiral of frustration. He had been up for almost twenty hours since daybreak and his face hurt with the desire to sleep, but between the ambience and the various breathy rustling of four other people sleeping in close quarters, he couldn't focus. Hermione kept wriggling in her sleep, creaking the bed frame.

It was impossible that he'd fallen asleep, but when he woke up, he knew he'd been dreaming. A blind swipe of his hand caught no enemy but air, and he flipped out of the bed in a pulse of unlucid adrenaline, answering a subliminal commandment to run run run. He felt like his brain had been dunked in cold water and he hadn't slept this badly since the Manor, when he'd grab a broomstick if he was out of Sleeping Draught and fly tight dizzy circles around the grounds until he woke the peacocks in their nests and got a honking rebuke.

A touch to his brow came away slippery, and his shirt was slicked to his chest. His heart clobbered his ribs. He grabbed his overcoat and his shoes and was out the door before anyone could wake to notice.

His watch read two o'clock. The air was cool and sweet and fresh like nights at the Burrow, the sea of lanterns issuing dreamy light, while residual smoke from the fireworks veiled the stars. He walked to the well and drank deep mouthfuls of ice-cold water that tasted faintly bitter but clean, rinsing the gummy bile-taste from his mouth, splashing his face in it. The shock purged the last of the tremors, and cleared his imagination of creatures in black cloaks creeping across his periphery. He wasn't sleeping again, not after that, but it was a nice night, and the celebrations had dwindled to just a few guttering loci of lights and music, including a high bonfire from the Irish tents that he doubted would fade before morning. Now that the dark didn't faze him, he ventured toward it.

A massive structure in the shape of a three-story log cabin — the outside alone was bigger than the Burrow — marked the end of a row of kingly tents. It was so big that it spilled over into the path, turning the lane into a cul-de-sac, which meant purebloods if it meant a thing at all: the lack of concern for campsite rules, or indeed anyone else's physical comfort, was as good as a beacon in the sky. He found his feet carrying him towards it.

Firelight flickered on the deck, enchanted blue flames inside a glass fire pit. Watery light spilled over Pansy Parkinson, sprawled on her side in a lounge chair, wearing satin lounge pants and a Slytherin jumper. She nursed a copper mug and a cigarette, which she flicked into the fire pit as Draco approached. Beside her, the nine-year-old Astoria Greengrass sat in a wheely-chair under a blanket of bear fur.

Pansy stood up when she heard him approach. Her wand was out. She held it overhand, its point angled out and slightly downward, levied threateningly away from her body — an archaic grip, Hogwarts taught the western underhand, it was better for charmwork and safer to boot — but also the one Theo used, however. He wondered when she'd started doing that.

"Who's there?" she snapped. Her eyes were a bloodshot rusty blue, like spots of oxidation on copper, and her sneer was startlingly cold. She looked like a feral cat.

He stepped into the firelight and felt a surprising amount of relief when she lowered her wand.

"I come to parlay."

"Ugh. Draco," she said, flopping back down in the lounge chair. "For Merlin's sake. Wear a bell."

"What's the matter? Worried about rogue leprechauns coming to steal your gold?"

"That's anti-Irish, prat."

“For one: that is an incredible move to hypocrisy, from you, I have never seen such shamelessness and I am impressed. For two: you’re English.”

“Partial credit, but lacking detail. My grandmother’s from Dublin. Normally I don’t give a damn, except it means the whole family’s got to schlep out to this wretched den of anarchy to represent the Motherland. Thank God we didn’t lose to the Slavs, I think Granny Shea would’ve killed herself. Melon spritz?" She passed him her copper mug. He sniffed it, detected honeydew, citrus, and no major poisons, and sipped.

“And for your information, these sorts of things are hives of crime,” she said. “It’s inevitable, when you pack thousands of excitable wizards in a confined space and lubricate them with liquor.”

“I lost my mother-of-pearl pocket watch,” said Astoria sadly. “It was my great-gran’s. She got it from a mermaid.”

“Mermaids don’t use pocket watches, Tori, don’t be dumb.”

“No, it’s true! A mermaid fell in love with her and made her a bridal gift of a hundred pearls, and sewed her a fishskin that let her breathe under the sea, and they were gonna get married and live in a palace underwater with lots of pretty fishes but my great gran didn’t like the fishskin because it smelled stinky, so she left the mermaid at the altar and ran away to marry my great grandad and had a buuuuunch of babies, but she could never go to the beach because she was scared the mermaid would come back and demand her bride price.”

“Dummy,” said Pansy, tweaking Astoria’s nose. Astoria squealed. “You’re a big dumb dummy, Tori, you know that? That story didn’t happen to your great gran, it’s a fairytale. Besides, mermaids are hideous, no witch would ever want to marry them.”

“Yeah durr,” said Astoria sulkily. “That’s prolly why she didn’t. You’re a dummy.”

“My God, you’ve got me. Draco, quick, help. Avenge my honor with your keen witticisms. I must burn my clothes and don mourning blacks for shame.”

He laughed. He had missed Pansy. She was such an awful unrepentant brat.

“Did the family come?” he asked Astoria casually. Pansy’s snort informed him that it was not casual enough.

Astoria puffed out her cheeks and whistled through the pucker of her mouth. “Um,” she said, “Mummy came with me. And Daddy, um… he doesn’t like quidditch? Because he says it’s super boring and um not good for your brain…?”

“Tori, you can tell him.”

The truth wheezed out of Astoria in a flurry of relief. “No. Daffy’s at home and they’re not letting her out and I don’t know why, she says she’s alright but there are always healers around and some nights they lock the doors to her room but they don’t lock the one in the back of my closet so I can sneak in and honestly she’s like fine, she just eats a lot and throws up and throws furniture around but I do that sometimes when I’m mad and my magic acts up so I think she’s just really really lonely.”

Her voice strangled out for want of air. Pansy patted her knee.

Draco gripped the mug between his fingers. Did that mean Daphne wasn’t coming back to school? Would they let her? It was actually hard to tell, based on Astoria’s testimony, whether she was well or not. She probably wouldn’t tell her younger sister if the answer was no.

“Relax,” said Pansy. She was smirking like his despair was her favorite ice cream flavor. “Daphne’s not keeling over dead anytime soon. She’ll be back at Hogwarts in September — now, whether Theo will have to stage a heist to get her out of that place, I wouldn't wager, but she means to continue her education."

"You've spoken to her?"

"Sparsely. I'm allowed to visit the Greengrasses if I say I'm seeing Tori here," said Pansy, nodding at Astoria. "It's a connection my parents are anxious to foster; they're worried I don't have enough friends that are girls. I told them Blaise is only a man every third Tuesday, but what do you know, they didn't find that funny at all. So Tori supposedly keeps me out of trouble. Don't you?"

"I'm not very good at it," said Tori cheerfully, without a drop of remorse.

"No, you're not, you perfect little gremlin," said Pansy, showing unprecedented reserves of fondness. She reached into her pocket. "Toffee?"

"Yes, please!"

The gremlin was paid.

Draco leaned back in his chair, relieved. "Why isn't Nott with us, anyway? I heard his father was around."

Tori looked at Pansy, who merely shrugged. "Search me," she said. "He's barely been around the whole Cup. We've been abandoned."

"He thays he'th buthy with hith dad," said Astoria. The toffee had plastered her teeth together. "He'th alwayth buthy."

"Yes, dear Prince Theodore has become the new darling of the British bureaucracy," said Pansy dryly. "You'd think he's the only reason the Ministry's still standing, to hear him tell it. As if his dad would let him do more than carry paperwork and lick arses."

Draco wrinkled his nose. "I thought he hated his father."

“And I, for one, loathe Transfiguration,” said Pansy. “Yet somehow, I keep finding myself in the presence of Professor McGonagall. Striking, how that happens.”

“Professor McGonagall never hit you, did she?”

Pansy grimaced and plucked the mug out of his hands, her silence a tacit concession. “She’s not my mother, either.”

“If your mother hit you, Theo would have her boxed and ready for the undertaker by noon.”

“What makes you think she hasn’t?” said Pansy, with a cool awful little smile, which he was sure would have sent someone who knew her less into paroxysms of awkward. But she wasn’t half as good at bluffing as she thought she was.

“Don’t be crass. You’re mother’s a woman of class and dignity,” he said. “She’d have the help do it.”

Pansy gave a surprised and unbeautiful snort of laughter. “Ass,” she said. “Why didn’t you come visit me?”

He was startled and touched by the offer. “Why didn’t you come visit me?” he said, after a moment. “The Manor’s bigger than Parkinson Court. And my mother misses having a girl around.”

“Certainly. If you don’t mind my mother tagging along.”

“She’s worried about your virtue?”

“No, she’s worried about appearances. In fact I think she’d take heart if a few more people showed interest in my virtue,” said Pansy flatly, fishing a shred of mint from the mug and flicking it into the fire. “She was my age when she received her first marriage proposal.”

“I can take a hint, but I’m afraid my heart belongs to potions.”

“Not you, prat. Good Lord, can you imagine it? I’d rather marry a toad.”

“Unnecessarily harsh,” he said. Astoria, making a pitiful noise through her teeth, agreed.

“No, no. You’re perfectly good-looking,” she said, flapping a hand at him, “especially now you’re coming into your cheekbones, well done; but a marriage only works if both spouses agree who’s funnier, and you and I would never concede. Our dinner parties would be unendurable.”

“Thoughtful of you. What about Theo?”

“What about him?” she said, aghast. “He’s not said anything to you, has he?”

He smirked and kicked his feet up on the firepit. She rolled her eyes.

“The toad remains the frontrunner,” she said. “I can’t marry a man who’s seen me in diapers. Anyway, now you’re starting to sound like my mother. ‘What about the Crabbe boy? You know him, don’t you?’ Vince! Vincent Crabbe! Like Vince would know a girl if one bit him on the arse. His family’s angling for an arranged marriage with the Bulstrodes, anyway.”

“How do you know?” said Astoria rapturously, as if having access to Slytherin house gossip was the fount of all knowledge.

“Millie’s opposed,” said Pansy, sanguine. “She has a crush on the Hufflepuff seeker. I told her I could help her stage a scandal to get out of it, if she wanted, but she wasn’t interested.”

“I’d stage a scandal with you, Pansy,” said Astoria desperately.

“Thank you, my dear. I invoke the ancient law of ‘no takesies backsies.’”

Astoria fervently crossed her heart. Draco was quiet for a while. His pulse had gone steady and slow, eased by the fire and the idle chat, but residual tension still bunched in his hands and hamstrings. The creases under Pansy's eyes made him wonder how much she'd slept. If at all. When her dreams woke her in the middle of the night, what did she reach for? What did she do?

Once, he would have hazarded a guess; but then, Theo wasn't here, and maybe that was part of the problem.

There was a faint boom somewhere in the distance. Screams followed it. He didn't stir. Sometimes a firework went off wrong, and accidents were commonplace with this much magic running around.

The second boom made them all turn their heads. It was closer, and the screams were clearer. A pillar of black smoke rose from the campsite in the distance.

Draco stood up and took out his wand. Pansy did the same.

"Did you—"

"Yes," she said, her eyes sharp and sweeping the darkness. "Tori, go inside."

"No! What's wrong?" said Astoria, craning her neck. "You're blocking me! I can't see."

"Doesn't matter. Inside, lock the door, and get my dad," she said. "Now."

"I want to stay with you and Draco!"

"Tori, I swear to Merlin, if you don't do as I say I will never visit you again, and I'll tell all the Slytherin boys at Hogwarts you've got pubic lice," snapped Pansy.

Astoria quivered with betrayal. "You wouldn't."

“I would! And you’ll have no beaux forever and and you’ll make no friends, and it’ll serve you right for being a brat!”

Moaning in misery, Astoria wheeled herself inside with the haste of a girl who took Pansy at her word.

Draco watched the door seal behind her. “You’ve a maternal touch.”

“She’ll be fine,” said Pansy dismissively. “Besides, she’s a shameless rat. She’s about to run straight to my dad and tell on me, which is good, because we’ll be safe when he gets here.”

He did not share her confidence in the matter. “Your father’s not an auror, is he?”

“He’s an Unspeakable,” she said, and it was the first time he’d heard her sound remotely proud, talking about her parents. “They might not have hired him to win fights, but he didn’t get the job by losing them, either.”

Before they could further litigate Prescott Parkinson’s skill with a wand, a third boom erupted. A blade of green fire slit open the darkness, so close that they both shielded their eyes, and when it dissipated a huge furl of smoke was opening like a hungry claw into the sky.

The Irish quarter was on fire.

The lanterns along the path flickered on and off, weakly, and then died. It was dark except for the firepit and the lights on the horizon.

Boom. Boom. Boom. Three more explosions went up, one after another, along the horizon, and the smoke billowed. The last one, a fourth, went up in the Weasleys’ section.

Draco was running before the sound had faded from the air.

“Stop! Stop! What are you doing?”

He barely heard her. A throng of people were streaming past the well. Their voices clashed in a violent cacophony of screams and fruitless shouting. Mediwizards raced stretchers through packed alleyways, bellowing for space. Aurors whizzed overhead on broomsticks, trying in vain to direct crowds. An old woman was knocked to her knees and disappeared under the thunder of feet. A witch in a green nightcap mounted the well and screamed for her children.

Vertigo struck. He listed against the nearest tent, head swimming.

“DRACO!”

He spun around. Pansy was trying to push her way through a pair of Bulgarian wizards. They shoved her back; she snarled, kicked one in the crotch, kneed him in the stomach, and leapfrogged across his back when he doubled over.

“Come back to the tent,” she shouted, grabbing his arm. “It’s not safe —”

“I can’t — I’m here with the Weasleys — the last explosion was on top of them—”

“The Weasleys?” She was baffled. He might as well have said the Dumbledores. “Well — but—”

“Whatever you’re going to say, consider that there has never been a worse time.”

“I was going to say they’ll be fine,” she snapped. “Let them take care of their own. We’ll take care of ours.”

“I can’t,” he said. At the thought of it, a peal of nausea almost drove him to his knees.

She gave him a stare that could have cut glass. Abruptly, she let go of his arm. Her lip trembled, like something fidgety was caught inside her mouth.

“Would you?” she said. “If it was me, would you? Instead of them?”

He stared at her.

“Despite your frankly appalling sense of timing,” he said, “I unfortunately do, yes, consider myself obligated to save your life, if and whenever possible, for any number of dim reasons not limited to being a remotely decent human being, and under certain circumstances even extending to — sod this. Yes. I would. Is that what you want to hear?”

She wilted. “No, I was afraid you’d say that,” she said.

“What?”

“Fine.” She raked back the sleeves of her jumper. “Let’s go find the stupid sodding Weaselbees. And don’t you expect a birthday present from me ever again.”

“I didn’t ask you to come.”

“And you never will,” she said sadly. He couldn’t spare the several decades it would take to unpack that remark, so he tried to ignore it. “But the thing about me is I’m secretly just as thick as Teddy, and I never knew how to t—”

But he never found out what Pansy didn’t know. A beam of green light paved the slate of the sky. Illuminated in its grasp were four floating figures, struggling against the grasp of the Levicorpus Charm. It was a man, a woman, and two children. They were being paraded through the tents like a float, their bodies bent into unnatural shapes.

“Muggles,” said Pansy.

“How—”

“Don’t be stupid, it’s muggles,” she said quietly.

Screams broke out. Tents shuddered and started to collapse. Tongues of fire ran up the sides of the path and leapt from tent to tent, roofing the paths in smoke. The woman’s legs were forced open and her head bent back, like a child playing with an unloved doll, trying to see where its hinges were. Her mouth was open, and she must have been screaming, but amidst the noise of the riot it was as if she were silent.

“This can’t happen,” said Pansy numbly. “The International Statute of Secrecy—”

“You think they give a damn? It’s a terrorist attack.”

“By whom?”

“I don’t know,” he snarled, elbowing his way through a group of fleeing Croatians. “Your dad’s the Unspeakable, you tell me.”

The smaller muggle child had started spinning, his limbs flopping around like so much puppetry.

“Someone needs to get them down,” he said, but he felt sick. Where were the aurors? Where was Runcorn, where was Nott?

The muggles floated over them, their bodies eerie and limp in the green light. Finally, Draco saw the figures holding them up. They were dressed in black shrouds, covering their heads, and wore black gloves and black robes — all black, save for the bone-white gleam of their masks.

He knew what those masks were. He’d seen one before.

He stepped back, into Pansy. She didn’t notice.

“Parkinson,” he said.

“My dad’s back at the tent,” she interrupted.

They stared at each other.

“Do you understand me?” Her voice had none of the warmth or vulnerability it held a minute ago, when she was holding his arm and entreating friendship. Her voice was not an invitation. It was barbed wire wrapped around a sledge hammer. It was a ten-foot wall of brick. “My dad is at the tent with Astoria. He’s been there all night. You saw him there. Do we understand each other, Malfoy?”

He had never seen anyone wear the expression on her face. No one.

Standstill. Deadlock on the tongue. Deadlock in the brain. He had only two options and both of them were lies, so he chose the one he could live with in the short term, cast away the implications he’d have to pick out of his shrapnel-ridden conscience later.

“Yes. We do.”

She nodded. “Good. Then we can go find your friends.”

The marchers passed over them, but another boom went up in the distance. There were multiple groups. Draco and Pansy wrestled through a glut of people surging away from the explosions, and got caught in a river of movement towards the edge of the campsite, where people were streaming in large congregations towards the woods.

“That’s the evacuation point,” panted Pansy. “If they’re alive, they’re headed there. If they’re dead, we don’t stand a chance of finding the bodies.”

“You’re a comfort in these trying times,” he snarled, and ducked under a stretcher carried by two mediwizards.

He didn’t think about Hermione. He didn’t think about Hermione. He kept moving, in no small part, because he wasn’t thinking about Hermione.

Damn Pansy.

A flock of birds zoomed overhead, forcing him to duck. He realized belatedly that they weren't birds at all, but womanlike creatures whose arms and fingers had fused into bird's wings, their feathers a resplendent white gold, their skinny legs an unnatural cross between claws and talons. One of them gave a earsplitting shriek and soared up to the floating muggle child, gripping him in her talons and beating her wings — trying to pull him free — but a green light darted out of the crowd below, struck her, and she tumbled out of the air.

The other veela screamed and peeled away, fleeing a barrage of spells that followed them.

"That wasn't," said Pansy, "you don't think—"

Something collided with his knees. He stumbled and caught sight of a house-elf running for its life, gripping a dark purse in its arms. In the haze and confusion, his heart skipped, thinking it was Dobby — but no, it was a female elf, wearing a dishcloth for a cloak.

"Little sneak," said Pansy darkly. "Expelliarmus."

The house-elf squeaked and tumbled to the dirt, her bag leaping from her arms. Pansy caught it and stomped over her.

"Who does this belong to?" she demanded, shaking it. "Where did you get this?"

"Begging your mercy, m-m-mistress!" wailed the house-elf. "It belongs to my m-m-master—"

"Who's that? Who do you belong to?"

Draco's impatience and discomfort peaked simultaneously. He hauled her off the house-elf by her collar, dodging the hiss and the elbow she threw at him. "Parkinson, stop. That's enough. She's not hurting anybody."

“Mimsy b-b-belongs to the Most Noble and Most Ancient House of Nott!” pleaded the elf. “Mimsy is a good and loyal elf, and she is t-t-trying to f-f-find her f-f-family—”

“Oh, really?” Pansy was scornful. “And who’s that?”

“Me, probably,” said a rather breathless voice, and Pansy’s head snapped up.

Theo stood in the alleyway beside them, his face a dalmatian mix of soot and cinders, his hair a static rumpus, and a bandage swaddling his left hand.

“Pans, would you please unhand my elf, before she pisses herself in fright? It’s rude to chew on other people’s toys.”

Pansy gave a cry of exasperation and surged forward with violent speed, and Theo let her hurtle into his chest. He grunted and let her put her hands on his neck — an unwise move from a tactical view — where she latched onto him and clung like a two-headed creature conjoined at the breast.

“You’re fine,” she said. “You shit, you awful shit, you’re fine. You’re fine.”

There was something strange and othering about watching the two of them reunite, as if he were witnessing an arcane ritual to a god he didn’t worship in a language he couldn’t speak.

“When am I not?” he said lightly, and tweaked her nose. She snapped her teeth at him, and he whisked his finger away, shaking it. “Oi. We’ve talked about the biting. Evening, Draco. Terrible night for it. You’re not hurt, are you?”

“No,” he said curtly. “I’d ask the same of you, but it seems you haven’t had the luck.”

Theo glanced down at himself and shrugged. “Oh,” he said. “This wasn’t the riot. I ran into a bit of trouble with some French girls at the celebrations — you know how it goes, the old ‘voulez-vous coucher avec moi, monsieur,’ and you try to let her down easy, ‘Non, madamoiselle, je ne couche qu'avec des blondes qui pourraient me tuer, et vous êtes beaucoup trop une dame.’ Only I forgot the word for ‘kill’ so I said ‘terminer’ instead, which I think she took as an insult to her skills. Or possibly she was just a bad sport. Anyway, it turns out they do teach them something at Beauxbatons besides lipstick and charm.”

“Ninny,” said Pansy. “Why’d you bring your stupid elf out here?”

“Because my father doesn’t trust me to my own devices,” he said indulgently, “does he, Mims? Doesn’t Lord Nott trust his own son less than a paper umbrella in a windstorm?”

Mimsy turned green. “Mimsy c-c-cannot presume to s-s-s-speak for Lord Nott,” she squealed. “Mimsy is only a house-elf — no insight into the minds of wizards — she only serves—”

Theo snorted and cut her off. “Oh, shut up.”

“Send her away, if she’s not helpful,” said Draco coldly.

He raised his eyebrows at him. “I forgot,” he said, “you had a soft spot for stupid things. Alright, as you like. Mimsy, go back to my father.”

Mimsy groaned, rocking on her heels, and eyed the purse in Pansy’s hands covetously.

“What? What is it? Oh. Pansy, give that back to her. Why on earth do you have it, anyway?”

Pansy threw the purse on the ground, and Mimsy scrambled to pick it up. With a crack, the house-elf disappeared. “How was I to know she hadn’t stolen it?” she said scornfully. “You’re lucky someone didn’t snatch it off her before I did.”

“Nott,” said Draco, slowly, “where’s your father?”

Theo paused. “With the Minister,” he said. “Like always. Why?”

“I’m wondering how he plans to get the muggles down.”

Theo shrugged. “The aurors will deal with that bit, I expect. Really, most of the Ministry is working on crowd control. It’s no picnic, evacuating a hundred thousand people—”

“I should think,” said Draco, hearing his own voice as if through water, “that a demonstration of that size, considering the number of muggles in the nearby area, and the likelihood that other muggles were disturbed when those four were taken—”

“Yes, yes, we’ll do all the cleanup later. I’m sure there’s a whole department for these things, somewhere, buried under a sub-division of the Bureau of Something-Or-Other. Say, your pal Weasley might even get to be involved—”

“So does the Minister have any plan,” he said, and his voice sounded very loud, now, curious that, “to address the muggles being tortured in the fucking sky?”

Theo jerked.

“I don’t know,” he said. It was the first time he’d sounded honest, and perhaps not coincidentally, the first time he’d sounded afraid.

Draco didn’t think about Hermione. He didn’t. Didn’t, didn’t, didn’t. Say it often enough, and a word became a kind of spell. He repeated it, a litany against imagination, and it kept him fastened to the ground.

“I have to go,” he said, because his litany was starting not to work. “If you want to come, do. I’m going to search the woods—”

There was a searing light, like the sun had broached the midnight clouds. Something shimmery climbed from the treetops, snaking through the air like something living. It radiated the ethereal chemical glow of the Aurora Borealis, only green, cold green, antifreeze green, the green of death and unforgivable things. And the world beneath it was green, too, cast in its light like actors under a floodlight, locked in the heartstopping temporal freeze of a lifted curtain, staring at the skull and serpent twining sensually against each other in the sky.

“They put up the Herald,” said Theo.

He rubbed his hand across his mouth like there was a stain. “But why? It doesn’t — there’s no one to summon, it wouldn’t— forget it. There’s no time. Come on.”

He threw out his hands. Pansy took one unquestioningly. Draco hesitated.

Theo shook it at him.

“Malfoy. Hurry. Grapple with your masculinity later—”

“I’m not going with you. I have to find the Weasleys.”

“Great! Good! Wonderful! Let’s start by getting out of — bugger all. I don’t have time for this.” He grabbed Draco’s wrist and turned on his heel.

With a crack, the world flattened into a two-dimensional plane, and he felt himself inside it, squeezed along places that his three-dimensional body assuredly and vocally did not want to be: and then, just when the pressure reached an unbearable peak, he shot back into the third, as if the second had misliked him and popped him out.

He stumbled away from Theo, gasping. They had Apparated.

He’d done that before, but only ever with his mother and Snape, and this was the first time he had realized it was possible to be bad at it.

They were standing on a hill over the campgrounds, far from the smoke and the tents. They had crossed the wood, and now had at least an acre of trees between themselves and the Dark Mark, or the riots; Theo had put them on a grassy knoll with a cairn at the top.

“My hair!” Pansy was fumbling at her head in horror. The little that Draco could see of it through her fingers offered very good reason for rage. “You twat! You splinched it!”

“What? Oh,” said Theo faintly. “Dreadfully sorry.”

He knelt in the dirt with his hand on his wrist, clamping it, breathing in and out through his teeth. Florets of red spotted the gauze on his arm, first a mere sprinkling, and then harder, faster, like snowfall.

“Nott,” said Draco in amazement. “You splinched yourself.”

“Is that what happened?” Theo’s voice cracked, a dreadfully pubescent sound. He was fumbling for something in his pockets. “You mean to tell me this doesn’t happen every time you Apparate?”

Pansy flew to his side, her hair forgotten, which was saying something, considering what it looked like. “Teddy! Oh, God, don’t move, don’t move.”

“Dial back the volume. It’s a paper cut with pretensions. Not that I don’t appreciate the hysterics — trust me, when I die, I’ll expect you to go full Niobe, but if you do it now it won’t feel special.”

“It is a truly hilarious cosmic joke that you think you’re a good liar,” she said. “I think of it and giggle when I’m blue. How bad is it? Apply pressure. Lift it up.”

“Look who’s a healer, all of a sudden,” he said through his teeth. “Shove off, I’m fine. It was worse before.”

“You did this before?”

“Where did you learn to Apparate?” Draco was stunned. “It’s seventh year magic.”

“Not really,” said Theo, with savage confidence that was undercut by obvious pain. “They teach it in sixth year at Durmstrang, and I’ve always been a dab hand at Charms. Anyway, it’s not that tough. It’s side-along that gets… tricky.”

“Yes! Wow! Maybe that’s the reason that you can’t do side-along before you’re twenty-five! Because of idiots who try to take two people when you can barely get all of you where you want to be!” Pansy had wrapped her handkerchief around his elbow and was tying it tight enough to compress the muscle, puffing out a small ring of purpling skin.

“In my defense, one of them was very small,” he said. “Ow. Ow.”

“Don’t be a wuss. Draco, do you have any healing charms? All I know is Episkey, and it’s not worth a wet toot for something like this.”

“It’s outside my wheelhouse,” he said, wishing that Hermione were here. Then he had to quickly slam the shutters on his own brain.

“Blood-Replenishing Potion? What about you, Teddy?”

“Sure, Pans, but I left it in my other trousers—”

“Okay. Shit. Okay. Fine.” She drummed her nails on her mouth anxiously; then, with a guttural, furious sound, she tore her hand away and wrenched up her sleeve.

“No,” said Theo sharply. “Stop it.”

Draco didn’t realize what she was doing, and then he wished he hadn’t.

Pansy sank her teeth into her wrist, bringing shallow wells of dark blood bubbling up around her teeth. When rivulets began running down her arm, she jerked her head free and spat a gobbet of red foam into the grass.

“Pans! No! Listen to me, you fool of a girl—”

“If you think I won’t knock you out and do this while you’re unconscious, Teddy—”

“What the hell are you doing?” said Draco, feeling ill.

Pansy wet her finger in blood — his gorge rose — and, tremblingly, drew a clumsy, ill-defined symbol on Theo’s wrist.

“The hell does it look like?” she said tightly. Her jaw was tight with pain. “It’s a rune.”

“Forget Apparition — where did you learn blood runes?”

“Not runes. Rune, singular,” she said grimly, sealing up her wrist and then sweeping her wand over the symbol. “Episkey.”

It blazed brilliant white, like a star, and then faded into rusty brown. The spots on Theo’s bandages stopped growing, and then started to shrink, leaving only ruddy brown stains where the wound had been. He swore violently and wrenched his hand out of her grasp, but the damage was done. His hand was whole, and his fingers flushed with a healthy glow, like they’d never been hurt in the first place.

“I — I didn’t know there were blood runes for healing,” he said numbly.

“There aren’t,” she snapped. It had taken a lot out of her: she was pale and shaky, and she lilted to the ground, on unsteady footing. Theo caught her and lowered her, snarling something inaudible into her ear; but he already looked better, stronger, as if she had infused him with whatever vitality she’d bled out from her wrist. “There is — ah — t-there is one for p-p- power, however, and I happen to know it, because I was the only twelve-year-old in h-h-history… to muster a f-f-full-force — Petrification Curse."

There was an awful beat.

"Yaxley?"

"No, Filius Flitwick. Yes, Yaxley. And please, don't bother reading me the Riot Act about Dark magic, because I'm going to hell anyway; it's the only way I'll get to have it out with him."

"I wasn't going to," he said, which was true. The fact that blood magic was Dark had been only the fourth or fifth thing on his mind.

"First off, you're not going to hell," said Theo, with a horrible, uncharacteristic gentleness. He chucked her under the chin and stood up. "Second off: leave some fun for the rest of us."

A glistening apparition came galloping out of the woods. He recognized the silver sheen of a patronus, bounding over the hill at top speed. As it approached, he identified the shape of an ermine.

It skittered up to his feet, cocked its head, and spoke in the haggard voice of Arthur Weasley.

"Find Draco. Tell him to meet at the Portkey," it said. Then it dissipated into mist.

"That's my cue," said Theo. He clenched and unclenched his freshly healed hand, like it was resisting him. He turned to Draco. "Find Arthur Weasley," he said. "He'll keep you safe, for a given definition of safe, and a given definition of keep, neither of which I endorse personally, but then, my standards are usually higher than other people's."

He turned on his heel and went crack.

"Teddy!" Pansy staggered up. "He's going to splinch himself again," she said angrily. "He's lucky he didn't die. Two in side-along! I can't decide if he's arrogant or suicidal!"

"A strong argument to be made for both."

She made a cross between a grunt and a scream. She fluffed at her shorn hair, helplessly, and then turned to him.

"You're not hurt, are you?" she said, sort of despairingly, as if she really didn't want to know the answer.

"No," he said, though he didn't feel too great about his toenails, to tell the truth. "I don't think so."

"Thank Merlin and Morgana," she said. "No offense, but I don't have another rune in me for you."

"None taken," he said, his stomach turning queasily. "Parkinson — how often do you—"

"What, rip open my own wrists?" She used Episkey to heal up the shallow bite on her wrist, but it was a mediocre Episkey, and it left a ring of crescent marks on the flesh. "Only on wrong Thursdays, you know — what the hell are you talking about? Does this look fun to you?"

"Yes, but I mean— at school— have you ever—?"

She burst into hysterical laughter. "Draco Malfoy," she said, "are you asking me if I use blood magic to cheat on exams?"

"No, you ninny."

"As if I care that much about my grade in sodding Charms? I'm not Granger. Now, she might."

The thought of Hermione locked several muscles in his gut.

"We have to leave."

She studied him for a moment and sighed. “Oh, piss,” she said. “Fine. Let’s go shelter with the blood traitors. I can’t very well go back home with my hair looking like this, anyway. ”

At the top of the Portkey hill, a huddle of people in nightclothes clustered under a Lumos-light, and when he was close enough to see the color of their hair he broke into a run.

Hermione saw him first. She gave a shout and tripped away from a tight three-way huddle with Harry and Ron, floundering down the hill. Her hair was tied in a silk kerchief and the hems of her pajamas muddied near black. Uninjured, however: apart from a long scratch on her cheek, she wasn’t hurt, and she was running like she could have done a neat half-marathon at daybreak. He could have cheered.

She tripped on a rabbit hole — she never did have the coordination God gave a fawn — and slammed into him like a Body-Bind. He hiked her up off the ground and sort of — this was embarrassing — wrapped them together, an arm around her waist and one hand spanning her narrow shoulderblades, and put his face in her neck and breathed, and breathed, and breathed.

She smelled like smoke and sweat and muggle soap. Probably there were other people trying to get his attention, but he didn’t actually care if there was another Mark going up over their heads. It would keep.

Hermione was yelling at him. It was a perfect moment.

“...woke up to find you GONE, no word, no note, the whole camp screaming on fire, you could have been KIDNAPPED—”

“Mmhm.”

“—or DEAD, for all I knew, trampled or trapped somewhere burning or caught by a stray curse, and we’d never find your body under the wreck, we'd wait here all night and never know it — Draco Malfoy, I could SKIN you—"

It was surprisingly gratifying that she'd worried about him; he'd been so caught up in worrying about everyone else dying that he'd had relatively little time to consider the non-zero risk of doing so himself. Alarming.

"I didn't mean to leave. I was caught outside."

"I know that NOW! And there were muggles, and they — I—" She broke off and shuddered with her whole body. She was so small. That was concerning. She hadn't been so small last year, had she? He could hold her up without any effort at all.

"The muggles," he said. But that was all. He had nothing to say. Nothing would make it better. Words couldn't help it. It was a black pit of a thing, where sympathy and compassion and all the encouragement in the world would fly in and dissolve at the corrosive touch of the truth.

She gave a push on his shoulder, and he lowered her down. "You shoes," he said suddenly, for she was still wearing her bed slippers, now shredded from running.

"What? Oh. They're fine," she said dismissively. "My feet are numb, anyway."

Pansy cleared her throat. Hermione stiffened.

"Hello," said Pansy. "Ciao, Granger. Glad you're not dead, it'd be a pain to wipe Malfoy's brains off my jumper. I'll just be going, then, shall I?"

"What, by yourself?" said Hermione. "No, no. You have to stay with us."

“Like any bad party, I appreciate being invited,” said Pansy, her lip curling, “but I’ll make do with a calling card. My father’s out there, and he’s worried sick.”

“Draco! Hermione!”

Harry and Ron hurried down the hill. They were quickly surpassed by the bounding strides of Arthur Weasley, who swept down in a midnight blue drawing-gown and a knit cap.

“Merlin’s blood! Thank God! Draco! You’re alright? Not hurt?”

“No, sir, thank you.”

“I’m so sorry we lost you, boy, it was pure chaos, when I saw you’d gone I was about to lose my mind — but I had to move the others, we couldn’t wait for you to come back—”

“I should say not,” said Draco, shocked. “That would’ve been— you shouldn’t have even thought—”

“Bill and Charlie are out looking for you,” breathed Mr. Weasley. “I’ll step away and call them back; pardon me for a moment.”

He was touched, and nigh astonished, that they had wasted time looking for him. Harry and Ron shuffled closer, and everyone languished in the sheer embarrassment of relief.

“We wanted to go,” said Ron, breaking the silence, “but he wouldn’t let us. I told him, listen, I can have this done in five: we’ll just listen for wherever the loudest complaining is coming from.”

“A good thought,” he admitted.

“Are you not a confounding variable?” said Pansy.

The four of them looked at her. She cringed.

“Don’t do that, it’s creepy,” she said. “Reminds me of phookas.”

“Where did you come from?” said Ron rudely.

“Your mum’s house. She keeps a Portkey in her bedside drawer,” said Pansy immediately.

Ron’s eyebrows climbed the white cliff of his forehead, with shades of impressment. There was a beat as everyone fumbled for the lost end of conversation, like a bunch of blindfolded snake hunters chasing an asp.

Hermione said, after a moment: “Pansy — please don’t take this the wrong way — but what did you do to your hair?”

The veneer of calm shattered.

“It wasn’t on purpose!” she screeched. “I was splinched!”

“Oh! Oh, alright, I’m sorry then—”

“You think I’d go around like this in public if I didn’t have to? You think I’d let the hairwitch escape alive if she did this to me? I’d be in Azkaban for murder in the worst degree!”

“Murder in the ‘first’ degree, Pansy.”

“Not the way I’d do it!”

“I think it looks sort of cool,” said Harry, whose own hair did not give him a lot of ethos on the subject. “It’s all shaggy and modern. You’re like Courtney Love.”

Pansy quieted, but remained suspicious. “Who’s that?”

“Er. She’s a musician.”

“...Is she pretty?”

Hermione scrunched up her nose and opened her mouth, and Harry stepped on her foot.

“Yeah, I reckon,” he said. “Everyone talks about her all the time.”

Mr. Weasley galloped back up the hill, dressing-gown a-flapping. “Bill’s coming,” he gasped. “Charlie’s on his way, got caught up helping some Bulgarians out of a bind — he’s going to swing by the Portkey office on his way, pick up something to get us home.”

“Oh, good,” said Pansy. “I’ll be on my way, then—”

“You’ll come with us, of course,” he interrupted her. “Also. I’m sorry. Who are you? I fear Ron’s got more friends every time I turn around.”

It was hard to say whether Pansy or Ron was more appalled.

“I’m Pansy Parkinson!”

“She’s not my friend, Dad!”

“Parkinson as in Prescott, who’s my father, if that doesn’t ring a bell —”

“Not even an acquaintance—”

“—thank the Lord for small mercies—”

“—a third year Slytherin, she’s like an evil baby.”

“Enough.” Arthur cut across both of them. “Pansy, you’ll come back to the Burrow with us. I’ll contact your father and tell him where you are.”

“I should say not!” She was indignant. “I only came because Draco made me.”

“I did what?”

If her wrist felt strained from twisting the knife in his back, she hid it admirably. “I’ll be perfectly fine waiting here myself,” she announced.

“There’s no need to shepherd me back to whatever ‘the Burrow’ is. I’ll just wait here.”

Arthur shook his head. “The riot’s not over. It’s not safe. I’m sorry, dear, but that wasn’t an offer. Harry, will you make sure she gets a hand on the Portkey?”

Choosing Harry was a wise move: Ron was gaping at his father like he was speaking Troll, and even Hermione looked like she had doubts. Harry nodded, accepting this surely painful duty with good-naturedness.

“You’re kidnapping me?” said Pansy, not so much enraged as disbelieving.

“No,” said Mr. Weasley, with much more gentleness than Draco would have, if he were accused of the same by a thankless child with terrible fringe. “We’re getting you back to your parents, just as soon as we can find them. Now, all of you come along; there’s Charlie.”

The dragonkeeper had cracked into existence on top of the hill, holding an old tire. He was harried. “Got one,” he yelped. “Basil’s office is overrun, Dad! Everyone wants out of here! Had to call in two favors with a mate from Games and Sports, and then I got jumped on my way out!”

“Thanks, Chucky,” rasped Fred. He and George were bundled up with Percy under a blanket, shivering in their pajamas. “You’re a real mate. You nail any Death Eaters on the way?”

Mr. Weasley flashed him a razored look. Fred fell silent.

“Why don’t we table mention of — that,” said Mr. Weasley, “until we get home.”

“Sure. Yeah, Dad. Sorry.”

“It’s alright,” he said. His shoulders slumped. “It’s alright, boys. I’m sorry to snap. It’s been… a very long night.”

They crowded the tire. Draco got sandwiched between Pansy and Hermione, shoulder to shoulder in the packed circle of tired faces and outstretched hands, and under the limpid green light of the Dark Mark, everyone’s face was pale and wan. He caught Hermione staring at it as though it were a crack in the sky itself, and the whole thing was about to fall down on top of her.

In a thoughtless impulse, he grabbed her hand.

Words were useless, words were drivel and dead cauldronwater, but there was still something to express. She was warm against him like a tiny radiator, generating twice the heat something her size ought to, and in the dark ghoulish basement of his mind a war drum still hammered on like a broken clock. He held on because it was that or get sucked down into that mental cellar and see the first thing he’d thought of when he saw the muggles floated overhead, the worst thing he’d thought of in years, which was an image he would have to carve out of his skull with a scalpel, and a terrible two-word litany: Not her.

Mad-Eye Moody

Chapter 36: Mad-Eye Moody

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

It was mid-morning when the Weasleys and company lagged on foot through Ottery St. Catchpole and made their way down the unpaved lane to the Burrow and the frantic woman standing outside it. She appeared at the first sight of them through the window and ran up the driveway to meet them, barefoot, with a fistful of skirt and soon two arms full of children. It was unclear what portion were hers: she was embracing any she could get her hands on.

She threw her arms around Arthur's neck and kissed him with a little more vigor than Draco thought was necessary. Ron politely made noises of death.

After much too long, Molly broke off. "Boys," she gasped. "Ginny — Hermione, your shoes! Get inside at once, I'll draw some water for a bath—"

"Can I have a bath, too?" said Ron hopefully.

"Yes, but after the girls."

"That's sexist."

"No, it isn't," said Hermione.

"It is," said Pansy, thoughtfully. Molly finally noticed her.

"Arthur—?"

"Ah. Yes. Picked her up with Draco," said Arthur. "Her name's Pansy Parkinson, Parkinson as in Prescott." Draco couldn't tell if he was making fun.

Molly and Pansy regarded each other with expressions of equivalent shock. “You brought home the Parkinsons’ daughter?”

“Yes.”

“Alone?”

“Hm. Yes.”

“I see,” said Molly. “And where is she going?”

Pansy had turned around and begun walking back up the path. Bill caught her and dragged her back by the collar.

“Right,” said Mrs. Weasley bravely. “Well. What’s one more?” (Draco thought one more, in a house of twelve, was actually a great deal.) “Come in, dear. Cuppa?”

“I’m not thirsty,” said Pansy.

“Have,” said Molly, “a cup of tea.”

Pansy did.

They crammed into the tiny kitchen. Certain compromises were made with respect to personal space and physical laws. Mrs. Weasley made a cup of eye-watering tea that Mr. Weasley gave a no less eye-watering shot of Ogdens, and they sat in a dull silence of clinking and slurping that was somehow its own comfort. The walls of the Burrow had never seemed more firm and more necessary to his survival than they did now.

When the clock tolled five, Arthur stood up. “I have to go in. They’re going to need all hands.”

“I’ll come with you,” said Percy at once. The two crossed to the door, and a pair of cracks sounded beyond it.

Harry was rubbing his forehead like he wanted to erode it from friction. Ron nudged him.

“You're about to start a fire over there, mate.”

“Sorry,” he mumbled. “It hurts.”

“Does it often?” said Pansy curiously.

Everyone looked at her. It was the first time she had said anything since coming in.

“Not usually,” said Harry. “Just sometimes, when I have nightmares. Molly says it's psychomat- no, hang on— psychosoto...” He looked at Hermione.

“Psychosomatic,” she said. She was tucked into a corner of the sofa and holding herself very tightly, a small and defensive posture that gave the impression at any moment she might burrow between the cushions and vanish.

“Yeah,” he said, “that. Thing where your brain makes your body thinks it's hurting, even when it's not, because it's scared. Apparently it's not uncommon for people who... I mean, if you've seen stuff, and you...”

The conversation dwindled awkwardly, like a swish of dirty water circling a drain.

To Draco's surprise, it was Pansy who intervened, giving Harry an approving jerk of her chin. “Cool. My dad has a magical scar on his back.” She leaned forward on her knees. “He got it fighting a horde of feral muggles in the underground.”

“They’re not animals,” said Hermione coldly.

“Fine. Whatever. Mad muggles, then. It’s what you call muggles that see magic and go crazy,” she said. “Their poor brains can’t handle the shock. Then you have to go clean it up and Obliviate them. My father’s not an Obliviator, that’s busywork, but he has to deal with the residual magic.”

“What was it?” said Harry. “That your dad was doing, I mean.”

She sniffed. “I don’t know. My father’s an Unspeakable, all his missions are classified.”

“What does an Unspeakable do?” said Hermione.

“Are you deaf? I just told you, his missions—”

“They’re the Ministry’s covert operations unit,” Draco said quietly. “They work in the Department of Mysteries. Platinum-grade clearance only.”

Hermione gave him a quiet, fleeting glance of gratitude. He shrugged. It wasn't as if it were particularly impressive knowledge to hold.

“Dad’s silver-grade, for reference,” Ron told her.

Hermione turned to Pansy. “So your dad’s a spy?” she said bluntly.

The other girl flicked her eyes at the ceiling. “If you wanted to be painfully simplistic, I suppose. It would be more appropriate to say he's a top-clearance political operative. He isn't running around in fake mustaches and silly hats. I see you got your metal off, by the way. Mazel tov. Does this mean you’ve become a woman, in muggle custom?”

“What?”

Pansy rolled her eyes and bared her teeth.

“Oh. I did, thank you,” said Hermione stiffly. “And it doesn’t mean anything except that my teeth are healthy. If you were a friend, I might suggest you get some, actually, yours are slightly crooked.”

Pansy turned scarlet and sealed her lips like a seam. “I beg your pardon?”

“Well, it's true. It's nothing to be ashamed of, most people need them.”

“I believe you'll understand,” said Pansy thinly, “if I don't take cosmetic advice from you.”

“Parkinson,” said Draco, mostly from exasperation, as the other three recoiled in varying states of distaste. Harry sat up straight and scowled, while Hermione — against whom this accusation was terribly unfair, really; she was quite put-together, most of the time, with the sole exception of her hair — suddenly found something of great interest in her clasped hands.

Ron said “Oi,” calmly but firmly, and Pansy made a little scoff, but still fell silent; Hermione was unusually subdued.

It was a bad moment, feeling-wise, for everyone.

“Oh, God, silences this long should be illegal,” said Pansy. “Bugger this, I'm going to get some air.”

She stood up, wrenched her jumper straight, and stalked out of the room with the airs of someone on six-inch heels, instead of a pair of muddy loafers. The door clattered emphatically behind her.

“Little bint,” muttered Ginny.

“She's just spoiled,” said Hermione calmly, though she was still staring at her hands. "Her teeth are crooked. It would do her good if more people told her things she didn't like to hear."

Then she looked sidelong at Draco, as if she expected him to say something. He didn't. He was glad Pansy had the good sense to remove herself before something more pyrotechnic happened. He didn't trust her and Hermione alone together in a small space for more than five minutes; neither had the patience to deal with each other. It was an unfortunate remark on his social situation that most of the girls he knew well had more personality than patience.

The fire blazed green. They cleared a small space for Arthur Weasley to stumble over the grate.

“Ministry inquest,” he said breathlessly. “Aurors dispatched for questioning. Everyone out—”

Too late. The fire turned green again, and there was a screeching and thumping of furniture as everyone tried to clear yet more space in a living room that was already all but bulging outwards at the seams.

Three men stepped over the grate, one at a time. The first was a short, pug-nosed man in a double-breasted black uniform, with his hair slicked within an inch of its life to his skull. The second was Barty Crouch. The third was an auror.

He wore an oily brown leather greatcoat over his auror’s uniform and a wand holster with a longknife strapped to it. A dirk sat on his other hip, while two handles jutted from his boots, and another holster disappeared under his jacket. He had a beady blue glass eye and a shag of silver hair, and the only face Draco had ever seen with more scars than Remus Lupin’s.

The auror hopped the grate with an agility quite unfit for his age, and planted a gnarled walking stick on the rug. Crouch stepped aside, clearing his throat, and the glass eye swiveled around to follow him. In fact, the glass eye never left Crouch, no matter where the auror was looking.

“Mad-Eye,” said Arthur, with surprise and faint warmth.

“Arthur.” The auror, Mad-Eye, scuttled over and exchanged a grim handshake. “Sorry to intrude. Prissy Parkinson here insisted.”

“Quite alright, I understand completely. Mr. Parkinson, I’d like to apologize—”

Prescott Parkinson pointed his wand at Arthur.

“Where is my daughter?” he said, in a calm steady voice, with a calm steady hand.

Crouch massaged the bridge of his nose. “Prescott,” he began. “We talked about this—”

“Put that down!”

It was Molly, come in from the kitchen; she drew her own wand and jabbed it at the intruders. “Not here! Not under my roof!”

“If someone doesn’t answer my question, you will soon have very little roof left to worry about,” said Parkinson. “My daughter. Where is she?”

“Touch Arthur, and in a minute she’ll be scrubbing her father out of the carpets,” snarled Mad-Eye.

Prescott turned to him, and there was a beat of intense silence.

Just when Draco was certain that the next word spoken was going to be a curse, the door banged open. Pansy stalked in, followed by a harried Bill.

“Father,” she said. “Finally. Do you know how long I’ve been stuck in this hovel?”

Parkinson dropped his wand. A change came over him completely. “Poppet,” he breathed, and dropped down to embrace her. Pansy hissed and danced out of reach.

“Dad! No! God! Not in front of the auror!”

“What happened to your hair? Didn’t Mummy offer—?”

“Nothing! Nothing!! Don’t draw attention to it!”

“Prescott,” said Crouch tiredly, “you have acquired your daughter. Acquit yourself.”

Nodding stiffly, Parkinson turned to Arthur. “We require use of your Floo,” he bit out.

“We don’t have any powder,” said Arthur calmly. “If you want to Apparate, you’ll have to go out to the yard.”

Without a word, Prescott Parkinson silently swept his daughter out of the room. Draco didn’t meet her eyes as she left, and she didn’t try to meet his.

“I apologize for the interruption,” said Crouch smoothly. “Prescott insisted on joining us. We’re here to conduct interviews.”

“Interviews?” piped up Fred. “Are we going to be in the paper?”

“Not if you know what’s good for you,” snarled Mad-Eye. Fred paled.

“All eyewitnesses will be questioned. Starting with Ministry officials and their guests. Someone breached Ministry security — someone on the inside.”

“Is that an accusation?” said Molly coldly.

Mad-Eye softened, insofar as the word ‘softened’ meant anything, for him.

“Molly,” he said.

“Hello, Alastor. Lovely to see you. Answer the question, please.”

“It's procedure,” snapped Crouch. “A hundred employees and their families have been interviewed already. Starting with the inner circle.”

“Oh, yes? All of them?”

“Sibelius Nott has been under questioning since sunrise, as has his fourteen-year-old son. Please do not think I fail to understand the gravity of the situation.”

Draco startled.

“And the muggles?” said Arthur.

“Obliviated,” said Crouch. “Having their memories modified as we speak. When they wake, last night will be a strange dream.”

Molly was skeptical. “And how do you intend to explain what happened to any other muggle witnesses?”

“Gas leak,” grunted Mad-Eye. “Cockridge and Peaseblossom hacked up a pipe near the closest town, and they’re leaving a tip-off in with the muggle paper.”

“Hard to do better,” Arthur admitted. “But the children were with me all night. You can question me, instead.”

“Arthur,” said Molly, disapproving and sharp.

“All of them?” said Mad-Eye. “The whole night?”

“Yes.”

“Dad, that’s not true,” said Percy quickly. “Malfoy left the tent, remember?”

Ron made a furious noise. “Perce, you great fat snitch!”

The unwitting elegance of this betrayal left Draco slightly impressed. The Minister and Mad-Eye both confronted Draco with new interest.

Hermione stood up suddenly. As gestures went, hers warmed him, but he actually rather wished she’d stayed out of Mad-Eye’s sightline.

“What? It’s true!”

“He’s fourteen,” said Molly loudly. “I repeat, fourteen.”

Crouch ignored him. “Mr. Malfoy, is that true?”

Draco nodded jerkily.

“He went to get water,” said Hermione. He was torn between wanting to thank her and wanting to clamp a hand over her wretched wonderful fearless mouth. “He was thirsty and the tents don’t have plumbing, and anyway, I’m certain there are thousands of wizards you can’t account for, it was havoc. Draco’s hardly an unusual case.”

Crouch acted as though he hadn’t heard her. “A quick interview,” he said crisply. “We’ll make it short—”

Mad-Eye grunted in disapproval. “No. Prior incantato.”

“Really, Alastor?”

“No special treatment, Barty.”

They traded a strange, knowing look. Mad-Eye did something with his cheek. Crouch clicked his tongue. Mad-Eye did it again. Then Crouch sighed and flapped his hand and Mad-Eye turned back to Draco, faintly smug, as if he had won something.

“Draco, listen,” said Arthur quickly, stepping between him and the Ministry men. He spoke in a low voice. “You don’t have to cooperate. You’ve got a right to an attorney. Alastor would be the first person to tell you that.”

Mad-Eye made a grunt that could be interpreted as agreement. It could also be interpreted as homicidal intent. All in the eye of the beholder, was Mad-Eye.

Draco felt an unexpected touch of affection for Mr. Weasley.

“I’m aware.” Come to think of it, he didn’t know how to get ahold of Gatz, if he needed to; they didn’t have Floo powder. But the Ministry men didn’t need to know that. “It’s fine. I haven’t anything to hide.”

The kitchen was cleared for his questioning. The others shuffled upstairs or into the garden and closed the door, leaving the Burrow eerily quiet, animated only by the dripping faucet and the creak of floorboards as people tried to eavesdrop upstairs. Mad-Eye and Crouch sat on one side of the table, and he sat on the other.

He pulled out his wand, flipped it, and held it handle-out. He tried not to show how it unsettled him. A man wasn’t supposed to be separated from his wand.

Mad-Eye took it by the handle — his index and third finger were covered by a dragonskin wand-guard, and a rather expensive one; Draco wanted one on sight — and lifted it before his glass eye. He grunted at whatever he saw, and gave it an experimental swish. “Do you know its properties, boy?”

“Do I? Please. Ten inches, hawthorn wood and unicorn hair. Pliant.”

“Hawthorn, eh?” Mad-Eye danced it over the back of his fingers, a gesture that was facially useless but patently cool. Draco wondered how he did it. “Any good at healing magic, are you?”

He wasn’t about to bloody well say no. “Better at jinxes, sir.”

“I see. The second wizard, then.”

“...Sir?”

“You know the saying about hawthorn,” muttered Mad-Eye, though he didn’t. “Every tree makes two wands. The first is for a healer, and the second is for the wizard who keeps them in business.”

He suspected he had been accused of a murderous nature. It wasn't impossible, but at fourteen, it seemed a touch premature.

"I'm not an expert in wandcraft," he said delicately.

Mad-Eye snorted. "Hark at him. 'I'm not an expert.' Lucius Malfoy rides again. And Merlin wept."

Crouch cleared his throat in discomfort. Draco narrowed his eyes.

"Forgive me, but I have a hard time believing you knew my father. Sir."

"I knew his backside well enough when I was chasing it over hill and dale," said Mad-Eye, with a certain gleam in his real eye. It reminded him slightly of the Weasley twins. "Enough chatter. Let's have a look at you. Prior incantato."

The hawthorn wand trembled, and from its tip issued a length of white mist. The mist took the shape of a lock.

"Colloportus," said Crouch with satisfaction. "And some time ago, judging by the color. What was that for, Mr. Malfoy?"

"I locked my trunk before I left Hogwarts, in June. Is that enough?"

Mad-Eye spun the hawthorn wand around and handed it back to him. "Hardly," he growled. "You could've cast the Mark in a dozen ways we'd never know about. You could've stolen someone else's wand. Obliviated them. Or made one of them do it. Arthur Weasley could be under Imperius as we speak."

Draco folded his arms. "I'm flattered," he said, "but we don't learn Unforgivable Curses until next year."

Neither of them laughed at his hilarious joke.

Crouch stood up. "We've spent enough time indulging your habit for conspiracy, Alastor. The boy didn't do anything. Mr. Malfoy, I apologize for the interruption. Please enjoy the rest of your summer vacation, if you can."

The glass eye swiveled around to follow the other wizard as Crouch stalked out of the kitchen. Mad-Eye waited and then leaned over the table, bringing his pitted face altogether too close to Draco's. "Remember what I said," he muttered.

"...About what, sir?"

The eye stayed trained on something behind his head, giving him the unnerving impression of a glassy white sclera. The other eye was cold and bright and wide as a dinner spoon. "Absence of proof is not proof of innocence. That's what no one at this kangaroo court of a Ministry can get through their heads. No one is ever innocent until you have the man who did it at the point of your wand." He paused, and when Draco thought he might have blown a gasket in that old ramshackle machine of a head, he shrieked: "Constant vigilance!" and Draco shouted and banged his knee on the table so hard that he was still nursing it when Mad-Eye scuttled out.

"Just a spell? That's all?"

"You sound disappointed. Would you rather I was put to the thumbscrews?"

They were in Ginny's bedroom, where Hermione was finishing her last-minute packing before they departed in the morning. (The 'last-minute' phase still occurred several hours before Draco intended to so much as think about packing at all.)

He sprawled sideways over the pillows while the Cranberries fought to be heard over the bellow of rain on the tin roof. The evening light dappled through the water on the windows.

"I had hoped it might build character," she said. He smirked at her. "But what they did is much more interesting. So a wand keeps a history of its uses? Like a ledger?”

“More like a palimpsest, I think. It only showed the last spell I’d cast.”

As befit the privileges of Only Girlchild, Ginny’s room was nicer than Ron’s. It was covered in peeling yellow wallpaper and Weird Sisters posters, as well as a Holyhead Harpies pinup calendar that Hermione, amusingly, couldn’t look at without blushing. (Draco could, and did.) A small bed was wedged in the corner, and Hermione’s sleeping pad had been rolled out on the floor beneath the window.

She pulled a garment bag from Ginny’s closet and paused in thought. “That’s still fascinating. Flitwick told us a wand is a conduit, like a vessel for water, but a vessel doesn’t remember the nature of what it holds.”

He turned a page of Quidditch for Seekers. An advertisement for riding gloves featuring one of the Bulgarian beaters winked at him. “It can still keep traces.”

“But that doesn’t make sense, because the spell should end once you’ve stopped casting it. How can you have a ‘trace’ of a spell like Colloportus? It doesn’t produce anything. If anything, it’s just a particular form of motion, moving the tumblers in a lock. It’s the same concept as Bombarda, or Ventus.”

“Fine, I’ll bite. How do you think it works?”

“I don’t know! I really don’t! But I do have a theory.”

“Shock. Surprise,” he said, turning another page.

“It would be simple to test, if only we could use magic — I suppose it’ll have to wait. But if your wand has memory, like a computer—”

“Objection. Refer to the Granger-Malfoy Treaty on Use of Muggle Analogies.”

“You analogize to things I don’t know all the time— no, never mind, we can’t do this again. If it has memory, in theory, you should be able to retrieve prior spells other than the last one. Possibly without going in order.”

“Very exciting. Of course, without limits, your theory implies that your full spellcasting history is accessible through your wand, which obviously can’t be the case.”

She had a special pout reserved for whenever he said one of her theories was demonstrably incorrect or impossible, especially because of things she had no reasonable ability to know. It was deployed now in full force. “Why not?”

“Because it could have been used to exonerate Sirius Black,” he yawned. “‘Did you blow up those muggles? No? Very good, sorry to bother you, have a nice day.’ Now, he still tried to kill Pettigrew,” he added, “so it doesn’t necessarily get him anywhere, but the point stands.”

“It’s possible they haven’t figured out how.” Sudden bursts of energy to her brain often stalled her in other places, and so she had been gripping the same garment bag, half-folded, for several minutes. “Spellwork is some of the most complicated magical theory. Especially metamagic, spells having to do with spells themselves. There’s a reason wandwork is so hard.”

He deserved an Order of Merlin, Second Class at least, for not making a joke about ‘wandwork.’

She was quiet again, and he put down the magazine.

It had been two days since the Dark Mark. Hermione had been unusually subdued since then, although out of respect for her and an obvious recognition of its probable cause, no one had — as far as Draco knew — yet commented on it. He found himself waiting for the right moment to broach the subject, but it was never good, it was never not awkward or inappropriate or a violation of some unspoken rule of engagement that kept their little rapport buoyant and tugging along.

And he was embarrassed, too: embarrassed because when he'd seen her on the hill, there had been a full minute or thereabouts where he hadn't thought a thing else, and that was alarming, in its own way. There was a wildness and rough-edgedness to those feelings that he didn't care to directly address. He didn't like that she'd seen him that way. She knew that about him, now. If she wanted, she could throw it in his face. Just because she hadn't didn't mean she couldn't.

He shifted uncomfortably. "Alright, Granger?"

"Of course," she said, with a funny look. In fairness, he hadn't exactly told her what he meant, which was: Are you unaffected by watching a family of muggles being tortured for possession of the very blood that flows in your admittedly magical veins? Are you processing the information that certain people want to hurt you, Hermione Granger, very badly, in a healthy way? Because certain other persons in this room are not.

The rain drummed on the windowpane like another musical instrument. He was struck by the idea that if they stayed here, in this room, then there would never be a need to concern themselves with Death Eaters ever again. Her blood status would be irrelevant, being that there were only two of them; it would be terribly easy. He could lay hexes on the doors, the windows, the cracks in the walls where the wind slithered in. And Hermione would be alright. And he would get to relax, for once in his life, because he wouldn't have to worry about anyone getting herself hurt when his back was turned.

Ridiculous idea. She'd hex him in half for the suggestion, anyway.

"What?"

"What, 'what'?"

“You’re staring.”

“I’m not,” he said immediately. “I don’t suppose — you don’t need any Sleeping Potion, do you?”

Her hand hesitated on its journey to the sock drawer. Then she resumed with a certain brittle businesslike vim. “Not recently,” she said. “I haven’t had trouble sleeping. More than usual, anyway.”

“If you do.”

“I’m fine.”

“I know.”

“This isn’t the first time — I mean, in second year, someone wrote a threat in blood over the Pink Lady—”

“I know,” he repeated, curtly. “I remember. But you’d be entitled—”

“I’m not some delicate muggle-born naif—”

“Obviously not, and neither am I, but one still might worry.”

He hadn’t meant to say that.

“You worried?” she said curiously. “I wouldn’t have think it was as awful — for you. Considering. No offense.”

She had a habit of appending no offense to statements that were heedlessly tactless, as if that helped. Still, it was endearing that she tried.

“Don’t be daft,” he snapped. “Only an idiot wouldn’t. Muggles floating in the sky, insurgents everywhere, it was madness—”

“Death Eaters, you mean.”

“We don’t know that for certain. It could have been a hoax.”

“The muggles looked fairly real,” she said, slightly acerbic.

“No, clearly, but the wizards might have been anyone. Death Eater was a real title, it referred to a fledged soldier of the Dark Lord, and there aren’t that many of them left. If everyone in masks at the Cup was a former Death Eater, it would mean everyone left in Britain showed out. No, it’s more likely that the group was inspired—”

“I think the kind of people who use Death Eaters for inspiration,” she said, “aren’t so very different from Death Eaters, actually. From my point of view.”

The beat that followed was distinctly guilty.

“Fair,” he said.

“I’m not afraid of them,” she said firmly. “Death Eaters or not, whoever they are.”

“Merlin’s sake.”

“I mean it, I’m not. I’m not going to run away from them. They can do whatever they like, they’re pathetic, and I’m not frightened—”

“I respect that you’re a Gryffindor and have to save face,” he said, with dwindling patience. “But it might occur to you one of these days that cowardice and wisdom are not mutually incompatible qualities.”

“Would you rather I was afraid?”

“I want you to save your own skin,” he said, irritably, “so as to save me the trouble of doing it.”

“Oh, because it’s such an inconvenience to you, is it—”

“More of an irrational compulsion,” he drawled, and hoped that the sarcasm would dry out any hidden evidence of feeling. He flicked another page of the magazine.

Hermione seemed taken aback. Her fingers curled tightly around the side of a hanger, and she fidgeted with a loose thread, absentminded.

“Were you — worried about me? At the Cup?”

He glared at her over the top of his magazine, lowered his eyes, and said nothing.

“You were scared — for me?”

“I shall reiterate the situation,” he said, “since it may have slipped your mind. Explosions. Killing Curses. Muggles in the sky. I was worried for everything living in a five-mile radius, I don’t know why you think this is some revelation.”

“But for me in particular. Specifically.”

“What do you want from me, witch? A signed confession? I, Draco Malfoy, do hereby declare I should not desire the violent and premature death of Ms. Granger, chiefly from aversion to the disastrous inconvenience of finding a new potions partner? Fine. Yes, in particular,” he said sourly. “Go on and laugh.”

“I don’t think it’s funny,” she said, still slightly startled. Now that was starting to annoy him, too. It wasn’t that ludicrous for him to care. He had a beating heart, for God’s sake, he wasn’t some cretin. “I worried about you, too — in particular — obviously. You know that.”

“That’s different,” he said. Hermione would have been worried if bloody Pigwidgeon went missing. If poor Ronald had misplaced himself, she’d have mobilized the Queen’s navy by sunup. He would have been insulted if she hadn’t shown a bit of nerves, honestly. “As you said, it’s not the same for me.”

She hummed in thought. “I wanted to go looking for you,” she said, absently. “Me and Harry volunteered. Mr. Weasley stopped us.”

He cast a sharp look at her over the magazine. “It’s a bloody good thing he did,” he said curtly. “I never took you for a lemming.”

“That’s rich! You went running off by yourself. And how did you end up with Pansy, anyway?”

“That was an accident.”

“Alright, then don’t tell me.”

“I’m not lying.”

“Mm. You just ran into her after midnight, then. On accident.”

“I entreat you to take that implication and stuff your woeful mouth with it. That’s heinous, Granger, she’s a child.”

“She’s almost our age,” she said, but she was very bad at repressing laughter. “I’m sure Harry would have done the same with Cho, if—”

“That’s enough.”

“—half a chance — or Fred and Angelina, I’m sure he knows a dozen ways to sneak out—”

He tossed the magazine onto the bed and sat up. Crookshanks glared at him balefully for jostling the mattress. “Right. I’m going to go vacate my intestines into a toilet bowl, and once I’m finished, if you’d care to act like a gentlewoman, I’ll return, and we can revisit other subjects of conversation.”

“You’re such a boy,” she laughed, and threw a pillow at him. He caught it with ease, snickering. He had a seeker’s reflexes, and she had what you could only generously call ‘reflexes’ at all. “You act like you’re so different from Harry and Ron, but you’re really just as silly as they are, only with a posher accent.”

“I am not,” he said indignantly. “I am a gentleman.”

“A posher accent,” she repeated. He scoffed.

“So what, then? You’re a girl.”

“And what is that supposed to mean?”

“Nothing. You are, aren’t you?” he said vaguely, and when he glanced up she was looking at him. She was wearing her light-wash jeans and a two-tone muggle shirt with sleeves more sheer than the camisole beneath, so one could see her soft birdlike arms and pointy shoulders through the film. She didn’t dress like this at Hogwarts. It was very hard to forget she was a girl when she was wearing such different clothing. Maybe that was why the subject hadn’t come up until now.

A lock of hair drifted into her face, and she blew it away. He followed the movement with his eyes.

“Your mother thought I was a boy,” she said finally.

“So? That doesn’t mean I did,” he said. “I don’t keep her abreast of everything that goes on at school, either. I think the werewolf and her disinherited cousin would be more of a shock than the fact that I’m mates with a girl.”

“Being ‘mates’ doesn’t mean you can’t mention it,” she said, with a sulky lilt. “I mean — and I don’t care, mind, it’s obviously not important, but — you never even used a pronoun? How often did I come up?”

“Often enough, and what did you expect? ‘Hello Mum, Granger looked ever so womanly today, as we brewed a Polyjuice Potion illegally in the second-floor girls’ bath, of which she is one, a girl, of the feminine sex. Yours, Draco.’”

“Trust you to miss the point,” she said, and set about folding her socks.

“Apparently I have missed it, because I wasn’t aware you had one.”

She was putting a real dent in the sock population. It was brutal. The day would live in infamy in sockdom.

“My point,” she said emphatically, “is that — I’m a girl.”

He stared at her.

“I know that. We’ve only been discussing it for about five years now, I have acquired the gist.”

“Good!”

“Yes, good.”

He had no idea how they had ended up in an argument, which meant, on experience, that he was on the verge of losing.

“...Are you angry, Granger?”

“Don’t be silly,” she muttered. “Why would I be angry? We agree. Like you said.”

The socks were packed into their soldier’s graves, row upon row of sad white tombstones, and sealed away in the tomb of her trunk. She sat on the lid to get it closed, with a bit more force than was necessary.

“I’m glad we have an understanding,” he said suspiciously, and returned to a magazine. She rolled her eyes and went to change the CD, which had skipped into static.

Getting a bit cryptic these days, was Hermione.

On Hermione’s suggestion, Mrs. Weasley ordered muggle taxis into London. Draco generously decided not to resent her for this, despite the fact that it meant all eight of them — the four schoolbound Weasleys, their guests, and Mrs. Weasley, Mr. Weasley being still stuck in the glut of post-Cup madness at work — had to cram into three musty-smelling green taxi cabs, along with their trunks, four owls, a cat, and a case of Filibuster's Fabulous Wet-Start No-Heat Fireworks, which would not have been a problem had Fred's trunk not sprang open at the first red light.

Draco, pinned between Harry and the door, put his head to the window and concentrated on not being sick. Crookshanks used every leg he could find as a stretching post. The stop-and-go traffic lurched them around the packed cab, which smelled of something sour and earthy and also, bizarrely, of pineapples. He tried to roll down a window and was yelled at by the driver for letting rain into the car.

He concluded that driving was a fresh hell that Hermione and Harry had both become inured to by exposure, which raised his respect for both of them, but when he tried to tell them so, they assured him that most car rides "weren't like this," for his next one would be "much better," and the very idea of a "next one" reduced him nearly to tears.

Everyone was better when they got outside. Hermione scooped Crookshanks from out of the cabbie's lap, apologizing profusely. Fred scraped the burnt firecrackers out of the cab under his mother's immolating gaze. The rain soaked them in an instant, and this leant a somewhat hurried, unsentimental quality to their goodbyes. Nobody was congregating to chat on the platform this year, and the convivial spirit, damp but undaunted, migrated onto the train, where people were drying off with Warming and Siphoning Charms in every aisle. Magic hummed overhead, that taut, wavery quality like air over hot pavement.

Piling into the compartment, the four of them shucked their wet clothes and let them dry over the luggage racks. "I can't believe I don't get new dress robes," moaned Ron. "Everyone else did. Harry got them. Fred got them! Even Ginny got a new dress."

“What do you even need dress robes for?” said Hermione. “You never wear them.”

“They’re on the school list! Dunno why there’s so much bloody new stuff this year.” He flopped his threadbare copy of Standard Book of Spells, Grade 4, which wore the marks of three careful owners and two not-very-careful ones: its cover clung to the spine by four spindly threads, like bony fingers. “Why do I never get new things?”

Hermione clucked her tongue and ran her wand over the back in what must have been its umteenth Mending Charm. “I’m sure that your mother does the best she can. You said things were getting easier, now Percy has a job.”

“Yeah, but now Ginny’s getting bigger, and she gets all new stuff, because she’s a girl,” he said sourly. “And Percy doesn’t like paying for us. He wants to spend all his money on nice robes and snooty quills.”

Draco subtly adjusted the sleeves of his robes, which were, of course, new, and a soft midnight black, cut from the finest cotton that Madame Malkin had to sell.

Pigwidgeon chose that moment to erupt in a fit of screeching. Ulysses, Thucydides, and Hedwig all glowered as if deeply ashamed to share a species with him.

“See?” Ron pelted an Owl Treat at his cage. “Even my owl’s rubbish.”

There came a tap at the door. It revealed a yellow-haired girl in a Slytherin tie, with a milk-white canyon of scars running from her right ear to her left jaw, and disappearing into the folds of her collar.

Hermione’s breath hitched.

Daphne smiled bravely. “Boo,” she said. “Hullo, chaps. Surprised?”

“Merlin’s taint,” said Ron. “Your face.”

Draco pulled out his wand and jinxed him. Ron’s tongue sealed to the roof of his mouth, and he gave a panicked grunt.

“Ron,” said Hermione furiously. “Daphne, it’s really — you’re lovely as ever, and really well — I’m sorry—”

“Oh, what, like you think I didn’t know?” Daphne tittered. “Yes, it’s a big honking ugly scar. Just hideous. I shall never be an actress. May I sit down?”

There was a beat.

“What,” said Harry, bewildered, “with us?”

Another beat. Daphne, caught in the compartment door, faltered and folded her small white hands around the handle of her trunk.

“Unless you’d object.”

“No,” said Harry, “but it’s just — you’ve never sat with us, before.”

“I was never invited. You four are dreadfully insular. You’re a harder ticket than Queen Charlotte’s. I was all aflutter to be invited to your Christmas party. I thought: ‘Now I’ve really made it, the Gryffindor Four are letting me in.’” She gave a nervous, tinkling laugh. “I don’t mean to put myself where I’m not wanted, of course. I suppose I can go sit with the first years or something—”

Ron scooted over on the seat and patted it. With obvious relief, she dropped with a bounce onto the seat between Ron and Harry, legs swinging girlishly.

“Well!” she said eagerly. “What shall we talk about? Muggle sports?”

A number of furtive stares ricocheted around the compartment.

“No, then,” she said. “No muggle sports. That’s fine. There’s plenty to talk about. Do you want to know what I did with my summer? I’ll tell you anyway. I read through the complete novels of Philomena Guinea. There are forty-seven in toto, and each one involves a strapping warlock fighting for the hand of a pureblood gentlewoman unwillingly affianced to her rich blood-traitor cousin. I won’t spoil the rest but if you like the kind of book where people are always ‘frozen in astonishment’ at the ‘fathomless depths of his onyx orbs’ then boy, does Miss Philomena ever have a story for you. Hermione, in fact, there’s one that you might like — the princess is only a half- blood in it, and she has four cats. Are you all this quiet all the time? Stop staring, I feel like I’ve spinach on my teeth.”

She turned to Harry. “You’ve got a scar on your head,” she said, belligerently, “and nobody stares at you.”

“They do, actually,” he replied. “These ones are just used to it.”

“But yours is such a neat little shape,” she said thoughtfully, touching her cheek. “I, er… how long was it, would you say? Before your friends were used to it?”

Apropos of little, Hermione said: “Won’t the other Slytherins sit with you, Daphne?”

Daphne smiled. “What do you mean? Everywhere was full.”

“...Every compartment?”

“Oh, thereabouts!” she said. “I don’t want to bother them. It’s not a pleasant thing to be reminded of, and I can understand… how one might think…”

She paused.

“Well, I might as well get right out in front of it,” she said fiercely. “I don’t know who came up with the idea that I’d caught lycanthropy, but you should all know it’s not true. I’m very well and I keep myself very clean.” She tucked her hair behind her ear. “So you haven’t anything to worry about.”

Hermione’s mouth fell open. He could hear her mentally adding Daphne to her collection of endangered objects, a coterie that was as large as it was motley, and he was unsure whether or not Daphne would be glad to know she was in it. Hermione hoarded lost and broken things like dragon’s gold.

If it made her occasionally annoying, well, he had an annoying streak himself, anyway.

“We’re not worried,” said Harry loyally. “Lupin was our friend. It wouldn’t matter if you were a werewolf.”

“But I’m not,” she snapped.

“Oh. Okay.”

The train chugged on in silence through the coursing rain.

“I’m human,” Daphne said.

Ron unstuck his teeth with a monumental effort. “H’llo,” he managed. “Y’lk. Wkuh.”

She blinked at him. “I beg your pardon?”

“You. Look. W’cked,” he said, and drew his finger down his cheek. She brightened.

“You’re a dirty liar, Ronald Weasley,” she said. “And if you weren’t so nice to me, I’d give you the scolding you deserve. Now — oh, who’s there?”

There was another knock on the compartment door. It revealed Theo, whose arm was in a sling, and Pansy, who was lurking in the background, eyeing all of them with mistrust.

“Theo!” said Daphne happily. She wriggled over, nearly sitting on top of Ron, who grumbled and made a sliver of room on the seat. “Pans! Come join us.”

Pansy burst into a suspicious fit of coughing.

“Tempting,” said Theo, and his voice could have dried a lake. “But I can’t. What are you doing here, Daph?”

“I wanted to catch up with everyone,” she said, without batting an eyelash. “I haven’t seen these chaps since before the summer. Where have you been, anyway? I looked for you for— longer than a gentleman has any right to make a lady look.”

“That’s my fault, we got caught up. Crabbe wanted to have a word about the League.”

“He’s not joining, is he?” Daphne was astonished. “Vince?”

“Unclear. He said he’s ‘interested,’ which is the first time I’ve heard him utter the word, so I don’t really know what it means.”

“But he’s not political! Vince? Vince!”

“It’s not all politics,” said Theo sorely, as if this were the third or fourth incarnation of an argument. “It’s a social club, we have speakers and things. Honestly I thought you’d be happy for him, you’re the one always getting on his case about having no hobbies.”

“Drinking in stuffy rooms with old people isn’t a hobby, it’s a career,” said Daphne hotly, “and Vince hasn’t got the brains for politicking. He’ll insult someone’s wife by accident and end up in St. Mungo’s. It’s irresponsible to let him join.”

“Come and save him, then,” suggested Theo, leaning against the door. “We’re rounding up for the first meeting.”

“On the train?” said Hermione shrewdly. “Jumping the gun, aren’t you?”

He shrugged. “It’s easier to schedule when we’ve got everyone in one place. Anyway, are you coming, or not? You’re welcome too, Draco,” he added, nodding at him. “But Pansy suggested that your summer activities might incline you to spend your time elsewhere.”

Draco’s stomach gave a queasy flip.

Hermione took a sharp breath and stared at him. He wished she wouldn’t; on the one hand, it felt like she wasn’t giving him enough credit, and on the other, it felt like he was being forced to decide something critical and important whose nature he could not begin to name. Why couldn’t he just have all of what he wanted at once?

He waved his hand lazily at the door, as if he couldn’t be bothered to move from his seat. “I’m not walking the length of a train for your Parliament of Prats. If I wanted to be bored stiff, I’d go sit with the Ravenclaws.”

“Have it your way,” said Theo. His voice revealed nothing. He jerked his head at Daphne. “Seriously. Daph. Come on.”

“I’m not sitting with them,” she said.

“Then stand, damn you, or I’ll carry you. Everyone’s there, they’re waiting.”

“They wouldn’t sit with me before,” she said, in a hard voice. “I’m not going to sit with them now, just because they’re scared of you.”

There was a thin dark silence, like the ice in the center of a frozen lake.

Theo stepped back from the doorway. “Fine,” he said. “Fine. I — okay. Whatever. I don’t actually care. Sit with the rabble if you want. Hell, go live with them, apparently that’s what Draco’s doing.”

Ron gave a cry of outrage, but Harry was already on his feet.

“I reckon she was pretty clear, but maybe you’re so thick you need someone to spell it,” he said. “She doesn’t want to go. And we don’t want you to stay. That means you’re leaving, and she’s not coming with you.”

“Isn’t she?” said Theo crisply. “Isn’t she, now!” He turned to Daphne. “Should I tell them what you said about blood traitors at Beltane? Or will you do the honors?”

“Just go,” she said miserably. “Theo, I’m sorry. I can’t go to the meeting. I’ll — I’ll join next week or something.”

“Fine. Or don’t. I really couldn’t care less.”

Which would have been more convincing if he hadn’t slammed the door.

Hermione let out a long breath, and sagged into the wall.

“He’s not bad,” said Daphne in a small voice, to no one in particular. “He’s a good person. He cares a lot. He’s under a lot of stress now, that’s all.”

“Yeah, what could that be like?” said Harry. “I guess none of us would know.”

Draco snorted.

“They make me nervous,” said Hermione. She was watching the compartment door. A frown twitched her brows together. “I don’t know why.”

He frowned at her.

“They make me sick,” snarled Ron. He propped his chin in his hand and stared out the window, his face streaked by the shadows of raindrops. “‘Live with pigs.’ Posh little wanker trotting around like he owns everything. Just because his dad’s got a Ministry connection. My dad could’ve had a promotion whenever he wanted…”

“Don’t let them get to you,” said Hermione bravely. “You just can’t let them get to you, that’s all. That’s giving him what he wants.”

“I’ll give him what he’s asking for, one of these days,” Ron said darkly. “For me and for you.”

Draco folded his arms and slid back into his corner. Meanwhile Ron and Hermione exchanged a broken trapjaw of a smile, which left him feeling like a man standing outside of a warm cottage in the rain.

And we're back to Hogwarts.

-Daphne my beloved! We'll get more from her later. There are several asterisks by her name in my outline for this year.

-Oh, dear Hermione.

-I am completely confident that Hermione is the kind of girl who organizes her socks by material and day of the week. Draco is the kind of person to whom it has never occurred to use "organize" and "sock" in the same sentence. This is still an improvement over Harry and Ron, who are on distant terms with the word "organization" at all.

-As always, a metaphorical bouquet of extravagant roses to everyone who commented! Next chapter is "The Triwizard Tournament."

The Triwizard Tournament

Chapter 37: The Triwizard Tournament

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

The carriages rattled through thick gauntlets of mud, swaying in the wind. Through the mirrored darkness of the window, he watched Hogwarts swell out of the rain, its golden windows blurred into watercolor shine.

Lightning flickered behind Gryffindor Tower as the carriage shuddered to a halt at the foot of a huge stone staircase, which unfolded from an enormous pair of oak doors. Draco jumped down from the carriage, splattering mud, and held out his hand for Hermione, who had hesitated to climb down with an armful of cat. After some deliberation, she tucked the moaning Crookshanks under her robes, planted her hand in his, and hopped down.

“Evening, Hagrid,” Harry hollered. The giant groundskeeper stood by the doors, lantern aloft, to count the students as they hurried into the warmth behind him.

“All righ’, Harry?” Hagrid bellowed back, waving. “Goin’ ter get the firs’ years. See yeh at the feast if we don’ drown!”

“They can’t be going on the lake in this weather,” said Draco, horrified.

“It’s tradition!” said Harry cheerfully. “They’re all wet anyway.”

Draco shared a glance with Hermione, who silently shook her head at him, shrouded in her cape like a nun.

The Great Hall always seemed especially lustrous at the start-of-school feast. A host of floating candles poured light like melted gold light from a bespelled ceiling, the shining host plates and goblets catching the light on each long table, and festive garlands glittered on every window. After the storm, the dry warmth of the Great Hall enveloped them like a welcome embrace.

The Heads of House stood at the doors to the Great Hall, ticking them off on rosters. Draco caught the eye of Professor Snape, for whom a summer of sun and rest had done nothing but make him paler and more tired; he exchanged a nod with his godfather before reporting to Professor McGonagall, who was wearing a festive new red-feathered hat and a tiny gold Ireland pin.

“Draco Malfoy, Professor.”

“I know quite well who you are, Mr. Malfoy,” she said, with a hint of mischief. “And Mr. Potter. A belated happy birthday.”

“Thanks,” said Harry, grinning. “Er — you wouldn’t happen to know anything about a broom-polishing kit, would you, professor? One of my presents came without a note.”

McGonagall peered at him severely over her spectacles. “I know nothing of the sort. Of course, if you have a broom-polishing kit, you should endeavor to use it; old brooms require more care than new ones. But anyone would tell you the same. Miss Granger, hello, and I apologize for ignoring your letter about partial transfigurations — stop by my office tomorrow, I have an article I think would interest you.”

“Oh, thank you,” said Hermione rapturously, and Draco had to tow her into the Great Hall to stop her from starting a symposium right there in the doorway.

At the Gryffindor table, Colin Creevey had high hopes for his brother Dennis, who would be sorted that year.

“Got his letter in May! Two in a family! Isn’t that mad? And I told him Gryffindor was it! The place to be! The only place! Best house by a mile! This is the house that’s got Harry Potter in it! Oh! Hello, Harry!!”

A flashbulb snapped, and Harry, who had been wringing out his socks, gave a groan. “Not now, Colin, look at us.”

“Oh! Yeah! Course! Didn’t realize! Sorry!!”

Draco threw himself down and raked a wet coif of hair back from his forehead. “The other one had better get Hufflepuff,” he said grimly, “or I’m transferring to Durmstrang.”

“‘The house that’s got Harry Potter in it,’” muttered Ron, throwing himself down with bad grace. The bad mood had carried over from the train ride, understandably, since harsh rain and bitter cold were not known for softening tempers. “Yeah, no, a thousand years of wizarding history, a top quidditch team, four Head Boys in the past six years, but no, we’re Harry Potter’s house. No offense, Harry.”

“None taken. That guy sounds like an arse,” said Harry.

The first years were late that year, straggling in soaking wet and goggle-eyed with wonder nonetheless. To the disgruntlement of many, Dennis Creevey was Sorted in Gryffindor.

“Guess what! Guess what!! I fell in!” he announced, throwing himself into an empty seat. “It was brilliant! And something in the water grabbed me and pushed me back in the boat!”

“Cool!! That was probably the giant squid, Dennis! They feed first years to it, if you’re late to class.”

“Wow!” said Dennis. “Cool!!”

“Dennis! Dennis! See that boy down there? The one next to the brown-haired girl? See him? Know who he is? That’s Harry Potter!!”

Harry cringed and turned his head. Draco, on the other side of Hermione, cut a lazy salute at Dennis.

“No pictures, please,” he drawled. “It’s hard enough, saving the wizarding world, but I’m just trying to enjoy my evening like the rest of you."

Dennis' eyes turned wide as moons. "Sorry, Harry," he gasped, and whipped his head around to stare at his plate.

No sooner had the first course been cleared from the table than the doors to the Great Hall swung open again, and a clap of thunder sounded from the torrent outside. Draco, who had more important concerns related to achieving the ideal gravy-to-mashed-potato ratio on his fork, didn't look up until Hermione elbowed his ribs.

"Oi, look," said Ron, startled. "It's Mad-Eye."

Draco disengaged from his mashed potatoes in time to see the man silhouetted in the doorway. He threw back his hood and strode with military precision toward the teachers' table.

"What's he doing here?" wondered Hermione.

"Additional security?" suggested Draco.

"Doubt the Ministry would send Mad-Eye, if it were," said Ron absently. "He was in the Order of the Phoenix. Leftie as they come, but a bit of a crank. Bet Runcorn hates him. Dad says he's not popular."

"What's the Order of the Phoenix?" Harry wanted to know.

"A rogue militia, back in the war," said Draco quietly. "They fought Death Eaters. Hunted them."

"...Didn't the Ministry do that?"

"Ostensibly, but who knows," he said, flourishing his fingers in a don't-ask-me gesture. "The books describe most of the fighting as taking place between the Order and the Death Eaters."

Hermione turned to him. "Did the Ministry do anything to try to end the war?"

“One: yes, assuredly, but you can’t go running around committing government-sanctioned extralegal killings, so if your enemies can, it’s useful to leave some things to private enterprise. And anyway, for two: when you say things in that tone, it makes me hesitant to talk to you about them, because I worry you’re going to go blow up a building or something.”

“Maybe it needed blowing up,” she muttered.

He considered this, and admitted it was true.

Mad-Eye reached Dumbledore. He stretched out a hand that was as badly scarred as his face, and Dumbledore shook it, murmuring something inaudibly. He seemed to be making some inquiry, to which Mad-Eye shook his head and replied in an undertone. Then Dumbledore gestured to the empty seat on his side, and Mad-Eye sat down.

“May I introduce our new Defense Against the Dark Arts teacher?” said Dumbledore brightly into the silence. “Professor Moody.”

There was a slightly confused spatter of applause.

“He dropped out to teach?” said Harry, confused.

“I don’t think so,” Ron said, frowning. “Maybe he’s on sabbatical. I don’t remember. He’s only been working part-time at the Ministry recently, anyway.”

“What happened?”

“There was a scandal, I think. Don’t know if it ever came out just what... Dad would know.”

“We could just ask him,” said Hermione. “We’ll have him for Defense, after all.”

“You do that,” said Ron meaningfully. “He looks like he’d take a chunk out of me for trying.”

As the Feast wound to a close, the plates vanished from each table. Full and content, they turned with the others to the staff table, where Professor Dumbledore had risen. The buzz of chatter dimmed to a burble, and then a silence, as the headmaster took the podium.

“I will not erode your evening with overelaborate welcomes, though I must insist on my prerogative to issue one, most warmly, to all who return! I hold too great a respect for your time, as students, to deliver a commencement address that includes any but the most immediate points of import, for which I require a brief loan of your absolute attention.”

If anyone had been murmuring before, they stopped now.

“I remind you, as ever, that the Forbidden Forest — contrary to the beliefs of many — was not named ironically, and any students inclined to brave its depths should be wary of the dangers that lie there. The village of Hogsmeade, our neighbor, is similarly barred to all below third year. Filch begs me to remind you that he will enforce this rule with every instrument of punishment at his disposal, which — though he has been denied the pleasure of the thumbscrews — are nevertheless, if I do say so, quite sufficient deterrents. Thirdly,” he said, amidst rising titters, “the Inter-House Quidditch Cup will not take place this year.”

There were many loud and profane objections to this, and none more loud nor more profane than Harry’s, who had to be hauled down by his robes to prevent him from standing up in protest. Draco thought for a moment that real violence was going to break out. He considered joining in.

It was unfair, verging on cruel. Quidditch was one of his few hobbies that didn’t involve sitting at a desk and arguing with Hermione. Without it, he really did worry that they’d kill each other.

Ginny clung to George’s sleeve. “He’s joking, isn’t he? They can’t do that! I mean, it’s — it’s quidditch! Quidditch!”

“It doesn’t sound like he’s joking,” Hermione said happily. She was smirking like none had smirked before. She was smirking like she held a monopoly on the expression. She smirked like the smirking market was about to go up in flames, and she was liquidating all her stocks.

“Quiet, please,” said Dumbledore kindly, and in a ripple of what could only have been magic, the students’ protests broke off like someone had ripped out a speaker. “We have the honor of hosting an event of much greater importance this year, as for the first time in a century, we have been granted commission from the Ministry to hold it. I announce, therefore, with no small degree of gratitude and honor, that Hogwarts will be hosting the Triwizard Tournament this year.”

“Holy shit,” said Fred.

Belatedly, he remembered that the Great Hall was dead silent.

Laughter exploded from the Gryffindor table, dissipating the remains of the Silencing Charm. Professor Snape drew his wand to repeat the enchantment, his face a dour rictus of disapproval, and most of the faculty looked like someone had forced them to gargle a lemon. Professor McGonagall delicately lifted her nose.

A groundswell of chatter swelled in the wake of Fred’s announcement. Excitement surged through the Hall like an electric current. There was much whispering and speculation, largely positive, though there was no small amount of dismay — Marcus Flint, the Slytherin captain, was swearing furiously, which probably marked the first time in his life he shared common cause with Ginny Weasley.

Snape had to cast three more Silencing Charms before the assembly regained any semblance of decorum.

“The selection of the three champions will take place at Halloween. An impartial judge will decide which students are most worthy to compete for the Triwizard Cup, the glory of their school, and a thousand galleons."

Now there was no way to suppress the excited murmuring.

"I am sure every Hogwarts student is in some way worthy of the honor," Dumbledore said, which made Draco chuckle, he had to admit. "However, the heads of the participating schools, along with the Minister's delegation of tournament administrators, have agreed to impose an age restriction. Only students of seventeen years or older may put their names forward for consideration."

Fred and George groaned a duet: they were seventeen in April. Complaints broke out, but Dumbledore raised his voice above them. "This is a measure we feel necessary, given that the tournament tasks will require some of the most difficult magical handiwork any of you have ever done, and we are not so overrun with underclassmen that we feel the need yet to cull them. Please, for your own sake, do not attempt to enter; it will not work, and you should not want it to.

"The delegations from Beauxbatons and Durmstrang will arrive shortly. That is all," said Dumbledore politely. "Good night!"

Chairs scraped on the stone as a vast, slow-moving mass of chatter lumbered towards the oak doors. Throngs pooled in the antechamber, babbling excitedly about the announcement, while prefects tried in vain to corral them. It was somewhat strange not to have Percy Weasley peering down his nose and prattling endlessly about the architecture of the hallway; and indeed, Peeves seemed somewhat put out that his favorite target for water ballooning was gone. Draco thought, with a strange resonance, that at least half the people who had been at Hogwarts in his first year were gone, and thoughts of this strange changing-of-the-guard preoccupied him as they returned to the familiar grueling stairwells.

Ron and Harry were calculating how much quidditch gear you could buy with a thousand galleons. Hermione, who neither could nor would ever spend a galleon on quidditch, was rattling off facts about the Triwizard Tournament at top-speed, perhaps in the fear that someone else would get to them first.

“...and they used to invite other schools, Ilvermorny and Koldovstoretz and the ones from North and Central Africa, and the European schools, of course — what’s the German one called? It’s only called ‘tri’-wizard because the first one ever had three in it. They’ve gone back to those competitors now, for tradition I suppose, though it’s a shame — I’d just die to see how they did things at—” She said a word that Draco didn’t understand, with clicks in it. “But who do you think the champion will be? It’s likely a Ravenclaw, they tend to do best in exams… or a Slytherin, I imagine they’re the type to want the prize…”

“Yes, wanting a thousand galleons, a notorious Slytherin trait,” said Draco.

“You know what I mean. Eternal glory, ambition, cunning, those things. It’s not an insult.”

“Glory is a Gryffindor value,” he remarked, but she didn’t seem to hear him, for Ron had an epiphany.

“Hey! Angelina’s seventeen, she could do it! She’s a tough nut. Plus she’s got an O.W.L. in Charms.”

“I hope she doesn’t,” said Hermione fervently. “Champions have died during the Tournament before. I wouldn’t wish that on anyone. You don’t think they’ll make us watch, do you?”

“No, but you’d better, if Angelina gets it.”

“The best money is on Cassius Warrington, for what it’s worth,” he drawled, trotting the last few stairs.

“The Slytherin?” said Harry, betrayed.

“Naturally. He’s the new Head Boy. Top grades, top breeding, spotless record. It would help his career, and he’s got the skills. It makes sense.”

“He’s a bit of a prat,” said Hermione, tactfully.

This was undeniable. Cassius had a fervor for taking points and a scrupulous eye for dress code violations. Lavender Brown had once lost fifty points to him in a week.

“Even so. Dumbledore never said that the judges ruled on moral character. Personally, I wouldn’t want the Hogwarts champion to be some soft-hearted team player.”

“In that case, why not Marcus Flint?”

“First, because Flint thinks his fists are hammers and every problem is a nail, and second, you don’t have to be an utter toad to have an edge,” he said patiently. “Whoever goes in for Hogwarts ought to be properly ruthless.”

“That’s quite nearsighted, don’t you think?” she said thoughtfully. “You don’t even know what the challenges are. You’re assuming they’re going to be feats of athleticism or daring.”

“What else?”

“I don’t know, but there’s more to being a wizard than being good at magic.”

“A good wizard is by definition someone who’s good at magic,” he said, aggrieved. “That’s the whole point.”

A fire crackled in the common room, scattering light on the leather armchairs and dark wooden tables. Hermione and Ginny said goodnight and disappeared up to the girls’ dorm, while Draco, Ron, and Harry retreated to the same small room full of four-posters they had inhabited for three years.

A house-elf had lit a fire in the grate and left a warming pan between the sheets, so the bed was warm as a bed of sun-baked gossamer. He donned black pajamas and crawled under the coverlet, listening to the storm run itself ragged against the windows.

“I hope the twins find a way to get their name in,” Ron said sleepily, his voice coming soft through the dark. “They’d be bloody good. I bet they’d win the whole thing.”

“Go to sleep, Weasley,” said Draco, but he imagined it nevertheless. The Hogwarts banner flying over a crowd of devastated Frenchmen and Bulgarians, a silver cup the size of Dennis Creevey, overflowing with galleons; though in his imagination, the champion’s hair was not red, but white.

And the crowds were going hoarse for cheering, and Hermione, who was sitting in the front row, was surprised and envious, but smiling, as if she had to admit that after all, she had been wrong, and he had been right, he could do it, she had believed it all along — and as she came up to the stage, saying something about how brilliant he was, her hair flew in her face, and he knelt at the side of the podium to speak to her — when she brushed it back, she was still smiling, and he was smiling, too — and then the scene dissolved into a quidditch pitch, and he was flying, and with the typical thoughtless logic of dreams, he couldn’t remember where or what he’d been doing a moment ago.

He slept, in his warm corner of Gryffindor Tower, and for once he did not dream of monsters.

By the middle of September, one couldn’t last an hour inside the castle without hearing mention of the Tournament. Speculation about the nature of the champions’ tasks ran wild (Seamus Finnigan, whose uncle worked for the Ministry, claimed that there had been talk of manticore jousting, which the public received with unanimous and unqualified delight). Wilder still, however, ran speculation about the nature of the other schools. Where fact failed, the rumor mill hastened to supply. On different occasions, Draco heard it said that Beauxbatons was a delinquent school for troubled girls (no comment), a convent (untrue, and no comment), and a training program for young Veela (no comment, for the communications representative committed ritual suicide on the spot). Durmstrang, as Draco had suggested, caught a lot of flak for the crime of being somewhere cold and Soviet.

“That’s hardly fair,” he pointed out. “It’s just because they’ve got a share of unsavory alumni, which everyone does, including Hogwarts. And their academic program is robust. My parents considered sending me to Durmstrang.”

“Understandable. Counterpoint,” said Hermione. “Your parents did not, historically, consider the practice of the Dark Arts to be a complete deal-breaker.”

He gave an unkind laugh. One of the nearby Ravenclaws turned around and stared at him. He sobered up and scowled at the little swot until she squeaked and turned around again.

“Granted,” he said, sprinkling some doxy wings into their cauldron. “But they don’t teach Dark Arts, they teach about them. There’s a difference, though apparently the nuance is lost on some people.”

“Seems sort of dodgy.”

“Only if you consider ignorance a form of safety.”

She drizzled Essence of Murtlap in small concentric circles. “I’ve always wondered about why we call them the Dark Arts. As if ‘good magic’ and ‘bad magic’ are just different sorts of spells, and not fundamentally a question of how the wizard wields her power in relation to others… and it’s not as if any form of magic is inherently corrupt, is it?”

Their potion smelled like cinnamon and honey, and with the addition of the doxy wings had turned the color of hot chocolate. He prodded it with a stirring wand. “You’re asking me, or the Ministry?”

“Either,” she said, shooing his fingers away.

“Then no, it’s not. I’ve lived in a house full of Dark heirlooms for years, and it hasn’t done anything to me.”

“The opportunities for jokes here are unbearable.”

“Watch it. Anyway, Durmstrang hasn’t produced any more Dark wizards than Hogwarts. What they do produce more of is competent and high-ranking aurors, which should give us all something to think about. You think it’s done?”

“Yes. Let’s see if we can supersaturate it.”

“My thoughts exactly.”

Other classes proceeded with a sense of queer anticipation. In Defense Against the Dark Arts, Mad-Eye proved irascible and animated, full of what could only be described as a bloodthirsty joie de vivre, and impressed them all by demonstrating the Bat-Bogey Hex on Neville’s pet toad during the first lesson (“for morale,” or so he claimed, when Professor McGonagall chased him down the hallway bellowing about pedagogy). Arithmancy had progressed to first-order derivatives, which Draco only accepted because it freed him and Hermione from the tediums of Double Divination on Mondays, which Ron and Harry reported consisted mostly in gazing at a crystal ball and portending vaguely of one’s own doom, until you left, having secured the O, but depressed.

There was another difference between their schedules. On Tuesday mornings, instead of bundling up and crossing the lawns to the groundskeeper’s hut, they went to a sunny, cozy classroom on the second floor, near the Hufflepuff Common Room, where a smiling, large woman named Charity Burbage sat in a plush armchair and taught Muggle Studies. In fourth year, this mostly consisted of learning about electricity and some newfound muggle fruit called a McIntosh.

It took no more than the first day of Care of Magical Creatures to assure him of his choice. Ron and Harry came back with charred fingertips from handling Blast-Ended Skrewts.

“Hagrid asked for you,” Harry said, somewhat accusingly, as Hermione cast Episkey over his blistered palm. The skin stitched itself together and flushed to a healthy brown. “We told him you were sick.”

“And what did you do that for?” sighed Hermione, flipping his hand over to do the other side. “He’s going to find out eventually.”

“Tell him yourself, then! He was holding an explosive slug, I wasn’t going to tell him you’re not coming back.”

Draco leveled his quill at him. “Statements like that are why we dropped the class.”

“He’s our friend,” said Harry stubbornly. “He’s still finding his stride. He only just got his certification this summer.”

“It was no picnic, if you ask Charlie,” muttered Ron. He shuffled forward for Hermione to repeat the spell over his hands. “He’s not, er… academically-minded, is Hagrid.”

Draco threw up his hands. “Of course not. Why on earth would that be a quality you’d want in a teacher?”

On a Wednesday in late October, a gigantic rust-colored barn owl dropped in the middle of Draco’s omelet. It waddled over to Harry, who lit up with excitement.

“It’s from Padfoot,” he said. “And Moony. They’re in Egypt!”

Draco, surveying the fallen kingdom of his breakfast in gloom, failed to celebrate.

“‘The news about your scar is the latest in a series of strange rumors that have reached us here. If it hurts again, go straight to Dumbledore… they’re saying he’s got Mad-Eye out of retirement, which means he’s reading the signs, even if no one else is. We’re traveling north, so we won’t be able to write again for a bit. Our best to Ron, Hermione, and Draco.” He held it out to Hermione, who snatched it at once and began scanning for double meanings. “All our love,” he finished, somewhat thickly, “P and M.”

“You didn’t tell us your scar’s been hurting again,” said Ron.

“It isn’t. I mean — not much.”

“Damn. Does it have something to do with the Cup? All those Death Eaters together… say, you don’t think you’re psychic, do you, Harry?”

“Yeah, reckon so. Hang on, there’s one coming on now: Ronald Weasley, you are about to lose something dear to you, which you will never recover.”

He stole Ron’s cinnamon bun and popped it into his mouth.

“HEY!”

Draco peered at the letter over Hermione’s shoulder. “They’re coming north?”

She tilted her head so he could see better. “North could mean anything. If they’re in Egypt, ‘north’ means all of Europe.”

“Or they could be coming to Hogwarts,” Ron suggested, through a mouthful of Harry’s toast. “Trying to see Harry. They might think — oi! Easy!”

Harry had just pounded himself in the forehead.

“I’m an idiot!”

“I understand your disappointment, Potter, but you’ve got other good qualities,” said Draco, with great sympathy.

“I shouldn’t’ve told him! It’s made him think he’s got to come back!”

“Maybe,” he agreed. “Or maybe he’s just coming for the climate. Either way, Padfoot is his own man, and he’ll go where he pleases.”

“But there’s nothing wrong with me!”

“You’re very thoughtful, Harry,” said Hermione. “But whatever Sir—”

“Padfoot.”

“—whatever Padfoot does, thank you, isn’t your responsibility. He’s a fully grown man, and so is L— Moony. God, these names are stupid. Why couldn’t they have come up with better ones?”

“‘Mione,’” said Draco.

She pinked. “Shut up.”

“I think we should have cool nicknames,” said Ron thoughtfully. “Say, we’ve already done worse than they did. Bet they never broke the law.”

“They became animagi at thirteen,” said Hermione, deeply skeptical.

“So we’re a little behind, but not by much. Say, it’d be bloody cool to transform into an animal, innit? Wonder which I’d be. Hate to go through all that effort and get stuck as a rat or something.”

“You can choose,” said Draco, mopping pumpkin juice irritably. “It’s not like a patronus. I expect Wormtail chose his form so he could scout for them.”

“Blimey, how do you know that?”

“There’s this funny thing that happens when you open a book, Ronald, where your eyes start moving and information goes into your brain.”

“We talked to Professor McGonagall about it,” Hermione added, spoiling his quip. He gave her a look of betrayal as she passed the letter back to Harry. “She offers an elective on becoming an animagus to seventh years, but she won’t teach the method to anyone who’s not of age. I think she’s quite right, too, she makes it sound incredibly dangerous, and positively horrific if you get it wrong. She had pictures. Eugh.”

Those pictures had cured him of any desire to follow the Marauders’ footsteps. He shuddered.

“Well,” said Harry, “that just makes it metal.”

“It is metal,” agreed Ron, decisively, and took a bite of pumpkin-juice sodden toast.

Beauxbatons and Durmstrang arrived on an overcast evening in early October, and the school piled onto the lawns to watch.

Draco drew his cloak tighter about him in the crisp air, and jostled with the other tall students for a better view. Since none of them were exactly clear where they were meant to be looking, this meant a lot of friendly shoving in no particular direction, more or less to pass the time. The wind snaked around their ankles and raked its teeth over any bare inch of flesh.

“There!” shouted a sixth year, pointing.

The ground near the lake trembled and bulged. It shuddered. It frothed. The grass vanished under a tide of upturned dirt, which rose around the growing maw of a yawning crack in the ground. Students scrambled back from the crevice, shoving and climbing over each other in their haste not to fall into the gap. Several unlucky bystanders had to be Wingardium Leviosa'd to safety by a professor; one poor swot caught a Levicorpus.

Out of the crevice rose a tall black spire. It rose to a height of ten feet, then twenty, and then a cone of green-copper shingles emerged from the earth beneath it, rotating gently while the earth around it shuddered and quaked. At first, Draco thought it was a strange sort of metal tent, but when the lip finally crested over the earth he realized it was the roof of a carriage. Beards of ivy, somehow perfectly preserved despite their recent subterranean state, trawled over the metalwork and hung in flattering curtains around the windows, dotted with pink flowers. The windows glinted under a pearlescent blue sheen, and nary a speck of dirt clung to the immaculate white flank, as if someone had ripped the picture straight out of a vignette by the Brothers Grimm.

Ron couldn't resist elbowing Draco. "Do you see that? Look! It's enormous!"

Draco, who had hidden his hands in his sleeves like a monk to keep them warm, glanced cursorily up at the carriage and snorted. The snort turned to fog. "Tacky," he said. "Filch will spend a myriad repairing the turf."

"The turf! Where's your sense of childish wonder?"

"I lack a sense of 'childish' anything," said Draco, a child.

Indeed, the doors to the carriage had swung open, and people had begun to spill forth from within. At the front of the crowd stood a tall, lightly muscled woman with pale hair in a receding half-moon hairline, tamped down to her scalp under a suffocating lacquer of gel. Sometime in her clearly numerous years, her bodily reserves of fat and muscle had resigned from poor working conditions. She was a woman of some age, but handsome enough, if you were into giants and also skeletons.

"That'll be Beauxbatons, then."

“How can you tell?”

He jumped. “Where did you come from?” he demanded of Hermione, who had materialized at his elbow.

“The library,” she said breathlessly.

“You were doing Runes without me?”

“Not Runes,” she said impatiently. “Another thing. Who’s the tall woman?”

“The Beauxbatons headmistress. Olympe Maxime.”

Behind her trailed an ordered line of students from Beauxbatons. They were shivering, which wouldn’t have been surprising except that it revealed nobody had told them to wear more than a silk shawl on a visit to Scotland in October. Their uniforms were identical sets of cornflower blue, with pleated skirts for the girls and white pants for the boys. The boys wore busboy caps, and the girls wore cloche hats.

Dumbledore and Madame Maxime traded a few words, and then she made a lazy, indolent, well-go-on-then gesture at her students, and they started up towards the castle. Filch hurried forth to guide them, his lantern aloft in the dimming twilight.

“Aw, piss,” sighed Ron. “I thought we’d get to talk to them.”

“There’ll be plenty of time for fraternization. I imagine they’re just as eager as we are to get out of this bloody cold.”

“Oi, who’s ‘fraternizing’? I want them all to eat it in the Tournament. I’d just like to meet them first, is all.”

A small smile bent Draco’s mouth. “Even if our champion is a Slytherin?”

“Scratch that, disclaimer: if Warrington’s champion, I’m transferring.”

“You wouldn’t possibly,” said Hermione, yawning. “They don’t have a quidditch team, Beauxbatons. You’d be miserable… although honestly, that might be better for you and Harry’s grades. Do you hear that?”

“Between your prattle and the sound of my own teeth chattering, I can actually hear very little,” said Draco.

“Shut up, then,” Hermione said absently, cocking one ear. “Listen, I think there’s something coming from the lake.”

She was right. Down by the shores of the lake, the air shimmered like a heat mirage over black-top, only it couldn’t have been heat, since the temperature dipped closer and closer to freezing with every moment. A strange humidity weighed the air, turning every hair on Draco’s arms upright. Static skittered along his clothes.

A neon black line opened in midair, like a wound in the universe. It sprouted a second dimension and swelled to a black square, approximately two meters tall and across, sending billows of wind across the lake. Small bursts of lightning sparked and fizzled out on the edges. It remained there, suspended a few inches above the ground, unchanging for the better part of the minute. As the seconds ticked by, Draco worried that something had gone wrong.

Then a black dragonhead mast glided out of the void. It was long, gleaming lacquered wood, with teeth carved from whalebone and a body that wrapped seamlessly into the head of a ship.

The vessel was a love letter from Gothic splendor to baroque extravagance, written in a beautiful and ornate hand: a rail of wrought-iron lattice, sculpted into the shape of flowers and plants and small animals, rimmed the dark slate of the deck, atop which rested four vast sails so white they almost glowed green through the fog. Smoky silver glass rimmed the cabins, and ornamental struts of age-tarnished gold formed clawed feet from which the rigging protruded. Up and among these riggings climbed a hundred animated skeletons, skittering here and there to bring the ship into dock.

An anchor in the shape of a whale's skull tumbled from the side, and then a plank lowered like an outstretched blade to the beach.

A man marched out. He was small, but the sleightness of his build was somewhat hidden under the enormous ruff of his mantle, which pooled at his ankles in a foam of red and black. He wielded a long dragon's-head cane whose point seemed a fair bit sharper than any walking stick should require.

Behind Karkaroff, the students of Durmstrang had dressed in similarly appropriate winter wear, hidden under fur coats and thick leather cloaks. Many of them wore tall coonskin hats. Unlike the Beauxbatons students, they appeared in more or less good spirits, and chattered amicably to each other as they filed out of the ship (which must have been bigger on the inside, or else the students of Durmstrang were very well-acquainted with each other). Some of them were laughing. A couple pointed at Hogwarts and gave audible exclamations of delight, as in: My God! That's a big castle!

"Dumbledore!" said the headmaster, shrilly. "How are you? Are you well? I'm wretched. I hate traveling. One of my students threw up on the ship."

"A crime of passion, no doubt," said Dumbledore serenely.

"I would have turned him into a dormouse," said the headmaster grimly, "but your man at the Ministry was very clear about the restrictions of British law. Well? Shall we stand here and stargaze, or will you invite us in?"

Dumbledore stepped aside, and Karkaroff stalked into the light cast by the open doors to the Great Hall. He paused, and snapped his fingers at the crowd of Durmstrang students behind him. "Hello! Come! Bez provolochek, Viktor!"

A student hurried out of the crowd. He was swarthy and short, almost drowned in the thick overcoat of his school uniform, but when the wind raked back his hood it revealed a short crop of black hair and a face that drew gasps from the crowd of Hogwarts students.

Ron gave a war cry. He shook Harry's arm.

"Harry!"

"Yeah! I know! I saw him!"

"What is it?" demanded Hermione, whaling on Draco's cloak. "I can't see! Did something happen?"

"No," said Draco, who was so distracted he forgot to be annoyed at her. "That's Viktor Krum."

"Oh," she sighed. "I thought it was someone interesting."

The doors to the Great Hall swung closed with a thunderous creak. The staff followed the students to their seats, herded in file by Dumbledore, Maxime, and Karkaroff. At the sight of Madame Maxime, the delegation from Beauxbatons jumped to its feet with a great scraping of benches and shuffling of feet.

(Both Hogwarts and Durmstrang found this move to be a rank bit of lick-arse, and the collective groan of irritation was shared.)

The Beauxbatons delegation took no notice, and did not sit until their headmistress had assumed her seat to Dumbledore's right. Karkaroff flanked him at left. A fourth chair remained empty to the right of Madame Maxime, and halfway through the meal it was occupied by, of all people, a harried Barty Crouch.

Along with the regular fare, the kitchens had seen fit to prepare an additional variety of foreign foods for their guests. A vat of some shellfish stew sat next to a casserole dish of aubergine. Puffed and golden-brown pastry sandwiches rose in a pyramid from a large platter to Draco's left, while a tray of roasted snails sat untouched between enormous tins of shepherd's pie.

When they had eaten their fill, Dumbledore rose from his seat.

"Hello! Welcome! I extend you all my warmest thanks for coming, both on my own behalf and that of the school.

"A word about the Tournament before selection begins. There will be three tasks, spaced throughout the school year, and they will test the champions in many different ways. One champion will be reaped from each of the participating schools. They will be marked on how well they perform each of the Tournament tasks and the champion with the highest total after task three will win the Triwizard Cup. The champions will be chosen by an impartial selector: the Goblet of Fire."

He nodded at the casket. Wandless, without so much as an incantation, the lid slid back and a large white goblet rose from its depths, its bowl hewn from an ivory so pale it could have been bone. But short of a giant's skull, there was no creature large enough to yield a bone that could be carved into a goblet this size: it would require manipulation of the sort that even Hermione struggled to master.

"Ahem," said Dumbledore, and blue flames erupted out of the cup.

Gasps ricocheted around the chamber. Draco wasn't altogether impressed — conjuring flames was relatively easy, especially if one wasn't too picky about the quantity or where they went after you made them.

"All students of age seventeen or older wishing to submit themselves for consideration must write their name and school clearly upon a slip of parchment and drop it into the goblet," said Dumbledore. "Aspiring champions will have two weeks in which to put their names forward. At the end of that week, the Goblet will return the names of the three it has judged most worthy to represent their schools. The Goblet will be placed in the entrance hall tonight, where it will be freely accessible to all those wishing to compete.

“Both I and the Ministry wish to impress upon all of you that this tournament is not to be entered lightly. Once a champion has been selected by the Goblet of Fire, they are obliged to see the tournament through to the end. The placing of your bid constitutes a binding magical contract. There can be no change of heart once you have entered your name. Please be very sure, therefore, that you are wholeheartedly prepared to compete before you submit your name. Good luck to you all, and may you judge wisely what you do.”

The students from the other schools filtered out of the Great Hall, shepherded by their respective headmasters.

Crouch remained and sipped from a small cup of coffee. To his right, Mad-Eye Moody was staring at him with the most furious frown he’d ever seen on a member of the faculty, and he’d seen Professor McGonagall after Slytherin won the House Cup.

“What’s his problem, I wonder?” said Hermione.

“Who knows,” said Harry.

“Who cares?” said Ron. “Draco, look. Warrington’s putting his name in.”

This was indeed enough to distract Draco from the staff table. Cassius Warrington had crossed the hall and was approaching the Goblet. A knot of fellow Slytherins stood off to the side, cheering him on. He got caught behind one of the boys from Durmstrang, who trotted up to the cup, dropped his name in, and strolled away. When Warrington succeeded, the Slytherins gave a little cheer.

“What are the twins doing?” Hermione said sharply. Fred and George had lined up behind Warrington, and both held slips of paper in their hand. “They can’t, they’re not seventeen!”

“Tell that to them,” said Harry.

The twins were next in line. They linked arms, grinned at each other, and lifted their hands together to drop their names into the cup. But as their hand passed over the blue flames, they let out a twin cry — Ron half-rose out of his seat, startled — and snatched their hands back. Nearby students shouted and recoiled from the sight: their fingers had shriveled, the nails split and crumbling away from blackened beds, the skin charred to cinder-gray.

“I believe it was made clear,” said Mad-Eye, cutting across the chatter in a loud voice, “that supplicants to the title of champion were to be of an age no less than seventeen.”

The twins whispered frantically at each other, scurrying away from the Cup. Hermione made a harsh sound of disapproval.

“That’s horrid,” she said. “I can’t believe the Ministry approved any of this.”

“Yeah, it’s awful,” said Ron distractedly. “Hey, can any of you see where Krum went? I want to see if we can get his autograph.”

“I’m serious! This is dangerous! They could’ve been hurt! Who lays down that kind of enchantment in a school for children? I want to have a word with Mr. Crouch.”

Draco was watching the upper table. Crouch had stood up and was talking to Mad-Eye Moody in low tones. Neither of them looked happy. Crouch gestured at the Gryffindor table, and Mad-Eye’s eye swiveled to surveil it while he continued to argue with Crouch. Draco glanced away, to the Goblet, where a group of Beauxbatons students were standing on tiptoe to put in their names.

Constant vigilance.

“Why now?”

“Hm? What do you mean?”

He nodded at the Goblet. “Over a hundred years since the last Triwizard Tournament, and they bring it back now. Why? Dumbledore wouldn’t put it forward. Neither of the other headmasters seem too happy about it, either.”

“It’s a game,” said Harry simply. “Don’t they want to compete?”

“No,” said Hermione suddenly. “I understand. You’re making a point about — the timing, politically.”

He jerked his head in a nod. “What does the Ministry want to say about Hogwarts?” he said quietly. “What does it mean that we’re hosting? It’s a disruption, an academic distraction, and as you said, it’s dangerous—”

“You’re thinking too much,” said Ron idly. “It’s a tournament. The competition is the point. It proves you’re the best.”

Draco stared at him.

“You know, Weasley, sometimes I wonder what could happen if you kept your brain activated all the time, instead of just taking it out for walksies every blue moon.”

“What? What’s that supposed to mean?”

“You said it exactly. The competition is the point. It proves you’re the best.” He pointed his chin at Cassius Warrington, who was holding court with a group of Slytherin upperclassmen. “And when the best looks like that?”

It would be all over the Daily Prophet. He’d make headlines even if he didn’t win, but if he did, it would be all anyone could read about: Warrington Heir Wins First Triwizard Title in a Century. The Pride of Slytherin Strikes Gold. There would be interviews and sponsorships, and a photograph of Cassius Warrington, a strapping blond Slytherin

Head Boy, shaking the Minister's hand, plastered across every flat surface in Britain.

"There's no reason to assume the Hogwarts champion will be a pureblood," said Hermione. "You're assuming one will. Most students here don't have pedigrees, you know. Angelina's a halfblood."

"No. I'm saying the Ministry is assuming it'll be a pureblood, for reasons that I'm certain I don't have to explain to you."

Her expression changed. She worked her jaw furiously, as if trying to break the argument between her teeth. "I understand," she said finally, "but surely they couldn't — it's incredibly dangerous! I understand some people at the Ministry don't really care about — I'm not delusional, I know it's not as though they all — but aren't they worried about their own children getting hurt?"

Someone needs to fix Hogwarts… It used to be the greatest wizarding school in the world.

"It's about tradition," he said.

"Tradition," she said, as if it tasted sour. "The pureblood tradition of having children get hacked to pieces for a thousand galleons and a made-up title."

"You wouldn't get it," he said absently. He almost envied her for that.

She threw down her fork and stood up. "Yes," she snapped, "as you've made me very aware before, there are a number of things I don't get about your stupid brainless 'pureblood traditions,' because I'm not born into it. And by the way, in the real world, things like child endangerment and neglect are crimes. I think the truth is that there are a hundred things about the way you live that just don't make sense if you happen to give a damn about other people!"

His head whipped around. He could feel the force of her anger, like a physical heatwave, leaving his face was tingling and numb.

“I didn’t mean that,” he said, feeling rather like he was staring at the crunched remains of a teacup he’d just stepped on. She kept fuming at him, obviously unconvinced. “And what do you mean, ‘the real world’? This is real.”

“Then don’t — don’t—” Her hands spasmed, as if she wasn’t sure whether she wanted to rip out her hair or his. “Don’t talk to me like that,” she snapped.

“Like what?”

“Like it’s — you know — some sort of chore to explain things to me. Like you’re so exhausted with telling me things you had the good luck to be taught growing up. Well, I’m sorry to bother you with it, you know, I don’t like feeling like I’m stupid, but I sleep about four hours a night trying to read as much as I can so I don’t bother anybody with questions about things they already know, so maybe I’d like someone to treat me like I’m not an idiot for not— for not—”

She realized, perhaps for the first time, that many people were listening to her. Draco was stunned silent, his mouth parted.

“Never mind. That was — I’m sorry. That was stupid. I didn’t — I shouldn’t.” She snatched up her bag. “Forget I said anything. I’m going to the library” she muttered, and fled.

“Hermione!” Harry stood up and glared at him. “What’d you do that for?”

“I didn’t do anything,” he said, shell-shocked. “I didn’t — not on purpose.”

“Ah, she’ll be alright by tomorrow,” sighed Ron. He idly hit Draco’s shoulder and stretched for the ceiling, twisting his wrists together. “Let her sleep it off. She’s been pulling double hours at the library. She’ll be sorry for snapping at you, mate, you’ll see. Though,” he added, “you could stand to be a little nicer to her.”

From Ron, who called Hermione a know-it-all at least once a week, and had veered into much worse during what Harry once called the Great Rodent War of 1993, this was something like receiving advice on dental care from a mountain troll. “Nicer?” said Draco, baffled and irritated. He was nicer to Hermione than he was to virtually anyone in his life, up to, and possibly including, his mother. He thought that, based on his regular standard, she ought to be aware of her own privileged status. “I don’t think she’s stupid, she bloody well knows that.”

“Beside the point, innit,” sighed Harry. He slung his bag over his shoulder. “I’m practically muggle-born, and she trounces me in everything, anyway, so it’s not like anyone can say I know more than she does. Ron’s a pureblood but he doesn’t give a rat’s arse for tradition, and she trounces him, too — sorry, Ron. But she still worries, doesn’t she? It’s not Hermione if she’s not tearing her hair out over something. And then at the Cup, with the Death Eaters and the Dark Mark, she gets a nice ugly reminder of everyone who wants her out.

“And then you come around, practically the most pureblood-est pureblood-y pureblood anyone ever dreamed up, with the white hair and the Eton sneer and everything, and she spends about half her waking hours trying to beat you just to prove she can, and you wonder why it means something different when you say she’s not good enough?” Harry shrugged. “I dunno. Wasn’t all that confusing to me.”

Draco, wordless, had nothing better than the truth: “I never said that.”

Then, belligerently: “How on earth do you know all that? Did she tell you?”

The idea of Harry being Hermione’s confidante in anything was unseemly. Using Harry Potter, lover of beasts, quidditch, and not one book ever written, as a source of wisdom reflected a dearth of choices that verged on tragicomic.

“No, but it’s not exactly a puzzle, is it,” said Harry exasperatedly. “Merlin, you’re bright until you’re thick. Don’t you listen to her?”

“Of course I listen to her,” he said coldly. “Far more than you.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?” said Ron, bizarrely angry, because they both knew damn well it was true. Draco could list things about Hermione that would make both of their heads spin; he could cite theses for her papers, chain-cite the bibliography of her summer reading list, rattle off the music she listened to when she folded laundry. He had more datum in his brain about Hermione Granger than either of them could pool with Gryffindor House, and the implication otherwise was a cold insult of the sort he’d normally demand satisfaction for.

Harry waved his arms between them, windmilling for peace. “Oi! Stop it! We’re at quota. One row a day.”

Ron huffed. “Makes us sound like right arses,” he muttered. “Course we listen to her.”

Perhaps he hadn’t given them enough credit, Draco thought, as they climbed the stairs to Gryffindor Tower in silence.

Well. —Not Ron. Ron was still suspended on paper-thin ice. But it was with a deep pang of discomfort that he acknowledged the things Harry had seen and he had not. He would never have admitted as much, on pain of death, had the proof not been tasted in the proverbial pudding: Harry hadn’t been surprised by Hermione’s outburst, while for one terrifying moment Draco had looked at her like a stranger, not knowing her at all.

Sorry for the tension! It wouldn't be fourth year if there weren't a little bit of angst. Fourth year is Hermione's Big Year. She's done taking everyone's nonsense. Fifteen-year-old girls are brave and terrible.

-dennis is mildly surprised to discover that harry potter is a blond, but that is the extent of his thought on the matter. big of heart and dumb of ass: the creevey boys story

-draco: oh you know, durmstrang isn't so bad, my parents would've sent me there

-hermione: your parents? your parents, the death eaters? those parents?

Up next: Chapter 38: "Four Names." Coming events: an interaction between Cho Chang and Ginny Weasley; a small row (unrelated); and a manifesto.

Four Names

Chapter 38: Four Names

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

The next day was Saturday, and so Draco would have ordinarily laid in until half eleven, marinating in the heat from the fireplace and his feather coverlets. Instead, he dressed at nine while the others slept. The dorm smelled of coffee and woodsmoke, and rain trilled merrily against the windows, a mild-mannered shower of late autumn, turning the lake to glittering diamonds and paving a layer of fog on the lawns.

With some regret, he left it, and went instead to the one place that would be empty as a graveyard on Saturday morning.

The doors to the library were ajar. Hermione always sat in the same place. It was a table in the Transfiguration section, under a round east-facing window, where sunrise drenched the whirling dust motes in gold, and the metal bindings on the books gleamed and glinted seductively on their plush leather spines. The table was engraved with the loquacity and carelessness of generations of students, epithets scrawled in Irreversible Ink and simple childish carvings, A + F in a heart enclosed, foul words, fouler curses, vows to perform acts sublime and unnatural with the reader's mother, all covered by the canopy of Hermione's Arithmancy homework.

He set his book down first, to test the waters. It made a soft thunk on the table. She didn't look up.

He sat down, crossed his legs, and opened the book.

His advantage in this was the knowledge that, though he had virtually no patience whatsoever, she had even less.

"You just missed him."

“Hm?” he said, as if he had been here for hours.

“Krum,” she said. She scrawled something, flipped back a page to check something else, and added another line. “He was just by. Along with his fan club. I’m sure he’s still around, if you’d like to meet him.”

He would. She knew that. It was beside the point, however.

“I’m not here for Krum.”

“Hmph,” she said. She signed something with a scribble and turned the page over.

“What are you working on?”

“None of your business.”

“If it’s the Arithmancy, I already finished it. You can have a look.”

“That’s cheating.”

“It’s collaborative learning,” he said. “Also, you give Potter your Potions homework every week.”

She sat up and put her quill down. “That’s beside the point. Harry tries, he and Ron just need a boost.”

“You coddle them.”

Narrowed eyes. If her anger had a meter, it would have slipped from green to yellow. “Coddling? I have to yell myself hoarse to get them to even look at the homework.”

“And the fact that you’re yelling yourself hoarse doesn’t tell you anything, vis-a-vis: coddling?”

She scowled. “You help Ron with his Potions, too.”

“Sure. I answer the questions he asks me. And only when those questions aren’t ‘hey Malfoy, what’s the answer.’ There’s a difference.”

“If you say so,” she muttered, in the put-upon way that meant she did not care to hear anything else that disagreed with her, and he suppressed a twinge of irritation. She could be impossible. She was being impossible, and a little bit on purpose, if he wasn’t wrong. Ridiculous witch.

He leaned out and snatched the top paper from her stack. “So. Let’s have a look—”

“No—!”

“—addressed to Madam Portia Magnussen, the Chairwoman of the Allegiance for Muggle-Born Wizards, Order of Merlin, Third Class — Granger, you’re not applying for a job, are you?”

“No!” She snatched it back and ferreted it away into her bookbag as if he'd read her bank information. “And I’ll thank you not to snoop!”

“Then what are you doing? They don’t take underage applicants.”

She slammed her hands on the table. Papers scattered. He caught a page of Arithmancy before it escaped into dusty oblivion.

“I know! It’s maddening! Why on earth would you restrict membership just to adults? Most of the difficulties of being muggle-born start at school, where you haven’t got the same resources as everybody else, so what’s the bloody good of starting an organization once your education’s over?”

He fell silent. There were some things it was better not to touch, and on a scale from cashmere to hot stoves, this subject was a flobberworm. If he hit it from the wrong angle, he could end up pitched into last night’s argument.

He still didn’t understand what he was supposed to say there. That everything was alright? That blood status didn’t make a difference, to him or anyone else? Neither of those things were true.

“Well, anyway,” she said, suddenly withdrawn, “I thought it was time someone tried to fix that. I thought — you know, enough complaining! I don’t want to be one of those people who sits around feeling sorry for herself when nobody helps her. So instead of any more whinging about how hard things are for muggle-borns — you know, all that stuff that nobody cares about anyway — I did something about it.”

She pushed a stack of papers across the table. Draco flipped up the top sheaf and read:

THE SOCIETY FOR THE CULTIVATION AND RECREATION OF UNDERPRIVILEGED AND MUGGLE-BORN YOUTH

A MANIFESTO IN EIGHT PARTS, AN APPENDIX, AND A POSTSCRIPT

The postscript alone was seventeen pages.

“You wrote this?”

“Yes.” She leaned forward on her elbows, smirking with commingled pride and embarrassment. More pride, though. With Hermione, it was almost always more pride.

“Good Lord, when?”

“I’ve been sneaking up to the library as often as I can,” she admitted, “which hasn’t been often as I’d like, between classes and this stupid tournament, everything’s been so crowded — but I’ve got the manifesto down, and there are an order of badges on the way. I’ve filed a permit with McGonagall, and S.C.R.U.M.B.Y. will have our first meeting in October.”

He looked up. “You’re not serious.”

His fondest hopes for her to be joking were quashed by her stony expression.

“‘Scrumby’?”

“It’s S.C.R.U.M.B.Y.,” she said impatiently. “It stands for the Society for the Cultivation and Recreation—”

“I know what it stands for,” he said, gesturing pointedly with the melee weapon she’d penned. “But — Granger — and listen to me, here—”

“Yes?”

“Why on earth didn’t you just call it the Allegiance for Muggle-Born Wizards?”

“Because they wouldn’t give me permission for licensing,” she snapped. “I wrote to them weeks ago explaining what I wanted to do, and they said they didn’t allow student chapters!”

“Maybe they haven’t finished reading the manifesto yet.”

“No, it’s because they don’t want to be affiliated with Hogwarts!” She stabbed her finger at the manifesto. “They said the Ministry doesn’t let private organizations recruit at schools with government funding, and Hogwarts only permits student-led clubs, which I’d have been fine with if I didn’t know it was the most bollocksing bloody tripe I’ve ever heard, because that stupid League for Special Purebloods or whatever it is was started only last year! But the Allegiance is already scared to death of the Ministry cracking down on them, no thanks to your friend Nott, so instead I’ve had to do it all myself, and without a lick of help!”

It was vaguely strange, hearing her use ‘we’ in a sense that didn’t include him. On some level, of course, he knew that it wasn’t his affair, and that he oughtn’t care less about whether or not there was a muggle-born society, but he had no idea what to say about it that wasn’t some flavor of condescending or trite.

“Well,” he said stiffly, “how’s recruitment, then?”

She flushed. “I — I mean, I haven’t really started recruiting yet. But — as it stands — three.”

“That’s— wait, who?” He ran back the register of muggle-borns he knew. For reasons various, it wasn’t a long list. “It can’t be Potter and Weasley, they’re not muggle-born.”

“You don’t have to be!” she said hurriedly. “Anyone’s welcome! I’m hoping to recruit lots of people. Also, Hogwarts rules say you can’t exclude people on the basis of blood purity — in either direction. I was actually planning to ask you and Harry and Ron, after I finished edits on the manifesto—”

“You haven’t answered the question,” he interrupted. “Who’s two and three?”

“Colin and Dennis Creevey,” she said reluctantly.

He stifled a guffaw.

“Oh, go on, laugh it up, why don’t you—”

“The Gryffindor Paparazzi? And his brother, Squidbait?”

“They’re nice boys!”

“They’re about nine years old.”

“So they need a lot of help!”

“Like baby kittens. Never mind, I’m sure they’re wonderful. Listen. Do you think that enlistment numbers might change if — spitballing, don’t mind me — you named it something other than ‘Scrumby’?”

She hauled the manifesto away from him, glowering. “Never mind. I shouldn’t have told you about it.”

“Hey. Hang on, hello, Granger,” he said sharply, sitting up. “I’m not making fun of the idea.”

“No, you think it’s stupid.”

“Don’t put words in my mouth.”

“I don’t need to. The ones already in there are worse.”

“I resent that. Give me some credit. Here, I—” He was, distantly, starting to worry. The conversation was slipping precipitously from good-natured ribbing to pressure on a bruise. “Give it back,” he said, impulsively. “I’ll read it.”

She greeted this with the shock it was due. The thing was bigger than a volume of Bagshot.

“You’ll read my manifesto?”

“Why not,” he said, with distant fatalism. There was a part of his brain banging a gong labeled BAD IDEA, WILL REGRET, but his wild impulses put it down mercilessly with a headshot. “You’ll need line edits, won’t you? I’ve seen your Charms essays, remember. Someone has to prune down all those em-dashes.”

She smiled at him, first hesitantly, and then breathlessly when she saw he meant it, with teeth and dimples and everything. Suddenly he found it very difficult to keep his expression neutral, and so he tried to sober himself with thoughts of the new voluminous addition to his workload. It didn’t work, and he had to turn his head away and pretend to cough into his arm.

After that, she was in a much better mood. She prattled to him about the Arithmancy homework, and didn’t bring up anything about their argument from dinner; he got the distinct sense, watching her steam unerringly through four minutes of monologue about second-order derivatives, that she, too, was slightly embarrassed by it, and saw it as a topic best drowned out with math. He could not have agreed more if he tried.

He was pleased, all in all, that things had returned so swiftly to normal, and for the trouble of only a few days' hard reading. Trust Hermione to be sensible.

When they finally found their way down to the entrance hall for breakfast, there were dozens of people milling around, some eating toast or sipping carafes of coffee, and examining the Goblet of Fire. It sat on the stool in the Great Hall that normally held the Sorting Hat.

"Has anyone put their name in yet?" Hermione asked Ginny.

The girl was wearing a plum-purple 'G' sweater, Molly Weasley's handiwork, and ratty corduroy pants. She yawned and shoveled sleep-tangled hair out of her face. "Everyone from Durmstrang. They got up in a line and did it earlier this morning. And from Beauxbatons, there were these two boys with weasel familiars, and this one tiny girl—"

"Fascinating, don't care," said Draco. "Who from Hogwarts?"

"Angelina just did," she said, indicating where the tall chaser leaned against the wall, chatting with Fred. She had done her hair in a different kind of braids this year, and was surrounded by a small hemisphere of worshipful Gryffindor underclassmen, who venerated her for her quidditch skills and the mere prize of being older. "She's got the best chance, I reckon."

He sized her up. Angelina had the advantages of height, strength, and athletic build, which would help her in physical challenges, and certainly any that involved flying. Anyway, she was friendly and ferociously competitive, frankly a much better sport than Oliver, but tolerated no nonsense and had an iron nerve. Everyone had thought she would make captain this year, now that Oliver was gone.

Her disadvantages, compared to these, were few: she lacked N.E.W.T.s in some of the thornier subjects, like Potions and Runes, which might come up as puzzles or challenges in the Tournament. She wasn't a prefect — she was part of Fred and George's gang of friends, so effectively disqualified, anyway — and aside from quidditch, she hadn't set herself apart as a student. She wasn't like Katie, who had a reputation for dressing wild and acting wilder; she was cool, competent, and wonderful at minding her own business, which in Draco's book was a cardinal virtue, but it meant not many people outside of Gryffindor knew her. Still, the Goblet wasn't a popularity contest.

"If it's her versus Warrington, I think she'll win," said Hermione. "Fred says she's top of her class in Charms."

"God, I hope it's not Warrington," said Ginny. "Imagine wearing green. I think I'd root for Durmstrang, wouldn't you?"

They fetched toast and tea and milled around watching students try their hand. A few more tried to cross the age line, without success, but by the time the hour bell tolled noon the only student to rival Angelina or Warrington was a Ravenclaw named Rogier Davies, the quidditch captain, a man with nearly as many acolytes as Oliver Wood. With him was Cho Chang, who spotted Harry across the hall and — Ron groaned — walked quickly over to talk to him.

"Hiya, Harry! Gosh, you look like you didn't sleep at all!"

Harry politely snorted some of his tea back into his mug and smiled blearily. "Potions essay," he said, at which Draco choked, because the liar had never lost sleep over Potions in his life. He'd been up scheming to get Krum's autograph with Ron.

"Wow! Boring!" said Cho. "I dunnae how you did homework after last night! Viktor Krum, Harry! I spent like an hour trying to figure out how to corner him without the entourage. I'm gonna get him to tell me how he did that Pincer move, if I have to hunt him down with a dart gun, I am toh-ta-lly serious."

“That’s brilliant,” said Harry, sounding concussed.

“Aren’t you in Ravenclaw?” Ginny said irritably. “Aren’t you supposed to like homework?”

Cho shrugged at her, guileless as a clear lake. “I dunno. We’re not like, the House of the Honor Roll. I’m just pure curious about things, I guess. I get mad into them, I’ll read three books in a day, but put me in class an’ I can’t focus for piss. I’m about quidditch, now,” she added, “but as a tyke, it was football and rugby. Mum’s a muggle, she played as a kid.”

“Wicked,” said Harry breathlessly.

Ginny’s face was pinching into an ever-tighter knot. She glowered at Cho as if she had been caught red-handed in the murder act, and at Harry for aiding and abetting it, but unfortunately, neither of them seemed to notice, having drifted into their own universe of chatter about quidditch plays.

“Doesn’t Cedric look handsome today, Hermione?” she announced, as if she wished all of Ravenclaw Tower to know about it.

Hermione looked like a startled deer.

“I… suppose? He’s, er… not really my type.”

“Your ‘type’?” What was her ‘type’ supposed to be, anyway? Besides leatherbound and Harvard style?

“I — not really — I obviously haven’t a lot of experience,” she said, turning pink.

“Have you any experience?”

Ginny mowed them both down on her warpath. “He’s terribly pretty, isn’t he? His hair’s perfect, like you said. It’s all neat,” she said, hitting her consonants percussively, “and well-combed.”

“You said his hair was perfect?”

Hermione was wringing the handle of her bag like it was Ginny’s neck. “I said ‘pretty,’ I didn’t say ‘perfect,’ and so what?” she said hotly. “Objectively speaking, it is—”

“‘Objectively speaking’? Do you fancy Cedric Diggory?”

“Not him, just his hair,” snapped Ginny, who was rapidly liquidating every token of his goodwill she had ever earned. “A lot of girls like a man who knows how to BRUSH HIS HAIR!”

Harry, hearing not her words but her tone, glanced over in bemusement and faint concern, and noticed Hermione’s mounting distress. “Hermione?” he called. “You alright?”

“She’s fine,” said Draco shortly.

“She’s wonderful,” snarled Ginny.

“I’m not involved in this,” Hermione said shrilly. “I was never involved in this. I will never be involved in this! I have no idea how I became involved in this! I hate all of you.”

She hadn’t said she didn’t fancy him.

Draco stared at Cedric Diggory, trying to see what was so bloody magnificent about him, and concluded little except that it would be remarkably easy to hit him in his tiny smug mouth.

Cedric himself stood among a group of his friends, toeing the age line. Draco watched through slitted eyes as he pulled a slip of parchment from his pocket. He walked right up to the Goblet, and his fingers passed harmlessly through the fire, which licked cheerfully at his wrist as if it were a mere light show.

He took a deep breath, opened his hand, and the parchment was lost to the blue flames.

“Lord, I hope it’s not Hufflepuff,” Cho murmured to Harry, while a few of the onlookers clapped for Cedric. “God bless an’ all, but all the same.”

Speak of the boggart. Out of the Slytherins milling around by the door stepped Gregory Goyle, who pointed at Cedric as he stepped down from the plinth: “What’s he going to do? Cuddle the other schools to death?”

“Don’t be silly, Greg,” said Marcus Flint. “He’d show them some Hufflepuff hospitality. Like: you turn around, bend over, and give ’em a real welcome.”

He demonstrated. There were shrieks and jeers from the Slytherin table. Cedric turned on his heel to face him, calmly, his hands in his pockets.

Harry bristled. “Oi,” he began, stepping forward — several of the Hufflepuffs had already drawn their wands — but Cedric smiled at Flint and cocked his head to the side, like he was speaking in a dialect he couldn’t quite understand.

“That’s not very sporting, Flint. We’re all in this together. One school, one champion.”

“Warrington’s our champion,” drawled Flint. “It’s an embarrassment he’s got to even compete with you. He’s going to be Minister someday, and you can’t even walk into a room without embarrassing us. I’m not letting you stand for me against Durmstrang, that’s for bloody sure.”

“Sounds like your mind’s made up,” said Cedric calmly, “so I won’t bother arguing. And I’m sorry to embarrass you, Marcus, but if my appearance bothers you that much, you’re free to divert your attention elsewhere. I didn’t realize it was so hard for you to look away.”

Some of the Hufflepuffs giggled. Flint’s lip curled.

“Shut up, you poofter.”

“You shut up!” Hannah Abbott, a girl he knew only for having the softest voice he’d ever heard, ripped out her wand and pointed it at Flint. “You’re a bully. Cedric’s worth ten of you.”

“Ooh, a bully. Am I mean? Did I hurt your feewings?”

“Langlock!” she shrieked. Flint dove sideways onto the table. He landed in the potatoes and knocked over a decanter of pumpkin juice, drenching his shirt.

Chaos erupted at the Slytherin table. Terrence Higgs and Adrian Pucey both shot jinxes back at Hannah, while Goyle simply lunged over the table. Hannah, who was generously speaking one-fourth his size, screamed and scrambled back, but before things could spiral any further, Cedric stepped between them and whisked his wand.

A shimmering translucent shield erupted between the Hufflepuffs and the Slytherins. Goyle knocked his head against it and tumbled back, rubbing his cranium.

“That’s enough,” Cedric snapped. “Ten points from Slytherin for verbal harassment, and language unbefitting a Hogwarts student. Ten points from Hufflepuff for improper use of magic.”

“What? Ced!”

“No exceptions. Hannah, go back to the table, I’m disappointed.”

Hannah trudged away, distraught. Cedric urged the other Hufflepuffs away with another wave of his hand, and shooting an unhappy look over his shoulder at Flint, he shepherded them out of the Great Hall.

“At least he’s fair,” murmured Hermione. The suggestion of violence still vibrated uneasily in the air, and as the Shield Charm flickered out, a susurrus swept over the hall. “I wouldn’t have taken points from Hannah for that, she was clearly provoked.”

“Fair, nothing. He was protecting Abbott. Otherwise, they’d have reported her.”

“Hm. That’s shaping up to be a nasty little gang,” she said. “I’d keep a close eye on them.”

He watched Goyle haul Flint off the table, scattering fruit rinds and pumpkin juice. The pack of Slytherins grumbled and bumped into each other with the brotherly violence of bulls. He hadn’t liked the way Flint spoke to Cedric — oh, it was only words, the sort of teasing that might happen anywhere, but it was the kind of teasing that hid the suggestion of what might have happened if there hadn’t been anyone watching. Of what might have happened to Cedric in an empty room.

“Not too close,” he murmured. Something hard turned over in his stomach at the idea of Flint looking that way at Hermione, or any other way, ever, at all.

On the Saturday before Halloween, Draco donned his nicest wool robe, threw some gel in his hair, and joined a throng of students in winter cloaks on their way to Hogsmeade. Frost crunched under his boots, and the crumbling leaves of autumn broke into brown shards underfoot. His breath turned shock-white in the air.

He was joined by Harry and Ron. Hermione bobbed behind them, her nose deep in a book about the Goblin Revolutions. Draco, having precious little social capital to spend ever since their quarrel over the muggle-born issue, didn’t dare remark on it, even when she almost tripped into a lamppost. While Harry and Ron guffawed, he suffered in silence. Noblesse oblige.

Emerging from Honeydukes an hour later with a bag of chocolate cream puffs, they strolled down Main Street, peering in shop windows. Hogsmeade was fuller than usual with Tournament spectators, as well as students from other schools: for every two or three black-robed Hogwarts students, there was a mantle of Durmstrang fur. A trio of Beauxbatons girls in blue silk capelets huddled excitedly outside the door of Zonko's, pointing and giggling.

"When the four founders started Hogwarts, they meant it as a school for wizards everywhere."

They were waiting outside Sprintwitches Sporting Needs. Draco leaned against the window, nursing a Peppermint Wand from Honeydukes, and Ron was idly playing catch with Harry's pocket snitch. Meanwhile, Hermione was enthusiastically indulging in her favorite hobby, which was to explain things.

"That's why they built it next to Hogsmeade, a wizarding settlement, so they wouldn't have to hide. But couldn't have known how many wizards were really out there — we know from historical documents that they thought there were only a few hundred wizards in the world. And all of them in Europe! How small-minded can you possibly be? Anyway, when everyone came out of the Middle Ages and they realized how many there were, it became obvious you couldn't have one school for a whole continent, I mean really, there are ten in China alone, and there used to be three or four in Russia, before the Bolsheviks — so a bunch of wizards from France split off and started a movement for their own school—"

"While their monarch was otherwise preoccupied clobbering the Huguenots," said Draco, rotating his Peppermint Wand for another angle of attack. "A bleak time for French nationalism. Vive la revolución."

"Regrettable!" said Hermione, brightly, of the massacre of thousands. "But the founders of Beauxbatons were aligned with the crown. Or at least Bagshot thinks they were. It's hard to explain where they got the money from, otherwise, and the revolutionaries certainly weren't kind to them — apparently the château was burned down four times. Oh, there you are, Harry. Did you get whatever it was you wanted?"

Harry grinned guiltily. He held a giant Sprintwitches bag behind his back, as if they couldn't see it bulging around his hips. "Yeah, and a few other things."

"I don't think 'few' means whatever you think it means," said Draco.

"Aw, but they had these new waterproof transition goggles! Which I need! Kind of. Probably. Oh, and Cho said she bought the new Firebolt scope that you can clip on your broomstick to calculate distances at speed, so you can do all these cool dives without worrying about velocity? She said it was the best hundred galleons she'd ever spent, seriously, crossed her hearts."

"Oh, good, she's rich, too," said Ron briskly, standing up. "Maybe I can have your dowry, when you two get married, then."

In the hierarchy of things not to be touched, this ranked supreme. Draco could point at it with a ten-foot pole and the pole's shadow would not grace the very edge of it, for that was how far, exactly, he was from touching it. Harry didn't, either, which showed three years of Draco's company had managed to rub off at least a thin shedding of tact.

Ron's feelings were more painful because they were obvious, as were his attempts to quell them, a child ripping fruitlessly at his own scabs. Everything about Hogwarts was grand and therefore subtly not meant for him, the robes and the books and the expensive supplies, the shops with sky-high markups at the end of the lane, posh traditions and sports where the best players bought their own gear, the secret pureblood rooms in which he, despite a Prewett pedigree, would never find himself welcome. Most of that wasn't magic, it was money, the second lifeblood of the wizarding world, the substance that did whatever magic couldn't.

Harry had inherited a third-generation fortune; Hermione's parents were well-paid Healers and lived in a suburb; Draco went without saying. What waited for Ron when he came home? A ratty attic bedroom full of secondhand everything? A house full of bigger, brighter, louder children than him?

“Weasley,” he began.

“Shut up,” said Ron evenly. “I’m serious, mate. Keep your head down.”

Twenty-three hours a day, seven days a week, he wouldn’t take that comment from Ron or anyone else breathing; but this was hour twenty-four, and he let it slip between his fingers without retort.

The Three Broomsticks was packed to the ears and people came by to say hello, Seamus Finnigan and Dean Thomas, Katie Bell and George Weasley, the trio of Ginny, Neville, and a small blonde Ravenclaw Draco didn’t recognize — and meanwhile, high-collared students from Durmstrang peered with steely eyes from the bar, while Beauxbatons students flounced through crowds as though they didn’t understand why everyone was standing in their way. Fed up with being the magizoo exhibit, Draco lifted his stein at one Beauxbatons student who’d been staring at them for a while, who squeaked and burrowed back into her friends. Unfortunately, after a moment’s furious discussion, they turned and crossed the pub to Draco’s table.

One of them was tall and thin and pale like a dehydrated cornstalk. The shorter two were younger and earlier-on in their processes of dehydration, still flushed in the face and animated when they spoke.

“Allo!” said a short one. “You are ’Arry Potter, oui?” She zigzagged her finger over her forehead.

Harry smiled thinly.

“You are! You are!” She whirled on the second. “Je te l'ai dit! Combien y a-t-il de jolis garçons avec une putain de cicatrice éclair?”

Draco snickered.

The second hopped up and down. “Do you… can you…” She turned to her friend, traded mutters, and then waved her pinched fingers through the air. “Signature?”

“Sure,” he said uncomfortably, fumbling for his pockets. “I can do that. Um, who’d you like it made out to?”

Hermione gave a deeply skeptical snort. Ron had slouched so low his eyebrows were on a level with the coasters.

The second glowed with pleasure. “Thank you, ’Arry Potter,” she said, curling her tongue slowly around each word. “Plees make eet for Gabrielle Delacour.” She smiled, the full bellows of her dimples swelling with life.

“Ai! Gabby! Et un pour moi!”

“And Monique! And Monique.”

“Gabby… and… Monique. Er — ‘have a nice day.’ There you are,” said Harry, handing them his napkin. It bore four lines of bleeding ink, an almost unrecognizable scrawl, and a butterbeer stain. Gabrielle clasped it like a bridal veil. “Have a good one, you lot.”

Apparently, the subtext of ‘thanks, get lost’ didn’t translate to French. The girls lingered at the table, even as Ron approached subterranean levels and Hermione’s little condescending throat-clearings threatened to broach the Richter scale. Gabrielle pointed at Draco’s tie. “Your tie,” she said. “You are: Gryffon-d’or?”

“Non, non,” hissed Monique. “Le jaune est pour Poufsoffle.”

“Je sais de quoi je parle! Harry Potter est un Gryffon-d’or!”

Draco decided to liberate them from doubt.

“He’s not,” he said to the girls in French. “In fact he’s a squib, and we only let him hang around because we like him. Don’t tell him, though, it’s his only reason for living.”

The girls fell silent. Monique gave a short gasp of betrayal.

“Parlez-vous français?” said the tallest, speaking at last, with a glimmer of interest. “Pourquoi n'as-tu rien dit plus tôt?”

He shrugged. “C’était marrant.”

A smile twisted her lips. It woke a sly, lazy cunning in her face, like a snake stirring to life. Her eyes took a leisurely vacation down from his face, and made no rush in returning. “Oui,” she said. “Clever boy.”

It was hard not to preen, but nobly, he managed. “So they tell me.”

“You may like to come see our carriage,” she said, still in French. “We do not let the students of École de Poudlard inside. But you will fit in with us, I think. And it is most magnificent.”

At first he thought he’d heard the word incorrectly. “Chariot? Vous voulez dire le véhicule?”

“Oui,” she said simply. Her mouth made the word in the shape of a kiss. Her eyes glowed with a lazy sort of interest, like an auror at the door of the most satisfying interrogation of her life. “We sleep there,” she said, in English.

Having dropped that on the table to fester, she sauntered off. The other two followed her in peals of insensate giggles. One fluttered her fingers over her shoulder at Harry.

Draco identified a great constellation of stains on the ceiling, and began composing an astronomical chart.

“So,” said Ron, from beneath the table. “Here’s the situation. I’m going to flip a sickle, and if it’s heads, I kill myself. If it’s tails, I kill you—”

Harry switched his empty glass for Ron’s full one while his head was submerged. “Are you talking to me, or Draco?”

“Both!”

Hermione stared at Draco with the perfect silence of a stalking predator. He glanced at her and lifted one eyebrow in a wordless question.

“I didn’t know you spoke French,” she said, in a constricted voice.

“Of course I do. It’s part of any complete primary curriculum. French, Latin, Greek, etiquette, dancing—”

“Latin makes sense. Latin is relevant for spellcasting. But what, pray tell, may I ask, is supposed to be the use of French? Besides fielding inquiries from blonde lampposts?”

“Hell if I know. I didn’t choose it. When I was seven, my mother handed me a textbook and didn’t talk to me in English for a month.”

“I suppose it’s come in very handy,” she said coolly.

“...Which means what, exactly?”

She flashed a meaningful look at him. He gestured in bold frustration. Then a sly smile curled the corner of her mouth.

“‘You know, we sleep there,’” she said breathily, in a very ungenerous dramatic interpretation.

He ignored the odd twitch that the hairs on his neck gave at the sound of her voice. “Shut up.”

“‘Ooh la la! Do you vant to see my carriage? It is soooo nice.’”

“That’s — don’t be ridiculous. She didn’t sound like that.”

Harry dropped his chin into his palm, grinning like a phooka. “‘Ooh, Monsieur Malfoy, talk French to me.’”

“You’re so good at it.”

“I could talk to you all night…”

He tripped and nearly tumbled to the floor in his haste to get out of the booth. He could light a match against the skin of his face. “I beg your pardon, I hadn’t realized I sat here by mistake. I meant to sit with my fellow fourth years, and yet somehow I’ve found myself up to my arse in ten-year-olds.”

“Monsieur Malfoy! Monsieur Malfoy! ’Ow do you say ‘bedroom eyes’ in Eengleesh?”

“Are ze mattresses as comfortable in Britain as zey are in France?”

Mockery piled on at the rate of avalanche. Ron made a double-entendre about carriage horses that made Harry spit up his butterbeer and Hermione bury her face in her hands, shrieking, and Draco was so violently appalled that he made a vow of silence against him on the spot.

When they hiked back to the castle, boots crunching through the shadowy frosted woods, they were still giggling about it, and he’d very nearly recovered enough of his dignity to start speaking to them again.

The silvery days of October slid out like beads of dew on a spiderweb, distended. It seemed that Durmstrang and Beauxbatons had been among them for months, not weeks, wandering around the castle’s labyrinths like overlarge first years and shouldering in at House tables during meals. All spoke English, some less perfectly than others, although some carried pocket dictionaries like the last life raft on the Titanic, and some stayed silent. Mingling was encouraged but rare. The Durmstrang students kept to themselves, and the Beauxbatons students, though friendlier, treated everything with a general haughtiness that made it clear they had meant to come as conquerors, not as comrades.

On Halloween, the Great Hall filled with orange garlands and flocks of enchanted bats, and pumpkins the size of hippogriffs were rolled up from Hagrid’s hut to service the roiling kitchens. The feast was three times as grand as usual, towers of roast goose and dripping chocolate fountains, deep cauldrons of pumpkin pie, buttery toasted apple crisps in tins like upturned shields, flagons of spiced cider and mulled wine wafted foisted aromatics amidst the scent of woodsmoke and candles and burning leaves. But all this was scarfed down impatiently, or left untouched by the impatient hordes, for the Goblet of Fire had been moved from its resting place, and now stood in front of Dumbledore's chair. For once, Hermione ate the most of any of them, spooning pumpkin bisque methodically into her mouth while she devoured with gusto a book on the muggle witch-hunts, inured to the collective anxiety of waiting for Dumbledore's announcement.

When the feast ended, Dumbledore rose to his feet. The champions' instructions were simple: when the Goblet called their names, they would rise, be applauded, and go into the staff chamber behind him.

He flicked his wand. The pumpkin jack-o-lanterns swallowed their light, and the Great Hall plunged into darkness, lit only by the sparkle of enchanted stars above. Hermione lifted her head from her book, nose wrinkled in displeasure.

"All together, everyone," muttered Ron. "Not Slytherin. Not Slytherin."

The flames from the Goblet of Fire cast a blue beacon on the stone floor around it, and made Dumbledore's face shine with a ghostly pallor as he approached the chalice. From the faculty table, Mad-Eye Moody's glass eye swiveled across the hall. Barty Crouch yawned.

An apprehensive stillness fell. Angelina's knuckles were white on the table, and she was squeezing Fred's shoulder so hard Draco could practically hear the bones crack. Fred patted her hand.

At the Slytherin table, Cassius Warrington sat rigidly upright, unblinking. Cedric Diggory was casually stirring his coffee.

Dumbledore cleared his throat and offered his hand. The flames turned bright red, and a piece of charred paper leapt from the ashes, flying high in the air and twirling to a graceful rest in his upturned palm.

“From Beauxbatons Academy,” said Dumbledore clearly, “the champion is Fleur Delacour.”

A willowy girl with flaxen hair, a hawk-nose, and a strikingly pretty face peeled herself away from a cheering group of girls and swanned up to the table. She had a lilting dancer’s step, as if she were more used to skating or gliding than having to walk.

“She’s rather small, isn’t she?” said Hermione dubiously. “I’ve seen bigger ballerinas. I hope she’s up to it.” She caught Draco’s look and flushed. “I’m just saying,” she said quickly.

Fleur’s fellow Beauxbatons students seemed to be of the same opinion. Several shot her nasty glares as she stepped up to shake Dumbledore’s hand. One of them even groaned. At a sharp cough from Madime Maxime, however, they sat up and applauded with fervor.

Each of the heads of school shook Fleur’s hand in turn. Dipping a graceful curtsy in the direction of the assembled students, she turned with a swish of her skirt and disappeared into the back room.

The clapping died down. The Goblet turned red again, and another piece of parchment spiraled from the ashes, lifted as if carried up on fingers of flame. This time, Dumbledore had to leap, and caught it deftly in mid-air.

“Spry for his age, inne?” remarked Ron.

“From the Durmstrang Institute,” he read, “the champion is Viktor Krum.”

A storm of applause and cheering swept the Hall. In contrast to Beauxbatons, no one from Durmstrang seemed remotely surprised, and applauded with good sportsmanship. Viktor Krum slouched up toward Dumbledore, in his trudging, ungainly bird-step; up close, it was striking how the pictures exaggerated his features, for he could have been an altogether normal boy.

Krum shook Dumbledore's hand without much enthusiasm. He didn't even look Crouch in the eye. Professor Karkaroff was the only one he acknowledged, and the man leaned in to whisper something in Krum's ear; Krum paused, nodded, and followed Fleur into the antechamber.

Hermione elbowed Draco, who returned the move with the slightest twitch of his head. In their own code, it meant: Well, isn't that interesting?

"It's strange that the Goblet chose him, he's only a quidditch player," she whispered. "Will the challenges be athletic? But Fleur was so tiny… I suppose he must be good at something besides flying, mustn't he?"

Draco did not have time to give this as much thought as he would've liked, because the Goblet of Fire had turned red once more. This time, it was violent, almost vindictive, when it spat out the piece of paper. The flames churned and snapped, threatening to spill over the ledge. A scrap of parchment with ragged edges soared high in the air, and it was a long time before it sank within reach of Dumbledore's long fingers.

He caught it, and stared at the parchment.

Whispers flew. Draco glanced leewards, and found Hermione agape with confusion and alarm.

For reasons that escaped his understanding, Draco found himself on the edge of his seat. There were whispers at the Gryffindor table, up and down the aisles, various names chanted like incantations. The tension frayed.

Dumbledore cleared his throat with a short, staccato sound. “From Hogwarts, the champion is Cassius Warrington. Congratulations.” He folded the paper into his pocket and removed his glasses to polish them.

The tension snapped, and suddenly he missed it. What followed was worse.

He had never heard Slytherin go wild before. Even its celebrations of victory in the House Cup were nothing next to the riot of roars and applause that surrounded Cassius Warrington, a grinning, golden-haired boy of seventeen, as he wrestled free of his peers’ embrace and staggered up to the dais, smoothing the immaculate lapels of his cloak. Twice, someone hauled him back to pump his hand or ruffle his hair. Draco sought Theo across the hall, met his eyes, and found him sitting apart from the riot, smiling slightly to himself. There was something thin in his smile, though, and the way he and Pansy remained seated, with almost bizarre decorum, while the rest of the house exploded in triumph.

Ravenclaw applauded politely. Hufflepuff, particularly the section seated around or near Cedric Diggory, gave a few half-hearted cheers, but Gryffindor descended into a depressed silence from which it seemed unlikely that, say, Fred Weasley, would ever return.

“Not a Slytherin.” He had pillowed his head in his arms, and was groaning, while George rubbed sympathetic circles on his back. “Whole bloody student body, and it had to be a Slytherin. We gave up Quidditch for this?” Angelina, meanwhile, was receiving an array of whispered comforts from the girls, many of whom were inventing new ways to describe Warrington’s appearance and desirability with such spontaneous creative license it should have earned them the Booker.

It was some time before Dumbledore could make himself heard over the tumult. “Very good! Thank you!” he cried. “A fine selection! Three fine champions! Prepared to undertake… to undertake…”

He trailed off. The light in the hall had changed again from blue to red, for the Goblet of Fire was stirring a fourth time. A ripple of shock quelled the cheers from Slytherin's table, like a water drowning a bonfire, issuing only the guttering smoke of whispers.

Dumbledore glanced at the slip of paper and cocked his head. The silence dwindled on to the point of awkwardness, then misgiving, then deep foreboding.

"From Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry—" And he became silent again, gazing deeply at the paper.

"Maybe it changed its mind," said George hopefully.

There was a screech of chairs. Crouch came hurrying down from the teacher's table and plucked the paper from Dumbledore's hand. He squinted at it, adjusted his glasses, and then lifted a clear, distant gaze to the Gryffindor Table.

He said, "And from Hogwarts — Harry Potter."

Draco, along with the rest of the hall, swung his head around to stare at the fourth champion. He had a strange sense he was dreaming.

Harry didn't move.

This was not a figure of speech. By all appearances, there was zero activity happening above or below his cranium. Hermione lurched out and seized Harry's wrist, as if trying to hold him there, but she needn't have bothered. The boy was stone still.

The rest of Gryffindor also burst into merry, if confused, applause. This was gratifying but useless, as it made it harder for Harry to pry himself free. When at last he did, he stumbled up to the staff table on sluggish feet, as if wading through muddy water.

Professor Karkaroff had swept over to Dumbledore and was whispering urgently in his ear. Madame Maxime was berating Crouch in spirited tones, but Crouch appeared not to hear her. Crouch had eyes only for Harry, who approached him on leaden feet.

Hundreds and hundreds of eyes rested on his shoulders, very few of them fond.

He stopped in front of Dumbledore, and waited.

“Well, in you go,” Dumbledore said, after a moment. He did not shake Harry’s hand. Neither did Professor Karkaroff.

Harry trudged into the antechamber. Maxime, Karkaroff, and Crouch followed him. Dumbledore hesitated, bid the Great Hall a somewhat cursory goodnight, and then swept in after them.

McGonagall rose to take control of the Great Hall, but it soon became clear this was impossible. The noise that erupted would take more Silencing Charms than the whole faculty could muster together.

Hermione was breezing through the early stages of hyperventilation.

“They won't let him compete." Draco’s knuckles were white on his knife-hilt. He spoke to himself as much as her. “There's no way they'll let him compete."

“He’s fourteen,” Ron mumbled. “How the hell…? He’s my age. We’re the same.” He swept around to Fred, and his tone was furious. “Did you tossers figure out how to cross the age line without telling me?”

“No,” George said, stunned. “We didn’t. Couldn’t crack it.”

“You swear? You didn’t help him? Or put his name in for him,” Ron was shrill, “or — something like that?”

“Why would we?” said George irritably.

“Because you thought he’d have a better chance than me!”

“Blimey, the bar’s on the floor,” said Fred. “We’d have had to put in all of Gryffindor Tower.”

All around them, students were yelling, chants of ‘Warrington’ and ‘Potter,’ meanwhile the Durmstrang and Beauxbatons students clamored of unfair play. He agreed with them. Two champions wasn’t fair, it wasn’t proper. It doubled Hogwarts’ chances. The other headmasters would never stand for it. Neither would the Ministry.

Hermione doubtlessly understood it, too, but that didn’t change her expression at all. Her face was marble-rigid and twice as pale.

“They won’t let him compete,” he repeated.

“And what if he does?”

“Then he’ll be alright. He’s not going to die. That won’t happen.” A small tightening happened in his stomach, like a pang of indigestion. She was terrified for Harry, almost beside herself for him. Part of his brain lifted its head from slumber, revealing a shockingly nasty face, and said: What if it was you?

She was acting like Harry would be dragged out and shot at dawn. She cared an awful lot about him, didn’t she? Would she have been on the verge of tears if it’d been him walking into that room?

He let go of her arm. She wrapped her arms around herself and nibbled furiously on the skin of her thumb.

The party in Gryffindor Tower raged for an hour before Harry showed up. Fred and George, performing admirably on short notice, broke open the bottles they’d saved for Angelina’s celebration and charmed the name on the banner to read ‘POTTER’ instead of ‘JOHNSON,’ only the enchantment wore down when both of them got plastered and ended up flicking on and off between ‘JOHNSTER’ and ‘POTTON.’ Ron was nowhere to be found. Draco and Hermione found armchairs in the back of the common room and camped out, waiting for Harry to come back, which happened when most of Gryffindor was already three drinks deep and nowhere near stopping.

When the shell-shocked boy came stumbling through the portrait-door, the roar almost scared him back into the hallway.

“S’him!” bellowed George. “Boy wonder! Fourteen!”

“A Gryffindor champion! FOR HOGWARTS!”

“FOR HOGWARTS!”

“Want some food? We’ve got some!”

“Butterbeer, Harry? Peanuts?”

“Tell us how you did it! Tell us how you outsmarted ’em!”

“I didn’t,” Harry shouted. He cringed away from the shouting. “I don’t know how—”

Draco, fed up and sore in the ears, rolled to his feet and pulled out his wand.

“Diffindo.”

The blast rocketed into the air and shattered a bulb on the chandelier, sending shrieks and good-natured hollers among the partygoers, who assumed it was part of the fun. In the noise-dimmed aftermath he cast a Movement Charm and stalked through the crowd, seizing Harry’s arm, and towed him over to the boys’ staircase.

“As you were,” he snapped, and bundled Harry up the stairs. Hermione hurried up after them.

On the way down, they bumped into Colin Creevey, who gasped and hit the shutter on his camera before any could object. The flash momentarily blinded the three of them.

“That’s it,” Draco snarled, and threw Harry off-handedly at Hermione, who caught him. He whisked out his wand. “I’ve had enough of this —”

“Oh, Draco, don’t—”

“Levicorpus.”

Colin was whisked into the air, warbling in fear, and Draco stalked up the stairs under his dangling body. He slashed a counter-jinx over his shoulder, and there was a great THUMP as Colin went tumbling back down to earth.

“Colin! Draco, really, he might have been hurt—”

“Should’ve gotten out of the way, then.”

“I don’t remember Flitwick teaching that jinx,” said Harry distantly, in dissociative tones.

“Didn’t. Learned it from a book. In here.”

He kicked open the door to the fourth-years’ room and found it empty except for Ron, who was sitting with his knees up on his bed. At the sight of them he scrambled to his feet, and Hermione slammed the door firmly behind them, murmuring, “Colloportus.”

Harry was wrestling off the Gryffindor banner that Lee Jordan had tied around his shoulders. Draco, too tired to watch him struggle, flicked a Disintegrating Jinx at the knot, and it drooped to his ankles.

“So,” he said, after a moment. “I… I have to compete.”

Hermione’s hands flew over her mouth. Draco let out a short gutpunch of a breath and rubbed his jaw.

“Dumbledore argued for me. He said I couldn’t consent, I wasn’t… of age. He was really… really angry. I’ve never seen him so — but Crouch said, if the Goblet made a decision — I was supposed to compete. And — and if I didn’t, Hogwarts would be disqualified for tampering. Which he couldn’t — wouldn’t — allow. The Ministry wouldn’t. Allow it. He said.”

Ron blinked. “Oh,” he said. He wore an unpleasant, anemic cousin to a smile. “Well… congratulations.”

“I begged to get out of it,” he said hollowly.

“What?” said Ron. “Why?”

If not for the shield of his glasses, Harry’s eyes would have popped out of his skull.

“Because I could DIE!” he shouted. “Because I could get KILLED! Because I wanted a QUIET YEAR for once! D’you think I fancy dodging death at every corner? You think I like getting chased and jinxed and kicked around? Giant spiders and Death Eaters and dementors — wow, fun! D’you know what I wanted to do this year, Ron? I wanted to join the GOBSTONES TEAM!”

Ron was almost bowled over onto the bed. Harry had never shouted like that before. Draco was glad to know the kid had it in him.

“Blimey!” Ron snapped. “Fine, then! Why’d you put your name in, if you’re so miserable about it?”

“I DIDN’T!”

“Honestly, Ron, when would he?” said Hermione acidly. “You’re with him day and night—”

“EXACTLY!”

“I dunno! He might’ve used the Cloak!”

“THE CLOAK?”

“For an Age Line?” drawled Draco. “Do you age three years when you’re invisible?”

“Or something else!” said Ron, defensive, but also relieved. “I don’t know! Maybe you paid off someone to do it for you!”

“PAID OFF?!”

There was a crash: Harry had kicked over his nightstand.

Ron leapt out of his bed, his hands aloft in pacifying formation. “Mate. I’m sorry. I didn’t— ha, er, I didn’t think— I thought you might’ve kept it a secret or something.”

Harry whirled. His hair, never tidy at the best of times, had reached new Lovecraftian orders of tangle. “I could die,” he said, raggedly, “and you’re worried — what, that you wouldn’t get to share the glory?”

“You’re not going to die,” said Draco shortly. Hermione was standing in a rictus of fright, absolutely going to town on her thumbnail.

“Exactly. I was being stupid,” said Ron calmly. He grabbed Harry’s shoulders — Harry lurched at him as if to swing, and then gave a wheeze, collapsing at the last moment — and hauled him into a hug. Harry melted into it as if it was his first glimpse of home in years. “Go easy on me, mate. I get stupid sometimes. So do you.”

“You can say that again,” said Harry thickly.

“Alright. Earned that one.”

Draco straightened and jerked his head at Hermione. The boys deserved a moment, and he needed to speak to her alone.

They stepped out of the room. He threw a Muffling Charm over the narrow hallway above the stairwell, and then drew her aside, into an alcove under the sconces.

“Well, he’s done for,” he said casually.

“Don’t say that. Don’t you dare.”

“What? He is.” He nodded at the door. “He’s fourteen. The magic in the tournament is designed for adult wizards. There’s no way he’ll manage.”

“You might at least pretend to have a little faith,” she said hotly.

“That’s not what I mean at all, and you know it.” He paused. “We’re going to help him cheat.”

He expected a wail of lament at even suggesting this heresy against School Rules.

Instead, she tilted her head and offered a quizzical: “No, we’re not.”

“Yes, we are.”

He had three arguments, an excuse, an appeal to emotion, and one very powerful expletive prepared to convince her. As it came out, he needed none of them.

“It’s not cheating,” she murmured, lifting her chin. There was a cunning flicker in her eyes. “It’s called collaborative learning.”

News! I made a Tumblr — @greenerteacups — if you prefer to get fic updates that way, or if you wanted to use the ask/messaging system there to reach out. It's threadbare at the moment, because it's brand new, but I thought it would be helpful to have conversations or answer questions that don't fit in the AO3 comments section. Anyway!

-One of the consequences of being friends with Draco Malfoy for four years, especially if you happen to be a teenage criminal genius, is that things like "rules" end up meaning a lot less. Hermione Granger is officially Not Bothered by the rules of the magical world, especially dumb ones that endanger her friends. Some buildings need burning.

-This chapter comes with formal apologies to the House of Hufflepuff, and a sincere promise that they have not been forgotten. Rest assured that Cedric isn't disappearing, he's just going to be on a different journey. Certain plot elements are going to be a bit different, this time around.

-Fun fact, some of those French words come from the French translation of the Harry Potter, where Gryffindor is literally translated as "golden gryffin," and Hufflepuff is "Poufsoffle." Which is the cutest, really.

-Harry is that guy who goes into Dick's Sporting Goods because he needs to buy fishhooks or something and walks out an hour later with two carts full of the most arcane weird sports tech known to mankind. He DOES have a fitbit, he DOES share his workouts, he DOES get the special dri-fit running jackets with the built-in reflector patches. Meanwhile, Ginny (the actual pro athlete) wears sweats.

Wishing a fresh, tasty cup of your favorite drink to everyone who commented! Perpetually amazed by the warm reception to this fic. Y'all are the best. Next chapter: "Norberta."

Chapter 39: Norberta

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

“The way I see it, if the Ministry is going to throw the rules to the wind and make him compete, then Harry doesn’t owe them anything except that. Bare minimum. The rules about collaboration and doing it yourself — which are mostly implicit, I read the rulebook last night —”

“Naturally.”

“—include nothing about collaborative preparation, and for the Tasks themselves, the only rule is no one can accompany him into the arena. That’s it! Isn’t that ridiculous?” The text was summarily brandished aloft for its crimes against reason. “I can think of about ten loopholes off the top of my head!”

“Those rules were written in a pre-Granger era. I’m sure they thought ordinary swot-proofing would suffice.”

“Then they were wrong! And we’re going to prove it.”

“Do you know, when you start plotting,” he said calmly, stealing a triangle of toast, “you get the most astonishing maniacal gleam in your eye; it evokes something deadly and primordial. While fixed in it, one gets the unsettling thrill of thinking he is about to be set on fire.”

She lapsed into a thoughtful pause. “But that wouldn’t be any use,” she said, upon reflection. “I wouldn’t set you on fire; you’re being helpful.”

“I bet you say that to all the boys.”

True to form, Harry and Ron skated into breakfast when it had been so long that most dishes had disappeared, and left only a pittance of scrambled eggs and turkey bacon. Ron threw himself into it with the same aplomb as ever, while Harry had not the time to consume a wedge of toast before a snowy owl dive-bombed and stole it from him.

“Aw, Hedwig, no.”

“Your owl is a menace.” Ulysses offered his master a Daily Prophet speared on his claw.

“She can’t help it. She’s a good girl,” lied Harry, scratching the saucy bird’s head. “Anyway, I’m glad she’s come. I’ve got to send another letter to Moony and Padfoot.”

“Telling them about the Tournament?” said Ron, except it was strained through masticated eggs, so the actual utterance was a bespoke combination of vowels and gurgling. The fact that Draco understood it flawlessly delivered a crippling blow from which his dignity would never again recover.

“Yeah,” said Harry, who, even worse, didn’t seem to realize it wasn’t English. “This is from them, too… they’re telling me to hang on. They’re aiming to camp in Ireland,” he added, unhappily, “so they can be close without the Ministry finding them. I was right. I shouldn’t have said anything about my scar.”

Draco flicked a piece of scone at him.

“Ow!”

“Repeat after me. ‘I will not accept blame for the stupidity of others.’”

“‘I will not—’ hang on, they’re not stupid!”

“If you’re right, and they’re planning a return to Britain, then they are; if you’re not, you’re both blameless. Either way, the mantra is useful.

I, personally, have made it my manifesto."

"Maybe I shouldn't tell him about the Tournament," Harry said doubtfully.

Hermione rolled her eyes and cleared her throat. She continued clearing it, with increasing verve, while Harry drafted his reply on the back of some scratch paper.

"Why, Hermione. It sounds like you want to say something."

"No, it's just — Harry, I love you to pieces, but sometimes I wonder if you hear what you're even saying."

"Sort of hard to, actually, when someone's coughing in my ear—"

"It's the Triwizard Tournament! It's hundreds of years old, it's an international tradition, it's the first tournament ever to feature two champions from one school, and one of them is Harry Potter! I'd be surprised if you're not the front page of the Daily Prophet tomorrow!"

This blindsided him. "Me? You're joking."

"She's not," said Ron seriously. "I'm sorry, mate, it wasn't a nightmare. You really are Harry Potter."

"I — shut up. Fine, I'll write to him. Hermione, can I borrow your owl?"

"Thucy? Please do, she needs the exercise—"

"As the individual who procured said animal, I would like to lodge an aesthetic objection to 'Thucy,'" said Draco.

"Overruled — but why not Hedwig?"

"Told me not to. She stands out," said Harry, standing up. "I'll run this up to the Owlery— oof."

He pivoted on his heel and almost plowed into Severus Snape.

Hard to say who of the group was most horrified about this. A real nailbiter, it was. Draco would cast a vote for himself.

“Mr. Potter,” said Snape, hitting consonants like he was chopping them for kindling. It was brutal. An elocutionary tableau. No vowels were spared.

“Professor Snape,” said Harry, somehow failing to shrivel up and evaporate under the immaculate coldness in Snape’s eyes.

“You. Are required. Upstairs.”

“What. Do you mean. By upstairs,” said Harry, slowly, and Draco would have followed the others in giggling if he hadn’t been reasonably certain he was about to watch a dear friend get decapitated. “This. Is a castle. Sir.”

Snape gave the thin shudder of one expending a decade’s accumulated patience at once.

“Mr. Crouch… requests… all champions… to report to the faculty lounge.”

“Oh. Okay. Can I stop by the Owlery f—”

“Now.”

“Right, yeah, yep, sure, that’s what I thought.”

With a grimace and a wave, Harry shot off, making the kind of time you’d expect for someone with his back to an armed and scowling Severus Snape.

“Draco.”

Draco lifted his head slowly, like Snape might forget about him in the time it took to make eye contact. It was a misbegotten hope.

“With me,” he said curtly, and left.

He had about four seconds of scrambling before Snape was out of sight, and filled these with a muttered goodbye to Hermione and Ron, who watched him depart with the same mystified stare they’d given Harry. Then he trailed his godfather down a fractal of orthogonal hallways traversing a wing’s worth of distance from the Great Hall, including several sharp turns through a hidden alcove or passageway, until anyone following them would have had to either teleport or sit down and cry; and only then did Snape stop and fold them both into the alcove of a window overlooking the lake.

“Professor—”

“Silence. I have a letter from your mother.”

“You’ve seen her? How is she?”

“If she required me to tell you, I imagine she would not have gone to the work of writing a letter.”

Sometimes, on blue moons, when the stars fell into geometric perfections overhead, and the spirits of earth and sky conspired to incline the affairs of mortal men, Severus Snape woke up in a good temper. This was not one of those occasions.

The letter changed hands. He checked the unbroken crest and then made to open it. A sudden grip to his shoulder startled him out of it.

“How did Harry Potter put his name in the Goblet of Fire?”

Slurred in a harsh fast whisper, Draco was almost sure he’d misheard him. When he processed it, he still wasn’t sure.

“He… didn’t, sir.”

“Don’t lie to me,” snarled Snape, stepping forward. He didn’t have so much height on Draco as he used to, but he didn’t need it. A man who could take down a ravenous werewolf with nothing but his wits and three wandstrokes was not the type who needed height to invoke the fear of God. “You two are always lurking together. You must have known it, if you did not see it. He would have confided in you.”

“I don’t — well, firstly — I mean, he would’ve,” said Draco, faintly flattered in the part of his gut that wasn’t scared fit to pee, “but he didn’t. Put his name in, that is. Potter doesn’t want to be champion.”

“Has he sworn you to secrecy? What oaths have you made? Answer me!”

“No, it’s true,” he said, melting fear with a tiny candle of indignation. “I’m not lying. He doesn’t want it. He’s fourteen and he doesn’t want to die, why would he risk it?”

“He is a vainglorious peacock—”

“Who? Potter?”

“—thirsty for fame, who rejoices in flaunting school rules—”

“Do I have the right Potter? Are we possibly talking about an effete thespian cousin?”

“He is a braggart! And a liar!”

“He’s a dumb friendly athlete who’s got no parents,” said Draco, half-stunned at Snape’s audacity, and half-stunned at his own. “He likes taking in strays and buying ripoff quidditch gear. He gets excited to de-gnome a garden. He thinks he’s got to thank people for being friends with him. Harry Potter? He’s thick, but he’s not vain.”

This was not Snape’s pleasure to hear. This was not Draco’s pleasure to say, exactly, either, but it was the truth and besides, it put an end to the interrogation. Snape closed off, a cold nightfall of eyes and hands that was almost more alarming than his fury.

“Swear that he did not touch the Goblet.”

“Fine. Done. I so swear.”

“On your house.”

He shifted onto his heels. “Uncle Sev.”

“On your house!”

“Fine! Merlin! I swear on the House of Malfoy.”

“And?”

“And on the land and the blood and the name of my father, which is now mine, and ever will be, and is that quite enough for you, or would you like me to fetch a witness for the Unbreakable, while you’re at it?”

“Careful,” said Snape, much calmed, but still cold. “Deep magic is not to be invoked lightly. Even in passing.”

“Understood,” said Draco, after a moment.

The tension simmered to a fever peak, broke, and descended into mellow silence.

“So,” he said. “Good summer?”

Snape let out a slow exhale through the nose, which was either a sign of immolating rage or slight amusement, depending on the angle of his eyebrows, but before Draco could check them there was a bark of: “SEVERUS!” and a clatter at the mouth of the hallway.

How a man of Mad-Eye Moody’s size managed any kind of stealth was a question Draco could not answer. The auror scuttled up the hallway. His height snuck up on you, and impressed itself in startling fashion when he peered down his nose at Snape, who had the automatic sneer of someone well-used to peering down at people.

“What are you about, Snape?” he growled. “Lurking around this one? Putting ideas in his head?”

“It may astonish you to learn that as his teacher, I am paid to do both,” said Snape, “but because you have so little experience in it, I can easily fathom your confusion.”

The two of them ogled each other in bold dislike. Abruptly, Mad-Eye turned to Draco.

“Is he trying to intimidate you, boy?”

“No,” said Draco, lying somewhat.

“Eh? Then what’s his business with you?” He flicked his wand between the two of them. “Not your head of house, is he?”

“Mr. Malfoy is my godson,” said Snape, in a slow and silken drawl. “I have a familial stake in his affairs.”

Draco looked at him with interest. Mad-Eye looked at him with even more interest; then he snorted.

“If I thought you could explain family with a dictionary in front of you, I’d pack my things and give you my job,” he said darkly. “Why haven’t you got it, by the way? You’ve been living in Albus’ armpit long enough, doesn’t he trust you yet?”

“Professor Dumbledore… has not seen fit… to appoint me… for the post of Defense Against the Dark Arts professor. He seems to believe it lies better with his… very… very old friends.”

“Heh,” said Mad-Eye, with satisfaction. “True enough. Slither away, Severus; two of your little shits are trying to jinx a girl’s teeth into railroad tracks, and if you don’t get to them before I do, they’ll end up with a dose of their own medicine.”

Snape’s expression evoked an old fresco of Prometheus under the eagle. “We … do not… use magic… on students… at Hogwarts.”

“Maybe you don’t. I’ll not let your pack of pureblood mutts run rampant through this school without ever seeing a consequence. I made that mistake the first time.”

The first time? Did he mean the first Wizarding War?

“I agree completely. Which is why, at Hogwarts, we give detentions for bad behavior.”

“Go give some, then,” Mad-Eye suggested, his eye aglitter. “While Susie Bones still has some of her teeth.”

“Draco—”

“Leave the boy,” barked Mad-Eye. “We’ve got business.”

Snape radiated dislike, but he had no recourse. Draco sympathized with his position. Mad-Eye was a teacher, and he couldn’t very well force Draco not to talk to him. “May I trust you not to grind the ax of your dead causes while I am gone?”

“If I wanted justice done in this hallway,” said Mad-Eye, “I wouldn’t start with Malfoy. Put it that way. Off with you.”

Snape cast a parting sneer over his shoulder, and swept out.

Mad-Eye tilted his head. He examined Draco impassively for a long moment. Draco didn’t understand where their animosity came from, except possibly a holdout from the war — but Snape had been a double-agent, hadn’t he? He’d turned coat for the Order. What problem did Mad-Eye have with him?

He prepared for an uncomfortable interview.

“Gryffindor?”

Not what he’d expected. “Yes, sir.”

Mad-Eye did a strange thing, then: he grinned. The expression was so unusual on his withered and churlish face that Draco checked over his shoulder to make sure the Rapture hadn't snuck up around a corner.

"I'll be damned," he said. "If you could buy a hat a drink."

"Sir?"

"Nothing. Not Slytherin, eh?"

"Obviously not."

"Rude surprise that must've been."

"One acclimates," said Draco tiredly.

"Hm." Moody reached down to scratch his leg.

But the movement was wrong, somehow. It stuck out like a hippogriff in a centaur herd. Draco followed the hand with his eyes, frowning, as he tried to figure out what the problem was. After a split second, it came to him: it was the wrong hand. Mad-Eye had cast with his right hand when he interrogated Draco, but he'd reached for his leg, across his body, with his left.

Draco's wand was already halfway out when Mad-Eye's jinx soared at him. He was such a quick draw that Draco hadn't even seen him move. But Draco was quick, too, and the curse bounced harmlessly off his hastily conjured Shielding Charm. It soared into a corner and hit the wall, shattering a quaffle-sized chunk of brick.

"What the hell!"

Mad-Eye, his arm still outstretched, bared his teeth in a near-feral grin.

"You're a good draw, Malfoy," he said, lowering his wand.

“Lucky for you,” said Draco, staring at the new hole in the wall.

“Don’t be a candy-arse. I’m making a point.”

“It seems like there were other ways, potentially, to make that point. With words, for instance.”

“Shut it.”

He did.

“Holster your wand,” ordered Mad-Eye.

He holstered it.

Mad-Eye sheathed his own and tugged his greatcoat over it. “Nobody ever won a battle with book-smarts and letters,” he growled. “Those friends of yours, the ones with all-O’s in Potions, Charms, Transfiguration — oh, they’ll graduate, and they’ll be fast-tracked into Ministry jobs, professorships, bureaucratic appointments…”

“I mean, I might like some of those,” said Draco dispiritedly.

Mad-Eye loomed. “There’s a war coming,” he hissed. “A war, do you hear me? And it needs soldiers. Soldiers, not cloisterites and librarians. Not bureaucrats. Not academics. It needs quick draws and steady hands. Your school is failing you, boy. It is failing you in ways more grievous than you can yet understand. Keep that guard up. Stay vigilant. Trust no one.”

“What,” said Draco, because he couldn’t help himself. “Or you’ll jinx me again?”

The professor shook his head, his jaw set gravely. “I’m not who you’ve got to worry about,” he said. “Of all the people in this castle, there’s a dozen you should worry about before me.”

Draco didn’t know what to say to that. So he took it as a dismissal and made to leave.

“Malfoy,” called the professor. Against his better judgment, Draco turned.

“You bear an uncommon resemblance to your father.”

That much was obvious. Pure white hair didn’t crop up often, and Draco had seen himself reflected in a hundred ways in his father’s portraits, the hard nose, the hard-set eyes. At parties and congregations he could be clocked with a cursory headcount. The most that could be said for Hogwarts in this regard was that nobody was likely to stare at you for having white hair, because odds were a dozen people had done something even odder to their appearance for giggles just that week.

Thinking about Mad-Eye’s observation seriously was liable to stir feelings he didn’t want to examine. There were no normal ways to react to learning you looked like a dead man. Especially when it was your father.

Then again, there were no normal ways for your father to be dead.

He picked up these thoughts and summarily dropped them in the rubbish. What remained was impatience and wit and good, nourishing insincerity.

“We’re related,” said Draco.

Mad-Eye worked his mouth, as if chewing on something. Finally, he said, “Not sure it’s doing you any favors.”

Dear Draco,

Oh my darling, I miss you more than an arm and a leg and a hairy heart. I want to throw my arms around you and bundle you away forever at the Manor, except that I know you would never forgive me. When I heard what happened at the Quidditch World Cup it was all I could do not to abandon Briselda and run to your side, hang all propriety; but I knew that you were a strong young man, and you would not be nearly as frightened as your weak mother.

Romania is beautiful and old. We have been sightseeing in some old churches and exploring the forests around Bucharest, which hold such exhilarating sights. Did you know that hidden in the heart of Romania are some of the most powerfully magical locations in the world? Your father took me to one for our seventh anniversary. Seven is an important magical number, as you know.

I've attached some things for you; souvenirs and trifles, little sweets from Mummy, so you remember someone somewhere is thinking of you fondly and ceaselessly. I've also sent a wee something for Theodore. His birthday falls in November, and I dread to think it went unremarked. Please deliver them at your convenience.

All best to your friends and housemates, Mr. Potter, Mr. Weasley, & etc.

I love you more than perfume and waltzes and strawberries and the first crocuses of spring, my little lion.

All my heart,

Mummy

The common room of Slytherin House was secreted under the belly of the castle. Draco hoped and prayed that the pipes would break and flood the whole thing with scummy pondwater. He had never felt so lost as when trodding through endless windowless hallways, dark as dungeons and twice as musky, lit by identical reas of torches and unmarked by signs or doors: he was used to airy towers, staircases that crisscrossed wide open vaults and let you peer down dizzying heights, everything open, the whole castle tumbling out at your feet like a child's sandbox kingdom. For him, the dizzying annals of the castle basement offered an atmosphere not of mystery and secrets but of aggravation and depression, which revealed more about the character of Slytherin in forty-six minutes than three years in their company could do altogether.

Finally, he stumbled into a second year in a green tie and threatened him into leading Draco where he wanted to go: a large V-shaped archway in the shape of a serpent, carved into a blank wall.

By then he was ready to spit acid and knock the thing down with Ventus. The second year squeaked, “Parseltongue,” and the brickwork peeled away to reveal a lacquered black door.

Behind it sat a large, dark vault of a room, paneled in green brocade, with marble pillars holding up a skylight into what could only have been the lake. A dozen inquisitive sneers perked up from a dozen leather armchairs; when they saw Draco, half sharpened in fascination, while the other curdled to disdain.

“Nott,” he barked. One of them spilled her crystal goblet. He swept inside and pointed his wand at the ceiling, prepared to cast Sonorus. “Where is he?”

A familiar yellow head poked over the back of one sofa. Daphne — who was, he noticed, surrounded by a wide radius of no one — kindled with excitement and scrambled over the sofa’s back, as if the time it took to go around was too great. She was thicker around the arms and middle than she’d been even on the train, and the scars had softened to a faint silver, washed out by the ruddy glow of health that suffused her cheeks. Where before she’d been a slender crescent of loveliness, all hollows, she had waxed into the round beauty of a full moon.

One of the other girls pointedly drew a handkerchief over her mouth and nose as she skipped by.

“Draco! You’ve come to visit! I thought you never would! I’ve wanted to show you the dungeons for ages and ages! You’ll adore our library, it’s simply without compare. Have you brought your friends?”

She ducked around his shoulder, as if he might be holding the other three Gryffindors behind his back. “No? That’s alright! Maybe it’s best you didn’t bring Hermione. I’ll show her later, when it’s emptier. One doesn’t like to make a scene—”

“Greengrass.”

“Hm?”

“I’m here on an errand.” He lifted the package.

“Oh, yes,” she said. “Theo? I think he should be here, I’ll get him.”

He had supposed this would mean her darting into one of the various passageways leading off the main vault, but in this he was mistaken. Daphne whirled, sucked her lungs full of air, and bellowed, “THEODORE!”

From a side-room to the common lounge emerged a mousy-haired boy, wearing an emerald green dress shirt less two buttons, disheveled by Slytherin standards, immaculate by Gryffindor ones. The sight of him lifted a wave of acknowledging murmuration from the nearest students, and he fluttered his hand casually, like a descending prince, which made Draco want to wedge his head in a toilet bowl and flush.

“Oh. You,” said Theo, with a complicated, unhappy kind of affection. “I thought you’d tired of shouting at me. You do realize you can’t do it here, don’t you? Or has your nerve finally overtaken what little remains of your brain?”

“Don’t flatter yourself. Do you have any idea how many stairs there are between here and Gryffindor Tower? I wouldn’t put myself through all that if I’d been poisoned and you had the last dose of antivenom in your pocket.”

“But you did,” Theo pointed out, more than a little smugly. “Should I be concerned for your health, or do we owe this dubious pleasure to something else?”

“I was going to say that my mother sent you a birthday present, but as the one holding said present, it falls entirely within my discretion whether or not you deserve to get it, and frankly I’m seeing a lot of behavior I’m not inclined to reward—”

“What? No. It’s mine. Give it here,” said Theo immediately. Draco snickered and released it with a minimum of tussling. “Could have started with that, tosser, I would’ve been nicer. Didn’t anyone ever tell you how to supplicate? It goes gift, then introduction, then request. The altitude in that tower’s getting to your head, your manners are deteriorating.”

He noticed that Theo’s hand was still bandaged, as it had been at the World Cup, but these bandages ran further down his wrist than those had, covering his palm and fingers. Had he splinched himself again? Draco frowned.

“The asbestos down here’s getting to yours. Happy fifteenth, by the way, not that you deserve it.”

“Thanks, young buck. Your gift can be learning to respect your elders.” He shredded the wrapping and tossed it over his shoulder as if he expected a house-elf to whisk it away on the breeze. Inside was a green leather jewelry box, which he recognized as a case from Moribund’s. Settled on a bed of black velvet like under a clamshell were a pair of dark jade cufflinks with ‘T’ inlaid in gilt.

Theo was doing a terrible impression of someone not deeply touched. There was an irrepressible tremor in his cheek and a double-blink of verification. He snapped it closed. “Cufflinks, for fifteen,” he said. “Traditional. I’d expect no less.”

“Perhaps it’s a veiled way of telling you to do your shirts properly. Speaking of which, mind your collar, this isn’t a nightclub.”

He struggled to rally. “I’m partial to diamonds,” he said, “but I suppose, for a night at the pub, it’ll do in a pinch. Please thank her.”

“Thank her yourself. I’m not an owl. Apparently she’s nothing better to do than sit around thinking of ways to get you weepy—”

“Sod off,” he said lazily. “And stay for tea. It’s a waste of time to go back up, besides which you’re sure to get lost, no offense.”

“Offense heedlessly taken, and if your common room weren’t shoved arse-deep in the basement like an afterthought—”

“You don’t like it? I think it’s peaceful.”

“I’m sure the mildew agrees with you.”

He was putting the finishing touches on another insult against what he honestly thought was a quite lovely common room when Pansy backed into the room, holding a box of pins and at least three different threads of argument at once. She was flanked by Crabbe and Tracy Davis and a short, soft-chinned girl with an underbite, who wore so much dark eye makeup her irises appeared to float in a vacuum. All of them wore a trifecta of badges, like military regalia, on the breast of their robes: a House badge, the heart-shaped badge of the League of Promising Youth, and one that said ‘CASSIUS WARRINGTON.’

“Dear Merlin,” sighed Theo, “so we’re doing this, are we? Even after I asked ever so nicely, specifically, to not?”

“Yes, we are,” said Pansy firmly, foisting the box on an ottoman. “Because Dumbledore’s a demented old loon, and Flint’s a brute, and I’m not going to let down the side. Do you know what Davies and Tuttle are doing right now in Ravenclaw Tower?”

“I am gleeful to report I’ve not given it a moment’s thought.”

“They’re making badges for Viktor Krum. Because they like his quidditch moves, I suppose, and I don’t doubt they’ve some objection to rooting for a girl — gibbons. I don’t even think they know the charmwork for it, so if they actually manage, I’ll be responsible for their first academic accomplishment since Roger got an O.W.L. Hello, Draco. I’d offer you a badge, but I don’t suppose you’d like one.”

“Why not?”

She tapped her nail on the lacquered surface, and the writing swirled into another message: POTTER STINKS.

“Ah. Wit,” he said. “Spent a long time coming up with that, did you?”

“Potter cheated,” said Crabbe. He folded his arms, which roughly doubled them in size. “He tricked the Goblet. S’not fair. Slimy.”

“Cass didn’t need to do that,” mumbled Millicent. “’Least when Diggory lost, he did it right.”

“Potter didn’t cheat,” said Draco tartly. “He doesn’t even want to compete.”

“Then he should drop out,” snapped Pansy. “Let the real champion have it. The school’s having enough trouble getting behind Warrington without Potter splitting the vote—”

“What do you mean, trouble? Warrington’s a pureblood and Head Boy, I can’t think of anyone less politically objectionable.”

“You’d think! You’d really think!”

Theo sighed and caught the badge that Pansy lobbed at him; but he slipped it into his pocket, instead of putting it on. “Apparently,” he said, “Cass doesn’t have quite the reputation amongst the Tower Houses that we’d like, socially speaking. We knew Gryffindor and Hufflepuff wouldn’t swing for us, but we’d rather thought that Ravenclaw might stay out of it, if only to be fair… but then again, Cass and Davies don't really get along. Something about taking all those points off for uniforms, I believe. Of course, the dark-horse candidate isn't helping matters."

Draco hummed, noncommittal. He hadn't thought that Cassius would struggle to rally anyone. But then, he also hadn't thought that Slytherin much cared what the other houses thought, in general.

"It's just embarrassing," continued Theo, "if we can't get a solid majority of our own school to applaud for us, what does it even say? Now, I'm of the philosophy that honey's a better condiment than vinegar, with respect to catching pixies, but Pansy's trying this bold new strategy where she tries to bully everyone in the right direction — negative campaigning, you understand, it's high-risk but it's worked before—"

"Potter cheated," said Pansy passionately. "It repeat, he cheated. How is this even a question? The school is splitting up over a twat who shouldn't even be competing! Just because Cass does his job, and enforces the actual rules—"

"Yeah, the rule against nice outfits," muttered Daphne.

"—doesn't mean this is suddenly some sort of horserace! There's a real champion, and a fake champion! It's simple! God!"

"You're just sour Potter figured it out," hollered one of the Slytherins by the fire, and Pansy made a rude gesture with gusto. "Slimy brat, he is, but he did do the thing, innit? Even Higgs couldn't find a way around the age line."

"Oh, yes? Really? You think it doesn't matter, Yates? Snape came in and just about took the skin off your bollocks about breaking Tournament rules, you're not fussed that McGonagall couldn't be arsed to do the same?"

"Pansy's found a cause," Daphne whispered. "It's been good for her."

“Yes! It has! Speaking of. Daph, do you want one?”

Daphne wrung her hands and glanced at Draco, who refused to make things easier for her. He folded his arms and let her flail.

“Oh, I don’t know,” she said. “Maybe — I’ll take one, just for Cassius — but I won’t switch the message,” she said to Draco quickly. “I like Harry. He’s nice to me.”

Millicent guffawed. The conversation tripped and plummeted into a hole of silence. Daphne stood up straight.

“Millie,” said Theo, massaging his nose, “I don’t suppose you’d do me the favor of our lifetimes and leave it be.”

“No, don’t,” said Daphne sharply. “I want to know what she thinks is so funny. I’d like her to say it. To my face. If she even can.”

“Daph, I swear, I’ll buy you enough pearls to wear as a ballgown if you just—”

Millicent was bristling. “Of course Potter’s nice to you,” she muttered. “We’ve all seen him with the half-giant.”

“Oh, but do go on, Millie. I can barely hear you.”

“Daph, don’t,” said Theo, tightly, “and that’s enough, Bulstrode—”

“I said, we’ve all seen him with the half-giant. I bet talking to you gets him extra credit in Care of Magical Creatures.”

Something unspoken was boiling over, and Draco didn’t realize until it erupted. This wasn’t the casual henpecking Hermione and Lavender waged on a daily basis, for mutual sport and pleasure. It was a wide open wound, and Millicent had spat in it, for Daphne gasped, “You bitch,” and backhanded her.

It was a good, cruel hit, four knuckles and a silver ring on her pinky, which ripped a glistening pink scratch over Millicent’s cheek. Millicent screamed and hit back, and Daphne lunged with a high wild laugh of someone living a long-harbored fantasy.

“NUFF,” boomed Crabbe.

The girls split apart, dripping blood and venomous looks. Pansy ushered Daphne away and fussed at a split in her lip. One of her cheek scars had reopened, and wept pink pus down her cheek. Pansy dabbed at it gently with a handkerchief.

“You touch Millie again, I’ll clobber you,” said Crabbe.

“Try it,” said Daphne, brightly, wetly, despairingly. “Oh, try it! I’d so love for one of you to just come out and hit me, hit me, for once, and we’ll see who’s an animal—”

“Daph,” snapped Theo. “Enough. Vince, Millie, would you please bugger straight off and stop talking to Daphne, thank you? It’s causing us all more distress than it’s worth, and I’m just about sick of it all. Draco, you too, for that matter. The Gryffindor faction of this miserable operetta is faffing up the dynamics.”

“Bite me, Nott.”

“Perhaps another time,” said Theo. He cast off Millie and Crabbe with a dismissive hand gesture and herded Draco back toward the door. “Pansy, take Daphne to the girls’ and keep her there, would you? I’ll be around in a mo. Vince, try to keep your girlfriend’s mouth shut, and believe me when I say I know how much I’m asking.”

Draco did not get to see whether these orders took any effect. He was expertly shepherded into the hallway outside the common room. Once the door sealed, Theo sagged against the wall, his spine wilting like a daisy under a heat lamp.

“I didn’t realize the dungeons were such a fracas,” said Draco, by and by. “I should’ve been down more often. Do you place bets?”

“Shut up. Shut up, shut up, and see footnote, shut up, I lack the space on my schedule to tell you all the ways you should go bugger yourself. I’m half convinced that was your fault.”

“My fault? How?”

“Give me a minute, I’ll think of something.” Theo’s eyes were watery from rubbing, and the hollows beneath them were so deep they were developing cave systems. “God. Repeat this to anyone and I’ll skin you for a briefcase, but sometimes I envy you, Gryffindor.”

“No, you don’t,” said Draco, one shocked heartbeat later.

“I do. Put ten Gryffindors in a room together, and an hour later you’ll have an organized sports league. I can’t even get ten Slytherins to agree on what we should have for lunch. First there’s the awkwardness with Daphne, and then the Potter problem, and I’m spending enough political capital trying to get everyone not to tear each other’s throats out over Warrington—”

“Merlin wept. Try complaining to Daphne. Or haven’t Bulstrode and Crabbe convinced you of something, after all?”

“Hold your tongue before it chokes on its own stupidity. Bulstrode’s a cow and Crabbe’s barely amoebic, and for the record, I wouldn’t care if she turned into a Blast-Ended Skrewt every full moon, but I’m also the only reason she hasn’t been jinxed in her sleep, yet.”

Something unpleasant skittered down Draco’s neck. “It’s that serious?”

“Obviously. You know what they say about her. I thought you would’ve guessed. But it’s nice to know we’ve been masking more than I thought.” Theo raked his hands down his face. “It’s not that I don’t want to help. I’m trying. Fuck me, I don’t think I’ve ever tried at anything this hard in my life. Do you think it’s been easy, keeping peace in that room? If I lose standing with the people she’s fighting with, I can't help her. Daph comes first, obviously — it's complicated."

"So? Who died and elected you Speaker of the Wizengamot?"

"If you could glimpse the sheer number of things on my plate at any given hour of the day, you'd go choke on a broomstick for the audacity of even asking that question," said Theo tiredly. He peeled himself off the wall and brushed himself off with the bruising strokes of someone slapping himself awake. "Draco, I know you're looking out for her, and that's the only reason I'm not cross with you, but I grow weary of asking you to trust me."

"Then you might consider making yourself trustworthy," he said coolly. "You strut around this school like you have your own Board seat, and you still won't tell me what's going on between you and your father. Pansy's worried sick about you, as you surely know."

Theo sighed a sigh the size of his whole body.

"I missed you," he said. "I know I'm not supposed to say that, as we're gentlemen rivals and everything, rah-rah, but I did. Over the summer. I wish you'd come to visit."

"I wish you'd stop antagonizing everyone who doesn't wear green."

"Yeah, well. If wishes were nargles, we'd all go mad."

There was something old and resigned in the way he adjusted his collar, but he blinked it off and was all jaunty cynicism again. He said, apropos of nothing: "A shame about the Samhain bonfire, wasn't it."

He had barely thought of it. It surprised him, actually, that he hadn't thought of it. After last year, "I assumed I wasn't invited."

"No, it was canceled. It was a real sore spot with Daph, especially since we couldn't have one last year, either, because of the dementors. And this year, of course…”

“They drew the champions on Halloween.”

He clamped a hand on Draco’s shoulder. Draco stiffened, and the fingers of his wand-hand flexed.

“Among other reasons,” said Theo softly. “They won’t let anyone in the Forest this year. Word is that they’re keeping something in it.”

“At this point, I must assume you derive some sort of erotic satisfaction from being cryptic,” he said. “Make your point or spare me the headache.”

Theo’s lips twitched in a mean little smile. “No, I don’t think I will. My recommendation is, instead, as follows: One. Deal. Two. With it. Three: Stop expecting to be spoon-fed information. It’s an embarrassingly Gryffindor trait, and it belies a fundamental misunderstanding of how people actually end up winning these things.”

“Would it detonate some combustible node in your cranium to say what you mean? What are you talking about, ‘these things’? The Tournament?”

“If that’s not rhetorical, then you really are beyond saving,” he said blithely. The door swung open behind him, and several Slytherins passed out; he caught the door on his foot and held it, half-inside, half-out. “But I’m afraid that’s all you’re getting. I’ve got enough to deal with managing the dungeons; if you want to keep your other friends alive, you’ll have to do it yourself.”

“I’m thinking of outlawing journalism,” said Harry.

“Great idea,” said Draco, tossing him his cloak. “Put your shoes on, we’ll work on it on the way down.”

“No, really. The whole thing. The press. Shut it down. I’m serious.”

“You’re neither the first nor the smartest to think of it. The champions’ interview went well, then?”

“She said my eyes ‘glistened with unshed tears’ when she brought up my parents.”

“Anything about your hair?”

“Er— no.”

“Then leave it, you’ve been lucky as is. Ronald, do you have an aesthetic objection to ties? We’re going to tea, there’s a custom.”

“With who?”

“Hagrid,” said Draco, and took satisfaction in the way both of their mouths unhinged.

By the end of that week, the school had cracked into ugly, asymmetrical factions. As with most things, this shook out badly for Harry. The Slytherins gave him a wide berth in the corridors — only Daphne could be depended on for a Good morning, Harry, or Get the door for you, Harry? and then See you, Harry, which was the only evidence of so-called sportsmanship. The rest of them treated Harry as if they longed to duel him for Cassius’s honor. Terrence Higgs had actually tried it on, dropping a lambskin glove on Harry’s shoe outside of the greenhouses, which was decent of him, because it gave Draco a chance to try out a Furnunculus Jinx and two Jelly-Legs Curses before Higgs was dragged wailing to the Hospital Wing by Marcus Flint.

After that, the message was inked invisibly over Harry’s head: nobody tried it with Harry Potter. That didn’t stop bad feeling from percolating. Hufflepuff was having a mourning period for Cedric (who, for his part, seemed entirely unbothered by Warrington’s victory, and had given Harry a firm handshake when he passed him in the halls), and too distracted to give much of a damn for either Hogwarts champion. Ravenclaw, a house of propriety and general regard for school rules, grew rather frosty, but Cho and a few other young Ravenclaws had started wearing POTTER POWER pins — which made Harry blush, and made Draco want to hunt down whoever invented the concept of a badge and find interesting places to stick one.

“Trelawney’s been predicting my death again,” Harry said glumly. They picked their way down the lawns to Hagrid’s hut in the yellow glare of an early November sunset.

“Everyone needs a hobby,” said Hermione absently.

“Yeah, but it doesn’t feel great, does it? Sitting down every Monday to ‘I see… I seeeeee… a boy with black hair and green eyes will perish at the start of May…’ Plus, I’ve got extra homework on Summoning Charms.”

“It’s not that difficult. You weren’t concentrating properly.”

“Yeah, because of those stupid pins! I can’t look at anyone without seeing my name flashing on their chests, how am I supposed to concentrate on anything?”

Hermione, who had spent Flitwick’s class whisking objects around her as if she exerted a unique gravity on school supplies, was not impressed.

“You didn’t seem so angry when it was Cho,” she said mildly. Harry’s jaw clacked together.

“What’s going on with you two, anyway?” said Ron cannily. “You gonna ask her out, or what? Because if not, you might put her out of her misery.”

“What? No! That’s not — but you don’t really think she’d want to go out, do you? With me?”

Draco consulted the heavens for patience not to reach for his wand.

“Put it this way,” he said, jumping up the steps to Hagrid’s front door. “If all she wanted to do was chat about quidditch, she could talk to Roger Davies.”

Harry didn’t have time to process what was apparently a mind-shattering revelation, because the door swung open, and Draco was nearly flattened by several stories of Frenchwoman. Madame Maxime unfolded herself from the cabin and swept her gaze haughtily over the four of them, including Draco, who was very lucky he hadn’t uttered the first jinx that leapt to his tongue.

“Thank you for ze drink, ’Agrid,” she said, as he appeared to escort her out. Hagrid had brushed his hair and was wearing a fur coat so large four or five bears must have been slain for its sake. “I do so appreciate Scottish ’ospitality. I ’ope to come back many times.”

“Pleasure’s mine,” said Hagrid gruffly, “an’ yer welcome back whenever, trust me. On’y — don’ go tellin’ everyone, alrigh’?”

“Of course. You may trust in my discretion,” she purred, and slunk out of the pumpkin patch with a very sneakish affect, for someone with so much of herself to sneak.

“Wow,” said Ron, after a moment. “I’m going to kill myself.”

“Granger,” said Draco, “I’m prepared to swear you a life debt if you can execute a minimally destructive Memory Charm.”

“We’re jumping to conclusions — we can’t assume — listen, it’s probably not what it looks like,” she muttered, apparently in prayer. “It can’t be what it looks like. They haven’t the room.”

“If you care for me at all, you won’t make me think about it.”

“What?” said Harry, baffled. “What’s everyone so upset about? She just had a drink.”

“You lot!” Hagrid noticed them at last, hauling a dreamy gaze away from the horizon. “What’re you doing here?”

“We were coming for tea,” said Draco, “but now we’re contemplating honorable ways to blow our brains out without leaving a mess on your pumpkins. We — I have never been more sincere in my life, professor — are happy to come back later.”

“No, no! Yer jus’ in time. Jus’ put a kettle on. Come in,” he said grandly, sweeping them into the hut. Inside a pot of tea still cooled on the table, with two teacups, and a terrified glance at the bed revealed it to be blessedly untouched. There was no evidence of furniture being knocked over, which further diminished the dread possibility, but Draco still fretted fearfully about lowering himself onto any flat surface absent certain assurances; ultimately, he elected to stand.

“I was missin’ the two of yeh in Care of Magical Creatures,” huffed Hagrid. He bustled to the cabinet and brought down a set of red clay mugs. “Dinnae realize the two of yeh didn’t like it no more.”

Hermione nearly cringed out of her chair. “We’re sorry. We wanted to take Care of Magical Creatures, we really did, it’s just—”

She looked at him desperately. He raised his eyebrows. He was intrigued and slightly impressed by her decision to lie, but he couldn’t help her. He had been prepared to tell Hagrid the full and simple truth, which was that he wanted to graduate with all ten fingers and toes intact.

“It’s just that Draco was desperate to take Muggle Studies,” she finished, and he marveled at how quickly the bus mowed him down. He would only jinx her shoelaces together for a few days, he decided, as encouragement for enterprising behavior.

“Did’ee, now?” Hagrid gave this excuse the suspicion it deserved, i.e., total. “Tha’s the firs’ I’ve heard of it.”

“Which makes two of us,” said Draco, or would have, but he was cut off at two by a sharp pain to his shinbone. He shot a daggered look at the innocent, blinking Hermione.

“No, it’s true,” said Ron, disguising a laugh as a honking sneeze into his napkin. “He’s really, er… turned over a new leaf, has Malfoy. Total mugglehead. You should hear him talk about sellyphones.”

The screech of the kettle filled the air. Hagrid filled everyone’s mug with strong dark tea, earthy and oversteeped, and set out mason jars of brown sugar cubes the size of galleons. A little tray of rock cakes and treacle tart followed this, the first of which could crack your teeth and the second which could glue them back together, a nice little therapeutic dessert course. Draco politely passed the tray over his empty plate; Hermione surreptitiously fed hers to Fang; Harry wolfed down both and asked for seconds. When there had been enough chitchat to throw a veil of plausible deniability over the visit, Draco set down his teacup and seized on the first beat of silence in the conversation.

“Professor, could I bother you with a question about the Forbidden Forest?”

Hermione glanced at him in interest, and he made a hand gesture to her under the table: Explain later. “Would you happen to know—”

“I don’ know anythin’ about anythin’ happening in the forest!” said Hagrid loudly, springing up to wash his cup. “Nothin’s happenin’! Where’d you hear tha’? Did someone tell yeh?”

“No, sir,” said Draco, serenely. “But I thought, if anyone, the Hogwarts groundskeeper must know everything that happens on the grounds, so I thought there was no one better to ask.”

Flattery of this type was too obvious to work on most professors, but on Hagrid, it was a tool so rarely deployed that it worked wonders. He flushed bashfully. “There’s almost always summat happenin’ in the forest," he said. "Busy place. But there's somethin' special happenin' there now — not tha' I can say about, of course."

So it did have to do with the Tournament. Not surprising, but helpful to confirm. "That's fascinating, professor. Do you know — I mean, I'm sure you couldn't possibly say outright, but speaking in general terms—"

"What is it?" demanded Harry, blundering all over Draco's carefully calibrated gambit. Draco dropped his teaspoon and glared at him. "Do I have to fight something?"

"Can't say, can't say," said Hagrid, eyes a-twinkle. "Can't break me promise, oh, no. When the Ministry came in an' set it all up, I helped 'em, an' they made me promise not ter tell any students. Very strict, they were, about leaks."

"But you can still tell us, can't you?" said Hermione, with a hungry expression. "We're not going to report you, we're your friends. And after all, the rumor's clearly out already, so it's not as though they can trace it back to you."

"Tha's squirmy," said Hagrid, frowning. "I'm no' gonna break me promise jes' because they cannae tell I've broken it."

Hermione exchanged a look with Draco, sharing in his frustration over this irritating moral stumbling block.

"Hagrid," she tried again, in a more coaxing tone, "Harry's got to compete in this Tournament against his will, which is already unfair in a dozen different ways, besides which it's going to be incredibly dangerous, the school's mostly turned against him, and he's obviously not as good at magic as the other champions—"

"Love you too, Hermione."

"And we're doing the best we can to prepare him, but it'd be really helpful if we could get some idea of what to expect — even just a hint—?”

“Yer a good girl to try it, but I’m no’ tellin’ ye, an’ that’s final,” said Hagrid gently.

She scowled and slumped in her seat, arms folded.

Frankly, Draco didn’t blame Hagrid. Hermione couldn’t manipulate her way out of a paper bag, and she had all the finesse of a rampaging wolverine.

An endearing wolverine, granted, but still not a politically-minded one.

“But,” he added thoughtfully, “if yeh wanted ter follow me on a walk or summat… well, it’s a nice night fer it, nae? And no one could say I’d done aught wrong, if I was jes’ takin’ me friends fer a walk.”

“Thanks,” said Hermione tautly, reaching for her bag, “but our evening’s quite full. I have a meeting with McGonagall about S.C.R.U.M.B.Y. and a Potions essay to finish, and then I have to dig up copies of the Hogwarts Enquirer from the last time the Tournament was played in 1891, which will be a joy, as wizards don’t seem to have a concept of archival science—”

“A walk sounds lovely,” said Draco abruptly. Her nose crinkled with indignation, and then understanding slackened her whole face, and she shot up like a pixie.

“Yes. Yes! A walk — Harry, Ron, come on, let’s go — Hagrid, that would be wonderful!”

“Jes’ a short one,” said Hagrid in alarm, as Hermione shot to the door and hauled it open. “There’s no rush — blimey, er, I s’pose we can go now, then.”

At just past five o’clock, the weak winter sun had drooped below the horizon, and darkness spread like melting syrup over the grounds.

Hagrid unhooked the lantern from his gate and held it high above them as they took the long path around the side of the forest, tracing the perimeter of the lake. They passed the pebble beach where he had stood down an army of dementors, the scarred trunk of the Whomping Willow — now swaddled in bandages, and fenced off with a twenty-foot perimeter of caution tape — and the thick copse of blackberry bushes where they had fled from a werewolf. Cold claws of dread trailed over his back. Hermione shivered. He shifted closer to the group, and took his wand out.

When the castle towers disappeared around a bristle of pine trees, faint shouting emerged from the darkness. The flicker of bonfires pressed through the trees, and Hagrid, after a quick check over his shoulder, veered hurriedly into the forest, leading them down a narrow dirt path that winnowed up to the peak of a steep cliff, and beneath it, a huge hollow in the earth where the forest fell away into the river valley. A barbed-wire fence ran along the top of the cliff, ostensibly to keep people from toppling over it.

Draco opened his mouth to demand where they were going, but whatever he was going to say was swallowed by a distant bellow and screech of a vast angered beast. A jet of fire erupted into the sky above them, and they reared back, their faces painted red by the intensity of the jet. The sound was unmistakable.

“It’s dragons,” said Harry, awed.

“Of course it’s dragons,” said Hermione miserably.

“Aren’ they magnificent?” sighed Hagrid. “Go on an’ have a look!”

He clapped Harry and Draco on the back, buffeting them forward, and nearly tripping Draco into the dirt. “They cannae hurt yeh from here. There’s containment spells all over.”

Holding an Aguamenti on the tip of his tongue, Draco crept to the edge of the cliff and peered down.

Four grown dragons prowled around the dirt pit at the bottom of the hollow. From above they made a wall of pitted jeweled backs and leathery crests, their scales fitted so closely they moved like liquid metal. Their eyes were hollow pits of molten light, ringed by the leathery black skin of their face, and venom dripped from the crescent blades of their teeth, like arakhs. They were all screaming and lunging at each other, only to be hauled back by the rattle of chains, as if it were only shackles keeping them from ripping each other to pieces.

At least thirty wizards, seven or eight to each dragon, flew around on broomsticks, hauling on the chains connected to heavy leather harnesses. How those had ended up on the dragon's bodies had to be a matter of suicidality or immense wizarding skill. One dragon leapt into the air and freewheeled above the others, its red scales flushing in the bath of fire it released from its throat.

"Keep back there, Hagrid!" yelled a wizard near the fence, straining on the chain he was holding. "They can shoot fire at a range of twenty feet, you know! I've seen this Horntail do forty!"

"Code blue!" yelled another wizard. "Stunners on three!"

"Charlie?" cried Ron. The wizard did a double-take and zoomed down to meet them.

He landed and whipped off his cap, revealing a flushed, disheveled redhead with penumbral volumes of eyeliner and a pair of piercings dotting his lip. He grinned and stuck out his tongue at Ron, revealing a barbell piercing through the tip of that, too.

"Charlie!"

"Ronniekins!"

Ron hauled his brother into a thumping hug. "I didn't know you were at Hogwarts! You tosser, you never said!"

“Been busy managing these four divas, haven’t I! And they’re needier than you are! Sorry I stink like ash! Norberta’s teething.”

“Norberta?” said Hermione faintly. “Who — which — is that?”

Charlie beamed and pointed. “The Ridgeback she-dragon, just there. Gorgeous, isn’t she? What a beaut! Hagrid knows her, doesn’t he, Hagrid — Hagrid?”

Hagrid had pressed himself to the wire fence. One of the dragons tore free of its harness, gave a violent shriek, and torched it to a crisp. A proud tear glistened in his eye.

Charlie whistled. “Aw, piss. Girlie doesn’t like the harness. We usually try to get them earlier, so they can acclimate, but, uh, Hagrid here had other ideas.”

“These are the First Task?” Hermione sounded furious. Draco sympathized. He didn’t realize the Ministry actively wanted their champions to die. “You have to kill a dragon?”

“Kill? What? No! Who said anything about killing? Berta’s endangered, nobody’s killing her!”

“Then what do the champions have to do?”

“Search me. If it don’t yell and spit fire, it ain’t my lookout, Mione. All we know is they want four young’uns, biggest we can get. The adults calm down a bit,” he added, as Norberta nearly clubbed a wizard out of the air with her tail, “but they’re too big to move overseas, and the Romanians’ll ride us like house-elves about it.”

“They get bigger?”

“Oh, loads. Also, hullo, Draco,” he said, grinning. “Good to see you. Excited for the show?”

“Like a gallbladder removal.”

“Why not use a Shrinking Charm?” Hermione asked, crouching over the precipice. She was kneading her hands thoughtfully. “Or a Transfiguration spell?”

“Good idea! Wish it worked,” he agreed, rubbing his jaw. His tone was exasperated and confoundingly fond, as if the creatures were an impishly clever little flourish of breeding, and not nature’s best attempt at a weapon of mass destruction. “Resistant to magic. Clever clogs! Takes about three Stunners to the eye to get the Shortsnout down for her Sleeping Draught, and that only buys you twenty seconds before you’re a meat toastie! Speaking of which.” He slung a leg over his broomstick and hopped into the air. “Gotta go.”

“Do the other champions know about this?” called Harry. “I mean — we’re lucky, thanks to Hagrid, but—”

“Thanks to Hagrid?” said Draco irritably.

“—but the others are going in blind, and if dragons are resistant to magic—”

Charlie laughed. “Give Warrington some credit, he’s smarter than he looks,” he said. “Bloke was down here last week. And just now, the big woman came out for a peek. Dunno but she was pure mad for them, wanted to know everything about them! Tried to chirp me, I think — poor girl, better women have tried — anyway, Wallace sent her off with a stern no peeking. Just like I’m about to do with you lot, come to think.”

“But hang on — how do you subdue them? Stunners? Multiple, simultaneous?”

“Aye, that’s one way. Probably shouldn’t tell you this, but if you want to know the truth, only the scales are spell-resistant. Inside they’re just like any animal, only huge. The trick of a Stunner is nailing the throat or the eye. ’Course, the eye’s your better bet, if you want to stay clear of the breath weapon — whoops , and she’s spitting mad, she nearly got Wally’s leg there! Better give him some help. Gotta go! Good luck, Harry! We're all rooting for you! Dad's trying to get time off for the Tasks. And write soon! Mum misses you!"

With that, the wizard careened into the air, firing off a tricky double-barreled pair of Stunners.

Harry lurched away from the dragonpit like the ground beneath him was the deck of a capsizing boat. Ron noticed and dove after him, catching him before he buckled and was sick into a patch of daisies.

Then he straightened, wiped his mouth, and wobbled into the forest. The three of them tagged after him. Hermione cast one last intense look at the dragonpit behind her, calculating, before Draco sent an annoyed chirp at her, and she joined them.

"Harry?"

Harry swiped his hand over his mouth, walking fast. "What?"

"You alright?"

"Fine," he said. "Great! Great, actually. Couldn't be better."

"We'll figure it out, mate. It's just a big lizard, when you get down to it —"

"I don't want to talk about it," he said doggedly.

A muted roar shuddered the trees behind them. Harry picked up the pace, and soon they were loping across the lawns back to the castle, hugging the curve of the lake. The Durmstrang ship sat pale and ghostly under a quarter-moon's light, like a haunted vessel lifted from the deeps, its dragonhead mast huge and snarling.

At this hour, with curfew fast approaching, Draco didn't mind a bit of haste to get back indoors. So it bemused him when, instead of beelining for the castle, Harry swerved right and made for the beach.

"Potter? What are you doing?"

“Taking a midnight swim,” said Harry grimly. “What does it look like?”

“Drowning yourself, by my best guess,” he called, lagging behind, while Harry and Ron scrambled down the pebbles. “A rational impulse, but not one I can support, in this instance. Come up to the castle, we’ve got work to do.”

Harry pivoted, planting his hands on his hips. The resemblance to Molly Weasley was neither faint nor pleasant. “You get it, don’t you?” he said flatly. “You can count. How many champions know about the dragons? We just saw them; Warrington’s known for a week; and Madame Maxime was there earlier, which means Fleur will know by tomorrow, if she doesn’t already.”

“Obviously. So?”

“So what about Krum?”

“So what about him?” Draco lifted his hands, agitated. “Bonne chance to him and Karkaroff. Maybe he’s been there half a dozen times since Sunday, you don’t know.”

“Or maybe he hasn’t, and he’s the only one going in blind.”

Draco had an unfortunate premonition of the mistake that was about to occur, which, like most of his premonitions, happened too late for anything to be done about it.

“Potter. Be reasonable. He’s your competition.”

“We wouldn’t have known about them, either, if you hadn’t heard that rumor,” Harry said stubbornly. “That’s not a fair advantage, that’s just random chance.”

“Hardly random—”

“Anyway, it’s not fair. He could use the help.”

“He could also report you for cheating,” Draco said. “Inter-school conspiracy is against the rules.”

“No, it’s not,” said Hermione suddenly. She broke out of her reverie in time to thwart him, which was just really typical. He glowered. “It’s implied to be, and you’ll be docked points if you collaborate during the Task. But they don’t say anything about preparing together. Or trading information.”

“Have none of you ever heard ‘it’s the spirit, not the letter’?”

“Yeah, and so what? What’ll they do, disqualify me?” Harry grinned with his teeth, a new and slightly frightening expression. “Stop me from competing? Oh, no.”

“Potter, this is a bad idea. A bad one, do you hear me? Listen! Don’t — Merlin’s blood, there he goes.”

“It’s sort of nice how you still try to stop him,” said Hermione fondly. Draco muttered mutinously, and kicked a rock.

Harry scampered up the gangplank and rapped on the door. Several moments passed, in which Draco aged several years, and as he approached his late twenties a small Durmstrang student poked his head out the door and squinted at Harry in understandable consternation. The two had a short exchange, and then the student disappeared.

Draco was well into middle age when it opened again and Viktor Krum ambled out of the ship. He was in what must have been nightclothes, wearing a peasant tunic and brown drawstring pants, arms folded and hip cocked in the age-old stance of skeptics and disturbed nappers. Standing next to each other, they could have been mistaken for a vaudeville act. Harry barely came up to Krum’s collarbone. The sight did not fill Draco with confidence.

Harry spoke for perhaps twenty seconds, gesturing vaguely and pointing to the sky. Krum’s expression waxed from suspicion to confusion to surprise. When Harry finished he paused, deep in thought, and then said a few words. Harry nodded. Krum opened his mouth, scowled, and then bracketed his chest with his hands in the universal symbol for ‘big.’ He cocked his head. Harry nodded again, harder.

Krum said nothing. Then, silent, he extended his hand. Harry shook it.

The Durmstrang champion disappeared into his ship, and the Hogwarts one jogged back down to the lawns.

“What’d he say?” said Ron eagerly. “Did you ask for an autograph?”

“Yeah, ’course, popped my collar and told him to do it right across the chest — no, mate, what the hell?”

“I was just asking! He’s a celebrity! Could sell that for a killing, come to think.”

“He didn’t know about the dragons,” Harry said, as they climbed back to the castle. “I was right. He was surprised.”

“I suppose his headmaster can’t flirt it out of Hagrid,” muttered Hermione.

“Close-minded of you,” said Ron. “Karkaroff’s not bad-looking.”

“No, but a tad small,” she murmured, and Ron threw back his head and cackled.

Draco cleared his throat. “That reminds me, Granger. We need to revisit the conversation about Obliviation. There are images in my head where there should not be images.”

“I think it’s sweet,” she tried valiantly, the dear little liar. “I imagine it’s hard to find companionship, if you’re looking for… you know, anyone who can understand…”

“Right,” said Draco crisply, “good, thank you, that’s the last call for tonight. My eardrums are closing until the next business day. Thank you for your contributions, but I’ll be hearing from you all again in the morning.”

Harry and Ron laughed at this, which was how they discovered themselves the unwitting victims of a Tongue-Tying Jinx; and the blissful half-hour of peace that followed was well worth having to sprint up all fourteen flights of stairs to Gryffindor Tower.

-ABSTRACT: Snape and Mad-Eye have a staredown in the corridor while their students rapidly try to reevaluate the Hogwarts power structure, ranked by level of intimidation, and finally resolve that the two must occupy a joint deputy position under Minerva McGonagall.

-Writing Mad-Eye is never not absurdly fun. Sure, he hasn't used Unforgivables on kids (yet), but that doesn't mean he's not willing to test their reflexes.

-Can't believe it took three books to get a scene in the Slytherin common room; it's a marvelous place, and by far my favorite common room of all four. For preference, of course. Gryffindor Tower is pretty unbeatable, for coziness.

-Charlie Weasley forbidden character: unlocked. Draco doesn't know the words for "snake bite piercings," but I do, so you get to know that's what he has. He just takes them out when he goes back to the Burrow, because his mum's still grappling with the fact that Bill has an earring, and they'll cross that bridge when they come to it.

-Thank you to those who commented, and to those who've come to chat on tumblr! Makes one feel quite welcome. A bouquet of your favorite non-allergenic flowers to every one of you.

-Next chapter: "Read All About It." And with it, an introduction to the wonderful world of Wizarding journalism.

There really was no spell quite like Levicorpus.

“Are you awake, Potter? Indicate. Else I shall advance to intermediate methods.”

Harry floundered in an upside-down pirouette from his suspended ankle. The wanker made a sound that did not signify consciousness so much as a lot of breath being discharged at once from an inverted windpipe and blundering into the vocal cords on accident. Most people would have accepted it as proof of consciousness.

It was a defining feature of Draco’s character that he was not, nor ever would be, ‘most people.’

“I didn’t hear that.”

Assembled in the Gryffindor dorm, at what Ron judged the “arsecrack of morning,” stood Draco and his proud legionnaires: Ron, in tattered paisley pajamas; Neville, in purple silk jimjams; Dean and Seamus, in faded muggle tee shirts; and Hermione, in a pink bathrobe. It was a worthy squadron, armed to the teeth with wits and wiles and whatever the hell Hermione’s bathrobe was made of, and also about five copies of the Daily Prophet between them, which, by Draco’s estimation, were more than enough to beat someone to death, if you put your back into it.

“Well, I gave you a chance. Anyway, no one can say I didn’t, and that’s what matters.”

“What?” said Harry blearily, and he enjoyed a few moments of reacquaintance with the surface of his mattress before the pair of them were joined by a deluge of cold water.

“Initiating intermediate methods.”

“OI! FINE! I’M AWAKE!”

“Do you think he’s up?” said Draco, yawning, to Ron. “I’m a bit deaf. Need a second opinion.”

“Nah, mate, I can’t hear him,” said Ron sadly. “Think he’s in a coma.”

“Drat. You know, if you can take over the Aguamenti, we might be able to engineer some sort of spit-roasting situation—”

“Piss off, both of you,” gasped Harry, thrashing to the edge of the bed. “Is the castle on fire? What’s happening?”

Two copies of the Daily Prophet hit him in the face, more or less concurrently. Draco exchanged a firm handshake with Seamus to congratulate his timing.

Hermione gave him his glasses and a sympathetic look.

“Mrph,” said Harry, reading. Then: “Ugh.” And, moreover: “Oh, God.”

Then, at last, with mortal fear: “Hermione, I swear—”

“Oh, Harry, I actually thought it was rather sweet,” she said, covering a yawn. “I’m sending a copy to my mum. She’ll be really excited that my name's been in the paper.”

She was useless. Draco gave her a look that conveyed his disappointment in her lack of vitriol.

“Don’t look at me like that! I made it very clear I was here under protest. You know perfectly well that Harry didn’t say any of this.”

“I’ll hear that from him, first.”

“Er — I did say some of it,” Harry admitted, “but it — hang on! No! Listen! Skeeter took it all out of context, and she left loads out. She brought up Hermione, not me.”

“Did she,” said Draco. He twirled his wand through his fingers.

“Since when were you a top student?” hooted Ron. “You been pulling O’s when my back was turned?”

“I never said that! She made that up!”

“She did quite a bit of that, it seems,” said Draco.

“Yeah! She did! Like here — I never winked at Fleur! She’s three years older than me and barely knows I exist, and anyway, I wouldn’t — I can’t even wink! And I did not give her a ‘flirtatious grin’!”

Ron lifted his paper up to the ceiling light as if to christen it. “Lads. Advice. I’m thinking of getting ‘watch out ladies, he’s trouble’ tattooed on my back.”

“Can’t, I’m already doing it with Seamus,” said Dean.

“Bastards. Then can I have ‘the longing touch of a thousand teenage girls’?”

“No, I’m doing ‘the longing touch of a thousand teenage girls.’”

“Damn you, Longbottom. Fine, I’ll take ‘an aggressively deliberate raggedness,’ but nothing less.”

Harry stood up and found himself far closer to the point of Draco’s wand than he had been previously. He sat down, to reestablish distance with it.

“‘Stunningly pretty’?”

“I don’t know where she got that,” he said immediately. “Not that it’s wrong — or just, not that no one would say it, I just wouldn’t — I mean, but not like that, Hermione, you’re pretty, really, I guess—”

On many different levels, this was the wrong move. It was the wrong move to Hermione, who stiffened and gave an awkward, crooked little smile at the backhanded compliment; it was the wrong move to the assembled boys, who groaned like they were watching a bad quidditch play; and it was very much the wrong move to Draco, who was struck by a wave of meanness so acute it was painful, a prickling impulse to do something petty and vicious. He fingered the grip of his wand instead of saying what came to mind, which was a jinx he’d only ever read once in the margins of a book with three different warnings under it.

“I give up,” said Harry loudly, climbing back into bed. “I’m going back to sleep, and maybe when I wake up, this will be over. I don’t even know why you’re mad at me! It makes me look like a ponce.”

Hermione was slowly mummifying herself in fabric, descending into a chrysalis of pink-and-brown fuzz. She really was half hair, when you got down to it — hair and eyes; big mean doe-eyes full of wonder and cunning, like nature’s Stunning Spell, so intense they ought to have been classified as a weapon. If you were going to call her pretty, it would be because of the eyes. The rest of her face, while not unpleasant, simply got lost in the comparison. A liberal smear of freckles trailed lazily from ear to ear, like whoever made her face had elected for a garnish. A nice chin, a wide nose. A mouth, if you paid attention to that sort of thing.

Stunningly pretty might not have been the first phrase a reporter would choose, if they’d seen her, but that wasn’t for lack of pretty. It just wasn’t how a stranger would realistically describe Hermione’s face. Stunning was closer. Or other strong attributive verbs: Staggering. Startling. Imposing. Words conveying force, basically. She spoke with an unconscious gravity that hauled everyone’s attention kicking and screaming into the ambit of her voice, where she held them until she was finished.

It was hard to describe, but he couldn't imagine walking into a room and not knowing she was there. Her presence clicked a light on in the back of his brain.

"I don't care what she says about me, you know," Hermione said waspishly, mistaking his attention for pity. This was a classic Granger mistake, and it hauled him straight back to earth, which was a relief, since he'd been somewhere strange and woozy; possibly he'd been hexed. "It's a tabloid puff piece. The muggle world's full of them. It doesn't mean anything, I know that."

"I never said it did."

"You're acting like it did."

He shrugged. "Good for a laugh," he said carelessly, and jinxed his copy of the Prophet on fire.

Gryffindor Tower, being a highly mature and even-tempered collection of wizards, found the article hilarious. The next few days saw it papered over every unlikely combination of doors, walls, ceilings, toilet stalls, shower curtains, and so forth. Lavender and Parvati made name tags that said 'HARRY POTTER'S WINSOME WITCHES' and distributed them, giggling, among the girls of Gryffindor Tower — with the exception of Ginny, who, in a fit of pique, pitched the whole lot in a bin after Romilda Vane cracked a joke about harems. Lee Jordan charmed a plaque that read 'HOME OF THE CROWN PRINCE OF HOGWARTS' beneath the Pink Lady, and Fred and George staged nightly dramatic readings of the article around the common room fire.

This was funny until it wasn't. Outside Gryffindor, people gave Harry the kind of dirty stares you might well be inviting, if you honestly claimed to be the 'crown prince' of anything, or sent 'sly looks' at your interviewer in print. There were whispers when he stepped into a room, and more whispers when he stepped out of it. Someone accused him of misogyny for winking at Fleur Delacour; someone accused him of bigotry for not winking at anyone else. The politics of it all were inscrutable and bad.

Perhaps worst of all, some of the backlash splattered Hermione. Having any part of your appearance described by a major news organization was taken by most people as an invitation to loudly and publicly pass judgment on it, which was good news if you happened to be a supermodel and/or deity, and terrible news if you were anyone else. Someone approached her after Transfiguration and demanded to know if she was “the pretty Hermione Granger,” which gave Draco a chance to try out the Ear-Shriveling Curse they’d learned that morning, and gave Hermione a chance to shout a lecture on the importance of critical media consumption into their rapidly desiccating ears. Undeterred, or perhaps uninformed, another person appeared after Potions the next day, inquiring if she “had ever heard of Sleekeazy Serum,” and proceeded, without waiting for an answer, to explain what it was: this individual was rescued by Hermione herself, who deflected what Draco thought was a rather apt Hair Loss Curse with her Shield Charm, and then hauled him out of the dungeons before he could think of any other thematically appropriate punishments.

He had received three detentions, all from an increasingly exasperated Professor McGonagall; the fourth one, he earned after he made eye contact with her while dangling Ernie “Well, For A Muggle-Born” Macmillan by his ankle over the third-floor banister.

“Morning, professor.”

“Good morning, M— Mister Malfoy! What are you doing? Release Mr. Macmillan at once!”

Following this instruction to the letter would have sent poor Ernie on an expeditious visit to the bottom of the staircase. Draco was generous, however. He left him dangling from a sconce.

“Same time tonight, professor?”

“Spare me your attempts to be amusing,” she said plaintively, and hurried to get him down.

As November drew on, the less Harry seemed to care about his reputation, and for good reason: if he didn’t come up with a way to best a dragon, he would have very little time to worry about his reputation at all. Hermione carted a N.E.W.T.’s worth of reading back from the library, and doling out assignments, the four of them assembled for marathon reading groups in the common room, trawling for information through the eyewatering depths of Dragon Breeding For Pleasure and Profit, and From Egg to Inferno: a Dragon-Keeper's Guide.

“To wit,” said Draco, “most of these are books on dragonkeeping, the main thrust of which seems to be keeping the animal alive.”

“Yes, but the only other books were in the Restricted Section.”

“That’s where the ones on killing them will be,” he said, stretching his back with a catlike twist of his spine. They had been reading so long that the light from the window was pointing in a different direction than when they’d started. “They won’t give books on dragonslaying to first years.”

“Charlie said you weren’t supposed to kill them,” objected Harry. “Norberta’s endangered, and Hagrid hatched her. He’d never forgive me.”

“Fine. Subduing them, then. Although, between you and me, if you get the chance, one less dragon in the world—”

“I’m not killing them.”

“I assure you, they don’t share your reservations.”

“‘Dragons are extremely difficult to slay, owing to the ancient magic that imbues their thick hides…’ very helpful, thanks,” muttered Hermione, and tossed aside Dancing With Dragons. “Doesn’t anyone know how to slow them down? A Stunning Spell is one thing, but it takes about four to knock them out, and it would take a miracle for Harry to land one in the eye from the ground.”

“Feeling great, team,” said Harry. “Keep that positivity rolling.”

Ron planted his elbows on the table and ruffled his hair, as if he could shake a good idea out of it. “Maybe there’s a trick to it, innit? Think of it like a game… What’s the most dangerous part of the dragon?”

“Fangs,” said Hermione.

“Fire,” said Draco.

“Claws.”

“Tail.”

“Size.”

“Bloodlust.”

“That doesn’t count.”

“Like hell.”

“It doesn’t!”

“Does.”

“You can’t kill something with bloodlust alone—”

“Can, and I’ve seen you try.”

“Oi,” said Ron loudly, banging his Standard Book of Spells like a gavel. “Not the time! Can we get the Swot Squad on something useful, thank you? What can Harry use to get close to the eye?”

Hermione screwed up her nose in thought. “We could try Transfiguration,” she suggested. “A Shrinking Charm—”

“Spell resistant,” said Draco, balling up a bit of parchment for a shot on the bin.

“Or Harry could make himself bigger? An Engorgio?”

“He’d need to do quite a bit of engorging before he was anywhere near their size, and that spell is patently horrifying when it goes wrong. You remember what happened to Finnigan’s toes.”

She cringed.

“I suppose,” she said, hesitatingly, “we’re doing Containment Circles in Runes; if you could slap down a ring before it got to you… but I don’t know where you’d get the blood…”

“The blood?” said Harry, alert at once. “What blood? Whose blood?”

“Goat’s,” said Draco, waving lazily, “usually. Calm down. Though, to the point, Potter could always use intravenous.”

“Wrong, Dark, and illegal,” said Hermione, scribbling something in a margin, “not to mention unhygienic.”

“So’s dying.”

“But I haven’t taken Runes,” said Harry flatly. “Whatever a runic circle is, I’m not going to be able to pick it up over the weekend. And I don’t want to do anything with blood. Mine or goat’s.”

“Close-minded of you.”

“We’re going at this wrong,” decided Ron, shutting his book. “We’re all thinking about how Hermione would do it. Including you, Hermione, no offense. But we should play to his strengths, yeah? Nothing fancy, just plain, simple stuff Harry can do.”

Draco had the opportunity to say something rude, then, but he refrained. For this not even one person applauded him, and it was perturbing. “We might start with practical magic,” he suggested. “Flying, magical artifacts, et cetera. And you’ve got reflexes. If one of the tasks were to catch a Snitch, for instance, or to duel one of your competitors, one on one — I mean, you would have a better chance. But they’re not going to make it that easy. This will be about cunning. Strategy. Precision.”

“Are you campaigning? Because I can’t actually let you and Hermione do the Task for me, like tag-team boxing.”

“I don’t know what that is. No, don’t tell me, I don’t care. And of course you can’t, I already looked into it.”

“That was a joke.”

“What about his broomstick?” said Ron, epiphanous.

Draco lifted his head from a restorative sojourn on the table and squinted. “...It exists. It flies. What about it?”

“Think, egghead. How can we get it to him?”

“Shrinking Charm, in the pocket?” Harry offered.

“Can’t take anything with you but your wand,” muttered Hermione, paging through the rulebook.

“Er… transfigure something?”

“And who will be executing this transfiguration?” said Draco, mildly intrigued. “Yesterday, he struggled with the Beetle-Button Charm.”

“Hey, I did it, didn’t I?”

“Depends how many legs you like on your buttons.”

“Summoning Charm,” said Hermione absently, turning a page. “That’s how he could get it into the arena. Summon it.”

The three of them stared at her.

“That’s a bloody great idea,” said Ron, after a moment. “Why couldn’t you come up with that earlier?”

She looked up, nose wrinkling. “Because it wouldn’t work,” she said. “He’d have to Summon it through at least one wall, which would probably break it. Or hit someone, though I’m sure that’s not as much concern to anyone here as breaking a blessed broomstick—”

“Obviously not. Potter’s broom is a collector’s-edition vintage Nimbus, we’re not risking it on some mangy first year’s skull,” said Draco incredulously.

“Okay, but — but! We could plant it somewhere near the arena! Or one of us could sneak it in through the stands!” Ron was eager.

“Logistically unfeasible. Also, spectators can’t interfere.”

“It’s not interfering if he Summons it off us, is it?” Ron’s tone waxed sly. “We haven’t done anything.”

“It’s a good thought,” agreed Draco, who more than anyone could admire a slimy technicality, “and your loophole is, admittedly, robust, but we won’t have the chance.”

“Why not?”

“Because if any of the administrators have a fraction of a brain, there’ll be Anti-Enchantment Shields on the audience, so stray spells won’t hit spectators,” said Hermione, slamming the book shut. She scribbled something in her journal, frowned at it, and threw down her quill as if it had offended her. “Nothing Harry casts will touch us. Or anything outside the arena.”

“Okay, so, not to be ungrateful or anything — and thank you guys, again, for your help, really — but just taking stock,” said Harry patiently, “as of right now, we have: about half a dozen things I can’t do; one that I can, but won’t be able to; and nothing — again, just checking in — nothing, yet, that might actually, feasibly, work. To defeat the dragon.”

He spread his hands inquiringly.

“That’s about it, yeah,” said Ron.

“Right. Cool. Which leaves us… where, exactly?”

“Precisely nowhere,” sighed Hermione, shoving back her chair. “Which means it’s time to go to the Restricted Section.”

The hour-bell interrupted them with the unwelcome reminder that they did, in fact, go to school, and while Harry was fully ready to sacrifice Divination to keep preparing, they agreed that removing the joy of Arithmancy from Hermione’s day would be like kicking a niffler. Draco lived to regret this. An hour of work with Professor Vector, who was dragging them through a grueling unit on number ciphers, would ordinarily have been a pleasant intellectual exercise, but his brain was already wrung-out from the effort of preparations, and so he missed a frameshift that made he and Hermione do the whole thing twice over.

“It’s still better than Divination,” muttered Hermione, as they packed up their papers and abaci. “Ron says Trelawney’s in rare form. ‘Oooh… When the trine of Mars meets the sextant of Venus, and the tropic of Capricorn is waxing gibbous, a Leo with meteorological scarring will suffer a violent end…’”

“Why, Granger, you never told me you had the Sight.”

“Those with great powers must use them sparingly,” she said loftily, and they snickered their way to dinner. It was a good night: he managed several spoonfuls of a truly delectable lobster bisque before Hermione lost patience and dragged him to the library.

Give him some sort of disorder, she would. Madwoman.

The library was nearly empty at this hour, its towering aisles shadowed and vacant. Dancing spots of torchlight that skittered here and there like mice on the Turkish carpets. Abandoned desks lay strewn with scratch and books, chairs askew, evidence of their users’ hasty desertion at the dinner bell. Their footsteps creaked on weathered floorboards. At this time of night, the windows were a dull, dark blue, sinking swiftly into nightfall, a reminder of curfew’s approach.

“Where’s Madam Pince?”

“At dinner, with everyone else,” she said. “We should be able to get into the Restricted Section with Alohamora, we’ll just have to be quick. I should’ve taken the Cloak… I can forge McGonagall’s signature, in a pinch, but I’d prefer not to.”

“Lovely,” he said. “Unrelated, but do you remember when you yelled at me and Potter for getting detention, back in first year?”

“I was eleven. And terrified of getting expelled. Are you still sore?”

“I’ve found it in myself to move on,” he said nobly, swirling a Muffliato over their shoulders. “Thinking of how times change. That’s all.”

The Restricted Section was a small chamber of polished cherry wood, fragrant with wood lacquer and the dry earthy scent of old books. The sight of it elicited from Hermione a soft happy sound, like a bird returning to its nest, and Draco bit down on his cheek to keep his face from doing anything in particular about it.

Ten minutes later, there were no such sounds to be heard. The section on dragons was empty, its shelves gaping with missed volumes like a string of lost teeth. There was nothing to read but imprints in the dust.

“You’re joking,” said Hermione, dumbfounded. “What kind of person —?”

“Warrington.”

“The Head Boy? No.” She sounded far from certain. “He wouldn’t.”

“Yeah? Who else?”

“I — maybe one of the Tournament officials came through, and removed them—”

“Just because he’s a ponce doesn’t mean he’s entirely brainless. I’ll bet you a hundred galleons that the minute he knew it was dragons, he came straight here and cleaned them out. It serves him, and it keeps the other champions from learning.”

She rolled her fingers together with a frustrated thoughtfulness. Turning on her heel, she remarked, “It really should have been Cedric.”

He snorted.

“What?”

“Do you think Diggory wouldn’t have done the same?”

“Cedric wouldn’t have done anything this underhanded. He’s a good sport.”

“And you’d know, would you?”

“Surely you can see that you’re being irrational,” she sighed, sweeping out of the Restricted Section.

“And you’re refusing to see reason.”

“Oh, but I expect you’ll instruct me.”

“Diggory is just as competitive as anyone else.”

“I don’t know why you’re so prejudiced against him—”

“Prejudiced? Prejudiced!”

“Yes, prejudiced, because he’s handsome, I suppose—”

Her remark sent a firestorm of bad prickles up and down his arms. He stopped. Hermione, lost in thought, marched on for several feet before she noticed. She pivoted, her hands lodged firmly in preemptive judgment on her waist.

“All right. What is it?”

He spoke slowly and coolly, polishing his signet ring on his robe. “Even if he were, supposedly, ‘handsome’ — which I don’t see, frankly, he’s got a mouth like a dead fish and wears enough pomade to grease an axle — you’re the one who’s always bringing it up. Maybe it’s you who can’t see past his looks.”

“Oh, come off it,” she said in amazement. “I never said anything—”

“Liar.”

“What — that? It was a joke! Ginny was being embarrassingly obvious. You can’t be that delusional.”

“Says the witch who thinks his hair’s perfect,” he said, clipped, and stalked past her.

Her jaw dropped. Danger grazed its fingers down the back of his neck, like the premonitory jitter of a thunderstorm, and a little eagerness. She took a deep, noisy breath, fueling up for a proper go at him. They hadn’t rowed properly in a while.

He was mounting up for a daring Granger Distraction Ploy by way of academic inquiry, possibly followed with a patented Malfoy Routing Maneuver via theoretically dubious suggestion, when some irrelevant wanker cleared his throat and stepped into the aisle.

“Zdraveĭ,” said Viktor Krum.

They froze.

“I am sorry to surprise,” said Krum stiffly. “I did not mean to sneak.”

“It’s not your fault in the slightest,” Hermione assured him. “We apologize for disturbing you. You’ve caught us in the middle of something.”

“Something private,” said Draco.

“Ah,” said Krum.

“Not that private,” said Hermione.

“I see,” said Krum.

“Reasonably private,” said Draco, through gritted teeth.

Krum tilted his head at an angle communicating maximum confusion. He gave a surly, unimpressed grunt, and then pointed at them with a finger and pinky.

“You,” he said, “are Potter’s friends. I have seen you with him, when he comes to the ship.” He pointed at Hermione. “I have read papers. His girl.”

“His what?”

“His girl. Potter’s girl.” He cocked his head even further. It was becoming apparent that his surly look, which Draco had mistaken for misery, was in fact a mask of deep confusion at many bizarre conspiracies of the world, one of which, assuredly, was the idea that

Hermione Granger would ever allow herself to become romantically affiliated with Harry ‘T for Tried’ Potter. “Top marks?”

“No. I mean, yes, that’s me, but we’re not — I’m his friend. There’s nothing — it’s really not, I mean — he’s nice — but friends! Only! Do you understand? Just friends!”

She leapt up an octave apiece on the last three words. Draco, who was enjoying the conversation about as much as he would a haircut with a rusty trowel, looked at Hermione in frank wonder at this verbal explosion. She glowered at him.

“Not his girl,” Krum said, frowning. “But you are — Herm-ee-own?”

Draco laughed. Loudly. They both stared at him for a moment.

“Right, so, no,” she said bravely. “It’s Her-my-onee, actually. Like my-own.”

“Her-my-own.”

“Her -mio-nee. Oh-nee. Nee, nee.”

“Nee. Nee. Hermione.”

“Yes, good.”

Krum’s scowl cracked and flickered into a dull little smile. “Yes? That is good?”

“To be clear, the grading curve is obscene,” said Draco. “It’s flat as a carpark. We’re wrestling on the knife-edge of ‘pass’ and ‘fail’ here.”

“A good name,” said Krum. “Her- mione. Strong name. Hearty.”

“Well, thank you,” said Hermione, perplexed and pleased in equal measure. She gave a sly, awkward smile, and Draco had a premonition that he was about to hear something terrible. “I suppose anything’s heartier than, er — a Crumb.”

Draco touched his throat in appalment. He did consider walking out of the library, but it would leave the two of them alone, a conspiracy that might well conclude in the heat-death of the English language.

Krum peered at her for several seconds, which crawled by as eons.

He threw his head back and bellowed a laugh that shook the dust from the rafters.

“Funny! That is funny! Very good!”

“No, it wasn’t, you idiot,” Draco hissed, “and pipe down, or Madam Pince will hear, and if I get detention because you’ve never heard a bloody joke before—”

Heedless, Krum hunkered down over his knees and continued to laugh for a full minute. When he straightened, he carefully shuttered his expression back into a glower, but his eyes were bright, and his cheeks were red.

“You,” he said, “are funny. But I must go.”

“Thanks,” said Hermione, so smug she might have broken into a purr. “It’s been a pleasure talking to you.”

“Yes. It has. Goodnight, Pale Man and Hermown.”

He pivoted on his heel and marched out.

“Oh,” called Hermione, “Oh, actually, it’s not — well, never mind.”

With a flourish of a fur cloak, he was gone.

“Granger.”

“He liked it,” Hermione said loftily. “He thought it was good.”

“He’s a quidditch player,” said Draco. “He’s been regularly concussed for years.”

“Or maybe I’m funny.”

“Maybe brain damage is infectious.”

“In fact, I’m hilarious.”

“You’re in want of a good pinching, is what you are.”

The green banker’s lamp still glowed at the desk Krum had abandoned, and a few books sprawled lasciviously over the desk. Lazy sod hadn’t even cleaned up his misses. Draco drifted close enough to inspect them, hoping for some indecorous reading, and found instead a headachy box of Cyrillic script. It had to be Krum’s, then.

A nosy witch pressed up against his shoulder. “What was he reading?”

He passed the book to her, and she cradled it like a baby in the crook of her arm. “No idea, it’s foreign. He must have forgotten to take it with him.”

“But it’s got the Hogwarts stamp,” said Hermione curiously, tapping the inside cover. She flipped to the title page. “That’s interesting, though, I wonder if he can read English… ‘The Golden Fleece and the Heroes Who Lived Before Achilles’? By Padraic Colum? What’s his interest in that?”

“Hello.” His eyebrow lifted. “Since when can you read Russian?”

“It’s not, it’s Bulgarian,” she said. She expertly slipped her thumb along the pages and found one that was dog-eared. “I read that dictionary you bought me. I’m not very good, but ‘Achilles’ is translated phonetically, and the rest is literal… you can sort of… infer… aha.”

She dumped the book on the table and stabbed her finger at a urchin-shaped black splotch in the margins. When she swiped it, a trace of ink clung to her index. “It’s fresh,” she said, with deep satisfaction. “He must have spilled it.”

“Well done, Constable Granger. We ride at dawn to draw and quarter him.”

“Don’t you see? That means he was reading it,” she said eagerly, wiping her finger on his shirt. He squawked and slapped her hand away, tempted to remind her of the number of organs she would have to sell to afford a replacement. “And taking notes. So he thought it was important. Come on, keep up, Malfoy.”

She flashed him a lightning grin, altogether too evocative of Harry, as was Malfoy; he didn’t like the sound of it in her mouth at all.

This was why no one ought to laugh at her jokes. It gave her ideas.

“Fine.” It was surly. “Can you translate?”

“Some. I’d need more time to do it all.” She fumbled out her English-Bulgarian dictionary, which, he was gratified to see, made a home in the same poor prolapsed bookbag that had carried all her other textbooks for three years. Since it could scarcely fit another teaspoon without ripping at every seam, this was great flattery.

“Loan me a quill and parchment. I’ll help.”

“You don’t read Cyrillic.”

He sniffed. “Then I’ll figure it out, won’t I? I broke Vector’s Playfair cipher, and this can’t possibly be worse.”

In fact, it could. They bracketed the Colum book with pages of script, sharing the dictionary between them, and putting their heads together engaged in their second daily dose of codebreaking. It had all the hallmarks of a study session — the squabbling for use of the book, muttered consultations on dangling participles, nitpicking the other’s choice of notation — with none of the academic pressure.

They were racing each other, naturally, because whoever finished first — well, they finished first. It was like competitive extracurricular homework.

One would have to be a deeply diseased individual to take pleasure in any part of it.

Draco threw his quill down first, snapped: “Ha!” and leered at her.

“You did not!” She snapped up her head, caught sight of his finished page, and tossed her quill away. “Damn it!”

“Don’t take it personally, Granger, I’m something of a savant.”

“No, you kept hogging the dictionary!”

He sat back, lacing his fingers behind his head in adulation. “Mmmno. I think I’m just really that good. Greek, Latin, French, Bulgarian… what can’t I do?”

“Fit your head through a doorframe,” she said flatly, hoisting the paper towards her. “Let’s see if any of this is actually legible, shall we?”

For all their efforts, the translated passage was rather short.

Then Jason saw something that was like a cloud filled with the light of the rising sun. It hung from a great oak tree. In awe he stood and looked upon it, knowing that at last he looked upon THE GOLDEN FLEECE.

His hand let slip Medea’s hand and he went to seize the Fleece. As he did he heard a dreadful hiss. And then he saw the guardian of the Golden Fleece. Coiled all around the tree, with outstretched neck and keen and sleepless eyes, was a deadly serpent. Its hiss ran all through the grove and the birds that were wakening up squawked in terror.

Like rings of smoke that rise one above the other, the coils of the serpent went around the tree — coils covered by hard and gleaming scales. It uncoiled, stretched itself, and lifted its head to strike. Then Medea dropped on her knees before it, and began to chant her Magic Song.

As she sang, the coils around the tree grew slack. Like a dark, noiseless wave the serpent sank down on the ground. But still its jaws were open, and those dreadful jaws threatened Jason. Medea, with a newly cut spray of juniper dipped in mystic brew, touched its deadly eyes. And still she chanted her Magic Song. The serpent's jaw closed; its eyes became deadened; far through the grove its length was stretched out.

Then Jason took the Golden Fleece.

"Always thought he was a bit of a pig, Jason."

"Hm? Why?"

He reached over her arm and tapped the name Medea. "That's his lover," he said. "A witch. She helps him steal that glittery bit of couture, and then he forsakes her to marry a king's daughter."

"Oh." Hermione sounded quite sad for her.

"Buck up, she hardly took it lying down. She gave his bride a cursed wedding dress that burned her to death, and the king died trying to save her. And Medea killed her two sons with Jason for fear of retribution."

Hermione pressed a knuckle to her mouth.

"Overkill," she decided, though she sounded like it was a hard call.

"Not to the Greeks."

“You know, I’m not sure what I’m supposed to gather from that story.”

“That’s fine, it’s less important than what Krum’s gathering. Why do you think he’s been reading up on the Colchian Dragon?”

“For the First Task, naturally,” she said, impatiently, “but I don’t see why. This is a myth. It’s not practical advice on taming dragons, it’s just a story.”

“And you’ve never picked up some good advice from a story, have you?”

“What do you mean?”

It was a rare triumph when he thought of something before she did; he celebrated, in fine spirits, by dangling the page in front of her face. “Come on, Granger. Keep up. What’s she doing?”

She snatched it out of the air. “Singing, obviously,” she snapped. “Singing a magic song to put it to sleep, which, having heard Harry in the shower, is a long shot at best—”

“Not just singing. What does she do to it? Cite your sources.”

“Someday I’m going to skin you, really, truly, I will,” she muttered. “Let’s see… ‘with a newly cut spray of juniper dipped in mystic brew, she touched its deadly eyes.’ Oh, good.” She slapped it down on the table. “She touched it with a stick! How enlightening.”

He pulled out his wand and rolled it through his fingers. He was still trying to learn Mad-Eye’s trick with the knuckles.

“Indeed. If only we had a special stick of some kind,” he said, spinning it around his thumb. “Capable of producing supernatural effects. Or perhaps even a mystic brew.”

“Oh my God.”

“Ah, here she comes.”

“Ten points to Gryffindor,” he said, flipping his wand in the air and pocketing it. “And five more, if you noticed where she casts the spell.”

“I’ll snap my wand if it isn’t in the eyes.”

“Merlin, but it’s good to be brilliant. What would you even do without me, I wonder? Die, I suppose.”

“Are you done? I mean really, are you quite finished?”

“Oh, never. Now, tell me your idea. If you let me continue I might accidentally revolutionize wand technology or solve Linear A or something. And I don’t need you plotting to slit my throat from jealousy, or to jinx my bride’s wedding gown, or some such Grangerly vengeance.”

“Why would I bother with the gown? She’s marrying you. I can’t do worse to her than that.”

“Zing. Talk.” He kicked the leg of her chair. “You’ve had a full fifteen seconds to come up with something, I have high expectations.”

“It depends on how quickly you can brew a Sleeping Draught,” she said, already reaching for her notebook.

He cocked his head. “Under what conditions?”

“Non-ideal. Assume you don’t have a vent, a stovetop, or a stasis chamber.”

“So this is a bathroom operation?”

“Hypothetically,” she said, a touch defensive.

“Dreadful. Forty-seven minutes. Plus time to cool.”

She paused. Her expression was redolent with eyebrow.

He disgorged a piece of lint from his sleeve with extreme prejudice. “What?”

“Professor Snape gave us two hours of class time.”

“That’s his business. Forty-seven minutes, unless the valerian’s dry, in which case, an hour.”

“How strong can you make it?”

“In standard ‘strength of potion’ units? What kind of question is that? It’ll work.”

“How well?”

“Very!”

“On a scale from one to dead?”

“Catatonia.”

She blinked. “Really?”

He rolled his hand dismissively. “I didn’t spend all my summer perfecting the Wronski Feint.”

She smiled. In her face glowed his own prickling eagerness, a whetted appetite for unsolved puzzles, an unfinished challenge. “Good,” she said, tearing open a blank page in her notebook. “In that case, we’re about to take a lovely stroll down memory lane—”

“Absolutely not.”

“To Myrtle’s bathroom,” she said cheerfully.

Her excitement phased rapidly from inspiring to horrifying. “Pardon me, I want a clarification. Even presuming Potter has the most mind-numbing Sleeping Draught imaginable, which, of course, he will, he'd still have to administer the potion. To a dragon. Trying to kill him."

"Oh, he won't," she said, annotating furiously. "We will."

"...Will what?"

"Give it to the dragon," she said. She speared the inkwell like she was staking a vampire and whisked back to the page. "Before the task. It'll be slow and sleepy, much easier for him to hit with a spell. Then all he has to do is hurry and finish the challenge before it wears off."

He stared at her.

"What?" she said.

"Oh, it's very good and everything. Potter stands a very low chance of being eaten. I do, however, wonder who will stop the dragon from eating us."

"But it'll be easier for us," she said patiently, "because we haven't got to follow the rules. We can bring the Invisibility Cloak. Dragon eyesight is terrible, you know. I read it in—"

"From Egg to Inferno, yes, I remember. You might also remember their eyesight is compensated by a rather exceptional sense of smell."

"It's only for a few minutes. We'll be in and out."

"You're serious."

"Perfectly," she said, and stabbed a full stop into the paper with great relish.

"Granger. Look at me. You want me to fight a dragon."

She lifted her head, blinking away the fog of inspiration. “I don’t want anyone to fight it,” she said. “They’re endangered, and anyway, that’s Harry’s job. We’ve only got to make it a little easier.”

“And you still don’t think this is somehow an inappropriate thing to ask? Of me? Draco Malfoy, a supremely talented, but nevertheless regrettably mortal man?”

Hermione looked at him with the blank stare of someone who had never heard of such a thing as dying before.

“I can ask Ron,” she suggested, hesitantly. “If you don’t want to.”

Of course he didn’t want to. On the order of things he didn’t want to do, this was skyrocketing past setting fire to his Nimbus and sharing a bed with Neville. It was establishing new hemispheres of Things He Didn’t Want To Do.

But on the other hand. On the other hand, however.

Hermione had a certain way that she looked at someone when they’d done something that made her really, exceptionally happy, like she wanted to blow trumpets and hang posters of their face on every wall in the known world. And the less often she looked at anyone like that, the better it would be for his mental wellbeing.

“You might as well kill him yourself,” he said, massaging his eyes. “He’d mistake it for butterbeer and drink it.”

“I could try—”

“Don’t bother. We both know you couldn’t last ten seconds on a broomstick with a knife at your throat.”

She rubbed a writer’s callus on her third finger. “Well,” she said, “I still won’t make you, if you’d rather not.”

“My recommendation is that you stop talking before my good sense returns from its smoke break and flips over all the furniture in my brain in a rage-induced frenzy," he said wearily. "In the meantime, you get the cauldron, I've got to go nag Longbottom for some valerian. But we're brewing in the empty Charms classroom, this time. I am sick to death of bathroom smell, and I am not going to spend my last week alive listening to Myrtle complaining about blockages in the pipes."

-This chapter was brought to you by PhotoPea. PhotoPea: "When you're too cheap for PhotoShop."

-Interesting fun fact about formatting images and special media on AO3: it is bad! And it makes me suffer.

-Note on the illustrations! Many headcanon Harry's appearance differently from the movies, and I am in fact one of those people, but the stills were just a convenient resource for the article. I don't necessarily imagine Harry looking like Daniel, so if you're like me, and it bugs you, please consider the newspaper clippings a piece of extracanonical fanart (just one made by the author).

-Someone in the comments for last chapter mentioned reawakening a latent crush on Charlie Weasley, and I want you to know that that is exactly what I intended. One of the core tenets of writing fic is that everyone's favorite character must be hot. It doesn't matter who they are. They could have all of three lines, one appearance on page 492 of Book 5, a name-drop in a non-canonical appendix, it doesn't matter. You deserve to have your favorite character look hot in print, and goddamnit, I'm showing up to deliver.

-This chapter's a bit shorter than usual — apologetic shoutout to that one person who told me to not cut anything, you are an enabler and I love you — because it's sandwiched between two hefty neighbors: "Norberta" (10k) and the upcoming chapter (11k). This three-chapter sequence was originally two, but when I went back to chop them up, I realized that it needed another cut for pacing, and 40 ended up getting squished. I don't have any reservation about posting long chapters (the Yule Ball chapter is currently around 16,000 words, so, you know) but in a serial piece of fiction, throwing in chapter breaks allows the material to settle, and hopefully draws attention to smaller elements that would otherwise get overshadowed by set pieces, or just washed out in all the dialogue.

-That being said: the next chapter will be called "Trial By Fire."

-As usual, thank you to everyone who commented! Seriously, I read them all, and if I haven't replied, there's a non-negligible chance I'm hoarding it jealously in my unreads as a treat. I hope that sometime today, you hear your favorite song playing somewhere you didn't expect it.

Trial by Fire

Chapter 41: Trial by Fire

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

The last week of November left in a capricious flutter of brown leaves and late nights. At mealtimes, he drilled curses and jinxes with Harry and Hermione until his palm ached. In the evenings he ran through batches of Sleeping Draught until he could brew it blindfolded by touch and scent, and then he ran through a dozen more, experimenting with stray rats that Crookshanks fetched him from the Owlery. The night before, Ron and Harry snuck down to the kitchens and brought back a raw slab of beef for a more palatable infusion. This was wrapped in paper and twine, and tucked in a satchel, which made him feel like nothing so much as the village errand boy.

The preparations distracted him from the assurance of doom that loomed over his head. Or, at least, this was what he told Harry, who kept badgering him not to do it, as if some part of him understood that this was the one way to assure that Draco inevitably must.

“You’re kidding.”

“You shouldn’t do it.”

“I fully agree.”

“I won’t let you.”

“That’s a good joke.”

“You could get hurt.”

“Occupational hazard.”

“Of what?”

“Keeping you alive,” he said irritably, and twitched the hangings of his bed shut.

December of 1994 was born on a bright, beautiful morning, and Draco woke up wanting it dead. He dressed in silence while Harry did the same, avoiding awkward eye contact at all costs. At breakfast, they had a formal standoff: everyone agreed that everyone should eat something, but no one wanted to touch a bite.

To get the ball rolling, Hermione took two slices of toast and started buttering them with enough force to skin a rabbit. “So. Harry. How are you feeling?”

“Excellent,” said Harry. “Might pop down to the pitch and have a quick friendly before.”

Hermione poured herself a cup of coffee. The pot rattled. “Think of it this way. In 1871, the First Task was to capture a Giant Boar in the Forbidden Forest. The champions disappeared for three weeks. One died, one went mad, and the boar was never found.”

She took a bite of toast and held it in her mouth, pensively.

“Hey, Hermione?” said Ron. “If I ever seem like I need a pep talk, just remember: I don’t, okay?”

“No, it’s good,” croaked Harry. “Maybe the boar will come back and take out the dragon for me.”

She turned to Draco. “What about you? How do you feel?”

“Ready to embark on a promising career in animal control.”

But this was a poor bluff. He’d woken up at four with his stomach in knots and staggered to the bathroom, where he spent an hour resisting the urge to empty his guts of what little dinner he’d managed the night before. Sleep deserted him, and so he dressed and waited with Harry in the common room, turning his wand over and over in his hands, while people trickled down to breakfast with excited choruses of “Good luck!” and “Don’t muck it up!” and “Thrash ’em!”

At five minutes to nine, Cedric Diggory came over to the Gryffindor table, trailing a coterie of moon-eyed Hufflepuffs, and shook Harry’s hand.

“Good luck, Harry,” he said warmly. “Everyone’s terribly excited to see you show up today. Give ’em the old what-for, for Hogwarts, yeah?”

“Thanks,” said Harry awkwardly. “I — listen, Ced, it should’ve been you.”

“Nah,” he said, smiling with only a touch of regret. It really was disgusting, thought Draco, how fair he was being about the whole business. “If it should’ve been, it would’ve been. And anyway, now I get to have a bit of a sit while you and Warrington do the hard part.”

“Warrington’s not going to win bugger-all,” said Ginny. She forked a kipper across the table and popped it in her mouth. The letters R-Y and P-O marched in bright red paint across her freckled cheeks; Fred and George, on either side of her, wore ‘H-A-R’ and ‘T-T-E-R.’ They had all constellated around Harry at breakfast like a praetorian guard of redheads. Fred was busily piling eggs onto Harry’s plate, while George fussed with the strap on his glasses.

“I like to think it’s not about putting anyone down,” said Cedric. “Everyone’s just trying to do their best for their school.”

“Maybe the others are,” said Fred, shoving a tray of kippers at Harry. “Harry’s here to thrash them.”

Cedric gave a polite laugh and he turned back to Harry. “Hey, listen. It’s easy to feel sort of alone out there,” he said. “But we’re all on the same team. You're still the Hogwarts champion, and we're behind you. I'll be cheering for both you and Warrington."

"Oh. Thanks, mate."

Draco privately thought that it was kind but utterly addled of Cedric to infer that Harry was nervous about feeling insufficiently supported by his schoolmates; a fat lot of good school spirit would do him, if he got ripped limb from limb. They shook hands again, and then Cedric crossed the Great Hall, to the Slytherin table.

"Merlin, what's he doing?" said Ginny incredulously. "He's not going to—"

"He's trying to shake Warrington's hand, too," said Hermione, who didn't sound much surer than Ginny did. "I suppose he's — trying to be a good sport."

The operative word was trying. Cedric reached Cassius' seat, said something, and extended his hand — and there was a long, dangling beat, where no one at the Slytherin table moved a muscle — and then Cassius slowly, painstakingly stood up, enclosed Cedric's hand with his fingers, and gave it a jerk.

"He's making a hash of it," said Ginny crossly. "You can't support both. You might as well be on Warrington's team, at that point."

"Warrington doesn't have a team," said Hermione primly. "That was Cedric's whole point, wasn't it? That we're all here for Hogwarts."

"If he thinks so, he's fooling himself, Mione," said George sagely. He sealed the end of the strap with a knot and settled the glasses carefully back over Harry's ears. "You look around and tell me there's not teams. It's like Christmas in here."

It was: red and green peppered the four house tables like Christmas baubles, hanging from the necks and shoulders of bedecked supporters, stamped in paint across the faces of eager young Ravenclaws and Hufflepuffs, some of whom Draco didn't even recognize, and must have been too young to know who Harry or Cassius even were. It was a horse race for them. A competition, fun for fun's sake. Pick a team and cheer. Place your bets.

Draco wasn't sure why it felt like more than that. It shouldn't have. For all that it was dangerous, it was still only a game. An extracurricular activity. Like quidditch. Like the House Cup.

But he'd never seen a Ravenclaw wear a Slytherin scarf, before, either.

Professor McGonagall appeared behind them. She wore a pair of red earrings, which by her standards was an outrageously political move. "Potter, the champions have to come down onto the grounds now. I shall accompany you."

Ron leapt to his feet in a seizure of silverware. "Can we go with him?"

"I'm sorry, Mr. Weasley." To her credit, she did sound it. "Champions must receive instructions alone."

"Okay. Just to the pitch. I can come with him to the pitch, can't I?"

"If Mr. Potter allows—"

"Yeah," interrupted Harry. "I mean yes. He can come. Please."

He got up and floated after McGonagall with a strange, distant expression, like he was sleepwalking. Ron followed half a step behind, with an anxious spring in his step. As they passed under the archway, McGonagall placed her hand on Harry's shoulder, and he leaned towards her, as if to ask a question. Then they were out of sight.

"That means — we haven't much time," said Hermione, haltingly. "If you're finished—?"

“God, yes, this is intolerable. Let’s go.”

As they walked into the bright December sunshine, he wondered how his father felt on the morning of his trial.

The thought dropped errantly into his head, and lingered there, troubling the waters. He didn’t think about his father often. He thought about him abstractly, as the person to hold the Malfoy title before him, and as a personage whose dignity and reputation was to be maintained, and, occasionally, a tall and pine-scented presence lingering in the background of several fond memories. But he hadn’t often considered how Lucius would have felt about something. The idea of him as real, as a person that lived and breathed and sweated from nerves, was so foreign it was like the Hogwarts castle having a personality.

“Did you sleep?” said Hermione. Her voice broke the monotony of leaf-crunching.

“No.”

“Neither did I.”

“Why not?”

“I felt sick.”

“Whatever about?”

She folded her arms and scowled.

“What? Not me, surely.”

“Of course I did,” she said tautly. “If you got hurt, I’d be a perfect mess.”

The morning light was falling warm and buttery on her hair, which she had bound back in elastic, and she had rolled up her sleeves for some reason. It was like she’d prepared herself for battle.

“A perfect mess?” he repeated, and was dismayed to find it didn’t sound mocking at all.

“Yes, obviously. You’re— oh, of course it’s here. I have come to altogether hate this place, you know.”

The Quidditch pitch had been repurposed for the occasion. From a distance, he could hear the spectators rumble, the floodlights up and blazing to cut the sun. A tent had been erected around the players’ entrance, leading through the enclave under the stands usually reserved for smoking cigarettes and whatever it was Fred and Angelina did after practice.

“I’m what?” he said, but the moment was lost, gone, strapped to the tracks while her train of thought thundered over it.

She darted up to the side of the champion’s tent, and crouched down, out of sight. He bent next to her, his knees brushing the wet sheen of dew. After a moment, the flap flickered, and Harry slipped out.

Hermione piped a short whistle around two fingers. Harry ducked down with them in the grass.

“Alright,” he said queasily, rubbing his hands. “I haven’t got a lot of time, they think I’m out to piss.”

“That’s fine, just tell us which one you’ve got.”

“The Hungarian Horntail. It’s black, with these big barbs—”

“The big one?”

“Draco, they’re all big,” he said, speaking from the bad edge of panic. “Krum got the Shortsnout, and Warrington got Norberta. Fleur got the nice green one without any teeth. Think she might’ve passed out from relief.”

“That’s the Welsh Green, and they spit acid, in addition to breathing fire,” said Hermione. “She won’t be celebrating for long. When’s your turn?”

“Last.”

“Perfect. Alright. Harry, you remember the key is to keep moving, right? Don’t stop moving. Ever. If you can do that,” she said, “all you have to do is—”

“Battle the dragon?”

She lurched forward and hugged him.

Harry yelped in surprise and toppled over on his bum, which led to: “I’m sorry! I’m sorry,” and “No, my fault,” “I thought you’d be stronger,” and, finally, “Oi.”

Harry grabbed Draco’s shoulders. “Don’t die,” he intoned, and then, to Draco’s surprise, did something he’d only ever seen Harry do with Ron: he delivered a short, hard headbutt to the top of his skull.

If this was meant to convey fraternal love and affection, it failed. It hurt like hell. He was left yowling and clutching his head while Harry hurried back into the tent.

“This is the thanks I get for risking my life? You get a full embrace, and I’m stuck with a concussion?”

“Boys,” she said fondly.

“Disaggregate me from that category immediately. I did not consent to that interaction.”

“Not so loud, you’ll hurt his feelings.”

“He hurt my frontal plate!”

“You’ll recover.”

They skulked around to the back of the dragon paddock, where they scaled a hastily erected wooden fence, dispelled a few Repulsor Charms, and a minute later stood on the edge of a wide, sandy hollow in the earth, as if someone had reached down and scooped out a place for the dragons to roost. Iron bars lay over the hollow, sealing the winged creatures off from any escape to the sky, and if that failed, the chains that shrieked and rattled as they prowled around their shaded chamber ought to have done the trick. Everything reeked of sulfur and charred flesh, except for his mouth, which suddenly tasted like metal.

Hermione drew her wand and leaned out over the edge. The height must have impressed itself on her quickly, because she drew back with a squeak. “You’ll — er — need your broom,” she said faintly.

Apparently she wasn’t going to offer him a hug, like Harry; that was fine. He didn’t like them.

He withdrew a small case from his pocket and cast Finite Incantatem. The Nimbus swelled to its usual size, and he carefully removed it from its berth.

“You can drop it from a height,” she added. “They’ll smell it. You don’t have to get too close, is what I mean.”

“And here I was trying to conduct a dental inspection.”

He slung the satchel around his shoulder and mounted the broomstick. It hummed to life under him, lifting up, and he braced himself with one foot on the grass. Hermione shook out the Invisibility Cloak, and he draped it over his shoulders. When he looked down he saw nothing but the ground under his broomstick, and the sight brought with it a bleary wave of unreality, like dreaming.

“Where are all the attendants?” Hermione murmured. “I don’t like this.”

“Moving Fleur’s Green into the arena, I’d wager. We’re not rich in time.”

“Yes, but — Draco, be careful.”

He looked at her. She had pressed her fingers into a tiny knot and was applying pressure like she was trying to achieve nuclear fusion inside it. Drawing on the slender reserves of his remaining confidence, he smirked.

“Ready to be amazed, Granger?”

“No!”

“Too bad.”

The Horntail sighed a huge curtain of smoke. Now that he was above it, he could see the glitter of embers in its throat and nostrils, the places where magic met chemistry and became death. It was bigger than the others, damn him, the poor sot couldn’t have drawn anything else. Bigger and more horrifying, with ashen filmy bat’s wings crested with bone-white claws, trunk-like legs covered in fat hanks of plated muscle, a trapjaw of teeth that jutted out of its very skull for want of space. It sniffed the air and gave a mournful shriek.

Air rippled past in a bath of heat. Draco instinctively veered, but it was only breath, no fire, all sound. The other dragons heard it and took up shrieks of their own, chains groaning and warping the metal fastenings.

He circled the Horntail, considering his approach. The good news was that the dragon didn’t seem to see him, between the smoke and the Cloak and its tiny pathetic rage-filled eyes. It knew something was there, but it couldn’t find him, and it worked itself into agitation snaking its head to and fro. The bad news — and it was very bad news — was also old news: it was, in fact, a dragon. A big old ugly fire-breathing dragon. And as it reared back his head, an electric jolt informed him that he was about to find out why.

A column of fire erupted from the pit. It broached the bars and leapt skyward like it sought to melt the sun. Draco threw himself sideways, almost lost his grip, and veered away from the Horntail's chamber. This saved his life. Unfortunately, it also brought him veering over the other dragons, who gave screams of their own, and let out a pair of answering jets of fire.

He looked over the guttering geysers, blinked, and saw a row of floating yellow cones, rising through the pale morning fog of a brutal six o'clock practice. Blinked again, and they were gone.

He had never been so grateful in his life for Oliver Wood. He'd have to buy out Puddlemere and give him a raise.

He hauled his broom sideways and wove between geysers of fire. The air was a blur of red and yellow and white. The heat crackled against his face and he could smell something burning — the best he could do was pray it wasn't him — as he rounded the last flame column and shot back to the Horntail along the side of the pit. Heat prickled the back of his broomstick, but the wind whisked it away.

"Draco!" Hermione cupped her hands around her mouth. "It's not a continuous jet! They need time to accumulate ethylene in their bronchi, remember? From Egg to Inferno?"

"Yes, that's exactly what's on my mind—"

He swept past her and rounded in for another drop, but there was so much smoke that the Horntail was barely more than a shadow swirling around in the pit. Smoke curled and billowed around his ankles. When he crept out over the Horntail pit and there was no fire forthcoming, he took a deep, bolstering breath — stupid goddamn mistake, now his eyes were watering — and sank down over the pit.

"The longer it stops, the bigger the jet!"

He wished dearly that she would shut up. Dragons didn't have great vision, but their sensitive ears could most certainly pick up the shrilling of a noisome fifteen-year-old girl who apparently wanted him dead.

A muffled roar came from the stands. The indistinct prattle of commentary echoed behind it. Fleur had done something. Get eaten, possibly.

He was about to ask Hermione what was so damn important, anyway, when the Horntail lunged. It seized the bars of its cage and beat itself against them like a rabid engaged animal. Draco shouted and whipped up into a breakneck incline while the dragon's clubbed tail battered itself deafeningly against the bars and its claws carved great glistening slivers of metal from the lattice. A premonition of heat on the back of his neck was his only warning. He hauled backwards into a hairpin U-dive, cutting down towards the pit, while a bellow of flame roasted the air where he'd been a moment ago.
